The Gebietskommissar in Kostopol was SA-Standartenführer Loehnert, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Wichmann.¹ A local Ukrainian administration and a Ukrainian police force were established in Derażne and reported to the local post of the German Gendarmerie that was established in September 1941, consisting of several German Gendarmes.

In the summer and fall of 1941, German occupational authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in the village. Jews were required to wear the Star of David for identification purposes; they had to surrender all gold and valuables; they were made to perform hard labor; they were forbidden to leave the village limits without permission; and the Ukrainian police subjected them to systematic looting and beatings. The German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in the village, which they used to transmit and enforce their orders and regulations for the Jewish population.

On October 5, 1941, the Germans established a ghetto in Derażne, where the Jews from the nearby villages were placed as well, about 1,000 people in total. The ghetto existed for almost 11 months.² In May 1942, most of the able-bodied men were sent for forced labor to work camps outside the ghetto, such that thereafter the inmates consisted mainly of women, children, and the elderly.³ The women also were obliged to work in agriculture to receive food or a ration card. According to one survivor account, the ghetto remained unfenced, but all the Jews were moved in together with those who already lived in the houses around the main square. Therefore, it remained fairly easy to sneak in and out of the ghetto.⁴

On August 24, 1942, the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie liquidated the ghetto. According to Chayah Sherman's recollection, in the evening (probably of August 23), all the Jews were ordered to assemble in the main square of the ghetto. Some Jews thought of escaping, but the rabbis and members of the Judenrat warned them that probably everyone would be killed if the Jews did not comply with German demands. While the Jews were gathered in the square, Germans and Ukrainians searched attics and basements in the ghetto for any Jews in hiding. From the square, the Jews were marched three abreast through the Ukrainian villages, watched by their neighbors. Jews begged the Ukrainians for water, in vain.⁵

The Jews of Derażne, together with those of the nearby village of Osowa Wyszka,⁶ 1,868 people in total,⁷ were escorted by the Ukrainian police to an area near Kostopol and then shot there by a squad of the Security Police and SD from Równe. In the fall of 1942, the Ukrainian police and the German Gendarmerie caught 152 Jews in hiding and shot them in an area 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) north of the village.⁸

SOURCES An article on the destruction of the Jewish population of Derażne can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 67–68.

Documents regarding the destruction of the Jews of Derażne can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1268 and 2872); DARO; GARF (7021-71-47); VHF (# 22483); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. AŻIH, 301/1268, testimony of A. Dereczynski.

3. Ibid.

4. VHF, # 2483, interview with Chayah Sherman.

5. Ibid.

6. According to the 1921 census, there were 700 Jews residing in the village of Osowa Wyszka. Allowing for an annual natural population growth of 9 to 10 per 1,000, by mid-1941 there would have been approximately 850 Jews. About 30 Jewish youths from Osowa Wyszka escaped to the forest and formed a partisan unit.

7. GARF, 7021-71-47, p. 1. AŻIH, 301/1268, however, gives the date of August 22, 1942, for the liquidation of all the ghettos in Gebiet Kostopol.

8. GARF, 7021-71-47, pp. 20, 22–23.

DOMACZÓW

Pre-1939: Domaczów, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Domachevo, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Domatschewo, Rayon center, Gebiet Brest-Litowsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Domachawa, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Domaczów is located about 48 kilometers (30 miles) south of Brześć. In 1921, the Jewish population of Domaczów was 1,337. At the time of the German occupation, including a number of refugees who had arrived from central and western Poland, there were probably about 3,000 Jews residing in the town.¹

Units of the German 1st Cavalry Division captured Domaczów on June 22, 1941. Combat operations destroyed roughly half the houses in town; many Jews became casualties. Then the Germans began a program of restrictions, abuse, plunder, and murder.

The Germans established a ghetto within two or three months. The ghetto was quite small and overcrowded, consisting of only about 30 wooden houses. It was fenced with planks of wood along the main road and by barbed wire on the other sides. Jews from the surrounding villages, such as Leplówka, were also brought into the Domaczów ghetto.²

The Storch family vacations with friends in Chelmski guesthouse in Domaczów, 1938.

USHMM WS #64239, COURTESY OF HELENA JACOBS

During the summer of 1941, the town was administered by a succession of military administrative headquarters: for example, in early August 1941, Feldkommandantur 594 was based in the town.³ The first Rayon mayor appointed by the Germans was the Pole Stanisław Gwiadziński. The Germans arrested him in early 1942 and later murdered him. The mayor of Domaczów, appointed in February 1942, was an ethnic German named Ludwig.⁴

In the fall of 1941, a civil administration took over responsibility for the region from the military authorities. Domaczów became a Rayon center in Gebiet Brest-Litowsk, subordinated to the Gebietskommissar (Brest-Land), Curt Rolle. In August 1942, part of a German cavalry squadron arrived in Domaczów to reinforce the Gendarmerie post.

Shortly after their arrival, the Germans established a local police force made up of about 40 local Ukrainian and Polish volunteers, supervised by four German Gendarmes. The commander of the local police from the spring of 1942 to the summer of 1943 was Konstanty Korneluk. The tasks of the local police included guarding the ghetto and searching people returning from work to ensure they did not smuggle in any food. As Jewish survivor Faibel Stul later recalled, “[T]he Jews in the ghetto were not given any provisions; they were starving and were therefore compelled to go to their deaths on the other side of the wire in their quest for a piece of bread.”⁵ Local policemen also beat Jews they caught not wearing their yellow patches and demanded from the Judenrat that clothing and other items be made especially for them.

The winter of 1941–1942 was very cold, with temperatures sometimes more than 30 degrees below zero. No fuel was available to heat the houses in the ghetto, and the Jews had to burn their furniture to stay warm. There was insufficient food, and people lost their will to go on, as it appeared there was no end in sight; they were almost envious of those who died. Frequent raids into the ghetto by the Germans and the local police terrorized the ghetto population.

According to a German report dated March 1942, artisan workshops were established for blacksmiths, carpenters, tailors, and other craftsmen in Domaczów in order for “Aryans” to be trained by Jewish specialists.⁶ In the spring of 1942, the Judenrat asked all the Jews to assemble at the entrance to the ghetto; the younger men and women were loaded onto trucks and taken away, presumably for forced labor for digging peat and building roads, which the Gebietskommissar in Brześć demanded of all Jews capable of work.⁷ According to one account, some 500 Jews were taken from the Domaczów ghetto in May 1942 for work on the Brześć-Kowel highway. Apparently those who were exhausted and weakened were shot shortly afterwards.⁸

During the summer of 1942, conditions in the ghetto for those remaining deteriorated, and some Jews, including Ben-Zion Blustein’s family, constructed hiding places in anticipation of further recruitment of forced laborers or also a possible “liquidation Aktion.”⁹ Rumors spread of the massacre of the inhabitants from the ghettos in neighboring towns, such as Kowel and Małoryta.

On Sunday, September 20, 1942, a German special detachment arrived in Domaczów. The Jews received instructions to report to the sports stadium, where the Germans took away their gold and other valuables and forced them to strip naked. The local police then escorted them in large groups to a sandy area in the forest about 500 meters (0.3 mile) east of Domaczów. Here they were made to lie facedown on the ground. The Germans then shot the Jews and buried them in a pit.¹⁰ At the killing site, the Germans singled out 13 Jews who were kept alive to work in the stables for the cavalry squadron.¹¹

Shortly afterwards, the German Gendarmerie commander in Brześć reported that “on September 19 and 20, 1942, about 2,900 Jews were shot in Domaczów and Tomaszówka by a special command of the SD together with the cavalry squadron stationed in Domaczów, the Gendarmerie, and the Schutzmannschaft [local police]. The ‘Jewish Aktion’ took place without any disturbances.”¹² The village elder in Domaczów at the time, Moisei Naumchik, covered the graves with lime about a week after the mass shooting. He estimated that the Germans had shot about 1,000 Jews.¹³ The precise number of Jews in the Domaczów ghetto at the time of its liquidation is not known. Given the departure of many Jews to work on forced labor projects prior to the Aktion, the number of Jews killed was probably about 1,000, consisting mainly of the elderly, women, and children.

In the days after the massacre, the local police repeatedly searched the ghetto area and murdered any Jews they found—some had hidden in bunkers and other hiding spots—while also looting Jewish property.

After the massacre, the Gebietskommissar in Brześć complained that he had not been informed beforehand and that consequently the local population had plundered Jewish property. The small soap factory in Domaczów was forced to close down, as all its workers had been killed.¹⁴ In November 1942, the Gebietskommissar issued instructions for the former Jewish houses to be sold by the end of the year.¹⁵

The Germans issued orders that anyone hiding Jews would be strictly punished, and rewards were offered for those who turned Jews in. For example, Boris Grunstein was handed over to the Domaczów police after he was discovered by the local blacksmith, Stanisław Szepeł.¹⁶ Most Jews who survived did so by joining the Soviet partisan movement in the area. In late 1943, the Soviet partisans launched an attack on the town of Domaczów in which they burned part of the town and killed several local policemen. In December 1943, there were eight Jewish members of the “Voroshilov” partisan group operating in the area, out of a total strength of 423 men and 26 women.¹⁷ Only a handful of Jews survived to return to the town after its liberation by the Red Army in the fall of 1944.

Of the local policemen involved in guarding the ghetto, escorting the Jews to the killing site, and especially in hunting down surviving Jews after the massacre, several were tried by the Soviets in the period from 1944 to 1948. The Polish authorities tried the head of the local police, Konstanty Korneluk, in the 1960s. Andrei Sawoniuk, a Non-Commissioned Officer (NCO) in the local police, was convicted on two counts of murder by a British court at the Old Bailey in 1999. He was the only person to be successfully prosecuted under the British (Nazi) War Crimes Act passed in 1991 and was given a mandatory life sentence for the crime of murder. He died in Norwich jail in November 2005.¹⁸

SOURCES Documents on the German occupation of Domaczów and the fate of the town’s Jews can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBBO; BA-BL (R 94); BA-L; GABO; GARF; IPN; NARB; Sta. Dortmund; WCU; and YVA. Much of this article is based on the statement of Ben-Zion Blustein at the Committal hearing at Bow Street Magistrates Court in London in the case against Anthony (Andrei) Sawoniuk, a local policeman from Domaczów, in 1998 (cited as Bow Street, Blustein, 1998).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-BL, R 94/7, Report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, March 24, 1942; BA-BL, RD 207/3-2, pp. 7–32, Zentralblatt Reichskommissariat Ukraine, January 9, 1943.

2. Bow Street, Blustein, 1998; WCU, Mariya Ivanovna Onufriyuk, Officer’s Information (OFI), February 1997; WCU, statement of Sergei Ulyanovich Melyanyuk, February 1997; Sta. Dortmund, 45 Js 13/64 (case against Hahn), vol. 1, pp. 82–86, statement of Erwin Glas on June 18, 1968. Blackbook of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), p. 148, gives a population of 14 Jews for Leplówka in 1921.

3. BA-BL, R 2104/16, p. 353.

4. Ibid., R 94/7, Report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, February 24, 1942.

5. IPN, SWGd 72-74, Case against Konstanty Korneluk, pp. 11–12, statement of Anastasiya Andreevna Yuzvik, August 3, 1967; AUKGBRBBO, Search File for Konstanty Korneluk, pp. 10–11, statement of the Jewish survivor Faibel Shmulyevich Stul, October 30, 1945.

6. BA-BL, R 94/7, Report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, March 24, 1942.

7. Ibid., R 94/6, Report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, Labor Office, July 6, 1942.

8. GABO, 514-1-195, pp. 4–7.

9. Bow Street, Blustein, 1998.

10. AUKGBRBBO, Case of Ivan Yefimovich Chikun, Arch. File No. 466, vol. 2, pp. 94–98, statement of Ivan Stepanovich Khvisyuchik, March 16, 1983.

11. Ibid., Case of Roman Antonovich Vitovskiy, Archive No. 6134, pp. 30–31, statement of the accused, January 28, 1945.

12. BA-BL, R 94/7, Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer Brest-Litowsk, situation report, October 6, 1942.

13. IPN, SWGd 72-74, testimony of Moisei Evstaf'evich Naumchik.

14. BA-BL, R 94/7, Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, situation report, October 9, 1942; Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer Brest-Litowsk, situation report, October 6, 1942.

15. GABO, 195-1-300, p. 11, Gebietskommissar Brest to all Rayon chiefs on the use of houses left empty by the Jews, November 14, 1942.

16. See especially AUKGBRBBO, Case of Stanislav Dmitrevich Shepel, File No. 42 (1944).

17. NARB, 3500-4-305, Partisan records of the Stalin Brigade, 1942–44.

18. The Guardian, November 7, 2005.

DROHICZYN

Pre-1939: Drohiczyn, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941 and 1944–1990: Drogichin, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Drogitschin, Rayon center, Gebiet Kobryn, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Drabichyn, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Drohiczyn is located about halfway between Kobryń and Pińsk on the main highway from Brześć to Gomel'. In 1921 there were 1,521 Jews living in Drohiczyn. In September 1939, Soviet forces occupied the town, which was incorporated into the Soviet Union shortly thereafter. Under Soviet rule, most shops and businesses were nationalized.

German forces occupied Drohiczyn on June 25, 1941. The only Jews who managed to flee were those with close connections to the Soviet authorities, including the photographer Israel Shvarts. On their arrival, the Germans searched Jewish houses, looking for arms, and stole items of value.¹

In the first weeks of occupation, a German military commandant controlled Drohiczyn. After a few days, he established a local administration, appointing as mayor the Pole Czaplinski, who organized a police force made up mainly of Poles. During the second week, the mayor ordered the Jews to place a Star of David on their houses and to wear yellow patches on their clothes. The Germans ordered the Jews living in the nearby villages to move into town.²

In early July, a detachment of Security Police arrived in Drohiczyn and arrested a number of Jews, allegedly as Communist activists. They then shot these prisoners 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) outside the town. At the beginning of August, assisted by the Christian population, units of German SS-Cavalry Regiment I, commanded by SS-Sturmabführer Gustav Lombard, brutally murdered almost all the Jews in the town of Chomsk (in Rayon Drogitschin) and also in Motol, after collecting a large "contribution" from those Jewish communities. German propaganda blamed the Jews for the war, both as Communists and capitalists, supposedly influencing the governments in the Soviet Union and the United States, respectively.³

Group portrait of Jewish physicians in Drohiczyn who later committed suicide rather than witness the murder of the town's Jews, n.d. Among those pictured are Dr. Shekhter (third from left) and Dr. Lampel (second from right).

USHMM WS #41040, COURTESY OF YIVO

As of September 1, 1941, authority was transferred from the military to a German civil administration. Drohiczyn was incorporated into Gebiet Kobryn, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Kobryń was Regierungsassessor Oscar Panzer.⁴ In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Drohiczyn. Jews were required to perform forced labor. They were forbidden to walk on the pavements, read the newspaper, listen to the radio, communicate with Christians, or leave their place of residence; and their schools were closed down. The local auxiliary police also beat and robbed them with impunity.⁵

To assist in the enforcement of German regulations, the commandant ordered the Jews to elect a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Not all Jews wanted to serve on the council, but Litman Feldman was chosen as its first head, soon to be replaced by his deputy, Jakov Sidorov. Two Jewish doctors also advised the council, and a Jewish police force served under it. The council's first task was to collect from the Jews a "contribution" of 10,000 rubles and 2 kilograms (4.4 pounds) of gold within two hours, or the Germans would shoot everyone. Out of fear, the Jews promptly surrendered their watches, jewelry, and money to meet the demand. The Jewish Council also built up a reserve of cash, to meet future demands and pay bribes. Another major task it performed was the organization of forced labor, with the Jewish Police sometimes using force to comply with German demands. The onerous burdens placed on ordinary Jews led to resentment against the Jewish Council and Jewish Police, some of whom were accused of enriching themselves.⁶

Soon after the arrival of the Germans, rumors spread in Drohiczyn that a ghetto might be established. In fact, the ghetto was set up in several stages. First, the Jews were driven completely from a few streets inhabited mainly by Poles, including the so-called Zamd, the street that led to the Jewish cemetery. Around this time (late summer 1941), several hundred Jewish refugees also arrived from Chomsk, Szereszów, and the nearby village of Kolonie, leading to considerable overcrowding in the shtetl. Meanwhile, German requisitions emptied most Jewish houses of their furniture. However, local Christians continued to trade food illegally with the Jews in exchange for clothing, supplementing the meager official ration of 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread and a little fat and sugar per day.⁷

The Gebietskommissar in Kobryń ordered the Jews of Drohiczyn to move into two separate ghettos on April 1, 1942 (Passover): Ghetto A for “useful Jews” and Ghetto B for “non-useful Jews.” The “useful workers” received special papers, and a lively trade in these certificates developed in the weeks before the establishment of the ghettos, as officials sold them secretly to the highest bidder, rather than issuing them directly to the actual craftsmen. The move into the two ghettos lasted several days. Soon Ghetto A was surrounded with a fence 2.5 meters (8.2 feet) high, while some of the youths from Ghetto B were sent to forced labor camps at Piotrowicze, Radostów, and elsewhere in the Gebiet. In the camps, the Jews mainly worked constructing roads or chopping wood. They received weekly food packages from the Jews in Drohiczyn. Those working as craftsmen in Ghetto A received additional food from Christian customers in payment for their work, while in Ghetto B some trade continued, as it was not fenced in.⁸

On July 25, 1942, the Germans and local collaborators conducted an Aktion against Ghetto B. Polish and Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto at 11:00 P.M. and together with members of the Jewish Police assisted a detachment of German mounted police in brutally driving the ghetto inhabitants to the market square, where they were forced to surrender their boots and other valuable items. The Aktion lasted more than seven hours, as many Jews tried to hide. From the market square the Jews were escorted to the railway station. In total, some 1,700 Jews (including some from Ghetto A) were deported by rail to Bronnaia Gora, where they were shot on arrival together with Jews from Kobryń and Antopol. Only three members of the Jewish Council survived the Aktion.⁹

Following this Aktion, a new Jewish Council was established in Ghetto A, and the Jewish Police was reorganized. Christians moved into the houses of Ghetto B, and the property left behind was collected in a special warehouse. The Christians continued to trade illegally with the Jews, so there was no starvation in the ghetto. The yizkor book also speaks favorably of the two “Russian” mayors, Kreiditsh and Bori-siuk, who succeeded Czapliński: they helped the Jews to meet some of the German demands for contributions and warned them of the impending liquidation of Ghetto A.

After a while, a number of specialist craftsmen were selected from the ghetto and sent to Kobryń, which indicated to those remaining that they in turn were now becoming “unnecessary.” Both at the nearby labor camp of Radostów and in Drohiczyn, the Jewish leaders tried to bribe the German authorities, in the hope that this would save them. However, the SD shot the entire Jewish Council just before the final liquidation of the ghetto in October 1942.¹⁰

On October 15, 1942, the local police surrounded the ghetto and drove the Jews (according to the yizkor book, about 3,000 of them) out to the railway station near the cemetery, where on this occasion the Germans shot them into a large mass grave. As they had expected this Aktion, many Jews hid inside the ghetto, and a number succeeded in fleeing. However, the Germans offered a reward of 50 Reichsmark (RM) with tobacco and schnapps to local peasants for handing over Jews, while also threatening with death those caught hiding them. The search for Jews in the empty ghetto lasted several days, and more were captured and killed (some betrayed by local peasants) in the surrounding forests thereafter. A few Jews managed to reach the Prużana ghetto in Distrikt Białystok, sharing the fate of the other Jews there. Some survived by hiding with local peasants and subsequently joined the Soviet partisan units that grew stronger in the area during 1943. Several, such as Erial Pomerantz, died as partisans fighting against the Germans.¹¹

In 1944, the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) uncovered a mass grave near Drohiczyn that apparently contained 3,816 corpses, partly tied to each other with barbed wire, including 895 men, 1,083 women, and 1,838 children. Given the breakdown of the victims by age and sex, the vast majority of these were probably Jews.¹²

SOURCES A detailed account of the persecution of the Jews in Drohiczyn can be found in the yizkor book edited by B. Varshavski, Drobitsshin, finf hundert yor Yidish-lebn (Chicago: Bukh Komitet Drohitshin, 1958), especially pp. 287–303; there is also a short article in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 242–244.

Documents regarding the fate of the Jews of Drohiczyn during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-98-28); NARB (845-1-13); StA-Wfb; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Varshavski, Drobitsshin, finf hundert yor Yidish-lebn, pp. 287–289.

2. Ibid., p. 289.

3. StA-Wfb, 62 Nds Fb. 2, Nr. 1304, p. 269, report of SS Kav. Rgt. I, August 11, 1941; Varshavski, Drobitsshin, finf hundert yor Yidish-lebn, p. 290.

4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

5. Varshavski, Drobitsbin, finf bundert yor Yidish-lebn, pp. 289–291.

6. Ibid., p. 291.

7. Ibid., pp. 292–293. On the fate of the Jews of Szereszów, see also Moishe Kantorowitz, My Mother's Bequest: From Sber-shev to Auschwitz to Newfoundland (Canada: Moishe Kantorowitz, 2004).

8. Varshavski, Drobitsbin, finf bundert yor Yidish-lebn, pp. 293–294.

9. Ibid., pp. 294–295; see also Benzion H. Ayalon, ed., An̄topol: An̄tipolye sefer-yizkor (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e An̄topol be-Yisrael uve-Amerikah, 1972), pp. 564–565.

10. Varshavski, Drobitsbin, finf bundert yor Yidish-lebn, pp. 296–299; the craftsmen in Kobryń were murdered in 1943.

11. Ibid., pp. 298–301.

12. GARF, 7021-98-28, pp. 1 and reverse, Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, October 30 to November 2, 1944.

DUBNO

Pre-1939: Dubno, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941 and 1944–1990: raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Dubno is located about 44 kilometers (27 miles) southwest of Równe. According to Moyshe Vaysberg and other sources, in 1939, the Jewish population of Dubno numbered some 12,000, or approximately 60 percent of the total population. In 1941, with the influx of refugees fleeing from Nazi-occupied western Poland, the number of Jews grew to about 13,000.¹

German troops arrived in Dubno only a few days after invading the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. Yehoshua Vubk writes that “shortly after the Germans entered Dubno, they established a Ukrainian police force and a municipal administration, made up of Ukrainians.”² Ukrainian administrators included the mayor Burka, deputy mayor Servas, and a village elder (starosta), Siderovich.”³ Anti-Jewish measures took effect almost immediately, including marking, expropriation, harassment, beatings, and killings. In three Aktionen between late June and late August, the Germans and Ukrainians killed well over 1,000 Jews at the Jewish cemetery. The first took place on June 30, 1941, when 23 Jews accused of collaboration with the NKVD were killed. During the second Aktion in mid-July, 80 men, mostly leaders and prominent members of the Jewish community, were killed. The third Aktion on August 21, 1941, was directed at the more assimilated members of the Jewish intelligentsia. Ukrainian militia forced their way into Jewish houses, dragged out the men, including, according to Helen Segall, her father, Hersh Leyb Szwom, his two brothers and two brothers-in-law. Together with men caught on the street they were taken first to the market place, later to the city jail, and finally all (about 900 to 1000 men) were murdered at the Jewish cemetery that day.

A Jewish water-carrier stands next to a horse-drawn cart on the streets of Dubno, ca. 1927–1930.

USHMM WS #64353, COURTESY OF YIVO

In mid-July, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Konrad Toybenfeld was placed at its head.⁴ “Rozenbaum and Bakszt were the directors of the Jewish Labor Office.”⁵ The Judenrat was ordered to collect sums of money and household goods as “contributions.” In the first week of August 1941, the German Ortskommandantur II (V) 909 in Dubno ordered the Judenrat to collect and surrender all the Jews’ gold, silver, and other valuables.⁶ In December 1941, the Judenrat had to collect and deliver to the Germans all fur and woolen items. Vaysberg noted that these orders were carried out with particular care, although people did what they could to hide their valuables.⁷ Jews were burying their jewelry and taking their valuables, silver, china, clothing, furs, and even furniture to their Christian Polish, Czech, and Ukrainian friends for safekeeping “until the war is over.”

After the first wave of killings, life went on, but it was never the same. Jews continued to live in their own houses and kept many of their possessions. There was privation but no general starvation. By September 1941, a German civil administration had taken over from the military. According to Vaysberg, the German administration of Dubno included the commandant of the Gendarmerie, von Papke, known for his cruelty; the leader of the German Labor Office (Arbeitsamt), Hauptmann Hammerstein; Gebietskommissar Werner Broks, who was responsible for the mass killings in 1942; his representative Stabsleiter Alleter; and Inspector Wiese.⁸ As news of murders committed during Aktionen in Równe and other towns began to spread, people became nervous. The violence continued. Homes were vandalized by local Ukrainians, and people were arrested on trumped-up charges, jailed, and executed. “In such a way, my uncle Moniek Katz, Aunt Hana’s husband, was accused of listening to the radio, arrested, beaten, and shot on February 23, 1942.”⁹

The ghetto was officially established on April 2, 1942, the first day of Passover. It was located in the old Jewish section of town. Its northern border was Trzeciego Sierpnia Street, the main road leading from Zabrama in the west to Surmicze on the eastern outskirts of town. The Ikwa River marked its southern border. People were given 24 hours to move in. They had to leave most of their belongings behind, as there was no time or space for furniture, kitchen utensils, and clothing to be transported.¹⁰ On the same day, a very tall wooden fence topped with barbed wire was constructed between the buildings forming the outer border of the ghetto. Windows and doors facing outward were boarded up and sealed tight.¹¹ Helen Segall writes that she and her mother were able to move in with her “grandparents, Golda and Pinchas Ajzenberg, whose house was on the edge of the ghetto. This made the move less traumatic.”¹² Some 11,000 Jews were crowded into the ghetto. It included people fleeing German persecution in other places. Bringing goods, food supplies, and other items into the ghetto was strictly forbidden and punishable by beatings, imprisonment, and even death. Nevertheless, people took risks and did it. There was hunger and epidemic diseases soon began to spread.

There were no public cultural activities in the Dubno ghetto. Religious and personal events were observed among family members in the space they occupied. Many people had books. Segall comments: “My mother, aunts, and I read a lot. My grandfather studied the Torah and prayed.”¹³

People able to work gathered at the gate every morning. Here they were organized into groups. Jewish Police led them to work in the morning and back into the ghetto each evening. Work varied. It was on construction sites, on the railroad, in factories, and in workshops specializing in products needed by the Germans. Jewish Police were the main force controlling order in the ghetto. Frequently, German policemen and Ukrainian Schutzmannen (in the fall of 1941, the militia was renamed the Schutzmannschaft) would carry out inspections of returning groups, confiscating food items and punishing individuals caught with them.

In the middle of May 1942, the ghetto was divided into two sections. One side was for the Fachleute, skilled workers and craftsmen, and the second for nicht Fachleute, people without a skill. Skilled workers were given special certificates. Many tried to obtain certificates by other means. They could be obtained through connections or purchased for a high price.¹⁴ Segall writes: “Others, like my mother, were able to move to the skilled side by arranging a fictitious marriage with a skilled worker.”¹⁵

Segall continues: “It was a beautiful spring. Lilacs were in bloom everywhere and their sweet scent permeated the air. Everyone was nervous. Rumors spread that large, deep ditches had been dug at the abandoned airfield in Surmicze.”¹⁶ According to Vaysberg and others: “On Tuesday evening, May 26, 1942, the Jewish ghetto police received an order not to let anyone from the ‘unskilled’ side enter the other side of the ghetto. At midnight, three shots announced the fourth Aktion.”¹⁷ SS men, armed with guns and leather whips, together with a few hundred Ukrainian Schutzmannen, entered the ghetto, which was surrounded by armed SS and police, some with dogs. Everyone was driven out of the ghetto and gathered at the “Platz” on Sholom-Aleikhem Street, at the ghetto entrance. The very sick and disabled were shot on the spot.

People who refused to leave were dragged out of their houses by Ukrainian Schutzmannen, who beat them as they herded them to the Platz. From there they were driven on trucks, or led in columns, to their places of execution. Vaysberg, other eyewitnesses, and the reports of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) indicate that women, children, the elderly, and the sick were taken to the former airfield, behind the train station in Surmicze. The men were taken to Shybina Gora, a hill with a ravine below it, located west of the center of town and Zabrama, near the village of Kleshchikha. This Aktion was carried out by a mobile SS squad from Równe, assisted by German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian Schutzmannen.

At Surmicze, the victims were brought to pits previously dug by Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). They had to undress and, in groups of 20,¹⁸ walk over and lie facedown on top of others who had just been shot. They were then shot by German SS men. One report of the ChGK indicated that in several pits they found remains of women and children whose mouths and noses were tightly bound by rags. They concluded that these victims died of suffocation.¹⁹ At the end of this Aktion, approximately 300 small children who had been left behind were pushed by the SS men into a pit, into which they tossed two grenades.²⁰ Men who were brought to Shybina Gora were also murdered in previously dug pits in the ravine. As after the other Aktions, the graves were heaving, and blood was flowing for several days afterwards. German SS men did the killing. Ukrainian Schutzmannen were actively involved in the murders and in helping the SS. The victims’ clothing was loaded onto trucks returning to Dubno, placed in warehouses, and then shipped to Germany. Most sources indicate that approximately 5,000 people were murdered on May 27, 1942.²¹ That day almost every Jew in Dubno lost family members and loved ones.

Over the next four months, killings and the harassment of individuals increased. News of the liquidation of the Równe, Krzemieniec, and other Volhynian ghettos caused general demoralization and a sense of hopelessness. Whoever could bought Aryan papers, went into hiding with non-Jewish friends, or fled into the forests. Expecting the worst, almost everyone built a hiding place in his house. “In August 1942, there were about 4,500 to 5,000 Jews concentrated in the Dubno ghetto. This number included the Jews resettled into the Dubno ghetto from villages in the vicinity.”²² There was hunger, starvation, and epidemics. Vubk writes that for the Kol Nidre service, on September 20, 1942, “men gathered in a house near the river to pray. They were led by the only surviving cantor, Reb Pinkhes Shoykhet.”²³

The fifth Aktion in Dubno took place on October 5, 1942. People in the ghetto knew what to expect, and many committed suicide by taking poison, hanging themselves, cutting their veins, or jumping into the Ikwa River.²⁴ Jews were assembled at Rybnaia Street and from there driven on trucks to Surmicze. Hermann Graebe, chief engineer of the German construction firm Josef Jung from Solingen, witnessed the killing. In his affidavit presented at the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg in July 1946, he described in moving detail the slaughter he had witnessed as he stood at the killing site in Surmicze. Graebe states: “Armed Ukrainian militia drove the people off the trucks under the supervision of an SS man. The militia men acted as guards on the trucks and drove them to and from the pit.”²⁵ Graebe describes the man who did the shooting: “He was an SS man, who sat at the edge of the narrow end of the pit, his feet dangling into the pit. He had a submachine gun on his knees and was smoking a cigarette.”²⁶ The graves were again dug in advance; people had to undress and in groups of 20 walk down into the pits and lie facedown on top of others who had already been shot. During the Aktion, men of an SS mobile unit conducted the killing.

Eugenia Sztivel writes that 240 people given “iron certificates” were spared and remained in the ghetto.²⁷ Vaysberg states that following the October 5 Aktion, in an effort to lure survivors into the open, the Germans posted notices all over the ghetto promising that no harm would come to those who would come out of hiding willingly, because they were needed for work. During the next two weeks, about 150 Jews came out of hiding. On October 23, 1942, in a sixth Aktion, except for 10 specialists, all Jews in the ghetto were killed.²⁸ Most sources indicate that almost 1,000 people were killed that day.²⁹ Segall writes that “people who remained in the ghetto in hiding places had to leave them once their food and water supply ran out. Many escaped to the woods in an attempt to join the partisans.”³⁰ She continues: “My Aunt Natalie and her husband, Leyzer Gitrajer, were among them. Aunt Natalie, who was blond and had Aryan papers, got a job in the sugar refinery in Mizocz. Uncle Leyzer went into the woods, but was killed before the war ended.”³¹ Thus, by the end of October 1942, Dubno was officially declared to be cleansed of Jews (judenrein).

The key events in the history of the Dubno ghetto were the Aktions. The Dubno ghetto existed for less than seven months, from April 2 until October 23, 1942. Seven weeks after its establishment, even while people were still settling in, on May 27, more than half of its residents were slaughtered. During the summer of 1942, people tried to find means and ways to escape from the ghetto. Some did. There was no organized resistance or escape. Some individuals who escaped did so with the help of their Christian friends and survived in hiding. Others survived on false papers,³² and yet others survived cold and hunger in fields and woods alone, in groups, or with the partisans.

The Red Army liberated Dubno on February 9, 1944. According to the Encyclopaedia Judaica, only 300 Jews from Dubno survived the war, including those who had evacuated into the Soviet interior.

SOURCES Relevant published sources on the Dubno ghetto include the following: Ya’acov Adini, ed., Dubno: Sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Dubno be-Yisrael, 1966); Samuil Gil’, ed., Krov’ ikh i segodnia govorit (New York, 1995); International Military Tribunal, ed., The Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal (IMT) [Blue Series] (Nuremberg, 1947), 19:507–509 and 31:446–450 (2992-PS); Douglas K. Huneke, The Moses of Rovno: The Stir- ring Story of Fritz Graebe, a German Christian Who Risked His Life to Lead Hundreds of Jews to Safety during the Holocaust (New York: Dodd, Mead & Company, 1985); Sara Gochberg de Silberstein, Sobrevivimos (Buenos Aires: Dunken, 2002); and Rhoda G. Lewin, ed., Witnesses to the Holocaust: An Oral History (Boston: Twayne, 1990).

Relevant documentation on the fate of the Jews of Dubno during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (e.g., 301/1542, 2168, 2887, and 4918); BA-BL (R 2104/21); GARF (7021-71-48); USHMM (e.g., RG-22.002M and Acc.1995.A.084 [Irene Zoosman memoir]); VHF; and YVA. In addition, reference is made to the author’s own unpublished manuscript, Helen Segall, “When the Lilacs Bloom: A Memoir.”

Helen Segall

NOTES

1. Moyshe Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto,” in Adini, Dubno: Sefer zikaron, pp. 693–706.
2. Yehoshua Vubk, “Di Likvidatsye fun Dubner Geto,” in ibid., pp. 707–712.
3. Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto.”
4. Ibid.
5. AŽIH, 301/2168, testimony of Eugenia Sztivel, July 16, 1946.
6. BA-BL, R 2104/21, pp. 341–462, report of OK II (V) 909 in Dubno, contains an extensive description of the valuables handed over up to August 10, 1941.
7. AŽIH, 301/2168.
8. Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto.”
9. Ibid.
10. Ibid.
11. Segall, “When the Lilacs Bloom.”
12. Ibid.
13. Ibid.
14. Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto.”
15. Segall, “When the Lilacs Bloom.”
16. Ibid.
17. Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto.”
18. Ibid.
19. GARF, Report of the ChGK, which examined remains in some of the graves at Surmicze on December 11, 12, and 13, 1945; see 7021-71-48, p. 23.
20. Ibid., “Protokol doprosa svidetelia,” 7021-71-48, pp. 36 and reverse side.
21. Encyclopaedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (Detroit: Thomson Gale, 2007), 6:33–34; and GARF, 7021-71-48, pp. 33–34. It should be noted that the dates and statistics presented in the ChGK reports and in other eyewitness accounts are often incorrect.
22. Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto.”
23. Vubk, “Di Likvidatsye fun Dubner Geto.”
24. Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto.”
25. Testimony of Hermann Friedrich Graebe in International Military Tribunal, The Trial of the Major War Criminals, 19:507; the German original is at vol. 31, pp. 446–449 (2992-PS).
26. Ibid., 19:508.
27. AŽIH, 301/2168, p. 3.
28. Vaysberg, “Lebn un Umikum fun Dubner Geto”; and AŽIH, 301/2168.

29. GARF, "Protokol doprosa svidetelia," November 21, 1944, 7021-71-48, p. 37.

30. Segall, "When the Lilacs Bloom."

31. Ibid.

32. Ibid.

DUNAEVTSY

Pre-1941: Dunaevtsy (Yiddish: Dinovitz), town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Dunajewzy, Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Dunaivtsi, raion center, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Dunaevtsy is located 33 kilometers (20.5 miles) northeast of Kamenets-Podolskii. According to the 1939 census, 4,478 Jews resided in the town (68 percent of the population). Another 848 Jews lived in the villages of the Dunaevtsy raion. After Germany attacked the USSR on June 22, 1941, a small group of Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for the Red Army, and some other Jews were able to evacuate to the east. About 4,000 Jews remained in Dunaevtsy and came under German occupation.

Units of the German 17th Army captured Dunaevtsy on July 10, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration governed the town, establishing a town council and an auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. In September 1941, power was transferred to a German civilian administration. Dunaevtsy became the administrative center of the Gebiet Dunajewzy, which also included the Rayons of Solobkowzy, Winkowzy, and Minkowzy. The Gebietskommissar was Gemeinschaftsführer Eduard Eggers. His assistant and chief of staff was Robert Hornig.¹ There was also a German Gendarmerie post in Dunaevtsy, and the detachment of Ukrainian local police (ukrainische Miliz) was renamed the Schutzmannschaft by 1942 and subordinated to the Gendarmerie. The Germans set up short-term training courses in Dunaevtsy for the volunteers recruited into the local police.²

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Gebiet Dunajewzy were mostly coordinated by a team of Security Police and SD from the outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Kamenets-Podolskii. This detachment was established in May 1942 and was headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Andreas Fermer.³ The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, as well as Gebietskommissar Eggers, also participated in these Aktions.

In the summer and fall of 1941, following the German occupation of the Ukrainian SSR, a series of anti-Jewish measures were introduced in Gebiet Dunajewzy, including marking, robbery, beatings, and forced labor. The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which is referred to in the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) documents as a self-governing Jewish community. One of the main tasks of the Jewish communal authority was the assignment of Jews to various types of hard physical labor for the Germans.

In February or March 1942, a group of Jewish men was assigned to work at the railroad station in Dunaevtsy. For some reason, these men abandoned their work, which the Germans considered to be an act of sabotage. On the orders of the Gebietskommissar, the German authorities arrested 20 Jews to make an example of them and discourage further attempts at sabotage or resistance. One of those arrested was released, but the rest were executed: 1 was shot as he attempted to escape, and 18 were hanged, their bodies left hanging for five days before the Germans let members of the Jewish community bury them.⁴

Sometime in the spring of 1942, all the Jews were forced to move into a ghetto: a separate part of the town that was sealed off with barbed wire and guarded by the Ukrainian police. There was no well within the area of the ghetto, and the only way for the Jews to obtain water was to leave the ghetto with the guards' permission. Food rations were also minimal. Jews were taken daily under armed guard by the local police for arduous forced labor.⁵

On May 8, 1942, the Jews were assembled in the yard of the Dunaevtsy Machine Tractor Station (MTS), a storage depot for agricultural equipment. Once there, the Germans selected a number of "specialists" (tailors, carpenters, and others) and those considered fit for hard labor and gave them special passes. The remainder, some 2,300 people, were marched 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) east of the town to the phosphorous mine near the village of Demiankovtsy. About 300 of them, primarily the very old and the very young, were shot on the way to the mine by the accompanying escorts of local police and Gendarmerie as they tried to escape or were unable to keep up with the pace of the march. Gebietskommissar Eggers ordered all the Jews to undress. They were then herded into the mine in groups of 15 or more people. The policemen beat with rifle butts those who resisted and did not want to go inside. Shots were fired into the crowd of naked, defenseless people. After all the Jews were inside the mine, the entrance was blown up. Those inside died a slow, torturous death from asphyxiation and starvation. Witnesses recall hearing moaning and screaming from the mine for five days following the Aktion.

Afterwards the clothes of those who had been murdered were transported back to Dunaevtsy.⁶ Most of the former policemen participating in the Aktion were rewarded by the Germans with clothes or fabrics. The "specialists" among the Jews of Dunaevtsy, about 2,000 in total, were moved back into the ghetto. Some former policemen reported that some of the Jews (about 500) were kept in the Dunaevtsy MTS, and the others (approximately 1,500) returned to the ghetto in the town. A special section of houses on one of the streets of Dunaevka (probably a section or suburb of Dunaevtsy) was fenced off with barbed wire and was permanently guarded by a group of 10 local policemen. During the day the Jews were taken out for forced labor and then locked up again at night.⁷

The liquidation of the ghetto was prepared and carried out jointly by the Security Police and SD from Kamenets-Podolskii, the German Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian police.⁸ Just before the shootings began, 10 members of the Kamenets-Podolskii Gestapo, along with the local police from the Minkowzy and Solobkowzy Rayons, arrived in the town. At 4:00 A.M. on October 19, 1942, the Gendarmerie chief Pusch assembled the police and Gendarmerie forces and assigned them their roles in the extermination of the Jews.⁹ Through a local interpreter and police member Bilinsky, Pusch appointed the guards, the shooters, the escorts, and those responsible for having the victims undress and leading them to the pits. After the meeting, the police cordoned off the town and searched the attics, basements, and other hiding places for Jews. The Jews were taken from their homes to the ghetto square and arranged in groups of 200 to 300 people. They were then escorted by local policemen to the Solonichnik Forest near the village of Chan'kovo, 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) west of the town, where pits had been dug in preparation. Ten policemen led the Jews in groups towards the pits and stripped them naked. Adults were shot in the nape of the neck, while children were thrown into the pits alive by the police and shot by members of the Gestapo. One of the victims, Shikogkoren, attacked one of the Gestapo men, biting him in the neck. He was immediately killed by the local policeman Magera, who was rewarded with vodka and clothing for saving the German's life. The waiting Jewish victims wept and begged the police not to kill them, but the entire group of nearly 2,000 people was shot on that day and buried in two pits.¹⁰

Some Jews successfully escaped the killings by hiding and survived until the liberation of the town on March 31, 1944. Several Ukrainian residents of Dunaevtsy helped these Jews to survive.

SOURCES A brief article on the annihilation of the Jews of Dunaevtsy can be found in Vestnik. Vypusk 2. Liudi ostaiutsia liud'mi. Svidetel'stva ochevidtsev (Chernovtsy, 1992), pp. 57–58; more general information on the Jewish population of the town can be found in the Encyclopaedia Judaica (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972).

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Dunaevtsy can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 437/67 and II 204 AR 332/71, vol. 3); DAKhO (R863-2-44, pp. 32–33); GARF (7021-64-798); USHMM (RG-22.002M); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman and Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 437/67, pp. 86–94, closing report, April 15, 1970.

2. USHMM, RG-22.002M (GARF), reel 2, 7021-64-798.

3. After the war, Fermer worked for some time for the Criminal Police in Dortmund (Germany).

4. Vestnik. Vypusk 2, p. 57, dates this event in November 1941; the detailed evidence from former policemen in GARF, 7021-64-798, indicates February or March 1942.

5. Vestnik. Vypusk 2, p. 58; according to Else Exner, the ghettoization took place sometime in spring 1942, that is, probably before the May Aktion. She also notes that the Jews were already living in a separate quarter of town, which was not enclosed, prior to the ghettoization; see BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 437/67, Bd. I, pp. 159–162, statement of Else Exner, July 14, 1971.

6. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 437/67, Bd. I, pp. 86–94, closing report, April 15, 1970; Vestnik. Vypusk 2, pp. 57–58; Podillia u Velykii Vitchyzniani viini (1941–1945 rr.). Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (L'viv, 1969), p. 98; GARF, 7021-64-798, p. 53.

7. GARF, 7021-64-798.

8. Ibid., 7021-64-798, p. 108.

9. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 437/67, Bd. I, pp. 86–94, closing report, April 15, 1970. According to other sources, the liquidation of the ghetto was carried out in September 1942 (GARF, 7021-64-798, p. 108). It is possible that the liquidation occurred on September 19 and not on October 19, 1942. The Dunaevtsy ghetto is also mentioned briefly by Boris Leibovich Levin, who dates the two Aktions as taking place in May and October; see I.M. Liakhovitskii, ed., Zhel'taia kniga: Svidetel'stva, fakty, dokumenty (Kharkov and Jerusalem: Biblioteka gazety "Bensiakh," 1994), p. 88.

10. USHMM, RG-22.002M (GARF), reel 2, 7021-9-798. Some witness reports collected by the ChGK indicate that as many as 5,000 Jews were shot on October 19, 1942, but that figure may include all the Jews of Solobkovtsy (ca. 500) and Minkovtsy (2,200) that were murdered. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravocnik (Kharkov: "Karavella," 2001), p. 109, gives the figure of about 1,820 victims from the Dunaevtsy ghetto.

DYWIN

Pre-1939: Dywin, village, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Dyvin, Kobrin raion, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Dywin, Rayon center, Gebiet Kobryn, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Dziwin, Bera's'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Dywin is located 107 kilometers (66.5 miles) west-southwest of Pińsk. According to the 1921 population census, there were 786 Jews living in Dywin (34.2 percent of the total population). By mid-1941, allowing for the average natural increase of the Jewish population in Poland, there would have been around 1,000 Jews residing in the village.

As German forces approached Dywin after the surprise attack on June 22, 1941, there were attacks on Jews by local "bandits" in the villages around Dywin. Jews from Załuchów and Wólka Szczyńska fled to Dywin following these attacks, taking the bodies of the victims with them for sacred burial. On June 24, 1941, the first German units arrived in Dywin. The new military authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) as an intermediary body between the Jewish population and the German authorities. Appointed as head of the Jewish Council was Abraham Engel. The German authorities also ordered the registration of the Jews. As men were being taken for forced labor, those who were not from Dywin fled back into the surrounding countryside, leaving their women and families in the village.

In the first days of the occupation, the Germans ordered a roll call of all Jewish men in Dywin and rounded up the Jews for forced labor. The work tasks included cleaning the Germans' boots and horses. The Jews feared that some men would be shot and were relieved when they were allowed to return home on completion of these tasks. A few days later, however, two Jews were shot in the surrounding countryside when they were discovered by a German patrol. Once news of this event spread, most of the men who had hidden in the forests again returned to Dywin. Some of the Jews from Wólka Szczyńska subsequently returned to their village, and from there they were moved into the ghetto at Kamień Koszyrski.¹

From June to August 1941, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of Dywin. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Dywin became part of Gebiet Kobryn, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Kobryn was Regierungsassessor Oscar Panzer.² A local police force was established in Dywin. Under the civil administration, the local police was renamed the Schutzmannschaft and placed under the control of a small squad of German Gendarmerie.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish policies in Dywin. Jews were ordered to wear patches in the image of the Star of David and were prohibited from leaving the limits of the village. Before the end of 1941, the Germans established a ghetto in Dywin in which a number of Jews from nearby villages were also forced to reside. The ghetto was guarded by the German Gendarmerie and local police (Schutzmannschaft).

The Germans liquidated the ghetto on August 12–13, 1942.³ On August 12, German and local police surrounded the ghetto. They drove all the men into a carpenter's workshop and sealed the windows with boards. Then they took the women into the synagogue. Close to the carpenter's studio, 30 peasants spent all night digging a large ditch. On August 13, the Germans murdered the Jews from the ghetto, shooting the men first, followed by the women and children. More than 1,000 people were murdered in total.⁴

Over the following months, units of the Order Police conducted searches for Jews who had escaped. On October 31, 1942, the 9th Company of Police Regiment 15, assisted by 39 members of the Schutzmannschaft from Dywin, shot 74 Jews in the village of Samary, on the border with Rayon Ratno. In addition, one Ukrainian family (six people) was shot together with the Jews in Samary for hiding a Jewish woman.⁵

SOURCES Relevant publications regarding the Holocaust in Dywin include the following: Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 241–242; A.A. Stein et al., eds., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski ve-ha-seviva (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Kamin Koshyrsky and Surroundings in Israel, 1965), pp. 745–750. The ghetto in Dywin is mentioned in Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 88; and in Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), pp. 115, 128.

Documentation on the persecution and extermination of the Jews of Dywin during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-83-13); NARB (750-1-232); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 16); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Stein et al., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski ve-ha-seviva, pp. 745–750.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. GARF, 7021-83-13, pp. 7–8.
4. Ibid.; Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, pp. 128, 139, gives the figure of 1,450 Jewish victims, but this is probably too high.
5. GARF, 7021-148-2, pp. 346–347, Report of 9th Company, Police Regiment 15, November 1, 1942.

GORODOK

Pre-1941: Gorodok, town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Gebiet Jarmolinzy, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Horodok, raion center, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Gorodok is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) southwest of Khmel'nitskii. The Jewish population of the town was 2,329 in 1939. In addition, there were another 1,632 Jews living in the villages of the Gorodok raion.

After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, there was no organized evacuation of the population from Gorodok. A number of Jews attempted to flee the town by horse and cart, but many were caught by the Germans' rapid advance and had to return. It is not known how many Jews remained in Gorodok at the start of the occupation, but it was probably in excess of 1,000 people.

Units of the German 6th Army had occupied Gorodok by the middle of July 1941. The town was run initially by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), which appointed a local Ukrainian police force. Shortly after the Germans' arrival, they established a ghetto in Gorodok for the Jews. Part of the town was designated as only for the Jews, and they were forced to move into this area by the local police.¹ Jews were required to wear the Star of David and to perform forced labor. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was also established.

In September 1941, authority was passed to a German civil administration. Gorodok became a Rayon center in Gebiet Jarmolinzy, which also included the Rayons of Satanow, Michalpol, and Jarmolinzy. The Gebietskommissar based in Iarmolinty was Kameradschaftsführer Ernst Mertes.²

Jews from neighboring villages were also brought into the Gorodok ghetto, for example, from the villages of Kuz'min (12 kilometers [7.5 miles] away), in October 1941, and Novii Shvet, just north of Gorodok. According to survivor Evgeniia Dantsis, the Jews were concentrated in one area, but it remained unfenced. Forced labor consisted of digging ditches. No food was provided to the Jews in the ghetto, but they were able to barter with local villagers. This was carried out mostly by children, who left the ghetto clandestinely.³ At some point in 1942, several groups of Jews were transferred from the Gorodok ghetto to the forced labor camp in Leznevo.

In late October 1942, on the order of Gebietskommissar Mertes, most of the remaining Jews from the ghetto in Gorodok (at least 300 people) were rounded up and transferred under close guard by truck to Iarmolintsy by forces of the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.⁴ In Iarmolintsy, all the Jews gathered from Gebiet Jarmolinzy were confined within a derelict barracks compound close to the railway station for a number of days.⁵ On the arrival of a detachment of Security Police and SD from Starokonstantinov, under the command of SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Graf, the Jews were shot in groups into three pits prepared nearby. The Ukrainian police were stationed around the execution site to isolate it and to prevent the prisoners from escaping. In total, about 6,400 Jews were shot there over the course of about six hours.⁶

According to Dantsis, who managed to hide during the roundup in Gorodok and was sheltered by local Ukrainians, about 10 Jewish families (more than 100 Jews) also survived the roundup and remained in Gorodok, probably kept alive, with their families, as skilled workers.⁷ Of these Jews, 87 were killed in December 1942 and another 16 in January 1943.⁸

SOURCES Relevant publications on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Gorodok include: A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravoch-nik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 89.

Documents regarding the extermination of the Jews of Gorodok can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/5071-72); DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-796 and 818); and VHF (# 32340, 34283).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. VHF, # 34283, testimony of Sofia Vugman.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. VHF, # 32340, testimony of Evgeniia Dantsis.
4. BA-L, B 162/5072, p. 434, statement of Karl Furchert, August 30, 1962, gives the figure of 300 Jews in Gorodok, but this is probably too low; VHF, # 32340 and 34283.
5. GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 203. See also BA-L, B 162/5073, pp. 649–657.
6. BA-L, B 162/5071, pp. 89–92, statement of Wilhelm Kurt Paul Grosse, January 8, 1960.
7. VHF, # 32340.
8. GARF, 7021-64-796, pp. 63–65.

GRITSEV

Pre-1941: Gritsev, town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Grizew, Rayon center, Gebiet Starokonstantinow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Hrytsiv, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Gritsev is located 22 kilometers (13.7 miles) north of Starokonstantinov. In 1939, there were 1,095 Jews living in the town (36.1 percent of the total population). In addition, there were another 218 Jews living in the villages of the Gritsev raion.¹

Since Gritsev was located relatively far away from the nearest railway line (15 kilometers, or 9.3 miles), and many Jews hesitated to leave their homes, only a few managed to escape or join the Red Army before the Germans occupied the town on July 5, 1941. Many Jews were forced to return to Gritsev after having gone only a few kilometers to the east. Immediately after the arrival of the Germans, the Jews were humiliated and ordered to hang large Stars of David on the doors of their homes. Ten young Jewish men and women were arrested and thrown into the water in the middle of the large lake near Gritsev. The police used oars to kill those who emerged from the water, and only 1 was able to save himself and survive. A week later, 10 more young Jews were arrested and confined to a basement; 24 hours later, the Ukrainian police shot them not far from the village of Gora.²

In the first days of August 1941, on one of the streets that adjoined the lake, a ghetto was organized for the Jews. It was enclosed by a barbed-wire fence and guarded by Ukrainian policemen. A German detachment arrived in Gritsev at dawn and rounded up the entire Jewish population of the town. Remaining Jewish properties and valuables outside the ghetto were looted by the Ukrainians and taken to German police headquarters. The Germans appointed one of the inhabitants, a man named Niakha (Nokhem), as the elder in charge of the ghetto. Three others were named as his deputies.

The inhabitants of the ghetto managed to buy food only by selling their possessions to the Ukrainians. Children sometimes sneaked out of the ghetto for this purpose, but the trading mainly took place through the barbed-wire fence. From time to time the Ukrainians brought food to the Jews out of sympathy. But this was generally insufficient. Scarcity and starvation resulted in many deaths among the ghetto inhabitants.³

At dawn on August 4, 1941, part of the 10th SS-Infantry Regiment, 1st SS-Infantry Brigade, arrived in Gritsev and gathered all the Jews of the ghetto into a school building. After the registration and selection of a group aged 15 and older, these Jews were taken by truck into a nearby wood located about 2.5 kilometers (1.6 miles) from the town. The police separated the men and women, then lined the men up against a stone wall and shot them. They took all the young women in a second group and shot them as well. Altogether they murdered 286 people.⁴

The remaining Jews from the school were returned to the ghetto, where they realized that the Ukrainians had confiscated all of their most valuable belongings with the permission of the German authorities. The surviving women and children were led out of the ghetto for work on a daily basis. This work included cleaning administrative buildings and the homes of the policemen and subsequently (during the winter) removing snow from the roads. Heavy labor, such as chopping wood and repairing roads, was performed by a group of 12 men under the guard of the Ukrainian police.⁵

During the selection at the school building, some of the young women had managed to avoid being taken by putting on the head scarves typically worn by old women. Some of the men escaped the Germans' inspection by hiding in concealed places inside the ghetto. Led by Isaak Bialik, a number of these men later managed to join the partisan resistance. Some of them also perished fighting against the Germans. Bialik himself survived until the arrival of the Red Army, which he then joined, to continue the struggle against Nazi Germany.⁶

On September 4, 1941, the German police conducted another selection after bringing all of the prisoners to the town's cultural center. On the previous night, one of the Germans had forewarned the Jews about the Aktion, but many did not trust him and therefore made no attempt to escape from the ghetto. The Germans spared the children, but shot a few hundred of the surviving women.

In September 1941, power was transferred from the military to a German civil administration. Gritsev became a Rayon center in Gebiet Starokonstantinow. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Schröder, who was later replaced by SA-Standartenführer Curt Rolle.

In May 1942, the remaining inmates of the Gritsev ghetto were escorted to the ghetto in Starokonstantinov and later shot there.⁷ Thanks to the help of several Ukrainian families—among them the Melen'chuk family, who received the title of "Righteous Among the Nations" from Yad Vashem—a group of five women and children were able to survive.⁸

All the Jewish homes in Gritsev were either demolished for their building materials or seized by the Ukrainians. The Red Army liberated Gritsev on March 6, 1944.

SOURCES The following publications contain relevant information on the fate of the Jews of Gritsev: I. Melen'chuk, "Riatuvaly, ryzkuiuchy zhyttiam," Den' za dnem (Shepetovka), no. 4 (1993): 3; and Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005), p. 84.

Documents and testimonies regarding the Jewish community in Gritsev and the ghetto there can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL/II 204 AR-Z 442/67); CAHJP (HM2/8969); and YVA (M-33/179, O-3/4019, O-3/4932, and M-31/7740).

Albert Kaganovich
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. CAHJP, HM2/8969.
2. YVA, O-3/4019, O-3/4932.
3. Ibid.
4. Unsere Ehre heisst Treue: Kriegstagebuch des Kommando-stabes Reichsführer SS, Tätigkeitsberichte der 1. und 2. SS-Inf.

Brigade, der 1. SS-Kav.-Brigade und von Sonderkommandos der SS (Vienna: Europa Verlag, 1984), p. 108, Report of 1. SS Brigade, August 6, 1941.

5. YVA, O-3/4019, O-3/4932.

6. Ibid., M-33/179, O-3/4019, O-3/4932.

7. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, vol. 1, pp. 263, 324.

8. YVA, M-31/7740; Melen'chuk, "Riatuvaly, ryzkuiuchy zhyttiam," p. 3.

HOROCHÓW

Pre–September 1939: Horochów (Yiddish: Horchiv), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Gorokhov, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Gorochow, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Horokhiv, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Horochów is located about 90 kilometers (56 miles) northeast of Lwów. According to the 1931 census, the Jewish population was 2,806. The total population of the town in 1937 was 6,260.

Most of the population did not evacuate when the German-Russian war broke out, even though trucks were available for those who wanted to leave. When the Germans arrived on June 24, 1941,¹ the non-Jewish locals rejoiced and greeted them with flowers because they hated the Communists and were pleased to be rid of them.

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, on the second day of the occupation, June 25, 1941, the Germans ordered the town's residents to gather on the main square. Not everyone showed up because the order was not announced on all streets. Then the Germans threw incendiary grenades into houses around town. About half of the houses were burned.² The Christian population suffered most in this Aktion and blamed the Jews as a result.

Before the end of June, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was established. On the request of the Ortskommandant, a squad of Security Police was sent by Sonderkommando 4a, based in Sokal, to Horochów, where they arrested and shot seven people as "communist functionaries."³ The Germans established a Ukrainian police force, which was merciless to the Jews. They tortured any Jews they caught and robbed Jewish houses. In July 1941, there was a pogrom during which two Jews were killed, and many were beaten and robbed.⁴

The first German decrees established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). All Jews had to pay a large fine, and everyone over 14 had to wear a white armband with a Star of David. All valuable personal possessions were confiscated: gold, silver, paintings, Persian rugs, telephones, fur, radios, and musical instruments. The levies in money and gold amounted to 100 rubles per adult and 50 rubles per child.⁵ One day, the Germans gathered the Jews in the marketplace and made them watch the burning of the synagogues. The Torah scrolls and prayer books were all burned.⁶

On August 12, 1941, two truckloads of Ukrainian police arrived in Horochów together with officers of the Gestapo

from Łuck. The Ukrainian police rounded up 300 Jewish men according to a list, with no involvement on the part of the Germans. The men were forced to dig a large pit near the forest, into which they were all thrown after being shot. The list of 300 men was probably drawn up from information provided by neighbors and former friends. The 300 men were local notables in the Jewish community. Another 70 or 80 people were shot on August 23, 1941.⁷

By August 1941, a permanent Gebietskommissar had replaced the temporary military commandant. The commander of the Gendarmerie post in Horochów was Krause, and the Gebietskommissar was Härter.⁸ Jews were not allowed to use electricity. Everyone over 14 had to engage in forced labor. Those who worked received an additional food ration. Many workers were black and blue from beatings endured during work. The local Ukrainian police guarded the Jews while they worked.

At the beginning of November 1941, all Jews had to leave their homes and gather in the marketplace with whatever they could carry. They were then herded into certain designated side streets in a very poor section of town. This became the ghetto. On the following day, a high wooden fence with barbed wire was erected around these streets. Most of the houses were dilapidated, and there was extreme overcrowding. The average housing density was two families (about 10 people) per room.⁹ There were two gates, and a written permit was needed to enter or exit the ghetto. Yellow patches on the chest and back replaced the white armbands.

All women aged between 14 and 40 and all men aged between 14 and 50 had to engage in forced labor for little or no pay. Those who worked outside the ghetto wore green armbands and were known as “useful” Jews. They mainly worked as tanners, preparing leather for military use. Other people worked on road construction. Some Jews established skilled workshops for other Jews to perform skilled labor: knitting, making brushes, and other craft activities. The workshops were situated in the town in houses outside the ghetto. Some Jews not employed in skilled jobs had to stand in the water all day during the winter in a river outside the town, probably working on bridge construction.¹⁰ Craftsmen were kept in a separate part of the ghetto from other Jews. Unskilled workers often performed meaningless manual labor, which they undid the following day.

There was starvation in the ghetto because there was no way to get food. People were executed if they tried to obtain food. Skilled workers received 300 grams (10.6 ounces) of bread, while “useless” Jews received 150 grams (5.3 ounces). Because food was so scarce, 20 youngsters built a tunnel under the fence as a way of getting out of the ghetto.¹¹ They would take off their stars and look for food for their families. They always had to barter items, such as clothing or jewelry, for the food.

The smells in the ghetto were horrible, and hygiene was almost nonexistent. Soap, toothbrushes, and toothpaste were not to be found. The chairman of the Judenrat was opportunistic: he treated the people in the ghetto very badly, and his family lived well at the community’s expense. For his own benefit, he did things that he was not forced to do by the Germans. There was a Jewish police force in the ghetto.

At first, there was a doctor in the ghetto. At one of the weekly roundups, however, he was taken away a month or two after the ghetto was created. Several women organized a school in the ghetto. They had to stop lessons when they ran out of things to barter for school supplies. At night, people gathered in the ghetto square to talk and get fresh air.

As a means of resistance, some young organizers stockpiled kerosene to set fire to the ghetto. Having learned of their plans, other Jews attacked them, demanding that the preparations be abandoned because they were afraid that everyone in the ghetto would be killed.¹²

When people found out about the mass murders taking place in other cities, they began to build hiding places. Jews fasted and prayed in the ghetto. In the spring of 1942, everyone was moved to a smaller ghetto, because the population had dwindled so much. Three sides of this ghetto, like the previous one, were enclosed, but one side was contained only by the river. When the guard on the ghetto increased, people became hysterical; they continued building false walls and hiding places in their homes, hoping that if they hid, they would not be found.

Preparation for the liquidation began in early August 1942. A pit was dug at the town limits near the road leading to Druszkopol.¹³ Before the ghetto was liquidated, some people hid, and 200 young men escaped. However, reportedly only 8 of them survived; the others were shot by Ukrainians or died of hunger. Other people tried to escape by hiding in the bulrushes along the river and then crossing the river. The ghetto was liquidated on September 14, 1942. People were taken in eight trucks to the previously dug mass grave. It is estimated that more than 2,500 people were shot by forces under the command of the Gendarme Holberg. Jewish valuables were confiscated; some were taken by the police forces, and the rest went to the civil administration. Holberg, who was of Sudeten origin, was later killed by partisans.¹⁴

Among the survivors from the ghetto were Benjamin Fishman, Bessie Kisis Glinkiewicz, and Sonia Zyroff. Shulamit Perlmutter (Charlene Schiff) managed to survive in the forests until the arrival of the Red Army but soon left for the West because of the continuing hostile attitude towards Jews in the area, as the local people did not want to return the possessions they had taken.

SOURCES The main published work available on the Horochów ghetto is the Horchiv Memorial Book edited by Yosif Kariv (Tel Aviv: Horchiv Committee in Israel, 1966), which includes several accounts containing information about the ghetto.

Documentation and witness testimonies regarding the extermination of Horochów’s Jews can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2862); BA-L (B 162/3878); GARF (7021-55-2); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 14; and testimony of Charlene Schiff, RG-50.030*0203); and YVA (Nazi Crimes Department of the Israeli Police, file pey-ayin 01273).

Ester-Basya Vaisman

VOLUME II: PART B

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG 22.002M, reel 14 (GARF), Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report for Horochów, 7021-55-2, p. 19.
2. Ibid.
3. USHMM, RG-30 (Acc. 1999.A.0196), Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 24, July 16, 1941; see also Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 31 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 694a, pp. 60–61.
4. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), pp. 66–67.
5. Ibid., p. 96.
6. A personal interview with Charlene Schiff conducted on June 19, 2003.
7. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheski spravochnik (Kharkov: “Kara-vella,” 2001), p. 89; according to the ChGK report GARF, 7021-55-2, p. 20, the Aktion took place in early September, and some 350 people were rounded up and shot together with 30 people brought in from Druszkopol.
8. ChGK report, GARF, 7021-55-2, p. 20a.
9. Spector, Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 129. News of plans to establish the ghetto in Horochów had reached neighboring Łokacze by November 3, 1941; see Michael Diment, The Lone Survivor: A Diary of the Łokacze Ghetto and Svyntukhy, Ukraine (New York: Holocaust Library, 1992), pp. 38–39.
10. Horchiv Memorial Book, p. 61.
11. Schiff interview.
12. Horchiv Memorial Book, p. 286.
13. GARF, 7021-55-2, p. 21.
14. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva, p. 18, estimates that as many as 500 Jews may initially have escaped. According to the ChGK report, p. 21a, some 3,800 Jews were killed.

HORODEC

Pre-1939: Horodec (Yiddish: Horodets), village, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Garadzets, Brest oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Gorodez, Rayon Antopol, Gebiet Kobryn, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Haradets, Beras’tse voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Horodec is located 67 kilometers (42 miles) east of Brześć. In 1897, there were 648 Jews in Horodec (out of a total population of 1,761). In 1915, when the front reached the immediate vicinity of Horodec, most of the population fled, so that in 1921 there were only 269 Jews registered in Horodec out of a total population of 753. In 1939, Horodec was annexed by the Soviet Union, and several Jews were exiled into the Soviet interior.

The Germans occupied Horodec during the very first days after their attack on the Soviet Union in late June 1941. A few Jews were killed not long after the Germans’ arrival. In April or May 1942, the German authorities forced all of the Jews into a ghetto surrounded by barbed wire. A Jew could be punished with severe beating for sneaking out of the ghetto to obtain food. Similarly, the local Christians were not allowed to enter the ghetto. The Jews were divided into those who could work and those who were unfit, the latter category consisting primarily of the elderly. Those who were able to work were given a daily regimen of forced labor.¹

On July 26, 1942, the majority of the Jews were marched to the train station and sent by train to Bronna Góra, just outside Bereza Kartuska, where they were shot. According to one account, when the Jews were being marched to the train station, they were forced to sing the Soviet folk song “Katiusha.” The day before the Aktion, about 15 skilled workers were brought on foot to the Antopol ghetto, where they remained until its liquidation on October 15, 1942.²

Although no information is available about the German perpetrators, some of the names of the local collaborators are known. Volodya Kazik was appointed mayor of the town. His deputy was Vanya Glavatski. Kalya Glavatski and Marian Bramkilises were members of the local militia. Vanya Glavatski and Bramkilises were killed by partisans.³

SOURCES The Horodec yizkor book, ‘E. Ben-‘Ezra and Yisroel Zusman, eds., Horodets: A gesbikhte fun a shtetl (1142–1942) (New York: Bukh-komitet “Horodets,” 1949), contains four brief accounts of the Holocaust period: two by Dovid Volinets, ostensibly the sole survivor, one by Binyomin Volf on Antopol, and a third by an anonymous Christian woman from Horodec. Information on the Jewish community of Horodec can also be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 245–247.

Andrew Koss

NOTES

1. Dovid Volinets, “Fun Dovid Volinets,” pp. 193–194; Binyomin Volf, “Fun Binyomin Volf,” p. 194; and Anon., “A briv fun a Kristin vegen der Horodetser geto,” p. 194—all in Ben-‘Ezra and Zusman, Horodets.
2. Volinets, “Fun Dovid Volinets,” pp. 193–194; Volf, “Fun Binyomin Volf,” p. 194; Anon., “A briv fun a Kristin,” p. 194; Sta. Bielefeld, 5 Js 703/70, Vermerk, October 26, 1973.
3. Dovid Volinets, “Vegen Horodetser mithelfer,” in Ben-‘Ezra and Zusman, Horodets, p. 194.

HORODNO

Pre-1939: Horodno, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Gorodnaia, Pinsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Gorodno, Rayon and Gebiet Stolin, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Haradnaia, Beras’tse voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Horodno is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) southeast of Pińsk. According to the 1921 census, there were 583 Jews living in Horodno, comprising 22.4 percent of the total population.

In September 1939, forces of the Red Army occupied Horodno, which was soon incorporated into the Belorussian SSR. At this time, many Jewish refugees from central and western Poland arrived in the region. Under Soviet rule, some Polish landowners and Jews who owned stores were among those people deported to Siberia. By mid-1941, there were probably around 700 Jews living in Horodno.

Following the German surprise attack on the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a number of Jews attempted to flee Horodno to the east. Some were turned back by Soviet guards at the former Polish-Soviet border, however, and had to return home. German military forces entered Horodno during the first half of July 1941. Initially, a German military administration was responsible for the area around Horodno, but no permanent garrison was stationed in the town. In early August 1941, German mounted SS forces conducted a first Aktion in Horodno. A detachment of the 2nd SS-Cavalry Regiment shot more than 50 Jewish men over the age of 14 near the Jewish cemetery. Some Jewish men managed to hide and avoid the roundup.¹

In August 1941, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Horodno, which was made personally responsible for the enforcement of German regulations and demands. These included the collection of all valuable items, especially gold and silver, and their surrender to the Germans. According to the Jewish survivor Iosef Dryzhun, the ghetto was also established in August; it probably remained an “open ghetto” at this time, as Jews were prohibited from leaving the limits of the town.² Jews were also required to wear armbands bearing the Star of David.

In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Horodno was incorporated into Gebiet Stolin, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Stolin was SA-Standartenführer Dziembowski. In Horodno there was a squad of local police, which was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie.

According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, by May 1942, the ghetto in Horodno was enclosed with barbed wire, and additional Jews from the surrounding villages had been resettled into the ghetto.³ Local peasants would come to the ghetto and collect Jews to work for them. The Jews were paid with food in return. Some of the ghetto inmates were also required to work maintaining the roads. Members of the Judenrat who dutifully obeyed German orders thought that they would be spared in the event of a further Aktion. Everyone looked out for himself and his immediate family first of all.⁴

Sources disagree about the date of the German liquidation of the Horodno ghetto, but it probably took place in the first half of September 1942, around the time of the Aktions in Stolin and Wysock.⁵ Just prior to this, local peasants warned the Jews that the Germans had ordered the preparation of seven ditches in the forest nearby, and they advised the Jews to escape from the ghetto. However, the rabbi in Horodno reassured the Jews that God would save them and advised them to pray instead. In the opinion of Dryzhun, many more Jews could have escaped, but “religion stood in the way.” Dryzhun, together with three others, cut the barbed wire around the ghetto and ran to the forests on the day of the Aktion. About 60 Jews managed to escape altogether, but around 40 of them were captured and killed by the Germans and their collaborators over the ensuing weeks.⁶

Forces of the German Security Police based in Pińsk organized the Aktion, assisted by men from the smaller SD outposts in Stolin and Wysock. A larger number of German Gendarmes and local police guarded the Jews during the roundup and the mass shooting. According to one source, about 400 Jews were escorted into the nearby forest and shot near Podralicze, located 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) east of the village in the direction of Terebieżów. Another 200 Jews, mainly women, children, and the elderly (probably those unable to walk or found in hiding), were shot and buried in Horodno.⁷

Partisan activity in the area forced the Germans to abandon the town by the end of 1943, and forces of the Red Army moved into the area from the southeast in 1944.

SOURCES A brief article on the Jewish community of Horodno can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 245.

Survivor testimonies regarding the fate of the Jews in Horodno can be found in the following archival collections: USHMM (RG-50.378*0014); and VHF (# 18847, 23729).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-50.378*0014, oral history interview with Iosef Fayvelevich Dryzhun, August 4, 1995, states that there were 70 victims. The information page of the Stolin Jewish cultural and educational association “Bridge” (www.stolinmost.narod.ru) gives the figure of 53 Jewish men killed.

2. USHMM, RG-50.378*0014.

3. Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, p. 245. See also USHMM, RG-50.378*0014.

4. Ibid.

5. The Aktions in these two towns took place around September 10–11, 1942. According to Wilhelm Rasp, the head of the Security Police Office in Pińsk, a number of Aktions were also carried out in smaller towns around Stolin at this time; see BA-L, B 162/4950 (204 AR-Z 393/59, vol. 2), p. 180. USHMM, RG-50.378*0014, Dryzhun, dates the Aktion in September 1943 [sic], but probably means September 1942. Other sources date it in July or August 1942.

6. USHMM, RG-50.378*0014.

7. Information page of the Stolin Jewish cultural and educational association “Bridge.”

HOSZCZA

Pre-1939: Hoszcza, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Hoshcha, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Hoschtscha, Rayon center, Gebiet Rowno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Hoshcha, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Hoszcza is located 29 kilometers (18 miles) east of Równe. In 1921, there were 811 Jews residing in the village (36.3 percent of the population). By mid-1941, including some refugees, there were more than 1,000 Jews in the town.

On Sunday, June 29, 1941, the Germans bombed Hoszcza from the air, killing scores of Jewish inhabitants and destroying many houses. Units of the German 6th Army then occupied the town on July 4, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration governed the town, and from September 1941, power was transferred to a civil administration. Hoszcza was part of Gebiet Rowno. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Beer.¹ There was a German Gendarmerie post in Hoszcza, as well as a squad of Ukrainian police.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupying forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Hoszcza: a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created, Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (initially an armband, and from September 1941, a yellow circle on their clothing),² and they were compelled to perform forced labor, during which they were beaten and otherwise abused. Among the forced labor tasks, Jews had to clean the streets, load trucks, and work on building a bridge. According to one account, the Jews were forced to relocate to one part of town soon after the Germans' arrival: two, three, or more families were forced to live together in overcrowded conditions.³ This initial "Jewish quarter" was not, however, enclosed. In addition, in the wake of the bombings the Ukrainian authorities had closed down most Jewish stores, removed all their merchandise, and even dismantled them, giving the wood to local Ukrainians. In this way, many Jews lost almost all their property.⁴

In late July 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in the town, during which 10 Jews were arrested from a work detail and shot.⁵ A subunit of the 10th SS-Motorized Infantry Regiment probably carried out the shooting; its headquarters was located in Hoszcza on July 27 and 28. A few weeks into the occupation, the Germans spread propaganda blaming the Jews for the war, in justification of their anti-Jewish measures. Local Ukrainians were forbidden to have contact with Jews, and most did not speak to them or even give them a dry piece of bread.⁶

Soon after their arrival, the Germans appointed a Jewish Council with seven members. Its head was Israel David Utzenik, and his main assistants were two local businessmen, Joseph Zawodnik and Zalman Zaltzman. The four other members, younger men with little experience in community affairs, assisted with the implementation of German orders. The Jewish Council was responsible for supplying Jews for work and for distributing the daily bread ration of 200 grams (7 ounces) per person from the bakery they established. These small rations were insufficient, but other goods, such as meat, butter, eggs, sugar, or tea, were unavailable. Some Jews criticized the Jewish Council, as they were sometimes seen drinking with the occupation authorities in Zaltzman's home, where they met, and they were inevitably viewed as tools of the Germans. It was suspected, for example, that when they collected utensils or money to meet

German demands, they kept some of this for their own benefit.⁷

During the cold winter of 1941–1942, some Jews passed the long dark evenings confined to the Jewish quarter, gloomily contemplating suicide or playing chess.⁸ News of the slaughter of some 17,000 Jews in Równe in November 1941 cast a bleak shadow over the celebration of Hanukkah. The synagogues had also been destroyed and the Torah scrolls torn apart. Some flour was found to bake matzot for Passover, but somehow the reciting of the Haggadah (Passover story) had no meaning in these terrible circumstances.⁹

By March 1942, some Jews had been issued with temporary identity cards.¹⁰ However, many still expected the worst once the ground was no longer frozen. In the week before the Shavuot holiday, word quickly spread that trenches were being dug in the woods nearby. Many rumors circulated, and the Jews were petrified with fear.

Then, early on the morning of Wednesday, May 20, 1942, a number of trucks arrived in town. Sensing the danger, many Jews fled and went to hide with local farmers or in other hiding places. This Aktion was carried out by a squad of Security Police and SD from Równe, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. They collected the Jews in the central square and then escorted them to the Simanoff birch forest, about 6 kilometers (3.7 miles) from town. Here the murderers told everyone to strip down to their underwear and then shot them in pits in groups of 10. Children were crushed under the heels of their boots and were also thrown into the pits. According to Peretz Goldshtein, some 400 Jews were murdered on that day.¹¹ One platoon (37 men) of the 1st Company of German Order Police Battalion 33 also participated in the Aktion.¹²

After the Aktion, the survivors gradually emerged from their hiding places to find that many of their relatives had been killed and their houses plundered by local peasants. People gathered to recite Kaddish for the dead. Some Austrians based in Hoszcza, who had not participated in the slaughter, took pity on the Jews and shared their cigarettes.¹³

In the weeks that followed, news spread of the liquidation of the Równe ghetto on July 13, 1942, and survivors from other massacres in Kostopol and Tuczyn spread news of the destruction there. Surprisingly the "Jewish quarter" in Hoszcza does not seem to have been enclosed or closely guarded, although it was reduced in size, producing more overcrowding. Suspecting their fate, the remaining Jews attempted to hide their valuables with local peasants and prepare hiding places in case of need. Some farmers took money from Jews but then turned them out or betrayed them. The Judenrat continued its policy of fulfilling German demands for money or workers, although it no longer expected any good would come of it.

A third Aktion, killing the remaining Jews in the town, took place in late September 1942, when the Security Police and SD squad from Równe, assisted by the Gendarmerie and local police, shot 350 Jews. Of these about 40 were killed inside the town, where they had hidden. The bodies were buried in the Simanoff birch forest.¹⁴ According to a peasant named Ochrim, who worked as a fireman for the Germans, about 140 surviving Jews later returned or were brought back to Hoszcza, and 123 of these were shot in a further Aktion on November 14, 1942. He reported that 17 Jews managed to escape.¹⁵ Another source indicates that about 20 skilled craftsmen were kept alive by the Germans in a labor camp thereafter and were killed by the local Ukrainian police on July 17, 1943.¹⁶ According to the report of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 1,270 civilians were killed in the Hoszcza raion under German occupation from 1941 to 1943.¹⁷

The few Jews who survived did so mainly with the assistance of local peasants who hid them, sometimes in return for some form of payment. At least five peasants are known who together helped to save 18 Jews from the Hoszcza area.¹⁸ For example, Pessah Kranzberg, with his wife, daughter, and the daughter's young friend, were helped by Fiodor Kalenczuk, who hid them for 17 months in his stable, despite the risks and the fears of his wife.¹⁹

SOURCES The following published sources have been used in the preparation of this entry: Peretz Goldshtein, Let the World Know (Zol di velt visn) (New York: Society of Hosht, 1965), which is an English translation of the main Holocaust narrative to be found in Re'uven Fink and Avraham Yaron, eds., Seyfer Hosht: Yizkor bukh (Tel Aviv: Hoshter Society of New York and Irgun yotse Hosht, Tel-Aviv, 1957); and Rochelle "Rachel" Smola Gelman, It Could Not Have Happened: A True Story of Humanity and Inhumanity, ed. Lou Weis (Irvine, CA: R. Gelman, 1995).

Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Hoszcza can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/1453); DARO; GARF (7021-71-121); TsDAVO; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. USHMM, RG-31.017M, reel 2, "Amtsblatt des Gebietskommissars in Rowno," announcement dated September 17, 1941.

3. Gelman, It Could Not Have Happened, p. 15. It should be noted that the author did not arrive in Hoszcza until September 1941.

4. Goldshtein, Let the World Know, p. 8.

5. Ibid., p. 15.

6. Ibid., pp. 7–8.

7. Ibid., pp. 9–11, discusses the Jewish Council in some detail, giving the names of all its members.

8. Gelman, It Could Not Have Happened, p. 18.

9. Goldshtein, Let the World Know, pp. 19–20.

10. Ibid., pp. 9–10, has a copy of the author's own identity card, including his photograph, noting his profession of baker and also that he worked for the Rayonverwaltung (local administration) in Hoszcza.

11. Ibid., pp. 26–30.

12. See the report of the Higher-SS and Police Leader Ukraine for the period June 1–30, 1942 (TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 29).

13. Goldshtein, Let the World Know, pp. 26–30; Gelman, It Could Not Have Happened, pp. 23–24.

14. Goldshtein, Let the World Know, p. 68; Martin Gilbert, The Holocaust: The Jewish Tragedy (Glasgow: William Collins, 1986), p. 403, gives the number of 500 victims.

15. Goldshtein, Let the World Know, p. 68.

16. Beth Hatefutsoth, The Nahum Goldman Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, Chronology for Hoszcza (available as an appendix to the USHMM copy of Goldshtein, Let the World Know).

17. GARF, 7021-71-121, p. 4.

18. Gelman, It Could Not Have Happened, p. 26.

19. According to Gilbert, The Holocaust, p. 862, Kalenczuk was honored by Yad Vashem as one of the Righteous Among the Nations. The relevant files can be found at YVA, in collection M-31.

IALTUSHKOV

Pre-1941: Ialtushkov, village, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jaltuschkow, Rayon and Gebiet Bar, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Yaltushkiv, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Ialtushkov is located 14 kilometers (8.7 miles) southwest of Bar. In 1926 the Jewish population was 1,392; by 1939, the number of Jews had declined to 1,212. At that time the village of Ialtushkov was part of the Bar raion.

Units of the German 17th Army occupied the village in mid-July 1941. Very few Jews were able to evacuate during these initial weeks following the German attack on the Soviet Union. In late July and August 1941, a German military administration controlled the area and established an auxiliary police force recruited from local non-Jewish inhabitants. In September 1941, authority was handed over to a German civil administration. Ialtushkov was included in the Rayon and Gebiet Bar, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar was Franz Schwarz, and his deputy was Hans Eberle.¹ The head of the Rayon administration (Rayonchef) in Bar was a former middle school teacher, Vladimir Kol'vepyrk.²

Initially the Jews had to wear an armband with the Star of David on it; later they were obliged to wear a yellow Star of David on their clothes. The German authorities demanded from the Jewish population "contributions" of money, and the Jews were also required to surrender their valuables, clothing, furs, and especially any jewelry, gold, and silver items. On December 15, 1941, the head of the Rayon administration, Kol'vepyrk, decreed the creation of ghettos in Bar and Ialtushkov starting on December 20, 1941. Some non-Jews were displaced in order to create the ghettos, and the German authorities were concerned with preventing Jews from destroying furniture they had to leave behind and also local Ukrainians from stealing it.³ When Jews were resettled into the ghetto, they were not allowed to take property with them, although some left items for safekeeping with non-Jews outside the ghetto. In Ialtushkov, according to one account, “the ghetto was set up next to the market place and surrounded by a tall barbed-wire fence. The people were starving.”⁴

On August 19, 1942, forces of the German Security Police, the Gendarmerie, and local policemen conducted a first killing Aktion in the ghettos of Bar and Ialtushkov. In Ialtushkov, several hundred Jews deemed unfit for work were rounded up in the ghetto. During the afternoon, the German forces and their collaborators escorted Jewish children and the elderly on foot to a sandy site a few kilometers to the northwest of the village. The policemen encouraged the Jews to keep moving by beating them with their rifle butts. At the pits, to save bullets, the Germans lined people up four deep to be shot. Some were then buried alive. Before the shooting, the people were made to undress. Afterwards the clothing of the Jews was stored in a house in Ialtushkov, and some of it was sold to the local inhabitants.⁵

Those Jews kept alive temporarily were mobilized for work mainly on road construction. In October 1942, the German Security Police conducted a second wave of killings in Gebiet Bar. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, 1,194 Jews were shot when the Ialtushkov ghetto was liquidated on October 15, 1942.⁶

SOURCES A witness testimony on the ghetto in Ialtushkov can be found in Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Black Book: The Ruthless Murder of Jews by German-Fascist Invaders Throughout the Temporarily-Occupied Regions of the Soviet Union and in the Death Camps of Poland During the War of 1941–1945 (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981).

Documents and witness testimonies concerning the destruction of the Jews of Ialtushkov can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, 204 AR-Z 447/67); DAVINO (1358-1c-1; R2966-1-691; R6022-1-4); GARF (7021-54-1273); USHMM (RG-31.002M); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. See USHMM, RG-31.002M (TsDAVO), reel 3, 3206-2-19, p. 29. This document notes that Schwarz was only temporarily appointed to the post of Gebietskommissar, but his name is also recorded in the ChGK reports; see BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 447/67, vol. 1, pp. 60, 63.

2. RG-31.011M (DAVINO), reel 3, 1358-1c-1, Order no. 21, signed by Kol'vepryk.

3. Ibid.

4. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 38.

5. BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 447/67, vol. 1, pp. 67–85, statement of Richard Schulz, February 1948, gives the figure of 213 victims. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 38, date the shooting on August 20. The ChGK report gives the number of victims as 450; see GARF, 7021-54-1273, pp. 14, 64.

6. GARF, 7021-54-1273, p. 64. This figure probably represents the total of all Jews murdered in Ialtushkov during the German occupation.

IARMOLINTSY

Pre-1941: Iarmolintsy, town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jarmolinzy, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Iarmolyntsy, raion center, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Iarmolintsy is located 30 kilometers (18.6 miles) south-southwest of Proskurov. The Jewish population was 1,264 in 1939 (61 percent of the total population).¹ Another 1,312 Jews resided in the villages of the Iarmolintsy raion, primarily in Sharovka and Frampol'. In the 1930s, Iarmolintsy was the center of a Jewish national sel'sovet (with 1,733 residents in 1931).

After the start of the German invasion on June 22, 1941, some of the Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for the Red Army, and a small number of Jews was able to evacuate to the east. More than 1,000 Jews remained in Iarmolintsy at the start of the occupation.

Iarmolintsy was occupied by units of the German 17th Army in early July 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. It established a local administration and an auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. In September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Iarmolintsy became the center of Gebiet Jarmolinzy, which included the Rayons of Satanow, Gorodok, and Michalpol, as well as Rayon Jarmolinzy. The Gebietskommissar was Kameradschaftsführer Ernst Mertes.² From the fall of 1941, there was a Gendarmerie post in Iarmolintsy, which was headed initially by Gendarmeriemeister Rudolf Buchholz and, from October 19, 1942, by Gendarmeriemeister Glossat. The head of the Gendarmerie post took over responsibility for the local Ukrainian police (renamed Schutzmannschaft). The head of the Ukrainian police in Iarmolintsy was a man named Kolbasiuk, and his deputy was Omanskii.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Iarmolintsy: a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created; Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols; they were compelled to perform forced labor, during which they were beaten and otherwise abused; and they were forbidden to leave the town. Already on July 9, 1941, 16 Soviet activists, including several Jews, were shot in Iarmolintsy.³

Sources differ somewhat regarding the precise date of the establishment of the ghetto in Iarmolintsy. On the Germans' arrival, most of the Jews lived together in the center of the town, with only a few Ukrainians and Russians living among them. According to most sources, in the fall of 1941, following the receipt of an order from Generalkommissar Schöne, the remaining non-Jews were moved out of the Jewish section of town, which was also reduced in size to only about 15 percent of the town's area, forming a ghetto. According to Jewish survivor Semyon Zelfon, the ghetto was set up about three months into the German occupation. He states that many of the former Jewish houses were demolished to create a park, and the ghetto itself was very overcrowded, with six to eight families sharing each small dwelling. Around this time, the ghetto was also surrounded with barbed wire and was guarded externally by the local Ukrainian police.⁴

In the ghetto the Jews suffered from hunger, as they only received a bread ration of 200 grams (7 ounces) per day. They were only permitted to visit the local market for one hour on Sundays. However, they managed to obtain some extra food by bartering their remaining possessions with the local population.⁵

Forced labor tasks for the Jews in the ghetto included earthworks on a large dam project, needed for the construction of an electrical power plant not far from Iarmolinty.⁶ At some time in 1942, probably in April, the head of the Judenrat in Iarmolinty was obliged to select 10 Jews who were to be hanged by the Germans as a reprisal for the killing of a German official in the town. Witnesses state that he selected 10 elderly or infirm Jews. When the Jewish elder in Frampol' was presented with the same demand for 10 victims, he volunteered himself as the first to be killed.⁷

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, in June 1942, Jewish residential districts, "open ghettos," were also created in the nearby villages of Sharovka and Frampol'.⁸ In August 1942, 400 Jews from Gebiet Jarmolinzy were sent to the labor camp in Leznevo, 6 kilometers (3.7 miles) from Proskurov; the Jewish inmates of this camp were used for the construction and the repair of roads along the main transit road, Durchgangsstrasse (highway) IV.⁹

In late October 1942, on the order of Gebietskommissar Mertes, most of the Jews of Gebiet Jarmolinzy, including the majority of those from the ghettos in Gorodok and Mikhalpol', and also those from Frampol' and Sharovka, were rounded up and transferred by vehicle or on foot to Iarmolinty, escorted by the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.¹⁰ In Iarmolinty, all the Jews gathered from the Gebiet were confined within a derelict barracks compound close to the railway station for several days under unbearable conditions, without food or water.¹¹

As a number had been killed during the course of the concentration of the Jews and several large pits were prepared within sight of the barracks, the Jews there offered resistance to their impending murder. A member of the Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft, named by one witness as Kazik Ostrovskii, was sent into the barracks to bring out some of the Jews. Instead, he was overpowered and killed by them, severing his head. Some Jews also fired rifle shots at the German and Ukrainian police who guarded the barracks externally. A number of Jews also decided to commit suicide in the barracks rather than allow themselves to be killed by their tormentors.¹²

Fearing that the revolt might get out of control, the German officials in Iarmolinty sent for reinforcements from other nearby police posts. On the arrival of a detachment of Security Police and SD from Starokonstantinov, under the command of SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Graf, the Jews were smoked out of the barracks when the Germans set it on fire.¹³ Once the remaining Jews emerged from the barracks, they were forced to undress and then were shot in groups of about 50 people into three pits prepared nearby. The Ukrainian police were stationed around the execution site to isolate it and to prevent the prisoners from escaping. In total, probably around 6,400 Jews were shot during this Aktion.¹⁴

Local witnesses indicate that some Jews hid in basements and other places in and around the Iarmolinty ghetto during the transfer to the barracks. Over the ensuing weeks after the mass shooting, more Jews were uncovered and were shot in turn. Some Jews managed to survive with the help of local non-Jews. For example, in a nearby village a Jewish boy aged 15 was hidden by an elderly woman for the rest of the occupation. The remaining Jewish houses in the ghetto were dismantled after the Jews had been shot, and Jewish clothing was recycled for use by the local population.¹⁵

SOURCES Publications concerning the destruction of the Jewish population of Iarmolinty include the following: Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002), p. 21.

Documents regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Iarmolinty can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/5071 to 5073); DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-818); VHF (# 24841, 32340, 34283, 38519); YIU (nos. 594 and 595); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. V. Lukin and B. Khaimovich, 100 evreiskikh mestechek Ukrain'i. Istoricheskii Putevoditel'. Vypusk 1. Podoliia (Jerusalem and St. Petersburg, 1998), p. 226.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 202.

4. VHF, # 38519; BA-L, B 162/5072, p. 404, B 162/5071, p. 318. YIU, Témoigné no. 595, however, states the ghetto was not enclosed until 1942. GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 202, dates the ghetto's formation in June 1942.

5. VHF, # 38519; YIU, Témoigné no. 594.

6. VHF, # 38519; YIU, Témoigné no. 595; BA-L, B 162/5071, p. 319.

7. VHF, # 38519; YIU, Témoigné no. 595; BA-L, B 162/5072, p. 459.

8. GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 202.

9. IPN, GKŚZpNP, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 4, report of SS-Hauptsturmführer Hilliges to KdS Rowno, August 18, 1942.

10. BA-L, B 162/5072, p. 434; VHF, # 32340 and 34283; GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 203. YIU, Témoigné no. 594, mentions that the Jews from Sharovka and Frampol' were brought to Iarmolinty but does not date this.

11. GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 203. See also BA-L, B 162/5073, pp. 649-657.

12. YIU, Témoins no. 595; BA-L, B 162/5073, pp. 649–651, B 162/5071, p. 91. According to Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 21, 16 local policemen and five Germans were killed in the uprising, but these figures are not mentioned in other sources.

13. VHF, # 24841; BA-L, B 162/5072, p. 494.

14. BA-L, B 162/5071, pp. 89–92, for the figure of 6,400; B 162/5072, p. 460, gives the figure of 8,000 Jews shot in the mass grave near the barracks, on the basis of ChGK materials.

15. YIU, Témoins nos. 594 and 595.

IARYSHEV (AKA YARYSHEV)

Pre-1941: Iaryshev, village, raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jaryschew, Rayon center, Gebiet Bar, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Iaryshev, Mohyliv-Podil's'kyi raion, Vinnitsia oblast', Ukraine

Iaryshev is located 101 kilometers (63 miles) south-southwest of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, 509 Jews lived in Iaryshev (17.7 percent of the total population). An additional 72 Jews lived in the villages of what was then the Iaryshev raion.

After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, a small number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Eligible men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 400 Jews remained in Iaryshev at the start of the occupation.

Romanian armed forces occupied Iaryshev on July 19, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. The Ortskommandant appointed a village elder and established a Ukrainian auxiliary police force.

In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The village was incorporated into Gebiet Bar, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Regierungsassessor Steffen was made the Gebietskommissar.¹ In 1942, Leutnant Willi Petrich became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Bar, and the Iaryshev Gendarmerie post was subordinated to his authority. The Ukrainian auxiliary police unit served under the direction of the German Gendarmes based in Iaryshev.

On the very first day of the occupation, Romanian soldiers killed 25 Jews in the village.² In early August 1941, the German military administration for the region, based in Vinnitsa, noted that there were 800 houses in Iaryshev and that all the Jews had been (temporarily) driven out on the orders of a “Romanian commander.” At this time no militia had yet been recruited in the village.³ Many of the Jews would later return to Iaryshev.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented on the authority of the German occupying forces in Iaryshev. Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing armbands bearing the image of the Star of David and, later, patches in the shape of a yellow circle. They were compelled to perform forced labor, and they were not permitted to leave the limits of the settlement unless they were part of a forced labor crew.

In late 1941 or at the start of 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto in the village, which was surrounded by barbed wire.⁴ The Jews from the village of Serebrinets, 8 kilometers (5 miles) away, were brought into Iaryshev in the fall of 1941. Initially they lived with other Jews in Iaryshev, and subsequently they were moved into the ghetto.⁵ When the ghetto was set up, those Jews who lived in the center of town were required to move into the area around the marketplace. Inside the ghetto there was terrible overcrowding, with as many as 40 people sharing one room.⁶

Every morning the Germans selected a number of people from the ghetto to serve on work details. The Jews were beaten frequently by both the Germans and the local police. The German authorities took some Jews as hostages in order to extract a large ransom payment. There were also shootings and acts of rape committed by Germans against Jewish women over the age of 16. Due to inadequate clothing, the Jews in the ghetto suffered from cold in the winter. Food rations consisted mainly of soup and a small amount of bread, barely sufficient to keep people alive. A variety of diseases spread among the Jews in Iaryshev, including typhus, and a number of Jews died.⁷

The ghetto was liquidated on August 21, 1942, and according to an official German report, 212 Jews were shot.⁸ The Aktion was organized by a squad from the outpost of the Security Police based in Kamenets-Podolskii, which was headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Andreas Fermer, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. On the day of the Aktion, the Jews were assembled and instructed to bring with them their valuable possessions. Then they were escorted into the woods, where a large pit had been prepared. Here they were forced to undress and were shot in the pit.⁹

On the night before the Aktion, it appears that the able-bodied Jews were selected out and transported to a forced labor camp. Jewish artisans were also selected at that time and allowed to remain alive for a short period longer.

Only a few Jews were able to escape from the ghetto and survive until the Red Army drove the Germans from the area in 1944.

SOURCES Documents regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Iaryshev can be found in the following archives: DAVINO (P1683-1-13); GARF (7021-54-1263); VHF (e.g., # 47924, 41939); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002), pp. 27–28. According to another source, 40 Jews were shot in Iaryshev on July 19, 1941, and another 175 Jews were killed two weeks later; see GARF, 7021-54-1271, p. 9.

3. See the report of Oberfeldkommandantur Winniza (Abt. VII) an Sicherungsdivision 444 (Abt. VII), August 11, 1941, in RGVA, 1275-3-662.

4. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Complete Black Book, pp. 27–28.

5. VHF, # 41939, testimony taken in 1998 of Roza Veksler (née Abramson), born 1927.

6. Ibid., # 47924, testimony taken in 1998 of Leia Bandus, born 1929.

7. Ibid.; also # 41939.

8. Report of Leutnant Willi Petrich, the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Bar, August 27, 1942, on Aktions against the Jewish population. See IPN, GKSZpNP Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 10. According to the materials of the ChGK, located in GARF (7021-54-1263, p. 53), on that day there were 595 Jews killed in the village.

9. VHF, # 41939.

IZIASLAV

Pre-1941: Iziaslav, town and raion center, Khmel'nytskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Saslaw, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Iziaslav, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Iziaslav is situated 68 kilometers (42 miles) southeast of Równe. In 1897, there were 5,998 Jews living in the town (47.6 percent of the total population). Before 1910 the town was known as Zaslav. According to the 1939 census, there were 3,208 Jews in Iziaslav (27.7 percent of the population).

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Iziaslav at the beginning of July 1941. During the two weeks from the start of the German invasion until the occupation of the town, a small number of Jews evacuated eastward, and some of the men were called up to or volunteered for service in the Red Army, so that at the start of the occupation about 3,000 Jews remained in the town.

In July and August of 1941, the town was under the authority of a German local commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), which also established a local administration and police force from among the residents. Among those appointed was a man named Digas, who served as "commandant" (probably chief of police), and also Bogutski, who became the town's mayor (Bürgermeister). In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Iziaslav became the administrative center of Gebiet Saslaw, which included the Rayons of Plushnoje, Lachowzy, and Teofipol, as well as Saslaw. The Gebietskommissar was SA-Oberführer Knochenhauer.¹ In the fall of 1941, a German Gendarmerie post was created in Iziaslav; it controlled the local Ukrainian police.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the following anti-Jewish measures were implemented in the town: a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was set up; Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing symbols, namely, the Star of David; they were assigned to forced labor; they were forbidden to leave the boundaries of the town; and they were subjected to systematic looting and beating by the Ukrainian police. Jews suffered from food shortages from early in the occupation and had to line up for bread; however, the local authorities on occasion removed certain Jews from the bread lines.²

The first anti-Jewish Aktion in the town occurred on August 24, 1941. On this day, the 45th Reserve Police Battalion, commanded by Major der Polizei Martin Besser, with the help of the Ukrainian police, rounded up all the Jews, telling them to take with them their valuables for resettlement to another place, according to one survivor, to Palestine. At about 4:00 P.M. the remaining women and children were released, but approximately 1,000 Jews, mainly men, were taken away in vehicles to be shot.³ The mass shooting was conducted on the edge of the Obluga Forest, approximately 1.5 kilometers (0.9 mile) south of the city. For the mass grave, the Germans used defensive fortifications, which had been prepared by the Soviet authorities in order to conceal tanks. According to a witness, the Jews were made to lie facedown in the bottom of the ditches and were shot in the back.⁴

Shortly after this mass shooting, in late August or early September 1941, the German authorities established a ghetto in Iziaslav for the Jewish specialists selected before the Aktion and for other Jews who had managed to survive. In addition, Jews were brought into the ghetto from the surrounding villages, including Belogorodka (about 20 kilometers [12.4 miles] to the southwest).⁵ It is estimated that up to 2,500 people were enclosed in the ghetto.⁶

The ghetto was located in the Old Town section of Iziaslav, which previously had been occupied by a mixed population of Jews, Ukrainians, and Russians. It included a large two-story synagogue building and about 15 to 20 houses. It was surrounded by a fence made of wooden planks and topped with barbed wire. The ghetto was also guarded by the German and Ukrainian police. Some Jews sneaked out through holes in the fence, taking off their yellow badges, to forage for food.⁷

It appears that the new arrivals were accommodated in the synagogue, which held around 500 to 1,000 Jews altogether. However, another account reports that the synagogue was used as a hospital. Some of the Jews who caught typhus were removed from the hospital periodically and shot.⁸

According to Semen Shider, there was another roundup about a month after the establishment of the ghetto, in which most of the remaining men (about 200 people) were taken away on a transport. He believes these men were also shot. After this, only a few male specialist workers remained in the ghetto.⁹

Survivors name the Jewish elder or head of the Jewish Police as Abrasha Galevich (or Kalenich). The Jewish Police were noted for some corruption in their collection of valuables from the Jews for the Germans, and they did not enjoy a good reputation. Some Jews left the ghetto under escort by the Ukrainian police for forced labor in agriculture or repairing roads and bridges. These columns sometimes received food from other local inhabitants who took pity on them and the Jews attempted to smuggle this food into the ghetto.¹⁰

Little information is known about resistance in the ghetto, other than individual or family efforts at hiding or escape. One survivor, however, mentions an incident in which 12 young Jewish boys from the village of Liakhovtsi overpowered their guards and managed to escape. Subsequently it appears they were all recaptured.¹¹

The Germans organized another large-scale Aktion against the ghetto on June 27, 1942. After rounding up the Jews, the specialist workers and their families were sent to one side. The remaining Jews were transported on trucks to a site about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) southwest of the town, where a squad of the Security Police and SD, with the help of the German and Ukrainian police, shot more than 2,000 people. Apart from the specialists and their families, a few other Jews survived by hiding in attics or behind false walls or escaping into the countryside.

After the Aktion, the remaining 140 or so specialist workers and their families were returned to a smaller ghetto area. Among the tasks they were now assigned were the sorting and repairing of the clothing that had been gathered at the killing site.¹²

Following a final roundup in January 1943, when most of the remaining Jews were shot, the ghetto in Iziaslav ceased to exist. A few Jews managed to escape and survived with the help of local inhabitants who agreed to conceal them for a shorter or longer period of time. Some of the survivors also joined with the Soviet partisans, who had become more numerous in the region by the summer of 1943.

In total, between 1941 and January 1943, around 3,500 Jews (including Jews from the neighboring villages) were murdered in Iziaslav.¹³

The German case against Martin Besser, the former commander of the 45th Reserve Police Battalion, tried by the court in Regensburg in 1971, resulted in no punishment owing to his advanced age and ill health (in 1971, Besser was 79 years old).

SOURCES Articles on the destruction of the Jewish population of Iziaslav can be found in D. Hoshkis, ed., Nezahoenarana (Slavuta-Hetishyn-Iziaslav, 1996), pp. 115–124; and in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2000), 4:503–504.

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Iziaslav Jews can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF; VHAP; VHF (# 27799, 32021, 33649, 50048); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft and Tatyana Feith

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. VHF, # 33649, testimony of Sofia Finkel; # 27799, testimony of Semen Shider.

3. Telegram of Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer Russland Süd, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln, no. 160, of August 25, 1941 (VHAP, Record Group—Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS). On this day the battalion also conducted shootings of Jews in Baranovka and Dubrovka (Zhitomir oblast'), in total killing 1,342 people in three separate Aktions (the majority, however, were murdered in Iziaslav).

4. VHF, # 33649; # 27799.

5. Ibid., # 50048, testimony of Lida Garnaga from Belogorodka, who dates the ghetto's establishment in August 1941; # 27799, Semen Shider of Iziaslav, however, dates it in early September 1941; # 33649, Sofia Finkel, states that the ghetto was set up for those remaining after the first Aktion.

6. Ibid., # 27799, gives the figure of between 2,000 and 3,000, which appears correct, given that about 3,000 Jews remained in the town, some 1,000 were killed in late August 1941, and a few hundred were brought in subsequently from neighboring villages.

7. Ibid., # 50048; # 27799; # 32021; # 33649.

8. Ibid., # 50048; # 33649.

9. Ibid., # 27799.

10. Ibid., # 27799; # 32021.

11. Ibid., # 27799.

12. Ibid., # 50048.

13. According to the ChGK report for Iziaslav, during the period of the occupation more than 5,000 civilians were killed, as well as 6,000 prisoners of war (see Podillia Velykii Vitchyzniani viini 1941–1945 rr. Zbirnik dokumentiv i materialiv [Lviv, 1969], p. 113). Most of the civilian casualties were probably Jews.

JANÓW POLESKI

Pre-1939: Janów Poleski, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Ivanovo, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Janow, Rayon center, Gebiet Pinsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Ivanava, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Janów is located about 133 kilometers (83 miles) east of Brześć and 41 kilometers (25.5 miles) west of Pińsk. In 1939, the Jewish population of Janów was around 3,000, about half of the total. From September 1939 until July 1941, Janów came under Soviet rule. Private property was nationalized, and workers had to join cooperatives. The Jewish population was swelled by refugees from central and western Poland, but a few Jews were among those deported to the interior of the Soviet Union.

The 45th Infantry Division of the German army occupied Janów on July 7, 1941. During the first two months of the occupation, Janów remained under a military administration (Ortskommandantur). The Ortskommandant ordered the Jews to wear markings and perform forced labor. He also appointed Alter Dubinsky, the former chairman of the Jewish community, as head of the Jewish Council (Judenrat). Since the members of the Judenrat were held personally responsible for the fulfillment of German orders, Dubinsky accepted this dubious honor only reluctantly.¹

In September 1941, a German civil administration assumed control of the Polesia region. Janów became a Rayon center in Gebiet Pinsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.

In Janów, the 2nd SS-Cavalry Squadron carried out an anti-Jewish Aktion in early August 1941.² They shot about 400 male Jews, age 14 and over, after pulling aside some with special skills, such as furriers.³

In the fall of 1941, a platoon of 26 German Gendarmes took over the policing of Gebiet Pinsk from the military and assumed control of the local police, which was renamed the Schutzmannschaft. The Schutzmannschaft consisted of about 100 men, the majority of whom were Ukrainians. Six Rayon police stations were supervised by the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Pińsk, including one in Janów.

In early April 1942 (around the holiday of Passover), the Germans ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Janów. The Jews were given only 18 hours to move into the ghetto and could only take 8 kilograms (17.6 pounds) of belongings with them.⁴ The ghetto consisted of about 68 houses on Sovetskaia Street between the market square and the mill. The ghetto was enclosed by a barbed-wire fence. Jewish carpenters quickly constructed bunk beds to deal with the overcrowding, as more than 50 people had to share each house, with only about 1.2 square meters (13 square feet) each.⁵ Many Jews performed forced labor at the sawmill. Daily rations were meager: 150 grams (5.3 ounces) of bread per day for workers and only 100 grams (3.5 ounces) for nonworkers. Jews were strictly forbidden to trade with non-Jews or to possess meat, butter, milk, or eggs. Those who worked outside the ghetto still exploited any opportunity to gain extra food illegally, in spite of regular searches when they returned. Some Jews were shot when they were caught returning to the ghetto with any food or tobacco. Others cultivated small parcels of land in an effort to supplement their diet.

In spite of these efforts to obtain extra food, hunger was rampant and disease widespread. As in other ghettos, Jewish religious life continued. There were two rabbis and a committee for assisting the community. Inside the ghetto, there was a Jewish police force of 10 men, commanded by Szmuel Grajer from the village of Zamoszi.⁶ In the summer of 1942, the Germans imposed a “contribution” on the Jews of 2.5 kilograms (5.5 pounds) of gold and 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of silver. This demand could be met only by surrendering wedding rings and pocket watches. Some Jews capable of work were sent to perform forced labor near Zhitomir. Fearing they would not return, wealthier Jews bribed the Judenrat to have their names removed from the list. Only one person, who escaped from the camp after five weeks, was ever heard from again.⁷

The murder of the Jews in Gebiet Pinsk was organized by the local outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle Pinsk), which was established in May 1942 and was under the command of SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhelm Rasp. The Aussendienststelle was staffed by members of the Gestapo, SD, and Kripo and was reinforced by Rasp’s Kommando Metz.⁸ There were 50 men serving at the outpost, including 15 Security Police officials, about 15 translators, and 20 or 30 officials of the Order Police. By August 1942, a small branch office of the SD had also been established in Janów.

The liquidation of the Janów ghetto began on September 22, 1942.⁹ In the evening, Gendarmerie and local policemen surrounded the ghetto. Those capable of work (about 500 people) were kept under guard at the sawmill, and on the morning of September 23, forces of the Security Police and SD arrived from Pińsk at about 8:30 A.M. Discussions on procedure then took place between Rasp and Gebietskommissar Klein.¹⁰

The remaining Jews in the ghetto were assembled at the marketplace and then escorted to previously excavated pits about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town, where they had to undress before being shot. As the Jews approached the pits, Chana Gorodecka attacked one of the policemen, and some Jews managed to escape in the confusion.¹¹ The mass shooting began only after about 500 Jews had been assembled, which meant that those who arrived first had to sit naked for about an hour before the shooting began. All were shot while lying in the pit with a shot from behind to the nape of the neck (Genickschuss) from a automatic pistol. As the pit filled up, those who were to be shot next had to walk over the bodies of those already killed in order to lie down for their turn. When it was no longer possible for the executioners to stand in the pit because of the number of dead, they stood on the edge of the pit and shot down into it.

As many Jews had gone into hiding, the Germans and local police started to comb the ghetto. One of the Germans involved, Heinrich Oeldmann, recalled after the war that the Janów ghetto suddenly burst into flames.¹² The Jews resisted with weapons and homemade explosives. People caught on fire and turned into burning torches. Between 400 and 500 Jews lost their lives during the uprising, but about 120 managed to escape from Janów to the nearby forests.¹³ According to the report of the German military economic office in Łuck for early October, “[I]n Janów . . . the entire ghetto was burned down with all its inhabitants.”¹⁴ The next morning, the mayor ordered the local population to collect the charred corpses from the streets.

On September 25, another selection was made at the sawmill, as a result of which all but 60 of the Jews held there were shot. There are conflicting estimates as to the total number of Jews murdered during the Aktion: the Germans probably murdered around 2,800 Jews altogether, including those shot or burned to death in the ghetto.¹⁵ A few Jews who came out of hiding were permitted to join the Jews at the sawmill, but the remaining Jews were murdered a few weeks later, apart from a group who fled to the forests in time.

Of those Janów Jews who escaped to the forests, at least 50 were subsequently slain by the Nazis and their collaborators as they searched for surviving Jews. A number of Jews from Janów served in Soviet partisan formations, including the “Szeleznia” detachment. At least 7 of these people died in combat with the Germans, including Dr. Włodawsky and a young girl named Cirinovsky.¹⁶ Around 100 Jewish escapees from the Janów ghetto managed to survive until the Red Army drove the Germans from the area in July 1944.

SOURCES Information on the Janów ghetto can be found in the following publications: Mordekhai Nadav and Nachman

1372 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

Blumental, eds., Yanov al-yad Pinsk: Sefer zikaron (Jerusalem: Irgun yots'e Yanov al yad Pinsk be-Yisrael, 1969); and Yehuda Adelman, Heroes without Medals (New York: Vantage, 1983).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/156); BA-BL; BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59); BA-MA; GARF (7021-90-27); NARA (T-77, reel 628); NARB (845-1-13, p. 23; 861-1-11, pp. 45–47); Sta. Braunschweig (2 Ks 11/63); USHMM (RG-53.002M); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/1944).

Stephen Pallavicini and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Shalom Cholawsky, The Jews of Bielorrussia during World War II (Amsterdam: Harwood, 1998), p. 253.
2. Most sources date the Aktion between August 2 and August 5, 1941.
3. Sta. Braunschweig, 2 Ks 11/63, file 1266, statement of Alfred Weidlich, July 16, 1962; AŽIH, 301/156, Samuel Reznik.
4. Isr Aplbeym, “Fun iene teg,” in Nadav and Blumental, Yanov al-yad Pinsk, p. 335; AŽIH, 301/156, Samuel Reznik, dates the establishment of the ghetto in May 1942.
5. Aplbeym, “Fun iene teg,” pp. 335–336; V.I. Adamushko et al., eds. Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: Staatskomitee für Archive und Aktenführung der Republik Belarus, 2001), p. 89; AŽIH, 301/156.
6. AŽIH, 301/156.
7. Aplbeym, “Fun iene teg,” p. 336.
8. BA-BL, R 94/9.
9. Aplbeym, “Fun iene teg,” p. 338; AŽIH, 301/156. NARB, 861-1-11, p. 46, the ChGK report for the Ivanono raion dates the Aktion on September 26–27, 1942.
10. BA-L, ZstL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, p. 3509, statement by Patik, April 5, 1963.
11. YVA, M-1/E/1944, testimony of Rosa Ichanowicz.
12. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, p. 12159, statement of Oeldmann, August 4, 1966.
13. Ibid., p. 1404, statement of Wilhelm Rasp, December 18, 1961.
14. NARA, T-77, reel 628, report of Wehrwirtschaftskommando Luzk, first 10 days of October 1942.
15. AŽIH, 301/156; BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, p. 12159, statement by Oeldmann.
16. Adelman, Heroes, p. 39.

JEZIERZANY

Pre-1939: Jezierzany, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Ozeriany, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jezeshany, Rayon Turisk, Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Ozeriany, Turiiis’k raion, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Jezierzany is located about 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) south-southeast of Kowel. According to the 1921 census, 340 Jews were living in Jezierzany. By the middle of 1941, there were probably around 400 Jews in the village.

The village was occupied on June 28, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) ran its affairs. From September 1941 onward, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Jezierzany was incorporated into Gebiet Kowel, which in turn became part of Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Regierungsrat Arno Kaempf became the Gebietskommissar in Kowel until June 1942, and Leutnant Philipp Rapp was appointed as Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.¹ In June 1942, Kaempf was arrested for embezzlement of Jewish property and executed shortly thereafter. His successor as Gebietskommissar was Stabsleiter Erich Kassner.

The Germans also appointed a village elder in Jezierzany and assembled an auxiliary Ukrainian police unit, which served under the German Gendarmerie precinct in Turzysk.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupying forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Jezierzany. Jews were required to wear distinctive markers in plain view, at first in the image of the Star of David and later in the shape of a yellow circle. They were subjected to various kinds of forced labor. They were not allowed to leave the limits of the village, and they suffered from systematic robbery and assaults by the Ukrainian police. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was also established in the village, through which the German occupying organs passed their orders and regulations to the rest of the Jewish population.

In the spring of 1942, an open ghetto was established in the village. All the Jews of Jezierzany were resettled into the ghetto. Jews were also brought in from the surrounding villages, such as Kupiczów (which had a Jewish population of 236 in 1921). In August 1942,² an SD detachment arrived from Kowel and liquidated the ghetto, with the help of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian auxiliary police. In total, 762 Jews were reportedly killed near the cemetery in the village of Sushibaba.³ As far as is known, 6 Jews from Jezierzany and 10 from Kupiczów survived until the area was liberated by the Red Army in 1944.⁴

SOURCES Published information on the fate of the Jewish community of Jezierzany during the Holocaust can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 101–102; and V. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni: Zbertvy i pamiat’ (Lutsk, 2003), pp. 37–38.

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Jezierzany Jews can be found in the following archives: DAVO; and GARF (7021-55-1).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni, p. 37.
3. GARF, 7021-55-1, pp. 70 and reverse side.
4. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni, p. 38.

KALIUS

Pre-1941: Kalius, village, Novaia Usbitsa raion, Khmel'nitskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kaljus, Rayon Nowaja-Ushchiza, Gebiet Bar; Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kalius, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Kalius is located on the Dniester River about 50 kilometers (30 miles) to the east of Kamenets-Podolskii. From the second half of the 1920s, Kalius was the administrative center of a Jewish national sel'sovet. In 1931, 1,204 Jews lived in the village.¹ The Jewish population subsequently decreased by a few hundred persons as a result of the Holodomor famine in 1932–1933 and the resettlement of Jews to other areas.

Around 500 Jews resided in the village on the eve of the war. After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, a small number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. At that time, men eligible for military service were either conscripted or voluntarily enlisted in the Red Army. Only about 400 Jews remained in the village at the start of the German occupation.

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Kalius on July 17, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the village. It appointed a village elder and recruited an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from the local non-Jewish inhabitants.

In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The village was incorporated into Gebiet Bar in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Regierungsassessor Steffen was named as Gebietskommissar.² The German Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Bar was initially Leutnant Richard Schulz. From May 1942 he became the deputy of the SS- und Polizeigebietsführer and Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Bar under Hauptmann der Gendarmerie Willi Petrich.³

During 1942, members of the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Kamenets-Podolskii organized the anti-Jewish Aktions in Gebiet Bar, which included the village of Kalius. At this time SS-Hauptscharführer Andreas Fermer was in charge of the outpost. The German Gendarmerie and the auxiliary Ukrainian police also played an active role in all the Aktions.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German military administration implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Kalius. Jews were required to wear distinctive markings in plain view, at first an armband bearing the Star of David and later a patch in the shape of a yellow circle. All Jews who were capable of work had to perform various forms of compulsory labor, such as chopping wood, building a bridge across the Kalius River, and building roads. The work was supervised by German overseers and the Ukrainian police, who were very cruel and who robbed and beat the Jews frequently. Jews were not allowed to leave the limits of the village.

In December 1941 or early 1942, all the Jews of the village were moved into a ghetto, and thereby a number of Jews were forced out of their homes.⁴ At the start of July 1942, about 100 young, able-bodied Jews were sent to a forced labor camp in Letichev. A few dozen more Jews were sent to the camp during the following six weeks. Those who remained behind in the ghetto were murdered on August 20, 1942.⁵ Altogether there were about 240 victims of this Aktion.⁶ The mass shooting was organized by the Security Police detachment in Kamenets-Podolskii, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police.

When Moyshe Rekhtman returned to Kalius in April 1944, after the Red Army had driven out the Germans, he found only the mass grave where the local Jews had been murdered, as all the Jewish homes had been destroyed and converted into gardens. The village had virtually ceased to exist.⁷

SOURCES The testimony of Moyshe Rekhtman, a Jewish survivor from Kalius, can be found in David A. Chapin and Ben Weinstock, eds., The Road from Letichev: The History and Culture of a Forgotten Jewish Community in Eastern Europe (San Jose: Writer's showcase presented by Writer's digest, 2000), 2: 701–703. He has also published a memoir in English together with Phil Shpilberg, Here My Home Once Stood: A Holocaust Memoir (USA: Fourth Generation Publishing, 2008).

Documents and testimonies relevant to the extermination of the Jews of Kalius can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, 204 AR-Z 447/67); DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-803); IPN; and YVA (file M-33).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. A. Kruglov, Poteri evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 gg. (Kharkov: Tabrut Laam, 2005), p. 204.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 447/67, vol. 1, pp. 67–85, 159–166.
4. Testimony of M. Rekhtman, in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road from Letichev, 2:701–703. Other ghettos in Gebiet Bar were created in December 1941; see DAVINO, 1358-1c-1.
5. Testimony of M. Rekhtman.
6. Report of Leutnant Petrich, the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Bar, August 27, 1942, regarding “Jewish Aktions,” IPN, GKŚZpNP, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 10. See also GARF, 7021-64-803. According to the ChGK report, 540 Jews were murdered in the village in 1942, but the total number of Jewish deaths during the German occupation was 666. In view of the German report, this figure seems too high. Rekhtman, however, gives an even higher number of 850 Jewish victims buried in Kalius.
7. Testimony of M. Rekhtman.

KAMENETS-PODOLSKII

Pre-1941: Kamenets-Podolskii, city, raion and oblast' center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kamenez-Podolsk, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kamianets-Podil's'kyi, raion and oblast' center, Ukraine

Kamenets-Podolskii is located about 100 kilometers (62 miles) southwest of Proskurov. According to the 1939 population census, 13,796 Jews were living in the city (just over 38 percent of the total population). In the villages of the Kamenets-Podolskii raion, there were 1,255 additional Jews. After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a small number of Jewish men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, but more than 12,000 Jews remained in Kamenets-Podolskii at the start of the German occupation.

Units of the Hungarian VIII Army Corps occupied the city on July 10, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office ran the city. Initially it was Feldkommandantur 183, under the command of Unterleutnant Josef Meiler. The military administration established a local authority in the city, which was run by a man named Kibets. In addition, an auxiliary police force was established, recruited from local non-Jewish inhabitants.

In September 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Kamenets-Podolskii became the administrative center of Gebiet Kamenez-Podolsk. Along with Rayon Kamenez-Podolsk, the other Rayon towns in the Gebiet included Chemerovtsy, Staraja Uschiza, Orinin, and Smotritsch. From September 1941 until August 1942, the Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Reindl. He was succeeded by Regierungsrat Rosenhauer. From November 1941 to June 1943, Leutnant Albert Reich served as the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer. A number of regional Gendarmerie posts, including one in Kamenets-Podolskii, were established, which were subordinated to the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer. From the end of April 1942 to July 1943, Gendarmeriemeister Fritz Jacob Jews are marched through the streets of Kamenets-Podolskii to a mass murder site outside the city, August 27, 1941. Gyula Spitz, a member of the Hungarian (Jewish) labor service, clandestinely took this photograph.

USHMM WS #28216, COURTESY OF IVAN SVED

was the head of the Gendarmerie post in the city.¹ The German Gendarmerie also took over responsibility for the local Ukrainian police, which was renamed the Schutzmannschaft.

Sonderkommando 10b (subordinated to Einsatzgruppe D) was stationed in the city from the end of July to the middle of August 1941. Its commander was SS-Obersturmführer Siegfried Schuchart. Among its assigned tasks was that of preventing the mass deportation of Jews from the territory occupied by the Romanian forces into German-occupied territory.²

In May 1942, a Security Police (Sipo) outpost (Aussendienststelle) was established in Kamenets-Podolskii, which served under the Kommandeur der Sipo und SD (KdS), Dr. Pütz, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien based in Równe. SS-Hauptscharführer Andreas Fermer was in charge of the Sipo-Aussendienststelle in Kamenets-Podolskii until February 1943. In July 1942, a Ukrainian Criminal Police unit became part of the outpost; it was headed by a man named Gladun. The Sipo-Aussendienststelle took a leading role in the mass shootings of Jews in Gebiet Kamenez-Podolsk in the summer and fall of 1942, as well as in neighboring Gebiete, such as Dunajewzy and Bar.

In July and August 1941, the occupying forces introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in the city. A former member of the Ukrainian police recalls a massive anti-Jewish propaganda campaign launched by the Germans that portrayed the Jews as war profiteers.³ The occupational authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was responsible for collecting food, furniture, valuables, bed linens, and other items demanded by the Germans. Sometimes the Judenrat also had to supply clothing and shoes for non-Jewish prostitutes who served the Germans.

Jews had to wear distinctive markings: initially white armbands with a Star of David and subsequently yellow stars sewn onto the front and back of their clothes. Those caught without the badge had to pay a fine. Fines were generally levied for the smallest offense, for example, for greeting a German in an inappropriate manner. More often than not, a fine was accompanied by a severe beating.

In late July 1941, Jews from Hungary started to arrive in Kamenets-Podolskii.⁴ These Jews had been deported from Hungary following a decree issued by the Council of Ministers on the removal of all persons of dubious citizenship. The Jewish deportees were only permitted to take with them currency worth 30 pengös, food for three days, and a few personal items. They were deported to the border in freight cars, where they were transferred across the border at the rate of about 1,000 per day. Over the ensuing two weeks, more than 10,000 Hungarian deportees arrived in the area around Kamenets-Podolskii.⁵

Temporarily settled in Kamenets-Podolskii and other places nearby, the sheer number of Hungarian deportees frustrated the German authorities. They repeatedly insisted that the Jews be sent back and the deportations be halted, as they posed a threat to German lines of communication. On August 9, 1941, the military commandant's office posted announcements all across the city ordering all the Jews of Kamenets-

Podolskii to move into a ghetto, which was set up in the center of the city, in the Old Town, within 24 hours. They could take with them only 20 kilograms (44 pounds) of luggage. The non-Jews were forcibly evicted, and the area was fenced off. Ukrainian police guarded the ghetto externally, and a Jewish police force wearing white armbands maintained order inside the ghetto.⁶

All the Jews were registered, both by the Jewish community and by the local Ukrainian administration. Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto without permission on pain of death, and the same penalty was also decreed for non-Jews who dared to visit the Jewish quarters to trade with the Jews. The Jews were not allowed to buy food at either the marketplace or regular stores, so hunger became widespread, as was black marketeering. Every day the German army conscripted Jews, especially women, for all sorts of work outside the ghetto, and they received food as payment for this work. Witnesses recall a series of pogroms during which ghetto inmates were beaten, tortured, humiliated, hanged, or shot. For instance, a prominent Jewish physician, Dr. Goldentrester, was hanged from the balcony of his house. For days, the Germans forbade the Jews to remove his body for burial.

At the end of August 1941, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln, the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) Russland Süd, organized the mass shooting of around 23,600 Jews in Kamenets-Podolskii. He was eager to complete this Aktion before the region was to be transferred to a German civil administration on September 1.⁷ On August 25, 1941, most of the Hungarian Jews in the Kamenets-Podolskii ghetto were instructed to prepare for their transport back to Hungary. At the same time, the local (Soviet) Jews were ordered to pay a "contribution" of 200,000 rubles "to buy their own lives." The Hungarian Jews were ordered to assemble the next morning at the Central Square. From there they were taken to the Cossack barracks near the train station. On August 26 and 27, the German police forces shot these Jews in the vicinity of the Cossack barracks, probably along with other Jews from the ghetto. On August 28, about 7,000 local Jews from Kamenets-Podolskii were assembled in the ghetto. They were escorted on foot to pits prepared on the outskirts of the city and then shot.⁸ Jeckeln's military staff command (Stabskompanie) HSSPF Russland Süd played an active part in these mass shootings, as did men of Police Battalion 320, commanded by Polizeimajor Dall, the local Ukrainian police, and according to some accounts, men of the Hungarian army.

After the mass executions at the end of August 1941, only a fraction of the city's Jewish population remained alive, mostly craftsmen and their families who had been selected out, although they were soon joined by several hundred more Jews, who emerged from hiding places in attics and basements. Information regarding the location of the ghetto (or ghettos) in Kamenets-Podolskii from September 1941 is somewhat contradictory, but it appears that the original ghetto in the Old Town was more or less dissolved. Jewish survivors mention ghettos located in a former military barracks of a drill battalion on the outskirts of the city and also in the former Silicate

Institute (later an Institute for Technology), but they disagree on which came first and the date of the transfers.⁹ It is possible that both locations were used for parts of the ghetto population, either simultaneously or successively. According to another Jewish survivor, who describes being put into the annex of a large red building, which was next to the "Institute for Food Technology," conditions in the ghetto were very overcrowded, with only one bed assigned to each family. Some non-Jews managed to smuggle food into the ghetto to friends and relatives (from mixed marriages), indicating that security was not too strict. Jews who still had money were able to purchase a little food. However, malnutrition and disease, combined with hard physical labor and brutality, meant that every day several bodies were removed on a horse and cart to be buried.¹⁰

The ghetto was exploited as a pool of labor for various tasks, including rebuilding bridges and repairing highways. The Germans also set up workshops inside the ghetto for artisans, such as shoemakers, tailors, and clock makers. All the profits from these workshops went into the budget of the Gebietskommissar. During the summer and early fall of 1942, hundreds of additional Jews were resettled into the Kamenets-Podolskii ghetto from towns and villages in the surrounding area. From Chemerovtsy and Smotrich, all the Jews were marched to Kamenets-Podolskii, and after the skilled workers and their families had been selected out, the remaining 813 Jews were shot on August 11.¹¹ From other towns, such as Staraia Ushitsa, only the craftsmen and their families were transferred to Kamenets-Podolskii, while the remaining Jews were shot close to their homes.¹² According to one survivor who spent a couple of months in the ghetto, after being brought in from Chemerovtsy, in the ghetto people had only grains and rotting horseflesh to eat and gradually were reduced to skeletons.¹³

Some Jewish craftsmen worked for the SD. When the commander of the KdS in Równe, Dr. Pütz, learned of this, in August 1942, he ordered them to be shot along with their families.¹⁴

According to a former Ukrainian policeman, at the end of October 1942, there were up to 4,800 Jews in the ghetto.¹⁵ On October 30, 1942, German security forces conducted another large Aktion against the Jews.¹⁶ On that day, a squad of the Sipo-Aussendienststelle, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, reportedly shot more than 4,000 Jews. The mass graves were dug and filled in by Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). Around 500 Jews managed to escape or go into hiding on the night before the Aktion.¹⁷ The majority of these Jews, however, were caught and shot over the ensuing weeks and months. According to postwar investigative sources, the last skilled workers from the Kamenets-Podolskii ghetto, including about 65 workers at the jam factory, were shot in the spring of 1943.¹⁸

SOURCES Relevant publications on the Holocaust in Kamenets-Podolskii include the following: Avraham Rozen, H. 'Sarig, and Y. Bernshtain, eds., Kaminits-Podolsk u-sevivatab: Sefer-zikaron li-kebilot Yi'sra'el ba-'arim Kaminits-Podolsk, Balin, Dunivits, Zamihov, Zvanits, Minkovits, Smotrits', Frampol, Kupin, Kiteygorod she-hushmedu bi-yeme ha-Sho'ab 'al-yede ha-Natsim bi-shenat 701 (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Kamenets-Podolsk u-sevivatah be-Yisrael, 1965), also available in English as Kaminits-Podolsk and Its Environs: A Memorial Book of the Jewish Communities in the Cities of Kaminits-Podolsk, Balin, Duni-vits, Zamekhov, Zbvanets, Minkovitz, Smotrich, Frampol, Kupin, and Kitaygorod Annihilated by the Nazis in 1941, trans. Bonnie Schooler Sohn (Bergenfield, NJ: Avotaynu Foundation, 1999); Podillia u Velikii Vitchyzniani viyni 1941–1945 gg.: Sbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (L'viv, 1969); R.L. Braham, "The Kamenets Podolsk and Delvidek Massacres. Prelude to the Holocaust in Hungary," Yad Vashem Studies 9 (1973): 133–156; K.-M. Mallmann, "Der qualitative Sprung im Vernichtungsprozess. Das Massaker von Kamenez-Podolsk Ende August 1941," Jahrbuch für Antisemitismusforschung 10 (2001): 239–264; A. Kruglov, "Evreiskaia aktsiia" v Kamenets-Podol'skom v kontse avgusta 1941 g. v svete nemetskikh dokumentov," in Golokost i suchasnist': naukovi chasopis, no. 1 (Kiev: Ukrain's'kyi tsentr vyvchennia Golokostu, 2005), pp. 43–48.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews in Kamenets-Podolskii can be found in the following archives: BA-L (4 AR-Z 223/59); DAKhO (R863-2-42 and 44); GARF (7021-64-799); NARA (N-Docs.); USHMM; VHF; YIU (no. 661); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Ksenia Krimer
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; BA-L, ZStL, 4 AR-Z 223/59 (Abschlussbericht, April 7, 1960); GARF, 7021-64-799.

2. Andrej Angrick, Besatzungspolitik und Massenmord: Die Einsatzgruppe D in der südlichen Sowjetunion 1941–1943 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2003), p. 202.

3. USHMM, RG-22.002M, reel 2 (GARF, 7021-64-799, pp. 98–116), ChGK report for Kamenets-Podolskii.

4. RGVA, 1275-3-667, report of Feldkommandantur 183, July 31, 1941.

5. N-Doc., PS-197, as cited in Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, ed., Verbrechen der Wehrmacht: Dimensionen des Vernichtungskrieges 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2002), p. 132.

6. GARF, 7021-64-799, pp. 98–116; Rozen et al., Kaminits-Podolsk and Its Environs, p. 67.

7. N-Doc., NO-3154, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 80, September 11, 1941, gives the figure of 23,600 victims, as does BA-BL, NS 33/22, Fernschreiben des HSSPF Russland Süd, August 30, 1941; N-Doc, PS-197.

8. GARF, 7021-64-799, pp. 117–118.

9. Testimonies of Moisei Schwarzmann and Bina Tenneblat in Boris Zabarko, ed., "Nur wir haben überlebt": Holocaust in Ukraine—Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Ditrach, 2004), pp. 389–390, 403–405.

10. YIU, Témoin no. 661.

11. IPN, GKŚZpNP Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, pp. 5, 6, report of the Sipo-Aussendienststelle Kamenets-Podolsk, August 13, 1942.

12. GARF, 7021-64-799, pp. 98–116.

13. Testimony of Semjon Waisblei in Zabarko, "Nur wir haben überlebt," p. 428.

14. IPN, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 5, order of KdS Wolhynien und Podolien, August 18, 1942.

15. GARF, 7021-64-799, statement of Zaloga, former company commander of the Ukrainian police, May 25, 1944.

16. Testimony of Bina Tenneblat in Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivimi ostalis' tol'ko my: svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev, 1999), p. 415.

17. GARF, 7021-64-799, pp. 114–115, 226.

18. BA-L, B 162/5073, pp. 640–641.

KAMIEŃ KOSZYRSKI

Pre-1939: Kamień Koszyrski, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kamen'-Kashirskii, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kamen Kaschirsk, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kamin'-Kasbyr's'kyi, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Kamień Koszyrski is located about 48 kilometers (30 miles) north-northeast of Kowel. Due to substantial losses in World War I and during the political instability thereafter, in 1921 the Jewish population was only 617. Just prior to the outbreak of World War II on September 1, 1939, it is estimated that slightly more than 2,000 Jews lived in the town.¹ Under Soviet occupation from September 1939 until June 1941, businesses were nationalized and craftsmen were forced to join state-sponsored cooperatives (artels).

German forces first entered Kamień Koszyrski on June 28, 1941, although a permanent German presence was not established for a couple of weeks. From mid-July until the end of August 1941, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) ran the town. In September 1941, power was handed over to a German civil administration. Kamień Koszyrski became the administrative center of Gebiet Kamen Kaschirsk. In addition to the Rayon Kamen Kaschirsk, the Rayons of Ljubeschow and Morotschnoje were also part of the Gebiet. Kameradschaftsführer Fritz Michaelis served as Gebietskommissar, based in Kamień Koszyrski.² A local Ukrainian auxiliary police force was established in the town, subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post composed of a few German Gendarmes. The head of the Gendarmerie was a man named Berger, and the chief of the Ukrainian police was Jaschek Mazur.³

The Soviet authorities abandoned the town on June 26, 1941. Many farmers from the neighboring villages exploited this opportunity and looted Jewish-owned stores in Kamień Koszyrski. They sparked a pogrom in the town, during which the properties of many Jews were plundered, and 2 Jews were killed.⁴ On August 1, 1941, a squadron of the 2nd SS-Cavalry Regiment arrived in the town from Ratno. One day later they arrested and shot 8 male Jews. On August 22, 1941, a detachment of Security Police subordinated to Einsatzgruppe C arrested all Jewish men aged between 16 and 60. The following day, they shot about 80 of the Jewish prisoners in a forest 5 kilometers (3 miles) west of the town. Among the victims was also the first head of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), Shmuel Verble.⁵

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities imposed a series of anti-Jewish measures, including the wearing of distinctive armbands bearing the Star of David (later it was changed to a yellow patch on their clothes) and the imposition of physically demanding forced labor. Jews also were forbidden to leave their place of residence. Within Kamień Koszyrski, certain streets were cleared of their Jewish population at this time, the Jewish residents being forced to move in with other Jews, creating a form of “open ghetto” by the fall of 1941.⁶ Jews also faced systematic plunder and beatings from the Ukrainian auxiliary police. The Jewish Council was obliged to transmit to the Jewish population all the German regulations and demands that were imposed on them and also was held personally responsible for their fulfillment.

Among the new regulations was the requirement for Jews to surrender all valuable items and pay “contributions,” which were collected by the Jewish Council and given to the Gebietskommissar. Gold, furs, and shoes were among the items surrendered. It was also forbidden for Jews to possess a number of “luxury” goods: for example, in early 1942 one Jew was publicly hanged after some cooking oil was found in his possession.

On the orders of the Gebietskommissar, an enclosed ghetto was established in Kamień Koszyrski, probably in late March or early April 1942. The civil administration also ordered some Jews from nearby villages, including from Pniewno, to be transferred to Kamień Koszyrski.⁷ The ghetto area consisted of one side of Dolnik Street, extending to cover half of the market square and half of Kowel Street. By June 1942, it was surrounded by a 2-meter-high (6.6-feet-high) fence strung with barbed wire on top. The single entrance to the ghetto was guarded day and night by members of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police.⁸ Altogether, some 2,300 Jews resided in the ghetto area. Within the ghetto there was no security for the Jews. In the summer of 1942, the Gebietskommissar and other German officials occasionally entered the ghetto and shot Jews arbitrarily, on the street or in their homes.

On August 10, 1942, the German Security Police from Brześć, with the assistance of the local German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, carried out the first mass shooting Aktion against the Jews of the ghetto. The police forces encircled the ghetto, and the Jews were ordered to gather at the gate on the false pretext that the entire area had to be disinfected. A selection was then conducted by the Gebietskommissar, assisted by the Judenrat, on the basis of permits issued to specialist workers. The majority of the Jews were made to strip naked and murdered in the nearby Jewish cemetery, where German forces shot them into mass graves that had been prepared in advance. Some 50 Jewish families from the village of Wielka Hłusza were among the victims, and about 130 Gypsies also were killed during the Aktion.⁹ Some Jews who hid within the ghetto were dragged out and shot by the local Ukrainian police over the ensuing days. In mid-August, the Security Police reported the “special treatment” of 3,399 Jews in Gebiet Kamen Kaschirsk (of whom at least 1,700 had been shot within the town itself).¹⁰

About 600 individuals selected as useful workers, such as carpenters, were left alive in Kamień Koszyrski. After three days they were moved back into the ghetto, which was reduced in size. On November 2, 1942, about 400 Jews escaped from the ghetto. The Jews who remained behind were shot at the Jewish cemetery shortly afterwards.¹¹ Most of the Jews who managed to escape soon died: some perished in the woods of starvation or disease, or even at the hands of various partisan groups, while others were turned in by local farmers, whom the Germans rewarded with salt or gasoline. The German police shot these unfortunates shortly after their capture. Only about 100 of those who fled found partisan units willing to accept them, enabling many of these people to survive.¹²

SOURCES Information about the Jewish community of Kamień Koszyrski and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: A.A. Stein et al., eds., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski ve-ha-seviva (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Kamin Koshirsky and Surroundings in Israel, 1965); Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 153–157; A. Biber, “The Township of Kamin-Koczirsk and Its Surroundings,” in Yehuda Merin and Ben Zion Kaminsky, eds., Yalkut Volyn (Givatayim: World Union of Wolynian Jews in Israel, 1998), pp. 55–60.

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Kamień Koszyrski can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/530); BA-L (B 162/6338); DAVO; GARF (7021-55-11); IPN; USHMM; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/656, 1380, 2200, 2203, and 2283).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Biber, “The Township of Kamin-Koczirsk,” p. 34.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942. Michaelis died in March 1961 in Salzgitter-Lebenstedt before he could be brought to trial.
3. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 35; Stein et al., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski, p. 759.
4. Biber, “The Township of Kamin-Koczirsk.”
5. Ibid.
6. BA-L, B 162/6338, pp. 71, 340, 343.
7. Ibid., B 162/6338, pp. 21, 32; Stein et al., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski, p. 756.
8. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 32; Biber, “The Township of Kamin-Koczirsk.”
9. GARF, 7021-55-11, pp. 27, 32, 35 (reverse side); BA-L, B 162/6338, pp. 8, 34, 44; Stein et al., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski, pp. 758–759. The Jewish population of Wielka Hłusza was 224 in 1921.

10. IPN, Zbiór Zespołów Szczątkowych Jednostek SS i Policji—Sygnatura 77. The documents appear to be Polish transcripts of German originals, which may have been partially destroyed or even smuggled out by the Polish Underground. Efforts to trace the original documents have proved unsuccessful. This figure presumably also includes the Jews murdered in Lubieszów at this time and possibly those of Moroczna and other places.

11. Biber, “The Township of Kamin-Koczirsk”; GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 35, indicates that 815 Jews were shot on this occasion, dating it (erroneously) at the end of November.

12. Biber, “The Township of Kamin-Koczirsk”; BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 45.

KATRYNBURG

Pre-1939: Katrynborg, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Katerinovka, Ternopol oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Katerburg, Rayon center, Gebiet Kremenez, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Katerynivka, Ternopil’ oblast’, Ukraine

Katrynborg is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) southwest of Równe. According to the 1921 census, the population of Katrynborg included 384 Jews. By mid-1941, there were probably some 450 Jews in the village. After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a number of Jewish men were drafted into or volunteered to join the Red Army. Another small group of Jews succeeded in evacuating to the east. Some 350 to 400 Jews remained in the village when German army units occupied it on July 3, 1941.

In July and August, a German military administration governed the town. Then, in September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Katrynborg became part of Gebiet Kremenez in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Müller.¹ The German authorities appointed a village elder and a squad of Ukrainian policemen to assist them in running the village.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupiers introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Katrynborg. They made Jews wear the Star of David; they compelled them to perform forced labor; and they forbade them to leave the town limits. A Judenrat was formed, which was obliged to collect “contributions” for the Germans and organize the Jewish forced labor squads. Among the labor tasks performed was the felling of trees. The Jews were escorted to work by the Ukrainian police, who frequently robbed and beat them.

In the early spring of 1942, probably in March, the Germans created a Jewish residential district, an “open ghetto,” in Katrynborg for the roughly 400 Jewish inhabitants of the Rayon.² It existed for only about four months.

On August 10, 1942,³ a detachment of the Security Police and SD, assisted by the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, including members of Schutzmannschafts-Battalion 102 based in Krzemieniec,⁴ carried out an Aktion in the village, during which 312 Jews were shot and killed: 114 men, 112 women, and 86 children.⁵ A few Jews managed to hide from their persecutors and escaped annihilation.

The Red Army drove the German occupying forces from the town on February 5, 1944. Only about 30 Jews from the Katrynborg ghetto survived the German occupation.

SOURCES Relevant publications on the fate of the Jewish community of Katrynborg during the Holocaust include the following: Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 175–176; and A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukraińskiego ewreistwa 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravocchnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 110.

Information concerning the extermination of the Jews of Katrynborg can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 163/67); DATO; GARF (7021-75-2 and 3); IPN; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Übersicht über die besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. GARF, 7021-75-3, p. 3, as cited in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 159. According to survivor testimony from the neighboring Rayon of Schumsk (AŻIH 301/2467), the ghetto there was established in March 1942.

3. GARF, 7021-75-2, p. 2.

4. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 163/67, vol. 2, p. 469.

5. IPN, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 3, transcription of a Security Police report from SS-Untersturmführer Selm of the Rowno SD, August 15, 1942, concerning the “special treatment of the Jews.”

KISIELIN

Pre-1939: Kisielin, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kiselin, Oziutichi raion, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Osjutitschi, Gebiet Gorochow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Lokachi raion, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Kisielin is located about 32 kilometers (20 miles) west-northwest of Łuck and 107 kilometers (66.5 miles) west-northwest of Równe. In 1921, the Jewish population of the village was 94.

At the end of June 1941, soldiers of the German 6th Army occupied the village. From July to August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) administered the village. The Ortskommandantur appointed a village elder (starosta) and formed a Ukrainian police unit from among the local population.

After September 1941, power was in the hands of a German civil administration. Kisielin was located in Rayon Osjutitschi within Gebiet Gorochow. SA-Standartenführer Härter was named Gebietskommissar and thereby placed in charge of the civil administration.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Kisielin. Jews were required initially to wear armbands bearing the Star of David, later replaced by yellow patches to be worn on the chest and back. They were required to perform forced labor, they were prohibited from leaving the boundaries of the village, and they suffered robberies and assaults at the hands of the Ukrainian police.

On August 19, 1941, German security forces conducted the first Aktion in Kisielin. On the outskirts of the village, close to a desolate Polish (Roman Catholic) church, two Ukrainians who were considered Soviet activists were shot along with 48 Jews.²

On November 1, 1941, a ghetto was created in the village, which was surrounded with barbed wire. The authorities also brought in Jews from the villages of Oziutichi, Kholopichi, Tverdynia, and Iukhimova.³

In August 1942, the Germans made preparations for the liquidation of the ghetto in Kisielin. Three days before the mass shooting, German and Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto. Around this time local inhabitants were requisitioned to dig a large pit about 10 meters by 10 meters (11 yards by 11 yards), which took them two days. Some Jews managed to escape from the ghetto before the guard was increased, and others went into hiding inside the ghetto. According to the recollections of local non-Jewish inhabitants, the rabbi had announced to the Jews “our hour has come, we are being taken to be killed.”⁴

On August 12, 1942,⁵ the Germans liquidated the ghetto. The Jews were transported to the killing site on trucks and were forced to undress and then go down into the pits. The entire population of the ghetto, about 500 or 550 Jews, was shot.⁶ About 20 people were able to escape on the eve of the Aktion, but the police soon caught them, and they were also shot.⁷

SOURCES Information on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Kisielin during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: V. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni: Zbertvy i pamiat' (Lutsk, 2003), pp. 29–30.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Kisielin Jews can be found in the following archives: DAVO; GARF (7021-55-10); VHF (# 1973); YIU (nos. 450, 451); and YVA (M-1/E/1622).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni, pp. 29–30.

3. Ibid., p. 29.

4. YIU, Témoins nos. 449 and 450, Agnia Chouba (born 1926) and Serguei Romaniouk (born 1930), March 30, 2007.

5. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni, p. 29. According to another account, the ghetto was liquidated on August 15–16, 1942. See GARF, 7021-55-10, p. 15.

6. GARF, 7021-55-10, p. 15.

7. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni, p. 29.

KIWERCE

Pre-1939: Kiwerce, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kivertsy, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kiwerzy, Rayon center, Gebiet Luzk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kivertsy, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Kiwerce is located 62 kilometers (38.5 miles) west-northwest of Równe. In 1921, the Jewish population had declined to only 175, owing to the effects of World War I. By mid-1941, the Jewish population was probably around 400, including a number of Jewish refugees who arrived in the fall of 1939 from western and central Poland.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Kiwerce on July 2, 1941. On the first day of the occupation, the Germans shot a number of Jews and Poles who had held key positions in the local administration under the Soviets.¹ During July and August, a German military administration took charge of the town. In September, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. As a part of Gebiet Luzk, under Gebietskommissar Lindner,² the town lay within the Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. German officials set up a local Ukrainian administration and recruited an auxiliary police force from the local inhabitants. The Ukrainian police was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie from September 1941.

During the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupation authorities instituted a series of anti-Jewish measures in Kiwerce. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, which was headed by two Jews named Jukelsohn and Lesznar. The council was required to pass on all the orders issued by the German authorities and was made personally responsible for their prompt implementation. Among the German directives was an order for Jews to wear armbands bearing the Star of David; this was replaced in September 1941 by the compulsory wearing of a yellow circular patch on their clothes. Jews were forbidden to trade with or have other contacts with the local population. They also had to turn over all of their valuables to the German authorities and to carry out physically demanding work of all kinds for little or no payment. The Jews were forbidden to leave the borders of the area where they resided and were registered. The Ukrainian auxiliary police repeatedly looted Jewish property and beat the Jews.

Once the German repressions started in Kiwerce, many Jews fled to the nearby Jewish rural settlement of Zofjówka, where the Jewish population increased to about 5,000 Jews. People thought that it would be easier for them to survive in a larger community. According to the testimony of Dr. Henryk Zajfen, “[T]here was no enclosed ghetto in Kiwerce, but there was some kind of Jewish quarter” (or open ghetto). There were a number of wooden barracks near the sawmill into which the Jews who had been expelled from their homes in town were resettled.³ This resettlement probably took place at the end of 1941 or at the beginning of 1942. All local Jews, except for the physicians, had to move into the ghetto.⁴

The Jewish community of Kiwerce was liquidated in May 1942, when 270 Jews were murdered. German security forces, consisting of a detachment of the Security Police and SD together with the 1st Motorized Gendarmerie Platoon, arrived in five trucks from Łuck. Assisted by units of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, they surrounded the barracks, woke the Jewish inhabitants, and herded them half-naked and barefoot onto the trucks. The Jews were largely surprised by the Aktion, as Kiwerce was one of the first ghettos in the region to be liquidated. The Jews were escorted into the forest in the direction of Łuck and murdered. Only the Jewish physicians who lived outside the ghetto were excluded from the Aktion.⁵

Over the following months, the German authorities shot most of the Jewish physicians and their families, although a few managed to escape. For example, Mala Berenblum and her husband, who was a doctor, fled in December 1942 after purchasing forged “Aryan” papers for a very large sum.⁶ Only a small number of Jews survived the German occupation in Kiwerce.

SOURCES An article on the history of the Jewish community of Kiwerce can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 176.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Kiwerce during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2162, 2167, and 2568); DAVO; GARF (7021-55-10); TsDAVO (3676-4-317); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Katrin Reichelt and Adam Kahane

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/2568, testimony of Dr. Henryk Zajfen, June 5, 1946.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. AŻIH, 301/2568.

4. Ibid., 301/2167, testimony of Rebeka Peste, November 22, 1946; 301/2162, testimony of Mala Berenblum.

5. TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 29, report of the Higher-SS and Police Leader Ukraine for the period June 1–30, 1942. AŻIH, 301/2568, gives the date of May 10, 1942, for the liquidation of the ghetto.

6. AŻIH, 301/2162, 2167, and 2568.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

KLESÓW

Pre-1939: Klesów, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Klesov, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Klesow, Rayon center, Gebiet Sarny, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Klesiv, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Klesów is located about 21 kilometers (13 miles) east of Sarny. According to the 1921 census, 52 Jews lived in Klesów I, and 90 Jews lived in Klesów II, bringing the total to 142 Jews. By the late 1930s, there were about 700 Jews living in Klesów, including members of a Hehalutz kibbutz that was based there.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Klesów in the middle of July 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town's affairs. Authority was transferred to a German civil administration in September 1941. Klesów was incorporated into Gebiet Sarny, and Kameradschaftsführer Huala became the Gebietskommissar. Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Schumacher became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer from the spring of 1942 onward.¹ A post of the German Gendarmerie was also established in Klesów, which took command of the local Ukrainian police force.

In the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Klesów. Jews were ordered to wear distinctive markings in the image of the Star of David and later in the shape of a yellow circle. They also had to mark their homes with a blue six-pointed star. In addition, they were required to perform forced labor, prohibited from leaving the limits of the village, and not permitted to buy goods from non-Jews. As a consequence, the Jews had to live in conditions of near starvation. In addition, the Ukrainian police subjected the Jews to systematic beatings and robberies.

On July 25, 1942, the Germans ordered the establishment of an open ghetto in Klesów into which Jews from the town and the outlying villages were forcibly resettled. On August 25 or 27, 1942, the ghetto in Klesów was liquidated.² Early in the morning, the Germans ordered the Jews to assemble in the square by the railway station. Here the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie guarded them almost all day long. In the evening, they were loaded into cars of a train that had just arrived from Rokitno carrying other Jews. Before the train departed, a number of Jews deemed too ill or infirm were murdered on site in Klesów. Then the train brought the remaining 580 Jews to Sarny, where German forces and their collaborators murdered them on August 28, 1942. It is likely that among those taken to Sarny were some 150 Jews from the village of Tomashgorod, which lay in Rayon Klesow. Over the course of the next few days, the police also captured and shot 15 Jews who had been hiding in and around the ghetto.³

Group portrait of members of a Hehalutz Kibbutz (Zionist collective) in Klesów, 1930s.

USHMM WS #98726, COURTESY OF GFH

SOURCES An article on the annihilation of the Jewish population of Klesów can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 178.

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Klesów can be found in the following archives: DARO; GARF (7021-71-52); and YVA (M-1/E-1269/1234; M-1/E-1222/1196).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSSH 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 113/67 (II 204 AR 1088/64), Sachstandsvermerk, June 7, 1967 (Gebietskommissariat Sarny), p. 2.

3. GARF, 7021-71-52, pp. 11, 17, and reverse side; DARO, R534-1-3, p. 143.

KLEWAŃ

Pre-1939: Klewań, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Klevan', raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Klevan, Rayon center, Gebiet Rowno, General-kommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Klevan', Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Klewań is located about 20 kilometers (12.5 miles) west-northwest of Równe on the banks of the Stubli River. According to the 1921 census, the population of the town included 1,527 Jews. Allowing for an average rate of population increase of 9 per 1,000 per year, by 1941 there were probably about 1,800 Jews living in Klewań.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Klewań on July 3, 1941. Between July and August 1941, a German military administration was in charge of the town. Authority was transferred to a German civil administration in September 1941. Klewań was a Rayon center in Gebiet Rowno. An official named Beer became the Gebietskommissar.¹ In the town of Klewań, the Germans established an outpost of the Gendarmerie, commanded by a man named Fischer, who was in charge of a squad of about 30 Ukrainian Auxiliary Police. Among those who served in the police were Alexander Yankevich, Kuz'menko, and Kulakovsky.²

On the second day of the occupation, German forces, together with local antisemites, organized a pogrom against the Jews in Klewań. The killings were probably intended as a reprisal for the shooting of a number of German soldiers by a straggling group of Soviet soldiers in the village of Bronniki just prior to this. The Germans and Ukrainians lined the Jews up on the main square in five rows and shot them with a machine gun and automatic rifles. Then they began dragging Jews from their homes to kill them. Jews were buried in mass graves in at least two or three locations, and a number of bodies were left lying in the streets. At the end of the pogrom, the local authorities ordered some Jews to drag these corpses into the synagogue. The doors were then locked and the synagogue set on fire. In total, about 500 to 700 Jews were murdered in Klewań during the first days of the occupation, and most of the others, like Abraham Kirschner, fled or were driven out of town.³

During the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Klewań. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established to pass on German orders. The small remaining Jewish population had to wear special patches in the shape of the Star of David (later a yellow circle) on their clothing. In addition, they were forced to perform physically demanding labor of various kinds. According to an order issued by the Gebietskommissar in October 1941, Jews were forbidden to leave their place of residence without official permission.⁴ In addition, the Jews had to endure widespread theft and physical abuse at the hands of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police and local antisemites.

By the spring of 1942, a number of Jews had returned to Klewań; about 700 Jews were living there, cooped up in only 13 houses that formed an open ghetto. There was a shortage of firewood, but the Jews were forbidden to go out into the woods to gather it. They lived together in overcrowded conditions, 20 people to a room, where they cooked, slept, ate, and bathed. According to one testimony, the Jews were starving and in rags, "people walked around dressed in sacks and barefoot, because the Ukrainians stole everything."⁵ The Germans based in Klewań arranged orgies from time to time. On one occasion, two Germans entered the home of a Jewish family where the mother was bedridden. They chased away the father and then raped their 15-year-old daughter in front of her mother's eyes.⁶

On April 11, 1942, German security forces arrested 48 people in Klewań: 18 Poles and 30 Jews. The Poles were arrested as nationalist activists. As all the arrested Jews were younger people, a number of older fathers voluntarily took the places of their sons. Shortly afterwards, the arrestees were led away and shot in the woods near the train station.⁷

The murder of the remaining Jews in Klewań probably took place in mid-May 1942.⁸ On May 13, 1942, the German police commander, Fischer, issued instructions to the Judenrat for all the Jews to assemble at the station on the next day. Very few Jews obeyed this instruction, so Ukrainian policemen immediately started to search for those Jews in hiding. They discovered most of them. The Germans and their collaborators then shot those who had been arrested (probably about 600 Jews) in a forest about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside Klewań.⁹ The mass shooting was organized by members of the German Security Police from Równe, assisted by the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police.

SOURCES A short article on the history of the Jewish community of Klewań can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 177–178. There is also a brief report on the fate of the Jews of Klewań in Samuil Gil', ed., Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit (New York, 1995), p. 135.

Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Klewań can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1190); DARO; GARF (7021-71-51); USHMM (RG-31.017M, reel 2); and YVA (M-2/200, O-3/2881, M-1/E/2215, and M-1/E/2142).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. AŻIH, 301/1190, testimony of Abraham Kirschner, November 10, 1945; and Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, p. 135.
3. GARF, 7021-71-51, pp. 11, 44, 61; AŻIH, 301/1190; and Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, p. 135.
4. USHMM, RG-31.017M, reel 2, Amtsblatt des Gebietskommissars in Rowno, announcement dated October 15, 1941.
5. AŻIH, 301/1190.
6. Ibid.
7. GARF, 7021-71-51, pp. 27, 37; AŻIH, 301/1190.
8. Some sources date it, however, in mid-July 1942.
9. AŻIH, 301/1190; GARF, 7021-71-51, pp. 1, 90. The ChGK report gives the figure of 1,500 victims, but this is probably too high (including the victims from the pogrom in early July 1941, as well as those killed in 1942).

KOBRYŃ

Pre-1939: Kobryń, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941 and 1944–1990: Kobryn, raion center, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kobryn, Rayon center, Gebiet Kobryn, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kobryn', Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kobryń is located about 52 kilometers (32 miles) east-northeast of Brześć. In 1921, the Jewish population was 5,431, comprising two thirds of the total.

Kobryń was occupied by German forces on June 24, 1941. Due to the town's proximity to the frontier and the suddenness of the invasion, most Jews were unable to evacuate.

A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town until September 1941, when a German civil administration took over. Kobryń became the administrative center of Gebiet Kobryn in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. In addition to Rayon Kobryn, Gebiet Kobryn initially included the Rayons of Antopol, Dywin, and Shabinka. On December 1, 1941, Rayon Shabinka was transferred to Gebiet Brest-Litowsk, and Rayon Drogitschin was transferred from Gebiet Pinsk to Gebiet Kobryn in its place. Further, in January 1942, Rayon Beresa-Kartuskaja, which initially had been part of Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien, was also included into Gebiet Kobryn.¹

The Gebietskommissar in Kobryń was Regierungsassessor Oscar Panzer.² There was also a German Gendarmerie post in the city, headed by a Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer. The local police (Schutzmannschaft) was subordinate to the Gendarmerie.

In the summer of 1942, an SD-Aussendienststelle (outpost) was created in Kobryń. It was headed by SS-Obersturmführer Julius Wangemann. This outpost was subordinate to the Commander of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Równe, SS-Sturmabführer Dr. Pütz. In the summer and fall of 1942, the local SD outpost organized the anti-Jewish Aktions in Kobryń and other towns of the Gebiet.

In the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Kobryń, including forced labor. The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) containing 24 members (chaired by the merchant Angelovich). Subsequently, including the Jewish Police, the Judenrat employed around 400 people in various departments.

Soon after the occupation of the town, the Bet Midrash Hayyei Adam was burned down. In the summer of 1941, between 150 and 200 Jewish members of the intelligentsia were shot by a squad of the SD near Patryka, just off the road to Brześć. The Jews were forced to surrender 6 kilograms (13.2 pounds) of gold and 12 kilograms (26.5 pounds) of silver as a "contribution."³ Subsequently in the fall of 1941, several hundred mentally ill Jews were also shot by German security forces.

In August 1941, hundreds of Jewish women and children were transferred to Kobryń from liquidated Jewish communities to the north in the area of the Białowieża Forest.⁴

In September or October 1941, the Germans organized a ghetto in Kobryń.⁵ It was divided into two parts: ghetto A, which was in the southern part of town, housed Jewish craftsmen and their families, and ghetto B, in the western part of the city, housed those Jews who were unable to work.⁶ Altogether, there were more than 7,000 Jews in the two ghettos, including Jews from the surrounding villages. The Judenrat established an office to assign living space to those moving into the ghetto. Overcrowding in the ghetto was severe, with 5 or 6 people forced to share each room. Shortly after its establishment, Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto, or even move from one part of the ghetto to the other, unless escorted in a group by the Jewish Police.⁷ Subsequently the area of the ghetto was reduced. Around the time of Passover in 1942

(April 2), the Germans began to construct a wall around ghetto B, making it much harder for Jews to escape.⁸

For many Jews in the ghetto, the main source of income was from selling their personal belongings. It was forbidden for Jews to do business with non-Jews, but much bartering went on nevertheless. The Jewish Police guarded the gates of the ghetto internally, so Jews were able to smuggle in some food. Despite food shortages, most families usually had some bread and potatoes, and there was almost no starvation in the Kobryń ghetto. Both Jews and non-Jews received ration cards. The Jews were to receive 70 grams (2.5 ounces) of bread per day. Supplies for the ghetto were secured because the Judenrat had good connections to the miller Józef Jadów, who was able to smuggle in considerably more flour than the Germans prescribed.⁹

In the first half of 1942, a number of mostly younger able-bodied Jews were rounded up from the ghetto and sent to labor camps around Kobryń. In Kobryń, around 500 Jews worked in a large craftsmen's workshop (the large artel) inside ghetto A, but many Jews were escorted daily by non-Jews to about 50 different work sites outside the ghetto. The Jews left the ghetto in columns, sometimes escorted by a 10-year-old non-Jewish boy. By 8:00 A.M., almost all the men had left the ghetto, and mainly women and children remained.¹⁰

On July 25, 1942, ghetto B was liquidated: approximately 200 Jews were shot near Mazura, and 1,800 people were taken by train to the Bronna Góra station and shot into large mass graves prepared nearby.¹¹ Jews from Antopol and Horodec who were not fit for work were shot on the same day. A squad of SD men carried out the shootings, assisted by Company 2 and Company 3 of the 320th Police Battalion: Company 3 transported the Jews in railroad cars to the station, and Company 2 was assigned to cordon off the place of execution, 7 kilometers (4.4 miles) northwest of Bereza Kartuska.¹² Other Jews were shot inside the Kobryń ghetto over the following days as the Germans and Ukrainian police searched for people in hiding.

After this large-scale Aktion, which resulted in the dissolution of ghetto B, those Jews who had survived were registered and fingerprinted, then sent back to work. Children were employed to sort out the property of the Jews who had been shot. Shaken by the mass murders, the youth of the ghetto intensified efforts to organize armed resistance. A secret Jewish Committee was established. Conspiratorial cells of five people were established in four different sectors of the ghetto to limit the danger of being exposed. Arms were assembled or purchased clandestinely from local inhabitants. Small groups of armed Jews then escaped to the forests and operated as partisans, attacking outposts of the Ukrainian police and German grain stores. Initially the Judenrat was opposed to these resistance efforts, urging the youth instead to work in the workshops, as otherwise they might endanger the entire ghetto. Later the Judenrat cooperated with the resistance, and vague plans were made for Jews to escape to the forest in the event of a further Aktion. These remained largely unimplemented, mainly due to the lack of arms.¹³

On October 15, 1942, the Germans and their collaborators liquidated ghetto A. At a site 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) south of the city, a squad of the SD, assisted by the 315th Police Battalion, shot 4,250 Jews.¹⁴ At this time those Jews who had been sent to camps in the surrounding area were also murdered. A number of Jews went into hiding in and around the ghetto, some remaining hidden for more than a week. Several hundred Jews may have escaped to the forest, but many of them were killed in the ensuing searches conducted by the Germans and Ukrainian police, and only a portion of them succeeded in joining the partisans.

After the liquidation of the ghetto, 72 Jewish craftsmen remained in the city for about another year; they were shot in the second half of 1943. In April 1944, Sonderkommando 1005c attempted to cover up the mass graves, removing the corpses from the ground and burning them. The 80 people who carried out this task were shot after the corpses had been burned.¹⁵

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews of Kobryń during the Holocaust can be found in these publications: Betsal'el Shvarts and Yisra'el-Hayyim Biletski, eds., Sefer Kobryn; megilat bayim ve-hurban (Tel Aviv, 1951)—a translation of this book by Nilli Avidan and Avner Perry is available on jewishgen.org; Meylekh Glotser, ed., Kobryn; zamlbukh (an iberblik ibern yidishn Kobryn) (Buenos Aires: Kobryn Book Committee, 1951); "Kobrin," in Encyclopaedia Judaica (Jerusalem: Keter, 1972); Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 305–310; and Bettzalel Schwartz and Israel Chaim Biltzki, eds., Book of Kobryn: The Scroll of Life and Destruction (San Francisco, CA: Holocaust Center of Northern California, 1992).

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Kobryń can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/1072, 1970, 2212); BA-L (e.g., B 162/2882, 2903); GABO (514-1-336); GARF (7021-83-18); IPN; NARA; NARB; USHMM; VHF (# 17696, 34429); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. NARA, RG-242, T-454, reel 102, fr. 169.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. Ibid., p. 251; AŽIH, 301/1072, testimony of Józef Blinder; Shvarts and Biletski, Sefer Kobryn, p. 381.
4. Voennyi dnevniki (Kriegstagebuch) 322-go politseiskogo batal'ona: Tsentral'nyi voennyi arkhiv v Prage: Dnevnik oberleitenanta politsii Ublia (Warsaw: Za Wolność i Lud, 1965), no. 20, p. 9. AŽIH, 301/1970, testimony of Symcha Bursztajn; 301/1072; 301/1849, testimony of Szymon Kamiński; 301/2212, testimony of Benjamin Wolf, p. 4. Also see Berl Blustein, "The Destruction of Lineve," in Joseph Friedlaender, ed., Pinkas Pruz'ani zeha-sevivah: (tol) dot ve-zikaron le-kehillot she-hushmedu ba-Sho'ah (Tel Aviv: Ugun yots'e Pruz'ani zeha-sevivah be-Yisrael uve-Artsot ha-Berit, 1983), pp. 151–153; and Glotser, Kobryn; zamlbukh, p. 253.
5. AŽIH, 301/1072, gives the date of September 1. I. Beil, "The Holocaust," in Shvarts and Biletski, Sefer Kobryn, pp.

382–392, here p. 383, dates it two weeks after the introduction of the yellow star by the new civil administration in September.

6. M. Botvinnik, Pamiętniki genocidy żydów w Białymostku (Minsk, 2000), p. 105. A more precise description of the streets that formed the ghetto can be found in Glotser, Kobryn; zamlbukh, p. 252.

7. Glotser, Kobryn; zamlbukh, pp. 252–53; AŻIH, 301/1072.

8. Shvarts and Biletski, Sefer Kobryn, p. 386.

9. Ibid., pp. 383–384.

10. Ibid., pp. 384–385.

11. GARF, 7021-83-18, pp. 8–9, 63, 72.

12. Sta. Bielefeld, 5 Js 703/70, Vermerk, October 26, 1973.

13. AŻIH, 301/1072; Shvarts and Biletski, Sefer Kobryn, p. 388; Isaiah Trunk, Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996), p. 458.

14. GARF, 7021-83-18, p. 9, and 7021-148-28, p. 62 (evidence of Zugwachtmeister Hermann Boltz, Company 7, 11th Police Regiment, taken prisoner in early 1944).

15. Ibid., 7021-83-18, p. 9.

KOŁKI

Pre-1939: Kołki, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kolki, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Gebiet Luzk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kolky, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Kołki is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) northwest of Równe. In 1921, 724 Jews were living in Kołki. By the end of 1937, there were 860 Jews in the village. According to the 1921 Polish census, the village of Czartorysk to the northeast had a population of 220 Jews, and Jews also lived in several other nearby villages, including Marjanówka (26), Komarów (15), and Kulikowice (5).

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Kołki at the end of June or the beginning of July 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village, and in September 1941, a German civil administration assumed authority in the region. Kołki became a Rayon center in Gebiet Luzk, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Luzk was Regierungsassessor Lindner.¹

The following organizations were established in Kołki: a Ukrainian Rayon administration and a Ukrainian police force, subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post that consisted of several German Gendarmes. The chief of the Ukrainian police was D. Sachkovski.²

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupying forces introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures: a Jewish Council (Judenrat) composed of five people was created in the village and was used by the German authorities to issue orders to the Jewish population; Jews were ordered to wear visible insignia in the form of a Star of David (after September 1941, in the shape of a yellow circle); Jews had to surrender all gold and valuables; they were compelled to perform forced labor without pay; and they were forbidden to leave the village without permission. The Ukrainian police also repeatedly beat and robbed the Jews.

In the summer of 1941, the local Ukrainian militia conducted an Aktion in which about 50 Jewish youths from Kołki were taken ostensibly for work but then were shot outside the village.³

In October 1941, the German authorities established an open (unfenced) ghetto in the village. It held more than 2,000 Jews, not only local residents but also Jewish refugees from Poland and Jews brought in from nearby villages. Semyon Menyuk, who was transferred into the Kołki ghetto from Komarów, recalls that he could take only 4.5 kilograms (10 pounds) of possessions with him, and on arrival in Kołki, people were given only an hour to find a new place to stay. Rations in the ghetto were only 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per day, and even this stopped after a couple of weeks. Inmates then had to exchange their clothes with local inhabitants to get something to eat. The overcrowded living quarters (as many as six families living in each room) and unsanitary conditions caused infectious disease to spread inside the ghetto, resulting in a high mortality rate.⁴

Menyuk recalls two of the German officials in Kołki as Bartz and Georg: one was a Sonderführer (agricultural commandant) and the other probably a Gendarme. Together with police chief Sachkovski, these men had absolute power within the ghetto, sometimes entering it when drunk to shoot Jews with impunity.

In late July 1942, a Security Police/SD detachment from Łuck, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and local Ukrainian police, liquidated the ghetto, shooting the majority of its inmates. The Jews were transported to the grave site on trucks. The mass shooting took place 6 kilometers (3.7 miles) west of the village along the Stir River, in a place called Belye Berega.⁵

Menyuk and his father survived this massacre, as they were kept alive to help sort the property remaining in the ghetto. A number of Jews also managed to hide and escape the liquidation. However, some of these Jews returned to the ghetto shortly afterwards, as they were unable to survive alone in the forests. The Germans also offered rewards, for example, of cigarettes or sugar, to peasants who captured Jews for them.⁶

A few weeks after the first Aktion, the SS, with the help of the Ukrainian police, carried out a second massacre in which more than 100 Jews were killed. This time Menyuk survived by jumping from the truck on the way to the pits. According to the report of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the occupiers and their accomplices murdered some 2,000 Jews in Kołki, accounting for more than 50 percent of the victims (3,949) of the “peaceful civilian population” under German occupation.⁷

According to one source, the Jews of Czartorysk (around 200) were murdered on August 24, 1942. It is more probable, however, that this Aktion was coordinated with (or was part of) the first massacre in Kołki, which took place in late July.⁸

Daniel Kats fled to the forests in the fall of 1941, where he joined forces with other partisans. Additional Jews from Kołki escaped to the forests at the time of the two massacres in the late summer and fall of 1942. A group of Jewish partisans from the Kołki region reportedly joined the Kovpak unit of Soviet partisans, which raided the Carpathian districts of Ukraine in the summer of 1943.

SOURCES A brief history of the Jewish community in Kołki and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 166–168. In addition, there is also a yizkor book for Kołki, compiled by Daniel Kats, Fun ash aroysgerufn (Warsaw: Czytelnik, 1983), which provides a literary picture of the town before the war. Its wartime section deals only with the activities of the Jewish partisans.

Documentation and the witness testimony regarding the murder of the Jews of Kołki can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2889); DAVO (R2-1-196); GARF (7021-55-5); USHMM (RG-50.030*0159); and YVA (e.g., O-3/1312).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ilya Bourman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. USHMM, RG-50.030*0159, Oral History with Semyon Menyuk, October 25, 1990, p. 5.

3. It is not clear whether this Aktion was organized by the German authorities or by local Ukrainians acting on their own initiative.

4. USHMM, RG-50.030*0159, pp. 4–5.

5. See DAVO, R2-1-196, pp. 218a–218b, Report to the Generalkommissar Wolhynien u. Podolien on gasoline supplies for the “special treatment” of Jews in the Gebiet Luzk, August 27, 1942, which notes that the “special treatment” of the Jews in the Rayons of Kołki, Zuman, and Olyka was conducted from July 26 to 29, 1942. Other sources also give late August as the date of the ghetto liquidation.

6. USHMM, RG-50.030*0159, p. 7; Kats, Fun ash aroysgerufn, p. 377.

7. GARF, 7021-55-5, p. 7.

8. See Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 285; it is also not clear from this source whether a separate open ghetto existed in Czartorysk or the Jews were brought into the Kołki ghetto before they were killed; see also note 6 above.

KORZEC

Pre-1939: Korzec (Yiddish: Korits), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Korets, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Korez, Rayon center, Gebiet Rowno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Korets', Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Korzec is located 66 kilometers (41 miles) east of Równe. According to the 1921 census, 4,120 Jews lived in Korzec. By late 1937, there were 4,895 Jews in the town out of a total population of 6,560.

Following the start of the war in September 1939, a number of Jewish refugees arrived from the west. Most Jews welcomed the arrival of the Red Army in 1939, as it offered them some security against the Germans. The new Soviet government eliminated private business in the town and established Soviet cooperatives. It also disbanded Jewish institutions and political parties, although some welfare work continued. Prior to the German arrival in July 1941, some 500 Jews managed to flee eastward.

Korzec was occupied by units of the German 6th Army following a heavy bombardment on July 7–8, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) governed the town, and from September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Korzec became a Rayon center within Gebiet Rowno. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Beer.¹ There was a German Gendarmerie post in Korzec, as well as a squad of Ukrainian police. The anti-Jewish Aktions in the town were organized by a team of Security Police from Równe, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans applied the same anti-Jewish measures in Korzec as in other cities and towns of Ukraine: a Jewish Council (Judenrat) consisting of five men was created, which was made personally responsible for the implementation of all German orders. There was also a Jewish police force subordinated to the Judenrat. Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (first a Star of David armband and later a yellow circle); they were made to perform forced labor; and they were beaten frequently by the local Ukrainian police. Immediately after the arrival of the German forces, Ukrainian nationalist antisemites organized a pogrom in Korzec, during which several Jews were killed, synagogues were ransacked, Torah scrolls were burned, and Jewish homes were robbed.²

In the summer of 1941, two anti-Jewish Aktions were carried out in the town. During the first Aktion, on the fourth day of the occupation in July, the Germans shot approximately 120 Jewish intellectuals. They were arrested according to a list and shot 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town in a nearby forest.³

During the second Aktion in August 1941, Ukrainian nationalists led by Mitka Zavirukha ran wild and harassed the Jews. Zavirukha declared with great zeal that God had sent him to punish the Jews and eliminate them from the [Ukrainian] nation. On that day, SS men arrived and attacked Jewish houses, forcibly arresting Jewish men and taking them to an unknown destination.⁴ In total some 350 Jewish men, including three members of the Judenrat, were taken and shot 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) northeast of Korzec in a forest near the village of Sukhovol' (in the Zhitomir oblast').⁵ During the course of the Aktion, money, bond certificates, gold, and silver items were collected from 77 Jews and forwarded to Berlin by the Ortskommandant as “war booty.” Among the items collected were four gold dental crowns taken from Goldar Gobulinik and Kopel Plosker.⁶

The Jews of the town suffered from a severe food shortage, as bread was distributed only to Ukrainians. Forced labor tasks performed by Jews during the winter of 1941–1942 included building shacks, digging underground tunnels, and excavating deep trenches. About 700 Jews were put to work at a sugar refinery. Many men were conscripted and sent to work in forced labor camps. This work was particularly arduous and dispiriting for the Jews, as they had been robbed of their warm clothes and were exposed to frost and snowstorms.

By the fall of 1941, the Jews were forced into an open ghetto. That is, they were made to live in one area of town and could leave this area only with special permission; however, the ghetto was not surrounded by a fence or physical boundary. Jews traded any clothing they had left for a little grain in order to bake matzot for Passover in April 1942.⁷

The third Aktion in Korzec took place on May 21, 1942, on the eve of the Jewish holiday of Shavuot. On this day, a team of SD men from Równe, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, as well as a platoon of the 1st Company, Police Battalion 33, roused families from their beds, shooting those who were too sick to walk. A group of about 200 young men and women were separated from the rest. The remainder, totaling some 2,500 Jews, including many women and children, were shot into previously dug pits in a forest near the village of Kazak, 7 kilometers (4.4 miles) north of the town. Among those shot was the physician Dr. Hirshhorn, who decided to accompany his wife to the pits even though the Germans wanted to keep him alive for his skills.⁸

Following the Aktion, the German authorities ordered those Jews in hiding to gather in front of the synagogue. Then on May 22, 1942, a new enclosed ghetto was created on Synagogue Street. It contained about 1,500 inmates, including the 200 workers who had been temporarily spared, the Jews who had hidden, and some women and children brought in from nearby villages. The Jews were forbidden to leave the boundary of the ghetto.

In the meantime the houses of the Jews were robbed and plundered. Not one family had survived the massacre intact. Those remaining thought constantly of their lost loved ones and recited Kaddish for their souls. They all sensed that their days were numbered, too, anticipating the next attack.⁹

The ghetto existed for only four months, until September 25, 1942. Within the ghetto, Moshe Gildenman appealed to the Judenrat to take revenge on the Germans and escape to the forests. However, the Judenrat continued the practices of mediation and bribery in an effort to mitigate the fate of the community, meeting all the renewed German demands. An attempt to contact the Soviet partisans by nominating two youths, Rozenshteyn and Waynshelboym, was unfortunately betrayed. Both of them were arrested by the Ukrainian police and were killed while trying to escape from their escorts on the way to Równe.¹⁰

On September 24, 1942, it became known that pits were being dug nearby. On that day an SD squad arrived from Równe to surround the ghetto, together with the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. In response, the Judenrat member Moshe Krasnostavski deliberately set himself and his home on fire, and within a short time, the entire ghetto was ablaze, forcing the Germans and Ukrainians to retreat. Another Judenrat member, Yukel Marcus, also committed suicide, and in the confusion a number of people broke out of the ghetto and found temporary refuge in the cemetery and elsewhere.¹¹ The German forces and local police, however, rounded up most of the Jews and shot approximately 2,000 people in a forest near Kazak on September 25, 1942. At the time of the liquidation, a group of men led by Moshe Gildenman escaped to the forests to take up partisan resistance against the Germans. He was known as the partisan commander “Uncle Misha.”

Altogether, according to the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 5,090 civilians were killed in Rayon Korez in 1941–1944; virtually all of them were Jews.¹²

SOURCES Articles about the destruction of the Jewish population of Korzec can be found in the following publications: Eli'ezer Le'oni, ed., Korits (Voblin): Sefer zikaron li-kehillatenu she-'alah 'aleha ha-koret (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yotse-Korits be-Yisrael, 1959); and Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 171–175.

Documents of the ChGK and the testimonies of witnesses and survivors regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Korzec can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/260 and 2756); BA-BL (R 2104/23); DARO; GARF (7021-71-54); USHMM (RG-02.208M*28); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Andrew Koss
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. AŽIH, 301/260; Dov Bergl, “Thus Was the City Destroyed,” in Le'oni, Korits (Voblin), pp. 338–347.

3. The dating is taken from the testimony of Nyuma Anapolsky in Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymy ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev, 1999), p. 5.

4. Bergl, “Thus Was the City Destroyed,” pp. 338–347.

5. See Zabarko, Zhivymy ostalis' tol'ko my, pp. 32, 34–35; K. Zakaluk, Zhivy stablyat' pamyatnik zagibli: Tsinogo blasnogo Zhittya (Rivne: Uporyadnik Kirilo Kindrat, 1995), p. 98. According to the ChGK report, 250 Jews were shot on August 15, 1941, and another 80 on August 23, 1941 (GARF, 7021-71-54, pp. 27 and reverse). Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, vol. 5, gives the number of 472 Jews murdered by the Germans in August.

6. BA-BL, R 2104/23, pp. 972–989. The receipts of the “War Booty Office” (Reichshauptkasse Beutestelle) list carefully all the items collected and give the names of the 77 Jews, who were probably among those shot.

7. Bergl, "Thus Was the City Destroyed," pp. 338–347.
8. Ibid., and GARF, 7021-71-54, pp. 32–33.
9. Bergl, "Thus Was the City Destroyed," pp. 338–347.
10. Le'oni, Korits (Voblin), pp. 338–347, 402–407.
11. Ibid.
12. GARF, 7021-71-54, pp. 1–3.

KOSTOPOL

Pre-1939: Kostopol, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kostopol', raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kostopol, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kostopil', raion center, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Kostopol is located about 29 kilometers (18 miles) north-northeast of Równe. In the fall of 1939, under Soviet occupation, a number of Jewish refugees from western and central Poland settled in the town so that in mid-1941 approximately 4,500 Jews resided in Kostopol.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Kostopol in early July 1941. During the first two weeks of the war, prior to the occupation of the town, only a small number of Jews was able to evacuate to the east, so over 4,000 Jews remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

In July and August of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town, establishing a local administration and also an auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. In September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Kostopol became the center of a Rayon and also a Gebiet, which also included the Rayons of Stepan, Beresno, and Derashne. The Gebietskommissar was SA-Standartenführer Löhnert, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Wichmann.¹ In the fall of 1941, a German Gendarmerie post was created in the town, and the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police was subordinated to it. Among the local Ukrainian policemen, Peter Ogrodnik was particularly notable for his sadism.²

Soon after the German occupation, a pogrom took place in Kostopol during which local Ukrainians beat many Jews, killing a few of them, and plundered Jewish houses. On August 16, 1941, a squad of the Security Police and SD arriving from Równe carried out the first Aktion in Kostopol. The Security Police assembled 460 Jewish men and 20 Jewish women from among the most affluent members of the community, including the head of the Judenrat, Dawid Dajan. These people were transported out of town and then shot. However, their family members were informed that they had been sent to work camps and were deceived into sending them money, which the German authorities confiscated.³

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupation forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Kostopol: a Judenrat was created, Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols, and they were forbidden to leave the limits of the town without special permission. In addition, they were compelled to perform forced labor in local sawmills, at the train station, at the sewage treatment plant, and in local offices, during which the Jews, including some female workers, were beaten and otherwise abused.

On October 5, 1941, a ghetto was created in Kostopol.⁴ Some 4,000 Jews who had been living in the town were given only three days to move into the ghetto. In addition, another 500 or so Jews from the surrounding villages were brought in, raising the total ghetto population to about 4,500. The overcrowding in the ghetto was such that 10 or 15 people had to live in each room. In fact, the ghetto was divided into three sections. The male Jews aged 16 to 60, who mostly had been brought in from other towns, were moved into one section known as the labor camp. This was located in the prayer houses, which were surrounded by barbed wire. The women, small children, and elderly were confined within the main ghetto. This was on the shister gas (Cobbler's Street), which before the war had housed only about 20 families. It was also surrounded by a high barbed-wire fence, which extended down to the pond. Then the specialist workers (mostly craftsmen), members of the Jewish Council, and the Jewish Police and their families (altogether 100 families, or about 500 people) were issued special passes and lived outside the ghetto along the fence near the gate; thus, they had the opportunity to maintain connections with the non-Jewish population, exchange goods, and acquire food. Some people also bought passes to live outside the ghetto, and women even paid to enter fictitious marriages to gain this privilege, although such arrangements often worked out badly, as the men took advantage of the women.⁵

In the fall of 1941, probably on November 10, a second Aktion was carried out in Kostopol: the families of the Jewish men killed during the first Aktion were offered the opportunity to join their menfolk in the supposed "labor camps." Once they had assembled, however, they were escorted to a site 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town. A squad of the Security Police and SD (part of Einsatzkommando 5, based in Równe), assisted by local Ukrainian police and the 1st Company of Police Battalion 320, which arrived from Sarny, shot approximately 1,400 people there into pits that had been prepared in advance.⁶

In the Kostopol ghetto, the Jewish workers received a daily bread ration of just over 200 grams (7 ounces), while the women and children received only half this amount. The Judenrat also established a public kitchen, which fed the families of those who went out to work during the day. Conditions in the ghetto were very dirty, leading to outbreaks of various diseases, which the Judenrat feared might lead to the liquidation of the ghetto. Just before the enclosure of the ghetto, the Gebietskommissar demanded a large "contribution" from the Jews, saying it would be used to maintain the ghetto, but in fact none of it was used for this purpose. The Jews had to surrender any valuable items they possessed, and later, in the depth of winter, they had to give up their furs and other warm clothing.⁷

The payment for work by inmates of the ghetto was 5.60 rubles per day, of which 20 percent was deducted for a "Jewish tax" and another 25 percent as "income tax." Jews were also forbidden to eat any fat products, such as butter or lard. By May 1942, the Germans had concentrated all the young Jewish men from Gebiet Kostopol in the labor camp. This was probably intended to avoid any resistance at the time of the liquidation of the nearby ghettos.⁸

On August 26, 1942, a detachment of the Security Police and SD from Równe, assisted by the German and Ukrainian police forces, organized the liquidation of the Kostopol ghetto. Ukrainian and German policemen surrounded the ghetto. Then they escorted the ghetto's inhabitants to the nearby village of Chotenka, about 6 kilometers (3.7 miles) to the south, where they shot them into ditches. In total, about 4,000 Jews were murdered during this Aktion (some 2,500 from Kostopol and the rest that had been brought in from Małe Siedliszcze and Antonówka, where Jews had continued to live as farmers outside the ghetto up to this time).⁹ A few Jews hid within the ghetto or managed to escape during the Aktion, but most of these people were soon caught by local Ukrainians and were handed over to the Germans, who shot them.¹⁰

Altogether, more than 13,000 Jews were murdered in Rayon Kostopol in 1941 and 1942.

In total, about 270 Jews from Kostopol survived the war, but most of them were people who successfully evacuated to the east in the summer of 1941. Only 15 or so of the Jews who endured the German occupation were still alive on the recapture of the town by the Red Army on January 31, 1944.

SOURCES The following published sources are of relevance for the history of the Kostopol ghetto: Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 168–170 (an English translation of this article is available at www.jewishgen.org); Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), pp. 66, 196; the yizkor book edited by S. Brayer, Ha-Mered be-Kostopol: Lo biskammu la-lekhet ke-tson la-tevah (Tel Aviv: Yaron Golan, 1996); and the memoir of Fayge Grinshpan-Milshtayn, A lebn oyf rates: Oytentische shilderungen fun der shoe tekufe (Tel Aviv: Naylebn, 1966), which presents a rare female perspective on the ghetto.

Documents and witness testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Kostopol can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/1268); BA-L (ZStL, 202 AR-Z 210/67); DARO (R534-1-4); GARF (7021-71-55); USHMM; VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E-1844, M-1/Q-30, M-1/E-1616, M/11/B-98, O-3/848, O-3/2902, O-3/2904, O-16/1805, and M.31).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Grinshpan-Milshtayn, A lebn oyf rates, p. 72.

3. GARF, 7021-71-55, p. 116, reverse side; another source gives only the number of 470 male Jewish victims.

4. AŽIH, 301/1268.

5. Ibid.; I.A. Volodarskaia, “Unichtozhenie evreev Zapadnoi Volyni 1941–1944gg,” in Katastrofa i opir ukrains’koho evreistva (1941–1944). Narysy z istorii Holokostu i Oporu v Ukraini (Kiev: Instytut politychnykh i etnonatsional’nykh doslidzhen’ NAN Ukrainy, 1999), p. 215; Grinshpan-Milshtayn, A lebn oyf rates, pp. 64–71. This latter chapter includes more detailed descriptions of the locations of the various parts of the ghetto.

6. According to evidence given on May 12, 1960, by the former commander of the 1st Company, Police Battalion 320, Captain Alfred Weber, the Aktion took place on November 10, 1941: this source states that there were only 300 to 400 victims (see BA-L, ZStL, 202 AR-Z 210/67). According to GARF, 7021-71-55, pp. 23, 88, the Aktion took place at the beginning of December 1941, and there were some 2,300 Jewish victims (this figure appears to be too high).

7. AŽIH, 301/1268; Grinshpan-Milshtayn, A lebn oyf rates, pp. 64–71.

8. AŽIH, 301/1268.

9. The settlement of Antonówka, a few kilometers to the south of Kostopol, had only about 20 Jewish residents in 1939 and should not be confused with the town of the same name close to Sarny (see separate entry in this volume); on the murder of the Jews of these two villages, see YVA, M.31 (award of the Righteous Among the Nations to Stanisław Jasinski and Emilia Słodkowska-Jasińska, February 28, 1985).

10. GARF, 7021-71-55, p. 22. AŽIH, 301/1268, dates the Aktion on August 22, 1942; another source gives the date of August 25.

KOWEL

Pre-1939: Kowel (Yiddish: Kovle), city, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kovel’, raion center, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kowel, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kovel’, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Kowel is located about 69 kilometers (43 miles) northwest of Łuck. By 1921, the Jewish population of the city had reached 12,700 (60 percent), remaining at about this level until 1939 (13,200 in 1937, nearly half the total population of 27,677). After 1939, the number of Jews increased, as many Jews from the German-occupied zone of Poland took refuge in Kowel. By mid-1941, including the refugees, there were about 15,000 Jews in the city.

German forces occupied the city on June 28, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration governed the city, and in September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Kowel became the administrative center of Gebiet Kowel, which included the Rayons of Kowel, Ratno, Mazejewo, Sabolotje, Manewitschi, Sedlischtsche, Goloby, and Turisk. The Kowel Gebietskommissar until June 1942 was Regierungsrat Arno Kämpf, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Philipp Rapp.¹ In June 1942, Kämpf was arrested for taking bribes from Jews, and Erich Kassner became the Gebietskommissar.

In July and August 1941, an SD-Einsatztruppe detached from the Einsatzgruppe zur besonderen Verwendung (z.b.V.) was stationed in Kowel. One of the leaders of this detachment was SS-Obersturmführer Erwin Gay. From mid-July until early September 1941, the headquarters of the 314th Police Battalion (commanding officer: Major der Polizei Dressler) and its 3rd Company were also located in the city.² From October 1941, the German Gendarmerie post in Kowel took over command of the local squad of Ukrainian police. The head of the Ukrainian police until late March 1943 was Polizei-Hauptwachtmeister Fritz Manthei.³

In October 1942, a Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) was created in the city; it was subordinated to the chief of the Security Police and SD (Kommandeur der Sicherheitspolizei und SD, or KdS) in Równe. SS-Hauptsturmführer Kurt Eggers was in charge of the Kowel outpost.

As recalled in the Kowel yizkor books, Kassner, as Gebietskommissar, and Manthei, as head of the local squad of the Ukrainian police, were most directly involved in persecuting the Jews of Kowel and in facilitating their annihilation. Kassner, a sadist, and Manthei, a virulent and committed antisemite, sought out and relished opportunities to brutalize, humiliate, and murder Jews.⁴

Except for the absence of a guarded fence surrounding the Jewish parts of town, all relevant aspects of a Nazi-ruled ghetto were present during this period. Jews were not allowed to leave the city limits (roads were patrolled); they were not allowed out on the streets between 6:00 P.M. and 10:00 A.M.; houses occupied by Jews had to be marked by yellow boards; Jews were required to display a yellow Star of David on the front and back of their clothes (replacing the initial white armband with a blue Star of David); and a 12-person Judenrat and a Jewish police unit reporting to the Judenrat were created almost immediately. The first chairmen of the Judenrat were B. Moroz and I. Sandler.⁵ Jews were also forced to pay the Germans large sums of money and to surrender their valuables. They were compelled to perform forced labor, during which the local Ukrainian police beat and otherwise abused them.⁶

Killings of Jews took place repeatedly from the very beginning of the German occupation, with the assistance of the Ukrainian police units. These were recruited from among Kowel residents and people from surrounding villages. Their leader was Dr. Progov (a Kowel resident, whose wife, according to the Kowel yizkor book, “distinguished herself with her murderous deeds against the Jews even more than her husband”).⁷ A few weeks after the arrival of the Germans, the head of Reb Velvele (the Trisker Rebbe) was cut off and displayed in the window of the Ukrainian cooperative.⁸

Very soon after the city was occupied, 60 to 80 Jews from the intelligentsia were arrested and later shot. The arrests and shootings continued during the following weeks. Altogether, about 1,000 Jews were killed in the summer of 1941. The shootings were carried out by the SD Einsatztruppe and the 3rd Company of the 314th Police Battalion, which were located in Kowel at this time. On August 31, 1941, this company shot 88 Jews in the city.⁹

In May 1942, two ghettos were created; according to one account, on May 27, 1942,¹⁰ it was officially announced that between 12:00 P.M. and 5:00 P.M. the Jewish population had to complete its relocation to the two ghettos, which then were sealed. Gebietskommissar Kämpf was in charge of the operation, and he personally ensured that everything went according to plan. One ghetto was in the old city, where mostly Jews had lived before. The other ghetto was in the new city between the railroad and Warsaw Street, in the “Sand.” Wooden fences, over 2 meters (6.6 feet) in height and covered with barbed wire, surrounded both ghettos. Jews could enter or leave the ghettos only through the gates. At first, the guards at these gates were German Gendarmes; their posts were later taken over by members of the Ukrainian police. After this, the German Gendarmes only supervised the Ukrainian policemen and occasionally carried out patrols through the ghetto themselves. Order within the ghetto was kept by a Jewish police force. In the new city ghetto, the Jewish craftsmen lived with their families (approximately 3,500 people). The remaining Jewish population, which (including those brought in from surrounding villages) consisted of more than 10,000 people, lived in the old city ghetto.¹¹

On June 3–5, 1942, a team of Security Police from Łuck organized the first Aktion, assisted by the 1st Motorized Platoon of the Łuck Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. The victims were the residents of the old city ghetto, except for those few who were able to hide or escape, as well as the Judenrat (with the exception of its then chairman, Pommeranz) and the Jewish Police. The day before the Aktion, June 2, Pommeranz received an order to compile a list of those Jews living in the old city ghetto who were not to be deported and thus needed to move to the new city ghetto. The same evening, the Judenrat and Jewish Police received an order to arrive at 8:00 P.M. at the German Gendarmerie post on Łuck Street. They were ordered to go to the ghetto in the old city and announce to the Jews living there that they would be sent to work in the east. The Jewish residents thus had to gather on the streets immediately, with a small amount of baggage; those Jews who did not obey this order would be shot. The members of the Judenrat and the Jewish Police, accompanied by the German Gendarmes and Ukrainian police, announced the order to the residents. As they went from house to house, armed German Gendarmes and Ukrainian policemen stood on the ghetto streets and later also checked that all the Jews had left their houses. Men, women, and children had to form lines on the streets and were then taken to the railroad station under guard. Those who tried to hide or escape, as well as the elderly, ill, and children, were shot on the spot; approximately 300 Jews were killed in this manner. (A work party of Jews from the new city ghetto buried the victims in a pit in the Jewish cemetery. Later, peasants from the surrounding area dug up the bodies of these Jews and removed rings, gold watches, gold teeth, and their clothing, leaving many naked corpses scattered throughout the cemetery.)¹² From the station, Jews were taken in a freight train to the shooting place at a sandpit near Bachów, 7 kilometers (4.3 miles) north of Kowel. After their arrival, the Jews had to undress: men had to undress completely, and women had to undress down to their underwear. They were then forced to get into the pit in groups and to lie down on their stomachs, at which point they were shot in the back of the head. The freight train took the clothing of the victims to the Kowel railway station, where, after the clothing was unloaded, the train was filled with new victims. Thus, during the mass shootings, which lasted three days, about 9,000 Jews were killed (men, women, and children); each day, approximately 3,000 people were killed.¹³ However, more than 3,500 people, comprising mainly the craftsmen and their families, were excluded from the Aktion, while almost 1,000 Jews went into hiding in the city, and about 1,000 others escaped to nearby villages or into the forests.

On June 9, 1942, a few days after the liquidation of the old city ghetto, the German authorities imposed a “contribution” of 1 million rubles (soon increased to 1.5 million rubles) on the remaining Jews. This sum had to be paid by June 15. Besides this monetary penalty, Jews also had to surrender any gold, jewelry, or precious stones. Somehow the new Judenrat managed to meet these exorbitant demands, contributing 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) of gold in addition to the required money.

After the liquidation of the old city ghetto, shootings of small groups of Jews regularly took place in the new city ghetto. In July 1942, Gebietskommissar Kassner personally shot 10 Jews near the Judenrat building because a search revealed that they were hiding money and foreign currency.¹⁴

On August 19, 1942, the ghetto in the new city was also liquidated: about 6,500 Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery, and 150 Gypsies were shot together with the Jews.¹⁵ A team of Security Police and SD from Łuck carried out the shooting, with the active participation of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police. Approximately 1,000 Jews managed to escape the initial liquidation, but most were soon captured by the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie, which regularly searched the ghetto and the surrounding area for hidden Jews. Those they found were mostly brought to the Great Synagogue, where they were subsequently left for days without food and water before being removed to the Jewish cemetery and shot. Periodically, policemen would take out groups of young Jewish girls and rape them before returning them to the synagogue to await their deaths.¹⁶ In the days of their captivity in the synagogue, many people wrote wills, requests for vengeance, and pleas for life on the walls of the synagogue. Many of these inscriptions, in Yiddish, Hebrew, and Polish, were copied by survivors and are listed in the Kowel yizkor book.¹⁷

The last shooting took place on October 6, 1942, at the Roman Catholic cemetery, where graves were found, after the liberation of the city, containing the bodies of more than 2,000 people.¹⁸ According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, altogether in 1941–1942, about 18,000 Jews were killed in Kowel, including the Jews from the surrounding villages.¹⁹

At the beginning of May 1942, two emissaries from the underground movement in Warsaw, Frumka Płotnicka and Tema Sznajdermann, succeeded in entering Kowel. On their return to Warsaw, they reported on resistance groups in the Kowel ghetto who had smuggled out arms from warehouses and passed them on to Soviet partisans active in the area. The hostile attitude of the partisan unit’s commander (Nasyekin) foiled the resistance groups’ efforts to leave the ghetto and go into the forests, and only a few succeeded in doing so.²⁰ Liuba Lederhendler, a native of Kowel born in 1921, managed to survive the liquidation of the ghetto and hide in the forests surrounding Kowel. She posed as a Christian and served as a courier for the partisan units in the area, which brought her into contact with Jewish partisans hiding in the forests. Two weeks before the entry of the Red Army into Kowel, the home she was living in was blown up by Russian shelling, and Liuba, forced to leave, was recognized by a Pole, denounced to the Gestapo, and subsequently shot.²¹

On September 28, 1966, Erich Kassner was sentenced to life imprisonment by the Regional Court in Oldenburg, West Germany. Erwin Gay was sentenced to 8 years and 6 months of imprisonment in 1967 in Darmstadt, and after a retrial in 1970, he was sentenced to 7 years and 8 months of imprisonment. On September 28, 1966, Fritz Manthei was sentenced to life imprisonment by the Regional Court in Oldenburg (case 2 Ks 1/64) in West Germany. Two former members of the Ukrainian police in Kowel were convicted: V. Lapchuk and P. Belograd. When questioned, they testified that the Ukrainian police in Kowel not only participated in the annihilation of the Jews in Kowel but also drove to Ratno, Jezierzany, Kupiczów, and Powórk to take part in the shooting of Jews there.

SOURCES Firsthand accounts of the Kowel ghetto can be found in the city’s two yizkor books: Betsalel Baler, ed., Pinkes Kovel (Buenos Aires: Aroysgegebn durkhn landsleyt fareyn fun Kovel un umgegn in Argentine, 1951); and Eli’ezer Le’oni-Tsuperain, ed., Kovel: Sefer ‘edut ve-zikaron li-kehillatenu she-’alah ‘aleh ha-koret (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Kovel be-Yisrael, 1957). A short article on the Jewish community of Kowel can also be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 158–165. Additional information on Kowel during the wartime period can be found in Ruta Sakowska, ed., Archiwum Ringelbluma: Konspiracyjne Archiwum Getta Warszawy (Warsaw: Wydawn. Naukowe PWN, 2000), pp. 916–918; Shimon Huberland, Kiddush Hashem: Jewish Religious and Cultural Life in Poland during the Holocaust (Hoboken, NJ: Ktav Pub. House; New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1987), pp. 387–399; Joseph Kermish, ed., To Live with Honor and Die with Honor: Selected Documents from the Warsaw Ghetto Underground Archives “O.S.” (Oneg Shabbat) (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1986), p. 33.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jewish population in Kowel can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1644, 2152); BA-L (Verdict of LG-Old, 2 Ks 1/64); DAVO; GARF (7021-55-13); USHMM (RG-50.030*0188); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Samuel Schalkowsky
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. See the Judgement of LG-Trau on May 26, 1982 (5 Ks 11, Js 9437/78).

3. On September 28, 1966, Manthei was sentenced to life imprisonment by LG-Old (case 2 Ks 1/64) in West Germany.

4. Baler, Pinkes Kovel, pp. 85, 92; Le'oni-Tsuperain, Kovel: Sefer 'edut ve-zikaron, pp. 447, 453–458.

5. Ia. Khonigsman, Katastrofa evreev Zapadnoi Ukrainy (L'vov, 1998), p. 152. See Baler, Pinkes Kovel, p. 83.

6. Le'oni-Tsuperain, Kovel: Sefer 'edut ve-zikaron, p. 411.

7. Baler, Pinkes Kovel, p. 83.

8. Ibid., p. 84.

9. Telegram no. 230 sent by the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer Russland-Süd, September 1, 1941, 09.30; see USHMM, RG-48.004M (VHAP), reel 1, Kommandostab des RFSS, Karton 2.

10. The sources differ on this date. The anonymous source published in Sakowska, Archiwum Ringelbluma, pp. 916–918, gives the date of May 27. Another source, Kermish, To Live with Honor, p. 33, gives the date of May 17. Other sources give the date of May 21.

11. Sakowska, Archiwum Ringelbluma, pp. 916–918.

12. See Le'oni-Tsuperain, Kovel: Sefer 'edut ve-zikaron, pp. 418–422.

13. Verdict of LG-Old, September 28, 1966 (2 Ks1/64), in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 638; GARF, 7021-55-13, pp. 217, 222, and reverse.

14. Verdict of LG-Old, September 28, 1966 (2 Ks1/64), in JuNS-V, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 638.

15. GARF, 7021-55-13, pp. 222–223 and reverse. Baler, Pinkes Kovel, p. 93, cites the August 19 date.

16. Baler, Pinkes Kovel, pp. 94, 98–99.

17. Ibid., pp. 485–498.

18. GARF, 7021-55-13, pp. 213 and reverse.

19. Ibid., pp. 215, 217.

20. See Le'oni-Tsuperain, Kovel: Sefer 'edut ve-zikaron, pp. 446–447.

21. Ibid., p. 522.

KOŻANGRÓDEK

Pre-1939: Kożangródek (Yiddish: Koz'anborodok), town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kozhan-Gorodok, Luninets raion, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Koshangrudek, Gebiet Pinsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kazhan-Haradok, Luninets raen, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kożangródek is a town located 5 kilometers (3 miles) west of Łachwa. In 1921 the Jewish population was 783.

The Red Army occupied Kożangródek on September 17, 1939, to the relief of the local Jews. In early July 1941, the Soviets fled, and the Germans captured the town. The Germans established a ghetto (probably around March 1942) in which approximately 950 Jews were incarcerated. The ghetto was liquidated in a single Aktion on the night of September 2–3, 1942, at the same time as the Łachwa ghetto. The German Gendarmerie and local police drove the Jews from the ghetto to a killing site near the Jewish cemetery. The Aktion was probably coordinated by SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhem Rasp, the commander of the Security Police and SD office in Pińsk. Some 40 men from the 2nd Company of Police Battalion 69, stationed in Łachwa, together with a similar number from the 2nd Company of Police Battalion 306, assisted by cordoning off the ghetto and the killing site. According to Soviet sources, the Germans and their collaborators shot a total of 937 Jews (including 325 women and 301 children), who were buried in a large mass grave 12 meters long and 4 meters wide (39 by 13 feet).¹

It appears that there was only one survivor of the ghetto, Hershel Vilk. He recalled that many Jews tried to escape at the time of the Aktion, but the Germans and their collaborators managed to catch the others. The Red Army drove the German occupying forces out of Kożangródek in July 1944. By the end of the war, most Jewish houses were damaged or destroyed. No attempt was made to rebuild the Jewish community.²

SOURCES The yizkor book for Luniniec and Kożangródek, edited by Yosef Ze'evi and others, Yizkor Kehilot Luninyets—Koz'anborodok (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Luninyets ve-Koz'anhorodok be-Yisrael, 1952), includes a section on Kożangródek, but there are no accounts by survivors. There is also a short article on the Jewish community in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 310. The ghetto in Kożangródek is also mentioned in Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000), p. 130. See also Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 1999), pp. 718–719.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, 204 AR-Z 393/59); GARF (7021-90-31); NARB (861-1-11); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. NARB, 861-1-11, p. 4; GARF, 7021-90-31, pp. 2 and reverse; see also Stephen Pallavicini, The Liquidation of the Jews of Polesie (Sydney University, 2003), chapter 6, which gives the number of only 500 victims of the Aktion, presumably from German investigative sources. Other sources date the Aktion on August 18, 1942.

2. Moyshe Tsipershteyn, "Der letste kapitl," in Ze'evi et al., Yizkor Kehilot Luninyets—Koz'anborodok, pp. 223–226, here p. 224.

KOZIN

Pre-1939: Kozin, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kosin, Rayon center, Gebiet Dubno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kozin, Radyvyliv raion, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Kozin is located about 21 kilometers (13 miles) southwest of Dubno. The 1921 census recorded 550 Jewish inhabitants in

VOLUME II: PART B

Kozin. In 1931, there were 599, and in mid-1941, there were probably around 650 Jews living in Kozin.¹

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Kozin at the end of June 1941. A military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the village in July and August 1941. The Ortskommandantur appointed a village elder (starosta) and recruited a local Ukrainian police force.

A few days after the Germans' arrival, they ordered all the Jewish men to assemble, and local Ukrainians identified alleged Soviet collaborators, who were then shot. A few weeks later, the German-appointed administration carried out atrocities against the Jews. They set fire to the synagogue and its Torah scrolls, and 20 Jews were murdered.²

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Kozin: Jews were required to wear armbands bearing the Star of David (later, a yellow circular patch); they were required to perform forced labor with little or no compensation; and they were forbidden to leave the village limits.

In September, a German civil administration took over. Kozin became the center of Rayon Kosin in Gebiet Dubno. The Gebietskommissar was a man named Brocks, and from the spring of 1942 the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant Eberhardt.³ There was a Gendarmerie post in Kozin, which took over responsibility for the Ukrainian police (renamed Schutzmannschaft).

On May 23, 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto⁴ that held Jews brought in from surrounding villages as well as the Jews of Kozin. The ghetto consisted of about 30 small houses. One week later, on May 30, the Germans carried out the first Aktion in the nearby village of Hranowka, just to the west of Kozin. From the ghetto they selected 372 Jews considered unfit for work,⁵ and these people were shot by a detachment of the Sipo and SD from Równe, with the assistance of the 1st Company, 33rd Reserve Police Battalion.⁶ Skilled workers and their families were exempted from this Aktion, and some Jews evaded the Aktion by hiding. Once the Aktion was over, many of those who had hidden returned to the ghetto under the illusion that those who were working were protected.⁷

On October 6, 1942, the German authorities liquidated the Kozin ghetto,⁸ shooting some 700 Jews in the village of Hranowka.⁹ Assisted by the Ukrainian police and members of the German Gendarmerie, a Sipo and SD detachment from Równe carried out the mass shooting. On the eve of this Aktion, several dozen Jews succeeded in fleeing the ghetto, but many of them were subsequently caught by the Ukrainian police and shot. All told, during the period from 1941 to 1944, the German occupiers and their collaborators killed 1,288 inhabitants among the civilian population of the Kozin raion, including 1,029 Jews.¹⁰ Jewish victims accounted for 79.9 percent of those killed.

Approximately 30 Jews were saved by Czech and Polish farmers who hid them. The Red Army drove the Germans out of Kozin in March 1944.

SOURCES A short article on the fate of the Jewish population of Kozin was published in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities, Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 165–166.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews in Kozin can be found in these archives: AŽIH; DARO; GARF (7021-71-53); TsDAVO (3676-4-317); VHF (# 33456 and 45524); and YVA (M-1/E/947, O-3/1302, 4152).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), p. 362.

2. “Kozin,” in Spector Pinkas ha-kehillot, vol. 5, pp. 165–166.

3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

4. AŽIH (www.jewishinstitute.org.pl/en/gminy/miasto/736.html); Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, vol. 5, pp. 165–166.

5. AŽIH (www.jewishinstitute.org.pl/en/gminy/miasto/736.html).

6. See the report of the HSSPF in Ukraine for the period June 1–30, 1942, in TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 29.

7. Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, vol. 5, pp. 165–166.

8. According to AŽIH data (www.jewishinstitute.org.pl/en/gminy/miasto/736.html).

9. GARF, 7021-71-53, p. 2.

10. Ibid.

KRASILOV

Pre-1941: Krasilov, town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Krasilow, Rayon center, Gebiet Antoniny, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Krasyliv, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Krasilov is located 120 kilometers (75 miles) southeast of Równe. According to the census of 1939, 1,250 Jews lived in Krasilov (17.2 percent of the total). There were an additional 1,442 Jews living in the villages of what was then the Krasilov raion, including the village of Kul'chitsy.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a few hundred Jews were able to evacuate to the east or were conscripted into the Red Army. Around 1,000 Jews remained in Krasilov at the start of the occupation.

On July 8, 1941, forces of the German 6th Army occupied Krasilov. In July and August 1941, a German military administration took control of the town. The military authorities appointed a mayor and recruited an auxiliary Ukrainian police force.

In September 1941, Krasilov was placed under German civil administration and included in Gebiet Antoniny. Regierungsassessor Harald Schorer became the Gebietskommissar in Antoniny until 1943, when he was succeeded by Gerhard Friedrich, who had served previously as his deputy.¹ A German Gendarmerie post with four Gendarmes was established in the town; it supervised the local Ukrainian police.

In the summer and autumn of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Krasilov. Soon after the arrival of the German military authorities, Jews were ordered to wear distinctive markings in the form of the Star of David, and later the Gebietskommissar ordered them to sew yellow patches onto the back and front of their clothing. In addition, they had to perform forced labor and were prohibited from leaving the limits of the town.

In or around October 1941, Mikhail Grinchuk, the head of the local Ukrainian administration in Krasilov, signed a public notice prepared by the Gebietskommissar informing all the Jews that they would have to live in a ghetto. Jews from the surrounding area were brought into Krasilov by the local police and were placed initially in three long one-story buildings next to where the market was located after World War II.² About two weeks after the announcement, Gerhard Friedrich, the deputy of the Gebietskommissar, arrived in Krasilov and organized the creation of the ghetto, personally choosing the section of town that was to be surrounded with barbed wire. The ghetto, consisting of about 25 houses, was located adjacent to the buildings that initially held the new arrivals. The Gendarmerie and local police assisted Grinchuk in obtaining barbed wire for the ghetto.³

All the Jewish residents of Krasilov had moved into the cramped space of the ghetto by January 1, 1942, with the exception of the Jewish craftsmen (shoemakers, glaziers, plumbers) and their families, who now lived in three buildings outside the fence. The perimeter of the ghetto was guarded day and night by two to four Ukrainian policemen. Jews were officially prohibited from visiting the market, and no rations were provided. The worst aspect was the lack of access to water in the ghetto. However, some Jews were able to trade items for food with the local population and also to obtain water after making arrangements with the guards.⁴ The local non-Jewish inhabitants of Krasilov became aware that Jews in the ghetto were dying, frequently from starvation or disease.

The Jews living in the ghetto were assigned forced labor tasks by the local administration, such as repairing roads or working in the sugar refinery, which was supervised by the Ukrainian police.

On April 25 or 26, 1942, the most respected and educated Jew in the ghetto, Moisha Hammerschmid, was summoned to the Gendarmerie post. On his return he bore the scars of beatings and torture and fainted into the arms of his fellow Jews. When he came round, he started to scream in Yiddish that everyone should try to get to safety wherever they could, as they all faced death. He then explained that the Gendarmerie had ordered all the ghetto inhabitants to assemble on the square next to the fence on the morning of May 1, as they were going to be resettled. They could take with them only property up to a weight of 16 kilograms (35 pounds) for adults and 8 kilograms (17.6 pounds) for children.

On May 1 and 2, 1942, most of the Jewish population of the ghetto was resettled into a "labor camp" in a stable in the village of Orlintsy, close to Antoniny. At the end of May, the Germans also began to transfer the Jewish craftsmen to Orlintsy. While escorting a group of 44 Jews on foot to Orlintsy, Ukrainian police on horseback shot 8 Jews who fell behind the column, owing to weakness. In Orlintsy at this time, some 100 Jews from various locations in Gebiet Antoniny were being held. From the labor camp, selected Jews were forced daily to drag heavy stones in a cart behind them for several kilometers. Subsequently, most Jews from the Orlintsy camp were taken to Manivtsy to be killed. The Jewish survivor Moysey Katz managed to escape back to the Krasilov ghetto shortly after his transfer to Orlintsy at the end of May.⁵

In Krasilov, Katz continued to live in the buildings for specialist workers, while some elderly Jews and children remained in the ghetto, as they were unfit for work, together with a few adults who had somehow avoided the transfers.

In July 1942, the ghetto in Krasilov was cleared. The Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police drove the Jews out of the ghetto and escorted them on foot to the village of Manivtsy. Those who were unfit were loaded onto carts. In Manivtsy, they were held for a few days and then shot along with other Jews from Gebiet Antoniny.⁶ The mass murder was organized by a detachment from the Security Police and SD outpost in Starokonstantinov. The Ukrainian police guarded the victims before they were shot and cordoned off the killing site during the shooting.⁷

The remaining 300 or so Jewish craftsmen with their families in Krasilov were then moved from the neighboring buildings into the ghetto, which was also reduced in size and now surrounded with two rings of barbed wire. On about September 10 or 12, 1942, the guard on the ghetto was strengthened, and about 30 Jews managed to flee at night, anticipating a final Aktion. The remaining craftsmen from the ghetto were also shot in Manivtsy. Many of those who escaped were subsequently also caught and shot.⁸

After the last Jews had been removed from the Krasilov ghetto, any remaining property of value was taken away by the Gendarmerie to Antoniny. The local population plundered the empty houses. With the permission of the Gebietskommissar, the local Ukrainian administration sold off some of the houses for local residents to live in, while others were dismantled either for firewood or as building material. Remaining items of lesser value, such as old furniture and crockery, were also sold to the local population. The proceeds from these sales, along with other local taxes, were booked to the account of the Gebietskommissar in Antoniny.⁹

SOURCES Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Krasilov can be found in the following archives: DAKhO (R863-2-44); GARF (7021-64-793, 800); and YVA (M-33). BA-L (II 204 AR-Z 442/67: Gebietskommissariat Antoniny) contains materials on the crimes committed by officials of the German police and civil administration in the Krasilov raion. In these files, there are some detailed descriptions of the persecution and massacres of the Jewish population.

1394 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Abschlussbericht, March 18, 1971, Verfügung, June 18, 1974.
2. Descriptions of the ghetto are all based on postoccupation testimonies.
3. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, vol. 1, pp. 199–203, statement of defendant Mikhail A. Grinchuk, March 30, 1947; see also vol. 1, p. 221, statement of Yakov M. Omelyaniuk, December 21, 1972; vol. 1, pp. 275–276, statement of Moysey M. Katz, December 22, 1972.
4. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 275–277, statement of Katz.
5. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 277–279, statement of Katz. See also Abschlussbericht, March 18, 1971, Verfügung, June 18, 1974.
6. GARF, 7021-64-793, p. 95.
7. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Abschlussbericht, March 18, 1971, Verfügung, June 18, 1974.
8. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 280–281, statement of Katz.
9. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 199–203, statement of Grinchuk.

KRYMNO

Pre-1939: Krymno village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Zabolot'e raion, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Sabolotje, Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Stara Vyzhivka raion, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Krymno is located about 53 kilometers (33 miles) northwest of Kowel. In mid-1941, approximately 500 Jews (about 70 families) resided in the Zabolot'e raion, primarily in Krymno.

German forces occupied the village on June 22, 1941. Until early September 1941, the village was governed by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), and then command was transferred to a German civil administration. Rayon Sabolotje was part of Gebiet Kowel. The first Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Arno Kämpf, but in June 1942 he was replaced by Erich Kassner. The Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Philipp Rapp.¹ He was head of the Gendarmerie posts located in the former Soviet raion centers and of the Ukrainian auxiliary police. One of the Gendarmerie posts was located in Zabłocie (the center of Rayon Sabolotje), and in Krymno there was also a post of the Ukrainian auxiliary police.

In May 1942, on the orders of the Gebietskommissar, a ghetto was created in Krymno, into which Ukrainian policemen and German Gendarmes drove approximately 400 people from the villages of Rayon Sabolotje. Ukrainian policemen guarded the ghetto and repeatedly beat the Jews. The residents of the ghetto were forbidden to leave or to communicate with local non-Jews. Each resident of the ghetto received only a small portion of bread per day, as a result of a terrible shortage of food inside the ghetto.

On September 5, 1942, a ditch was dug near the village measuring 20 meters by 4 meters by 2 meters (65.6 by 13.1 by 6.6 feet). On September 6, Ukrainian policemen, led by the chief of the Ukrainian district police, N.G. Dufanets, as well as German Gendarmes from Zabłocie: Sitzler, Kaminski, and Wagner, shot all the residents of the ghetto (at least 386 people) in this ditch, on the orders of Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer Rapp. Among those killed were Mindell Leizer and his wife, mother-in-law, and three children; Shana Goldman and his family of four; Borukh Roytinstein and his family of five; and many others.

After the liquidation of the ghetto, there remained a labor camp in Zabłocie in which Jewish artisans were kept with their families. On January 9, 1943, the camp was liquidated: Ukrainian policemen and German Gendarmes shot 101 Jews.²

On August 28, 1980, the Volyn' Regional Court handed down a death sentence to the former head of the Ukrainian police in Rayon Sabolotje, Dufanets, as well as to two former Ukrainian policemen in Krymno, A.L. Bubela and F.Ye. Rybachuk, who played an active role in the murder of the Jews of the Krymno ghetto. Kyrylo Zvarich, another local policeman who escaped to Britain after the war, died peacefully in Bolton in 1986 despite repeated Soviet requests for his extradition.³

SOURCES Information about the extermination of the Jewish population of Krymno can be found in the following archives: DASBU-Lu; DAVO; and GARF (7021-55-3). There are no publications specifically focused on the Krymno ghetto; more general publications containing information on the ghetto are cited in the notes.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; verdict of LG-Old, 2 Ks 1/64 (case against Erich Kassner and Fritz Manthei) on September 28, 1966.
2. Verdict of the Volyn Regional Court in the Case of Traitors of the Homeland N.G. Dufanets, A.L. Bubela, and F.Ye. Rybachuk, published in A.F. Vysotsky et al., eds., Nazi Crimes in Ukraine 1941–1944. Documents and Materials (Kiev: Naukova Dumka, 1987), pp. 345–352; P. Shafeta, Stroku davnosti ne isnuie (Kiev, 1984), pp. 68–78, 128–134.
3. David Cesarani, Justice Delayed: How Britain Became a Refuge for Nazi War Criminals (London: William Heinemann, 1992), pp. 195–196.

KRZEMIENIEC

Pre-1939: Krzemieniec (Yiddish: Kremenets), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Kremenets, raion center, Tarnopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kremenez, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kremenets', Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Krzemieniec is located 77 kilometers (48 miles) south-southeast of Łuck. In 1931, 7,256 Jews lived there (26.5 percent of the population). By 1941, the Jewish population exceeded 12,000, including more than 4,000 refugees. After the start of the German invasion, several hundred young Jews were able to flee into the Soviet Union.

Three young Luftwaffe personnel publicly humiliate an elderly Jew in the streets of Krzemieniec, ca. 1942.
USHMM WS #09527, COURTESY OF IPN

The Germans occupied the town on July 3, 1941.¹ During July and August 1941, a German military administration temporarily governed the town; in September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The town became the administrative center of Gebiet Kremenez, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Krzemieniec was Regierungsrat Müller.² A Ukrainian local council and police force were created in Krzemieniec. The Ukrainian police, renamed the Schutzmannschaft, was subordinate to the German Gendarmerie post consisting of several German Gendarmes.

According to a report dated July 20, 1941, by Einsatzgruppe C based in Zhitomir, the Soviets had killed 100 to 150 Ukrainians just before their retreat from Krzemieniec. Some of these people were apparently thrown into a cauldron of boiling water, as evidenced by the fact that the corpses, when exhumed, had no skin. The German Einsatzgruppe report states that on July 3, 1941, "the Ukrainians killed 130 Jews with clubs as a form of revenge."³ The account of B. Shvarts indicates that the pogrom lasted for several days. He reports that Jewish stores were robbed, and Jews were badly beaten and thrown in jail. The SS and "Gendarmerie" (probably "Feldgendarmerie" of the Wehrmacht) assisted the Ukrainians, who arrived in groups from the surrounding villages to beat and kill Jews. Shvarts writes that a group of Jews bribed the German commandant to stop the murders; he estimates that about 800 Jews died during the pogrom.⁴

In the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Krzemieniec: a Judenrat was created, Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (first a white armband with a Star of David on the right arm, and then a yellow patch sewn on the shoulder, a little below the collar), and they were compelled to perform forced labor during which they were beaten and otherwise abused. It was forbidden for Jews to use the sidewalks, and they had to take off their hats when passing a German.

On one occasion, a Jewish child who had tried to buy something in the marketplace was caught and forced to dance on a table and then lick a German's spit off the table. On another occasion, German officials sent the beadle home and stole everything valuable from the synagogue. They then brought in barrels of kerosene and other flammable material and set the synagogue on fire. Only its stone walls were left standing. Afterwards, the Gestapo came to the Judenrat to "investigate" who had burned down the synagogue. They wrote an official report claiming that the Jews had burned it down themselves. Gebietskommissar Müller decided to pull down the walls of the burned-out synagogue and sow the place where it stood with grass. During the destruction of the walls, one wall fell and crushed some people.⁵

On July 23, 1941, the German Security Police arrested and killed members of the Jewish "intelligentsia" (several hundred people).⁶ According to Shvarts, the Gestapo arrived in Krzemieniec and ordered the Judenrat to collect people with an academic status for forced labor. Those gathered (mostly intelligentsia and religious leaders) were taken away to be shot: 800 people were killed, destroying the fabric of the Jewish community's leadership.⁷

Soon after their arrival, the Germans appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The first chairman was Dr. Benjamin Katz, and other members included Dr. Buzi Landesberg and Dr. Lione Grinberg. The Judenrat consisted of well-respected individuals from the town as well as refugees from the west who knew German.⁸ After Katz was murdered for his refusal to collaborate with the Nazis, Bronfeld became the Judenrat chairman (in the summer of 1942). After Bronfeld was killed by the Nazis, Dr. Mandel became chairman. The Judenrat

The burning of a synagogue in Krzemieniec, 1941.
USHMM WS #09528, COURTESY OF IPN

Jews wearing circular badges walk through town during a deportation from the Krzemieniec ghetto, 1942.
USHMM WS #09524 COURTESY OF IPN

was responsible for supplying Jews for forced labor and for distributing the daily bread ration of 75 grams (2.6 ounces) per person.

The head of the Jewish Police was Dr. Mandel from Kraków, who spoke German well. Two of the Jewish policemen acted as German agents: Bronfeld, a Czech Jew (who later became Judenrat chairman), and a Jew from Łódź, Itsi Diamant. Diamant was connected to an international band of thieves and swindlers. He was shot when diamonds were discovered in his house. Before the establishment of the ghetto, the Jewish Police were responsible for collecting contributions and for ensuring that people went to work as instructed. The police would go from house to house, collecting people for forced labor. The workers were fed a half-liter (16.9 ounces) of soup and 250 grams (8.8 ounces) of bread per day. Cleanliness was very important and enforced by the Jewish Police, as was the 7:00 P.M. curfew. The police helped smuggle food into the ghetto at night because they were allowed past the ghetto guards.⁹

On March 1, 1942, the remaining Jews (about 8,000 people) were driven into a ghetto.¹⁰ The ghetto was located in the west part of town. It was 1.6 kilometers (1 mile) long and 100 meters (328 feet) wide. It was initially set up at the end of January 1942 and sealed off from the rest of the town on March 1. The ghetto was surrounded by a wooden fence 3 meters (9.8 feet) high. Although Jews were allowed to bring in their belongings, the ghetto was so overcrowded that there was nowhere to put them, and much had to be left behind.¹¹

Some 10 to 12 people died of hunger every day, owing to the meager daily bread allotment. Gebietskommissar Müller issued some 500 death sentences based on false accusations of alleged “crimes.” The German authorities demanded a “contribution” of 25 tons of grain. Women and men were forced to have short hair. Jews had to dismantle the Jewish cemetery because the Germans needed the stones for their own construction projects. Müller ordered the Judenrat to set up a brothel for Jewish youths aged 16 to 19. Every youth was ordered to visit the brothel and received a special note acknowledging his visit. This order was revoked for youths whose parents could afford to pay off the Germans. In August 1941, Jews had to “contribute” more than 10 kilograms (22 pounds) of gold and silver to Müller.

A standard day in the ghetto proceeded in the following way: first, people stood in line in the morning at one of the three wells for water. After cleaning and sweeping the streets, people went to the kitchen for soup and to distribution points for bread. Sometimes people fought for bread when there was not enough, and the police had to intervene. The youths were taken to their workplaces; people walked in columns, with a policeman at the head. On the way back from work, people were searched and beaten if the Germans caught them smuggling anything. The hospital was not assigned any food, so workers would sometimes bring some back for the sick. There was an illegal market in the ghetto.¹²

Once, a drunken German entered the ghetto. All the adults ran away, leaving only the children. The German gave them all candy and embraced and kissed them. Then he cried and lamented, “Poor Jewish children! Why does that damned Hitler persecute you?” The ghetto guards could sometimes be bribed to let wagons of food into the ghetto.

When the Jews in the Krzemieniec ghetto heard about killing Aktions in other towns, they began to look for ways to escape death. Some people escaped from the ghetto; others built hiding places underground (bunkers). The bunkers were so small, however, that people were unable to stay in them for an entire Aktion, and many ended up coming out. Others were able to build bunkers that had electricity and sewage facilities. In mid-1942, there were about 8,500 Jews in the ghetto.¹³

One week before the final Aktion (in August 1942), the German forces made announcements in the city, inciting the local population against the Jews. On Saturday, August 9, 1942, the workers received an order to report to the trains after work to load grain onto wagons. They worked half the night, which ensured that they would be even more exhausted than usual and unable to resist when the Aktion was carried out. During the night of August 9–10, loud shooting broke out in the ghetto. The ghetto fence was torn down, and Jews were dragged out of their houses. Some people were caught in the crossfire and died in the ghetto; some people escaped to their hiding places. About 60 Gendarmes and a force of Ukrainian Schutzmannen, mainly from the locally based battalion, entered the ghetto. The Nazis claimed that the shooting throughout the night was carried out by Jews who had initiated an uprising.

The Judenrat was ordered to gather all those capable of work at the gate. The Gendarmes and the Security Police performed a selection to determine who would be removed from the ghetto. People were lined up at the gates in two long lines, and the Ukrainians stood between the two lines. The security forces led people in groups of 400 from the gate to Belaia Krinita under heavy guard. Those who tried to escape were shot. According to one account, 1,500 able-bodied prisoners were dispatched to perform forced labor in Belaia Krinita,¹⁴ while another account gives the number as 1,200 Jewish craftsmen.¹⁵

The first victims of the Aktion (which took place on the following day) were the patients in the hospital and the poor, who occupied a former hotel. They were gathered in the synagogue square and taken from there to the old barracks behind the city in wagons or on foot. The victims were beaten and forced to undress and lie down in the ditches. Local Christians watched as the victims were shot. The German police and their collaborators returned to the ghetto to look for people hiding in bunkers. The cries of infants often gave people away. Sometimes the children were suffocated or poisoned by their desperate parents. Some people committed suicide with their families to avoid falling into the hands of the enemy.¹⁶ The Aktion was carried out by a team of Security Police and SD with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, including the 102nd Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft battalion, based in the town before its transfer to antipartisan operations in Belorussia. About 5,000 Jews from the ghetto and half the Jews in Belaia Krinita were killed.¹⁷

On August 14, 1942, 1,500 more Jews were shot, making a total of 6,402 people.¹⁸ A German report dated August 15 states that Jews from the small nearby ghetto in Berezhce were brought in trucks to Krzemieniec and killed along with the local Jews. The victims were 2,322 men, 2,925 women, and 1,155 children.¹⁹ On August 16, 1942, about 400 Jews from Belaia Krinita were killed together with Jews captured in the ghetto and transported to the killing site in two cars. Some 200 craftsmen were brought from Belaia Krinita to the prison in Krzemieniec. On August 20, 1942, a team of Security Police and SD shot 1,210 more Jews (848 women and children and 362 men). During the night of September 2, 1942, Jews hiding in the ghetto set it on fire to cover their escape. Most of them were captured and shot (several hundred people).²⁰

Another account states that the Germans set the ghetto on fire to kill the Jews remaining in hiding. Firemen were brought in to make sure the fire did not spread outside the ghetto. The people escaping the fire from the bunkers were killed by the firemen, Germans, and Ukrainians.²¹ Additionally, 120 Jewish craftsmen from the prison were shot on September 2. Later the remaining craftsmen were killed.²²

Sixteen-year-old R. Kravets witnessed the slaughter on August 10, 1942, and recorded the following in his diary: "Behind the town there is an old entrenchment, about a kilometer [0.6 mile] in length . . . that is where the execution took place. The removal of the Jews from the ghetto began at approximately 3:00 A.M. and lasted until late in the night." He writes that people were loaded into a truck in layers: the first people on the bottom of the truck, the next set on top of the first, and so on. There was absolute silence; no one talked or screamed or cried. Trucks returned, filled with clothing. The drunken Ukrainian policemen pocketed the victims' watches and hid clothing in secure places in the forest to pick up later for themselves. At the site of the killings, the victims were unloaded from the truck, forced to undress, and led one by one to the entrenchment.

The entrenchment was filled with human bodies, covered with chlorine. People were forced to lie down on the corpses and were shot by two Gestapo men. Some Jews resisted, not wanting to undress or get into the ditch. These people were shot on the spot and thrown into the pit. When it seemed full, a policeman covered it with some earth, and the people were led to the adjacent ditch. The Ukrainian policemen were constantly given alcohol to keep them drunk. "People were completely apathetic—they just wanted it to end, and quickly: this is a result of the famine and beatings."²³

It appears that only a handful of Jews from the ghetto survived.²⁴

SOURCES Several firsthand accounts of events in the ghetto can be found in the yizkor book, which contains material in Hebrew and Yiddish, edited by Abraham Stein, Pinkas Kremenets: Sefer Zikkaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun 'ole Kremenits be-Yisrael, 1954). There is also some material concerning survivors from Krzemieniec in M. Goldenberg et al., eds., Kol yotsai Kremenits be-Yisrael v'batfutsot (Booklet 11) (Tel Aviv: Organization of Kremenets Emigrants, 1974); see www.jewishgen.org/Yizkor/kremenets1/kremenets1.html.

Documents on the annihilation of the Jews of Krzemieniec can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/1393); BA-BL; BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 163/67); GARF (7021-75-3); IPN; and YVA (JM/324 and JM/10598).

Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Another source indicates that the Germans entered the town on July 4; see B. Shvarts, "Ghetto Martyrology and the Destruction of Kremenets," in Stein, Pinkas Kremenets, pp. 416–435, here p. 416.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Übersicht über die besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 28, July 20, 1941. According to another source, 300 to 500 Jews were killed during the pogrom organized by local Ukrainian antisemites; see GARF, 7021-75-6, pp. 13 reverse, 20, and 49.

4. Shvarts, "Ghetto Martyrology," p. 418.

5. Ibid., pp. 419–422.

6. GARF, 7021-75-3, p. 14.

7. Shvarts, "Ghetto Martyrology," p. 420. According to Shvarts, the Aktion took place in August.

8. Ibid., p. 418.

9. Ibid., pp. 423–426.

10. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravocchnik (Kharkov: "Karavella," 2001), pp. 173–174. Kruglov notes that the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report gives the figure of some 13,000 Jews enclosed in the ghetto. However, in light of subsequent reports on the fate of the ghetto's Jews, this number is almost certainly too high.

11. Shvarts, "Ghetto Martyrology," p. 421.

12. Ibid., pp. 423–425.

13. Ibid., p. 428.

14. Ibid., pp. 431–433.

15. Kruglov, Katastrofa, pp. 173–174.

16. Shvarts, "Ghetto Martyrology," p. 434.
17. Evidence of the participation of the Ukrainian police battalion can be found in BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 163/67, vol. 2, pp. 311–324, J.K.K. on February 14, 1969, and M.D.K. on February 19, 1969.
18. Kruglov, Katastrofa, pp. 173–174.
19. IPN, Zbiór Zespołów Szczatkowych Jednostek SS i Policji—Sygnatura 77.
20. Kruglov, Katastrofa, pp. 173–174.
21. Shvarts, "Ghetto Martyrology," p. 435. This account also indicates that the Germans tried to spread rumors that the people hiding in the ghetto had started the fire, but the Ukrainians did not believe this, as they had seen the Nazis setting the ghetto on fire and forbidding anyone to put it out.
22. Kruglov, Katastrofa, pp. 173–174.
23. R. Kravchenko-Berezhnoi, Moi XX vek (Stop-kadry) (Apatity, 1998), pp. 118–119. See also A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), pp. 396–397.
24. Shvarts, "Ghetto Martyrology," p. 435.

KUL'CHINY

Pre-1941: Kul'chiny, village, Krasilov raion, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kultschiny, Rayon Krasilow, Gebiet Antoniny, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Kul'chyny, Krasyliv raion, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Kul'chiny is located 107 kilometers (66.5 miles) south-southeast of Równe. In the 1930s, the village was the center of a Jewish rural sel'sovet. As of 1931, 1,060 Jews lived in Kul'chiny. As a result of the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933 and the movement of Jews to other regions during the early 1930s, the Jewish population decreased by several hundred persons.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, more than 100 Jews (about 20 families) were able to evacuate to the east, and some Jewish men were drafted into the Red Army. About 400 Jews (including some 40 craftsmen) remained in Kul'chiny at the start of the occupation.¹

In early July 1941, troops of the German 6th Army occupied Kul'chiny. In July and August 1941, the occupying German military authorities appointed a village elder (starosta) and recruited an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Kul'chiny became part of Rayon Krasilow in Gebiet Antoniny, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Regierungsassessor Harald Schorer became the Gebietskommissar in Antoniny.

The anti-Jewish Aktions in Gebiet Antoniny, which included Kul'chiny, were organized in 1942 by officials of the Security Police outpost (Aussendienststelle) in Starokonstantinov, headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Graf,² assisted by the chief of the Gendarmerie, Karl Otto Paul.³ The head of the Ukrainian police in Antoniny was named Galitzky.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Kul'chiny. The Jews were ordered to wear distinctive markings, first in the shape of the Star of David, later patches in the shape of a yellow circle, sewn onto their clothes. In addition, they were required to perform arduous manual labor, prohibited from leaving the limits of the village, and subjected to arbitrary robbery and humiliation by the Ukrainian police.

In late 1941 or early 1942, Gebietskommissar Schorer issued an order posted in public places to establish ghettos in Bazaliia, Krasilov, and Kul'chiny. The Jews of the Gebiet were ordered to move to one of these places, where they would be confined to a specific quarter (ghetto).⁴ Shortly afterwards, a ghetto was established in Kul'chiny, consisting of about 25 houses. The Jews were made to erect the barbed-wire fence themselves. The Jewish houses outside the ghetto area remained empty or were pulled down to make room for the fence or for other purposes. Initially there was no permanent guard around the ghetto, but the Jews were afraid to go into the village, as this was prohibited. According to one account, some Jews escaped from the ghetto, and those who were caught were shot by the German security forces. The Jews were also forbidden to converse with the local Ukrainian population.⁵

From time to time, the Germans and local police came to Kul'chiny and escorted groups of Jews to perform forced labor, such as road work in Antoniny or other places. The Jews received no rations but lived on whatever they could get from the local Ukrainian population. The Germans and local police humiliated the ghetto inhabitants in every conceivable way. When they were forced to dismantle their houses and load the materials onto carts for transport to Antoniny, Jews (even young Jewish girls) were forced to take the place of the horses that ordinarily pulled the carts. The precise number of Jews in the ghetto is not known, but it was about 400 or 500, probably including some brought in from nearby villages such as Kuz'min.⁶

Sometime around the end of May 1942, part of the Jewish population from the ghetto was resettled into a labor camp based in a stable in the village of Orlintsy, close to Antoniny, where they worked repairing roads and performing other tasks.⁷

In July 1942, the ghetto in Kul'chiny was liquidated. Members of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police from Gebiet Antoniny surrounded the ghetto and escorted the roughly 60 remaining Jews to the village of Manivtsy. Those unable to walk were loaded onto carts. In Manivtsy, many of the Jews of the Gebiet were collected before being taken out and shot, including those from the Orlintsy camp. Initially the Jews from Kul'chiny were held overnight in a stable in Manivtsy, and on the following day, once the grave was ready, the Jews were transported in trucks to a nearby wood.⁸ As they were being unloaded, a local resident of Manivtsy recognized the Jewish teacher Solomyonnaya from Kul'chiny, who used to teach his son. The woman was pulling her hair out and shouted to a local policeman that she was a teacher; she tried to show him a document, but the policeman knocked her to the ground with a blow to the head from his rifle butt.⁹

A German SD man shot the Jews into a pit roughly 20 meters long by 4 meters wide (65.6 by 13.1 feet). Two Jews who attempted to flee were shot dead as they ran. There were probably several such mass shootings organized here by the Security Police and SD unit based in Starokonstantinov as successive groups of Jews arrived in Manivtsy. The Ukrainian police were responsible for escorting the victims before the shootings and for cordoning off the killing site.¹⁰ About 200 Jewish craftsmen from the Krasilov ghetto, together with some other Jews still held at Manivtsy, were shot on the grounds of the estate in Manivtsy in September 1942.¹¹

After the Jews had been removed from the Kul'chiny ghetto, the Gebietskommissar took over responsibility for the empty houses. Most were dismantled, and the materials were taken to Antoniny to be used by German officials as firewood. The local Ukrainian authorities sold only a few houses for local residents to live in.¹²

There were very few survivors of the Kul'chiny ghetto.

SOURCES Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Kul'chiny is located in the following archives: BA-L (II 204 AR-Z 442/67); DAKhO (R863-2-44); GARF (7021-64-793); VHF (# 30137); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, vol. 1, pp. 315–316, statement of Mikhail I. Moskaliuk, March 21, 1973.

2. Graf died in 1953.

3. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Concluding Report, March 18, 1971, and Instruction (Verfügung), June 18, 1974. Schorer perished in 1943, and Paul died in 1969.

4. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 368–374, statement of Pyotr Tomchuk, December 18, 1972. Tomchuk dates the establishment of the ghetto in the summer of 1942.

5. GARF, 7021-64-793, pp. 95, 98; BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, vol. 1, p. 209, statement of Yakov Y. Kondratiuk, December 19, 1972; and p. 217, statement of Moskaliuk, March 21, 1973.

6. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, vol. 1, p. 217, statement of Domna Moskaliuk.

7. GARF, 7021-64-793, p. 95.

8. Ibid.; BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, vol. 1, pp. 344–349, statement of Denis Paska (resident of Manivtsy), March 14, 1973; vol. 1, pp. 256–261, statement of Pyotr A. Doshchuk, January 19, 1973 (former local policeman in Gebiet Antoniny); vol. 1, pp. 287–299, statement of Vasily S. Lysink, February 1, 1973 (former local policeman from Antoniny).

9. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, vol. 1, p. 214, statement of Nikolay S. Kravchuk, March 15, 1973.

10. Ibid., Concluding Report, March 18, 1971, and Instruction, June 18, 1974; vol. 1, pp. 256–261, statement of Doshchuk.

11. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 344–349, statement of Paska.

12. Ibid., pp. 199–203, statement of Mikhail A. Grinchuk in his own case, March 30, 1947.

KUPEL'

Pre-1941: Kupel', village, Volochisk raion, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kupel, Rayon Wolotschisk, Gebiet Proskurov, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Volochisk raion, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Kupel' is located 120 kilometers (75 miles) south of Równe. According to the 1926 census, there were 1,828 Jews living in the village (43.2 percent of the total population). In the years 1927–1941, the number of Jews in the village was almost halved as a result of emigration and the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933.

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Kupel' on July 5, 1941, two weeks after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22. During that time, a small number of Jews managed to evacuate to the eastern regions of the country, and men were drafted or volunteered for military service in the Red Army. Around 800 to 900 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the village. The Ortskommandant appointed a village elder (starosta) and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. In September 1941, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Kupel' became part of Gebiet Proskurov (Gebietskommissar: Hundertschaftsführer Schmerbeck), which in turn belonged to Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.

At the start of the occupation, it was above all the rabbi of Kupel', 55-year-old Itzhak Meir Glaser, who was tortured and subjected to violations of dignity. He managed to escape and hide. Then the Germans took 51 hostages and declared that they would be executed unless the rabbi showed up. To save these people, Glaser voluntarily came out of hiding. Nevertheless, most of the hostages perished: they had been confined within a very small space, such that they were forced to lie on top of each other; the doors and windows of this tiny room were tightly closed, and as a result almost everyone, except those in the very top layer, suffocated during the night. The corpses were buried in a pit near the monument to Lenin, and sometime later, when the smell of putrefaction became noticeable, they were reburied in the Jewish cemetery. The rabbi was murdered and buried with the hostages.¹

In the summer of 1941 a "Jewish quarter" (an open ghetto) was established in the village. Mikhail Furman and his family, who arrived from the nearby village of Klininy shortly after the arrival of the Germans, lived there in a two-bedroom house together with two other families. He recalled that everyone in the ghetto had to wear a yellow star, and they were forbidden to go outside without wearing it—or they would be killed on the spot. The Jews were also required to perform various kinds of forced labor. Every day the local police would come around and demand any gold or valuable items from the Jews. If they did not surrender their possessions right away, they were shot.

There was not much to eat in the ghetto, and ghetto residents often went hungry. However, there was a market where they could buy or barter items for food. At the market, some Ukrainians still gave them food, even if they had no means to pay for it. The efforts of these Ukrainians saved them, as the Jewish Council (Judenrat) had requisitioned their remaining property to meet German contributions.²

The Kupel' ghetto was liquidated in August 1942 when about 600 Jews were resettled to Volochisk. On September 11, 1942, the Jewish New Year, they were murdered there, along with the other Jews gathered in that town. Some of the Jews managed to escape at the time of the roundup and were not resettled to Volochisk. The Ukrainian police regularly conducted raids in search of the Jews in hiding, and all those who were captured and brought to Kupel' were shot in the Jewish cemetery.³

SOURCES Information about the fate of the Jewish community of Kupel' during the Holocaust can be found in the following sources: "Kupel," in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 690; T. Perlshtein, "Kupel: In Memory of My Shtetl and the Dear Ones Who Died There" (unpub. memoirs, Oakland, 1996); and "Rav Itzhak Meir Glaser & Gitl Perelman," available at www.geocities.com/kuzja14/death_of_jews_of_kupel.doc.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews in Kupel' can be found in the following archives: DAKhO (R863-2-39); GARF (7021-64-795); VHF (# 39625); and YVA (M-52/179).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft and Gina Caruso

NOTES

1. DAKhO, R863-2-39, p. 74; see also the letter of Kupel' native M. Adler to Bertha Glaser (the rabbi's daughter; at that time she was in the Kemerovo oblast', involved in Zionist activity) dated June 4, 1944 originally at www.geocities.com. These events, it seems, took place on the second day of the village's occupation, that is, on July 6, 1941, and at the same time, according to ChGK documents, 100 hostages were taken, of which 89 perished (GARF, 7021-64-795, p. 139). VHF, # 39625, testimony of Mikhail Furman, also mentions 50 or 60 Jews murdered in Kupel' at the start of the occupation.

2. VHF, # 39625.

3. GARF, 7021-64-795, pp. 139 and reverse. In all, it seems 172 Jews were captured and shot.

ŁACHWA

Pre-1939: Łachwa, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Łachwa, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Łachwa, Rayon Luninez, Gebiet Pinsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Łachwa, Bera's'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Łachwa lies on the Smierc River, 80 kilometers (50 miles) east of Pińsk. In the late 1930s, Łachwa had a total population of about 3,800. Approximately 2,300 Jews were living in Łachwa on the eve of World War II. In September 1939, approximately 350 Jews who had managed to escape from Poland found refuge in Łachwa.¹

The first German troops reached Łachwa on July 7–8, 1941. A Judenrat was set up, headed by Dov Lopatin, who had been the chair of the Zionist organization in Łachwa before the war. Jews were compelled to wear an armband bearing the Star of David and were conscripted for forced labor.²

The ghetto in Łachwa was established on April 4, 1942.³ It consisted of 45 one-story houses. About 2,350 people were forced into the ghetto, which, as in Pińsk, amounted to roughly 1 square meter (10.8 square feet) per person.⁴ The ghetto was located on the river and was divided by a road that split it into a larger and a smaller part. Jews from the surrounding villages were also confined there. The ghetto was fenced in and guarded by the police force recruited from local Ukrainian and Belorussian residents. The meager food allowance for Jews in the ghetto (200 grams [7 ounces] of bread per day) drove Jews to seek food outside the ghetto. Leaving the ghetto without permission was punishable by death.

In August and September 1941, news of massacres in the surrounding towns spread in Łachwa. Beginning in January 1942, Jewish youth organized underground groups, with the first group of 5 youths coming together under the leadership of Isaac Roszczyn, the head of the Revisionist Betar youth group. Soon five more groups of 5 formed, bringing the total of underground members to 30. Other members of the resistance included Asher Hafets, Hersz Migdalowicz, Icie Slucki, the brothers Fajnberg, Lejzor Romanowski, and Lopatkin.⁵ The groups established contact with partisans in the area and with the Judenrat to secure funding and weapons, although antisemitism among local partisan groups limited the effectiveness of such contacts. While efforts to secure firearms were largely unsuccessful, members did manage to acquire axes, knives, and iron bars. Some firearms and grenades, which had been purchased, were hidden in the village of Liubka Łachowska. The Judenrat and the youth movement cooperated closely. The Judenrat also had offered money to purchase arms. Some members of the youth movement were also members of the Jewish Police who worked with both the Judenrat and the underground movement.

The liquidation of the Łachwa ghetto, which lay in the administrative area of the Łuniniec Security Police (Sipo) outpost (Aussendienststelle), began on September 2, 1942. SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhelm Rasp and his assistant Petsch led the Aktion; SS men Patik, Balbach, and Dohmen were among the hands-on executioners.⁶ All these men were part of the Sipo outpost in Pińsk. Support was given by the 2nd Company of Police Battalion 306 and by the 2nd Company of Police Battalion 69. Wehrmacht forces stationed in Łuniniec cordoned off the ghetto. The Judenrat was told to assemble all the Jews on the streets.

During the previous month, August 1942, the Jews in the Łachwa ghetto received news of the fate of the Mikaszewicze ghetto.⁷ At the time this information arrived, some local farmers had already excavated large pits in the vicinity of the town on the banks of the Smierc River. The pits were dug at night, and the victims knew full well that a mass grave had been prepared.⁸

Knowledge of the impending liquidation prompted different responses within the Jewish population. In general there was a feeling of helplessness and confusion within the community. Roszczyn and other members of his organization began to prepare for armed resistance. Although Roszczyn wanted to break out of the ghetto the night before, Lopatin asked him for time so that he could learn more about the Germans' intentions. The Judenrat raised the issue of the continued existence of the ghetto with the Germans at two levels, first, with Ebner of the Gebietskommissariat, who informed the Judenrat that the same fate awaited the Łachwa ghetto if its inhabitants attempted to escape. He demanded and received from the Judenrat a list of the names of the ghetto inhabitants. Second, the chairman of the Judenrat, Lopatin, made inquiries with the Wehrmacht and was told that "the Jewish population has an important task ahead of them" and that the pits were purely for military purposes. Lopatin was summoned to Ebner just prior to the ghetto liquidation. Ebner waived all pretense and informed him that the ghetto was to be liquidated and, in an attempt to obtain cooperation, proposed a deal whereby the doctor, the members of the Judenrat, and 30 artisans of Lopatin's choosing would be spared. Lopatin declined the offer and refused to cooperate with the Germans, choosing instead to initiate the uprising that Roszczyn had demanded.

When the liquidation Aktion commenced, trucks were parked on the street dividing the ghetto. The smaller part of the ghetto was to be liquidated first. Immediately after the Sipo forces entered the ghetto, Lopatin set fire to the Judenrat headquarters, which was the signal to begin the uprising. Other buildings in the ghetto were then set alight, and the Jews tried to escape while the ghetto was burning. Thus the Łachwa Judenrat made a conscious decision to forego the illusion of salvation and to share the fate of the Jewish population. The Sipo forces retaliated with machine gun and rifle fire⁹ in an attempt to herd the Jews already assembled onto the trucks. Members of the underground attacked German forces, using axes, stones, and cleavers. Roszczyn killed a Gestapo officer with an ax and jumped into the river but was shot in the head.¹⁰ Lopatin, who had joined the fighters, was injured in the hand but managed to flee to the forest. The Jews had some hand grenades, which they used against the Germans.¹¹ Chajim Chajfec was able to get the gun of a dead Gendarme and returned fire on the Germans. The resistance managed to kill six German and eight Belorussian policemen and injure some others. Approximately 1,000 Jews broke out of the ghetto, but hundreds were killed by German machine-gun fire, and only 600 managed to reach the Pripjet River. Others died in the flames, which enveloped the ghetto, and those who did not escape in the flight from the ghetto were brought to the pits and shot. Kopel Kolpanitzky recalled his flight from the ghetto: "The machine guns on the other side of the river opened fire along the length of Rinkowa Street, wounding fleeing Jews and killing them. . . . I also ran quickly, as the people who ran in front of me were shot and killed, their bodies falling next to me and their blood sprayed on my body." Many of the 600 Jews who escaped into the forests tried to join the partisans, but at least 120 died or were captured before contact could be made.¹² In the first few days after the escape, many were hunted down by the Germans and killed or handed over by local farmers.¹³ Some did succeed in joining the partisans. In the ghetto, the shooting was over by early afternoon. At least 300 were murdered at the pits. Another 1,500 Jews were killed during the uprising. At the end of the war, only 90 of the escapees from the Łachwa ghetto were still alive.

The Łachwa Judenrat acknowledged the reality of the imminent murder of the Jews and rebelled. It is interesting that such rebellions mostly took place in the smaller towns. This can perhaps be explained by the more tightly knit community and less-stringent control by the Germans, which meant that the Jews had more opportunity to resist than in the larger towns. In some other ghettos, better contacts with people outside enabled more of the young Jews to arm themselves.

SOURCES Published sources include the Łachwa yizkor book: H.A. Mikhaeli, Y. Lichtshtein, Y. Moravtsik, and H. Shklar, eds., Rishonim la-mered: Łabwa (Tel Aviv: Entsiklopedyah shel Galuyot, 1957). Also useful are the memoirs of Kopel Kolpanitzky, Nigzar le-hayim: sipuro shel nitsol geto Łabwa (Tel Aviv: Ministry of Defense, 1999), now also available in English as Sentenced to Life: The Story of a Survivor of the Łabwa Ghetto, trans. Harold Jacobson (London: Vallentine Mitchell, 2007). Another relevant publication used for this entry is Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 261–262.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/286, 2441, and 3087); BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59); Sta. Braunschweig; USHMM (RG-50.030*0260); VHF; and YVA (O-3/475, 481, 487-90, and 496).

Stephen Pallavicini and Avinoam Patt

NOTES

1. Kolpanitzky, Nigzar le-hayim, p. 34.
2. Michaeli et al., Rishonim la-mered, pp. 44–45.
3. Izak Lichtenberg, AŽIH, 301/2441; also Leja Romanowska, 301/286. Mikhaeli notes in Rishonim la-mered that the Jews were forced into the ghetto on April 4, 1942 (14 Adar, 5702), the eve of the holiday of Passover; see p. 54.
4. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, vol. 16, p. 4449, and vol. 19, p. 4711.
5. Leja Romanowska, AŽIH, 301/286.
6. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, statement of Otto Scholl, April 4, 1963, 2538.
7. Ibid., statement of Leon Slutzky, 9637. See also Mikhaeli et al., Rishonim la-mered, pp. 58–59.
8. AŽIH, 301/3087.
9. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, statement of Bakalczuk, February 5, 1972, 6792.
10. Kolpanitzky, Nigzar le-hayim, p. 61.

11. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, statement of Scholl, April 4, 1963, 2538.

12. Mojżesz Romanowski says that, in addition, 150 Jews were murdered by the partisans.

13. Kolpanitzky managed to hide in the pig shed of a local farmer before joining a group in the forest; see his Nigzar le-hayim, pp. 65–66. See also USHMM, RG-50.030*0260.

ŁANOWCE

Pre-1939: Łanowce, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Lanovtsy, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Lanowzy, Rayon center, Gebiet Kremenez, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Laniwtsi, raion center, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Łanowce is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) southeast of Krzemieniec. At the end of 1937, the number of Jews in Łanowce stood at 760.¹ In the fall of 1939, several hundred Jewish refugees from western and central Poland arrived in Łanowce, but during 1940 some of these people were deported to the interior of the USSR.

After the German attack on the USSR on June 22, 1941, several Jewish families managed to evacuate to the east. However, most Jews did not want to leave or were unable to flee because of the rapid advance of the German troops. Therefore, the majority of the town's Jews came under German occupation.

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Łanowce on July 3, 1941. In July and August 1941, the town was run by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Łanowce became a Rayon center in Gebiet Kremenez. Regierungsrat Fritz Müller was the Gebietskommissar in Krzemieniec.² The German commandant soon named the Ukrainian Jakov Sutski as the town's headman (sołtys) and organized a local Ukrainian police force. In the fall of 1941, the Ukrainian police was renamed the Schutzmannschaft and subordinated to the post of the German Gendarmerie established in the town, which consisted of several German Gendarmes. The senior German official in Łanowce was a man named Richter, who had a reputation among the Jews as a brutal sadist.³

Soon after the occupation of the town by German troops, a group of Ukrainian antisemites organized a pogrom that left 60 Jews dead, Jewish girls raped, and Jewish homes looted. Local Ukrainians also used this opportunity to settle their own personal scores.⁴ A few days later, 10 respected Jews were arrested and held as hostages in prison, where they were also starved. Persons alleged to have cooperated with the Soviets were also arrested. According to local Ukrainians, the prisoners were later escorted to the nearby village of Białozórka, where they were murdered. One Jewish survivor recalls that during these initial days the Ukrainian headman announced that "Jews were forbidden to have children and that the punishment would be for the man to be castrated and the woman made barren."⁵

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupation authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Łanowce. Jews were required to wear armbands bearing the Star of David (later replaced by a yellow patch sewn onto their chest and back). They had to surrender all gold and valuable items, and they were made to perform forced labor. The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) to transmit their orders to the Jewish population and to ensure their prompt enforcement. The active members of the Judenrat were Yerukham Forman (the son of Ben Avraham Mash'hes) and Abramov, a refugee from Katowice.⁶

On February 28, 1942, the German authorities ordered the Jews to construct a ghetto fence between 2 and 4 meters (6.6 and 13.1 feet) high, made of wooden planks. The work took several days to complete under the supervision of the Ukrainian police. Within two or three days of this initial order, all the Jews of Łanowce were forced into the designated ghetto area, together with the Jews from Białozórka, other nearby villages, and also some Jews from the towns of Krzemieniec and Katrynborg. In total, there were about 2,000 inhabitants of the ghetto. The Jews were permitted to take into the ghetto only what they could carry in their arms. At this time there was much theft and looting by the Germans and Ukrainians, who took valuables and furniture for themselves. The ghetto was in a small area around Targowa and Ogrodowa Streets, incorporating the Bet Midrash but only part of the large synagogue (which had been converted into a granary). Most of the houses vacated by the Jews remained unoccupied. Conditions were very crowded in the ghetto, with five or six families (about 25 people) sharing an apartment, but people tried to find room for the additional occupants as best they could.⁷

Almost from the first day, the Jews in the ghetto suffered from hunger, and a number of people starved to death. Many of those who died were buried in mass graves inside the ghetto area. To ameliorate the hunger, the Jewish Council organized a soup kitchen for the needy, and the ghetto was able to obtain some food by bartering items with local peasants.

Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto only to perform forced labor. The Judenrat had to organize a certain number of laborers each day to work outside the ghetto. The Jewish Police, headed by Raphael Krepman, assisted them, using force if necessary to assemble the contingent demanded by the Germans. Those who performed forced labor were paid in the form of a bread ration, but people also used the outside work details as an opportunity to barter for extra food. On returning to the ghetto, Jews were searched by the Ukrainian police to ensure that they were not smuggling anything. Some policemen, however, were susceptible to bribes. In the spring of 1942, the Germans demanded that 20 youths be sent to Równe for forced labor. On one occasion the Germans demanded that the Judenrat supply a number of pretty Jewish girls. The community raised a large bribe to get this demand revoked, anticipating that the girls would be defiled.⁸ In the depressed atmosphere of the ghetto, religious life also declined, mainly out of fear. After 10 Jews were arrested and shot for saying Kaddish, only a few, mostly older Jews continued to pray publicly, although others continued behind closed doors.⁹

The German police liquidated the ghetto in mid-August 1942. First the ghetto was sealed off and surrounded by German and Ukrainian police. No Jews were permitted to leave for work for about four days before the Aktion. At this time people in the ghetto heard rumors that large pits were being prepared and became increasingly fearful, but few managed to escape. Then on August 14, the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, including members of the Schutzmannschafts-Bataillon 102 based in Krzemieniec,¹⁰ assisted by dogs, rounded up the Jews and escorted them to the two mass graves in the new Jewish cemetery. Here the Jews were forced to undress. The men were shot first into one mass grave and then the women and children into the other. The whole Aktion was organized by a detachment of the Security Police and SD from Równe.¹¹

According to a Security Police report, 1,833 Jews (589 men, 783 women, and 461 children) were shot in Łanowce.¹² A small group of Jews hid and managed to escape the shooting. The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police later captured most of them and shot them at the new Jewish cemetery.

The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report estimated the overall Jewish losses somewhat higher. It stated that the occupiers and their accomplices murdered in total 2,535 people (2,143 of them being Jews) in Rayon Lanowzy during the occupation. According to this estimate, Jews comprised 84.5 percent of all the victims.¹³ Among the few Jews who survived was Moshe Rosenberg, who evaded the searches of the Ukrainian militia with the aid of local “Stundists” (Baptists) who were favorably disposed towards the Jews.¹⁴ The Red Army recaptured the town from the Germans in early 1944.

SOURCES The yizkor book edited by Haim Rabin, Lanovits: Sefer zikaron le-kedoshai lanovits she-nispu be-sboat ha natsim, 1941–1942 (Israel: Association of Former Residents of Lanowce, 1970), includes several personal accounts by survivors of the ghetto and others who fled to the east. A short article on the Jewish community in Łanowce can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 102–103.

Documents on the ghetto and the extermination of the Jews in Łanowce can be found in the following archives: DATO; GARF (7021-75-211); IPN; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), p. 362.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432. Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. Meir Beker, “Kh’ bin antlofn fun geto Lanovits (a kind derzeylt),” in Rabin, Lanovits, pp. 329–338, here p. 329; Moshe Rosenberg, “Lanovitser in umkum,” in Rabin, Lanovits, pp.

313–328, here p. 316. It is not clear whether Richter was an official of the civil administration or the senior Gendarme in the town. He was not traced by postwar German investigations into crimes in the Krzemieniec district.

4. Rosenberg, “Lanovitser in umkum,” p. 314.

5. Ibid., pp. 315–316; Beker, “Kh’ bin antlofn fun geto Lanovits,” p. 329.

6. Beker, “Kh’ bin antlofn fun geto Lanovits,” p. 331.

7. Ibid., pp. 329–330; Rosenberg, “Lanovitser in umkum,” pp. 316–317. In 1921, there were 869 Jews living in Białozórka. Krzemieniec and Katrynborg both had their own ghettos (see the respective entries in this volume), so these were probably relatives returning to join their families.

8. Beker, “Kh’ bin antlofn fun geto Lanovits,” pp. 330–331.

9. Ibid., pp. 332–333.

10. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 163/67, vol. 2, p. 469.

11. Ibid., pp. 334–335; Rosenberg, “Lanovitser in umkum,” pp. 324–326.

12. IPN, GKŚZpNP Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 3, transcription of a Security Police report from Untersturmführer Selm, of the Rowno SD, August 15, 1942, concerning the “special treatment of the Jews.” According to the materials of the ChGK (GARF, 7021-75-211, p. 7), the shooting of the Jews in Łanowce took place on August 2, 1942; 2,143 people were shot.

13. GARF, 7021-75-211.

14. Rosenberg, “Lanovitser in umkum,” pp. 327–328. On the help given by Baptists to save a Jewish child, see Shalom Segal, “How My Daughter Was Saved,” in Rabin, Lanovits, pp. 95–97.

LETICHEV

Pre-1941: Letichev, town, Proskurov oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Letischew, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Letychiv, Khmel’nyts’kyi oblast’, Ukraine

Letichev is located 53 kilometers (33 miles) to the east of Proskurov. In 1939, the Jewish population of Letichev was 1,946 (36.4 percent of the total).

The German army reached the Letichev area during the first week of July 1941. The XLIX Mountain Corps, the 4th Mountain Division, and the 97th Light Division were involved in the capture of the town. From July 8 to July 17, major battles took place. Letichev itself was a Soviet defensive strongpoint along the main route between the cities of Proskurov and Vinnytsa, and it held out until July 17.¹ Celia Michelson reported that during the first few days of the occupation, the Germans rounded up Jewish children in a church. They forced these children, her brother Mutty Burshteyn included, to carry hot asphalt with their bare hands.² Shortly after capturing Letichev, Pinkhas Michels and Froim Burshteyn reported that the Germans summoned the Letichev rabbi and about 25 young and prominent Jews. These people were shot in a mass grave in Zavolk on the outskirts of Letichev.³

On September 20, 1942,⁴ the Germans and their collaborators shot about 3,000 people in a mass grave in Zaletichevka, on the outskirts of Letichev. In November 1942, approximately 4,000 people were shot at the same site, effectively eliminating the Letichev ghetto. In November 1943, the slave labor camp at the church was liquidated, and 200 people were shot within the camp. Including non-Jews, approximately 7,200 people were massacred in the Letichev raion.⁵

The Nazi official responsible for the massacre is reported to be Leutnant Gasha. The local Gendarme was named Peterman. A Ukrainian policeman named Sobchik was reported to have commanded some of the killings.⁶

The Gebietskommissar for Gebiet Letischew, according to documentation, was Regierungsrat Hammer.⁷ According to Vladimir Goykher, who worked for German administrators making official stamps, the Gebietskommissar was named Frieber.⁸ Another German, by the name of Koch (apparently Reichskommissar Erich Koch's brother), was a high-ranking administrator involved with agriculture.⁹ A Ukrainian policeman by the name of Ivan Kupriyan was active in Letichev and was particularly cruel.¹⁰

The castle and Catholic church complex was established early in the German occupation as a prison camp, probably occupied at first by Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). This fortresslike complex had thick masonry walls with two rows of barbed wire on top and was well suited for the purpose.¹¹ The church had a well.

On September 22, 1941, Germans rounded up Jews in the community and established a ghetto in the central part of town. This was the main Jewish ghetto. It was surrounded by barbed wire and had a main gate. During the first week in the ghetto, the Germans and their allied Hungarian troops did not guard the ghetto. On the first Sunday in the ghetto, Frieber made an address to all the Jews. Afterwards, Jews were required to wear a yellow circle with a Star of David. The gate to the ghetto was guarded.¹²

At that time, the population of the ghetto had swelled to about 7,500, owing to the clearing out of nearby towns and villages. The population of the ghetto was mostly local Jews. These prisoners suffered greatly because of disease, starvation, and violent acts by the guards. Ukrainian peasants were given passes to enter the ghetto to obtain goods and services from Jewish craftsmen, for which they paid in currency and food. Later, the German administration ordered that Jews should train Ukrainians in various trades in preparation for their replacement.¹³

The prison camp was a separate facility, located only a few hundred meters from the ghetto. Jews from Bessarabia, Bukovina, and more distant parts of Podolia were interned there in a population that ranged from 200 to 1,500 prisoners. It was guarded by Lithuanian policemen. Most of the prisoners worked at hard labor on a road-building project, starting in the spring of 1942. At first, the prisoners worked side by side with ghetto work crews; later, they had more difficult labor and were kept separated. The prison camp was emptied every day. Those too sick to leave were shot. Jews were brought in from the south periodically as replacements. The prisoners were fed 200 to 300 grams (7 to 10.6 ounces) of bread a day and some soup. Conditions in the prison camp were appalling. Lithuanian guards killed people at the slightest provocation. Burials were conducted next to the kitchen.¹⁴

The winter of 1941–1942 was a particularly difficult time in the ghetto. Disease was rampant. Inmates stripped houses of their wood to burn as fuel. In the spring of 1942, work commenced on the road-building project, and many people from the ghetto were also requisitioned. Unlike their counterparts in the prison camp, the ghetto Jews were paid for their work.¹⁵

The elder of the ghetto was named Mendel. By all accounts he was an honorable person who did his best for the Jews.¹⁶ The elder of the prison camp was Nachman. He was a young man in his thirties, supposedly a lawyer from Vinnitsa, who apparently took advantage of the women prisoners. His assistant was Moshe, a strict disciplinarian.¹⁷

Starting in April 1942, the ghetto and prison camp in Letichev were controlled by the Organisation Todt (OT) for the purpose of constructing the main highway between Proskurov and Vinnitsa (the location of Hitler's Werewolf bunker). The administration of the road-building project was called Durchgangsstrasse (highway) IV. The Bauabschnittsleiter (section leader) who supervised work crews in Letichev was named Otto Fach.¹⁸ According to Goykher, the OT officers in Letichev included Franz, Hainy Keller, Feltzman, Herman Meyer, Immy Ertle, and Karl.

Ghetto workers received 117 to 124 grams (4.1 to 4.4 ounces) of bread a day, and their families received 64 grams (2.3 ounces). They were paid 225 to 564 rubles a month or 30 rubles per day for day labor. Work consisted of quarrying stone, shoveling sand, and pouring asphalt. In the winter, crews were assigned to clearing snow to keep the roadway open for military traffic.¹⁹

The local OT unit mobilized out of the Letichev area around October–November 1942 and relocated to the main battlefield near Donetsk.

In August 1942, the Nazis quarantined the ghetto and the prison camp for several days. Local policemen disappeared, and German gate sentries doubled. A motorcade arrived with high-ranking Nazis to inspect both the ghetto and the prison camp. Jews were required to remain inside their quarters. Moshe Rekhtman remembered the visit but did not know who the Nazis were. Goykher climbed up into the attic of his house to watch; this gave him an excellent view. He later asked Mendel, the ghetto elder, who the dignitaries were. Goykher reports that Mendel told him one was Reichskommissar Erich Koch.

By late summer 1942, the ghetto was split into two. Skilled laborers were assigned to Ghetto 2, the rest to Ghetto 1. In September, Ghetto 1 was liquidated over a two-day period. The Jews were marched out of the ghetto in large groups towards a mass grave in Zaletichevka, on the edge of town. Over the next two days, Germans and their collaborators tore apart Ghetto 1, looking for goods and for hidden Jews. Afterwards, Frieber assembled all the Jews in Ghetto 2 and demanded that everyone who should have been assigned to Ghetto 1 step forward. About 40 did so, and they were marched off to be shot. Ghetto 2 was commanded by an official named Koch to train Ukrainians in different skills and crafts.²⁰ Two months later, this ghetto, too, was liquidated.

The Germans apparently used gas vans to kill a small number of prisoners from the prison camp around September 1942. They loaded the vans with the sick or weak inmates and drove around to gas them. They would then dump the bodies in the forest. This occurred on at least three different occasions.²¹

Unusual for this region, the prison camp survived for almost a year after most of the Jews in Letichev were killed.²² Perhaps this was because of the strategic nature of the road, which required constant maintenance. There are no known survivors from the period after January 1943.²³

There was no known resistance in the area. The survivors escaped during work details or through the relatively light security surrounding the ghetto. Most sought sanctuary in nearby Romanian-controlled Transnistria. The relatively long life of the prison camp and ghetto enabled a number of people to survive the occupation.

Survivors include Vladimir Goykher, who served as an orderly for OT officers and was mobilized from Letichev with them to the front. He escaped across the front line. Moshe Rekhtman escaped from a prison work detail and fled to Transnistria. Boris Levin was interned in the prison camp after the ghettos were liquidated. In January 1943, he escaped from a group execution of prisoners and fled to Transnistria. Moishe Einhorn and Rose Huberman spent some time in the Letichev prison camp but escaped together from the Proskurov ghetto to Transnistria. Abraham Shmeis, a prisoner in the camp, escaped in the fall of 1942 to Transnistria. Another prisoner in the camp, Manya Laster, also escaped to Transnistria.

There were three large-scale war crimes trials conducted by the West German government relating to OT activities on the Durchgangstrasse IV, which included the Letichev road construction project. The first took place in Lübeck in 1965. Those indicted included SS officers Franz Christoffel and Oskar Friese.²⁴ Otto Fach was tried in Bremen in 1970.²⁵ The third trial took place in Dortmund in 1971. It centered on the execution of the Jews in 1942, including those in Letichev. The defendants are not specified in the published record.²⁶ In all three trials, the defendants were found not guilty due to “lack of evidence,” partly because eyewitness evidence could not be obtained from people who lived in the Soviet Union.²⁷

SOURCES In the book by David Chapin and Ben Weinstock, The Road from Letichev: The History and Culture of a Forgotten Jewish Community in Eastern Europe, vol. 2 (Lincoln, NE: iUniverse, 2000), chapter 16 on the Holocaust includes English translations of the archival testimonies from Jewish survivors cited in this article. Vladimir Goykher also published his own memoir, Tragedy of the Letichev Ghetto (New York, 1992).

Relevant documentation, mainly from the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) reports and other postwar investigations, can be found in the following archives: BA-L;

DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-92); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 2; and Acc.1997.A.0305); and YVA (e.g., O-3/7064 and 1266).

David Chapin and Ben Weinstock

NOTES

1. Newspaper Za Chest' Rodiny, no. 27, March 30, 1944.
2. YVA, O-3/7064, Manya Laster testimony.
3. Ibid. Also from a letter by Pinkhas Michelson, Bnei-Brak, Israel, dated May 29, 1994. Leonid Rapoport also confirms this account. Among those executed were Velvel Michelson and a relative of Leonid Rapoport.
4. Goykher, Tragedy.
5. USHMM, RG-22.002M (GARF), reel 2, 7021-64-92, p. 2. Also see DAKhO, Fond 363, case 50, p. 7; case 38, pp. 115–118; case 39, p. 76: “About concentration camps and places of mass killing of Soviet people by the Fascists in the Territory of Khmel'nitsky Oblast at the time of the Fascist occupation.”
6. Lev Goldenberg testimony, 1995, PADC. Goldenberg claimed that Sobchik was never caught.
7. “Vorläufige Übersicht über die Generalbezirke und Kreisgebiete in der Ukraine,” Reichskommissar, February 15, 1942, Rowno.
8. Goykher, Tragedy. See also USHMM, Acc.1997.A.0305, Moshe Rekhtman testimony, 1995.
9. Goykher, Tragedy.
10. Ibid., confirmed by Rekhtman. Kupriyan was rumored to have survived the war and fled to Australia.
11. Rekhtman testimony.
12. Goykher, Tragedy.
13. Ibid.
14. Testimonies of Rekhtman and Moishe Einhorn—see 1981 edition of the Yiddish-language periodical Sovietish Heimland. See also YVA, O-3/1266, Abraham Shmeis testimony.
15. Goykher, Tragedy.
16. Ibid.
17. YVA, O-3/7064.
18. BA-L, ZStL, 213 AR-Z 20/63, see pp. 2854, 2953, and 3351–3352. Another German witness alleged that Fach conducted a selection at the Jewish forced labor camp in Letichev in the fall of 1942.
19. “Handbook of the Organisation Todt,” a recently declassified U.S. military intelligence report available at the U.S. Army Military History Institute; Goykher, Tragedy, confirmed by many others.
20. Goykher, Tragedy.
21. Rekhtman testimony.
22. DAKhO, Fond 363, case 50, p. 7; case 38, pp. 115–118; case 39, p. 76, indicate that the prison camp was liquidated in late 1943.
23. The last known survivor was Boris Levin.
24. Sta. Lübeck, 2 AR 711/65 (BA-L, ZStL, 213 AR-Z 20/63).
25. Sta. Bremen, 29 Js 120/70 (BA-L, ZStL, 213 AR-Z 886/70).
26. Sta. Dortmund, 45 Js 10/71 (BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 440/67).
27. Karl Sauer, “Am Jom Kippur wüteten Erschiessungskommandos,” Die Tat, December 7, 1974. See also Herman Kaienburg, “Jüdische Arbeitslager an der ‘Strasse der SS,’” in Zeitschrift für Sozialgeschichte des 20. und 21. Jahrhunderts 11, Jahrgang, Januar 1996, Heft 1 (Hamburg, 1999), pp. 13–39.

LIAKHOVTSI

Pre-1941: Liakhovtsi, village and raion center, Khmel'nytskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Lachowzy, Rayon center, Gebiet Isjasslaw, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Bilobir'ia, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Liakhovtsi is located 51 kilometers (31.7 miles) east-southeast of Krzemieniec. According to the 1939 census, 908 Jews were living in the village of Liakhovtsi (51.5 percent of the total population). An additional 331 Jews lived in what were then the villages of the Liakhovtsi raion.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the village on July 3, 1941. In the intervening two weeks from the start of the German invasion, a small number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Some Jewish men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 700 Jews remained in Liakhovtsi under the German occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of the village. The German commandant chose a village elder and organized an auxiliary police force. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The village became a Rayon center in Gebiet Isjasslaw. SA-Oberführer Knochenhauer was the Gebietskommissar.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in the village. A Judenrat was formed. Jews had to wear distinguishing markings: initially armbands bearing the Star of David, and then later a yellow circle. Jews were not permitted to leave the borders of the village.

In September 1941, the German authorities established a ghetto in Liakhovtsi. Hundreds of Jews were also resettled there from the nearby small towns of Iampol' and Kornitsa. (In 1939 the Jewish population of Iampol' was 1,058; in 1923 the Jewish population of Kornitsa was 322.) Two streets, which included about 50 mostly older houses with mud floors, were assigned for this purpose. The ghetto area was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by Ukrainian police with dogs. The Germans were rarely visible to the inhabitants of the ghetto, who were escorted by the local police to the fields of a nearby kolkhoz to harvest potatoes and sugar beets.²

During the winter of 1941–1942, there was great cold and hunger in the ghetto. Some Jews were able to smuggle food into the ghetto illegally when they returned from work outside, which helped their families to survive. In addition, a few Jews who had non-Jewish friends outside the ghetto had left some of their possessions with them when the ghetto was formed. Some of these non-Jews in turn brought food to the ghetto and threw it over the fence.³

At the end of 1941 and the start of 1942, the first shootings were carried out in the village. More than 160 persons were killed.⁴

On July 27, 1942, German security forces liquidated the ghetto in Liakhovtsi.⁵ About 2,300 people were shot in the meadow near the village of Trostianka.⁶ The mass shooting was probably carried out by a detachment of the Security Police and SD from an outpost (Aussendienststelle) in Starokonstantinov, with the aid of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police.

There were very few survivors from the ghetto. Ida Kritman managed to escape one week before the ghetto liquidation, with the aid of a school friend who bribed a local policeman by giving him a new bicycle. Kritman remained in hiding in sheds, attics, haystacks, and pits until the Red Army and the partisans drove out the Germans and their collaborators in early March 1944.⁷

SOURCES Publications concerning the ghetto in Liakhovtsi include Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 147–148.

Documents relating to the persecution and murder of the Jews of Liakhovtsi can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-801); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. Testimony of Ida Kritman, in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 147–148.
3. Ibid.
4. GARF, 7021-64-801, p. 356.
5. Testimony of Ida Kritman. According to another source, the shooting took place in June 1942; GARF 7021-64-801, p. 373.
6. GARF, 7021-64-801, pp. 354, 373. It is possible that this figure for the number of victims is too high.
7. Testimony of Ida Kritman.

ŁOKACZE

Pre-1939: Łokacze (Yiddish: Lokatsb), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Lokachi, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Lokatschi, Rayon center, Gebiet Gorochow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Lokachi, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Łokacze is located 60 kilometers (37 miles) to the west of Łuck. According to the 1921 census, the Jewish population of Łokacze was 1,265. The total population of the town in 1937 was 1,790 inhabitants.

Units of the German army entered the town on June 23, 1941. Shortly after their arrival, the German military authorities appointed a Judenrat, headed by Moshe Pechornik and a man named Shainer. Expropriation, forced labor, abuse, and killing soon followed.

By August 1941, a permanent Gebietskommissar, Härter, had been appointed for Gebiet Gorochow to replace the temporary military authorities. Łokacze became a Rayon center within Gebiet Gorochow. The commander of the Gendarmerie in Horochów was Krause, who was represented by a Wachtmeister in charge of the Gendarmerie post in Łokacze.¹

At the beginning of November 1941, the Jews of Łokacze were forced to move into a ghetto, concentrated around one of the synagogues. As a result, about half of the Jewish houses were confiscated. The ghetto itself initially remained open. Jews from other small towns and villages nearby (including Świniuchy, Kopytów, Błudów, and Markowicze) also were forced into the ghetto. These Jews had to leave almost all their property behind, apart from bedding and a few potatoes, as almost no wagons were made available for the move. In addition to the 1,400 Jews already residing in Łokacze, another 800 were brought in from outside. This resulted in terrible overcrowding: some people moved into rooms without windows or had to live in stables.²

Shortly after the establishment of the ghetto, all the Jews were registered, including about 200 craftsmen who received a special status. On this basis, the Judenrat issued ration cards for an allowance of 140 grams (5 ounces) of bread per day. All Jews aged between 18 and 55 were placed on a schedule for forced labor. About 150 men were requested daily, mainly working as personal servants for those in power in the town. After a time, forced labor was divided into more arduous tasks out of town, such as loading grain sacks and transportation work, while those remaining in Łokacze conducted street sweeping, road repairs, and tree cutting. Favoritism shown by the Judenrat in the allocation of work caused great bitterness.³

A special area adjoining the ghetto was established for the Jewish craftsmen. The craftsmen also received larger rations—250 grams (8.8 ounces) of bread—and were able to demand “gifts,” mostly in the form of produce from local peasants, in return for their work. This in turn provided a vital source of extra supplies that could be traded within the ghetto. In the winter, firewood was in short supply as this was difficult to smuggle into the ghetto. As the Germans also carefully restricted access to mills in the area, some Jews built improvised hand mills to grind flour or prepare vegetable oil inside the ghetto.⁴

On December 20, 1941, posters were put up demanding that Jews surrender all furs, sweaters, stockings, and gloves. These items were then collected by the Judenrat and handed over to the Gendarmerie. Owing to the lack of medicine, the death toll from scabies and other diseases in the ghetto began to rise.

On January 5, 1942, the town authorities informed the Judenrat that it would have to supply laborers to build a fence around the ghetto. Shortly after this, the ghetto enjoyed a brief respite, as the local Gendarmerie chief went home on leave for 15 days, and his replacement was much more lenient. The stand-in permitted some Jews to go to the villages to obtain supplies, and he even reprimanded the Ukrainian police for beating Jews. Even the construction of the fence was briefly halted during this period.

In January, the Jewish Council in Łokacze received instructions from the Gebietskommissar to collect a poll tax of 20 rubles from all ghetto inhabitants. Michael Diment recorded in his contemporary diary: “[T]he Judenrat and the [Jewish] militia with an additional 15 Jewish musclemen called on those who had not contributed. . . . They broke into homes, shouting: ‘Give us the money!’ . . . All valuables found were confiscated; they also took food and flour. . . . Everyone was very angry at the way the Judenrat handled the situation. They were very bitter, but the money had to be turned over.”⁵

By February the construction of the ghetto fence was completed. It was 2 meters (6.6 feet) high and wrapped in barbed wire. The enclosure of the ghetto made trade with the local peasants much more difficult, and the punishment for leaving the ghetto without permission also became more severe. Whereas initially the Judenrat had been able to ameliorate punishments by bribing the local police chief, now the Ukrainian police began to shoot on sight Jews caught outside the ghetto or even while they were working. For example, a Jew named Matis was shot for leaving the ghetto on March 16, which instantly caused black market prices in the ghetto to rise by 50 percent.⁶

On April 16, 1942, the Gendarmerie requested 30 Jews from the Judenrat to bury a group of 114 Gypsies that they had shot. News of this terrible massacre had a terrifying effect on the ghetto.⁷ On April 22, the Judenrat received a demand from the Gebietskommissar to produce 523 people for work by April 25. With bribes, the Judenrat managed to bargain down the number required so that on the appointed day only 200 had to leave. However, again the Judenrat was criticized, as favoritism clearly influenced the selection of those affected. The work conditions in the labor camp at Wynice were very harsh, as the workers received only the food that was sent to them from the ghetto.⁸

The town authorities also required 250 Jewish workers every day for road repair, street sweeping, and peat digging. Jews were frequently beaten and humiliated by the local Ukrainian police while performing these duties. The German authorities also ordered the dismantling of Jewish homes outside the ghetto to make use of the wood.⁹

Inside the ghetto, the Jews at least felt safe from their Ukrainian tormentors, who were not permitted to enter the ghetto. At the beginning of July, the Jewish militia scoured the ghetto searching for grain and even destroyed any hidden flour mills they found. The Judenrat had received a demand to produce 7 tons of grain and with the aid of bribes ultimately got away with surrendering only 1.6 tons. After this, flour was in very short supply. On July 10, a group of Jewish workers was sent to the Jewish cemetery to break up the tombstones and level the graves. The stone was used for paving roads.¹⁰

In mid-July 1942, the Germans conducted another detailed registration exercise that resulted in several additional groups of Jews being sent away from the ghetto to work. Most of the remaining craftsmen were transferred to Horochów, leaving only 36 in the craftsmen section, and of the 750 laborers registered, some 200 were sent in four detachments to various work sites away from Łokacze. Mothers feared they would never see their children again. Another 250 Jews were assigned to peat-digging gangs, leaving the ghetto each day and returning in the evening.¹¹

On one occasion, a Ukrainian farmer told the peat workers from Łokacze that Jews in other communities were being systematically murdered. The news was greeted in the ghetto with some disbelief but also concern. People argued: “the Germans need our labor, and we must continue to prove our value to them.” In response, the Judenrat requested that the spreading of such demoralizing rumors should cease. The debate about these disturbing reports continued, as news came in by late August of the massacre of entire communities in neighboring towns, such as Łuck, Kowel, and Torczyn.¹²

The end came on September 9, 1942, two days before the start of the Jewish High Holidays. The German Gendarmerie and the local police first isolated the ghetto. Many Jews went into hiding or tried to flee, and some even burned their last possessions to prevent their falling into the hands of the murderers. The ghetto was emptied, and its inhabitants were driven into an open field, where they were shot and thrown into a large pit that had been prepared in advance. The Ukrainian police continued to hunt down those Jews hiding in the ghetto and in the surrounding forests for weeks after the Aktion. In total, probably about 1,500 Jews from the Łokacze ghetto were murdered, as several hundred had been transferred to other work camps or the Horochów ghetto before the Aktion.¹³

SOURCES There is a very detailed account of events in the Łokacze ghetto in English, The Lone Survivor: A Diary of the Łokacze Ghetto and Svyntukhy, Ukraine (New York: Holocaust Library, 1992), based on the contemporary diary of the author, Michael Diment, which he was able to preserve. Some additional information on the town and the fate of its population can be found in the yizkor book in Hebrew and Yiddish edited by Eliezer Verba and Shimon Matlofsky, Sefer Yizkor li-kehillat Lokats' (Polin)/Gedenk bukh far di shtetl Lokats' (Jerusalem: Le-ha'sig etzel Sh. Matlovski, 1993).

Documents relating to the persecution and destruction of the Jews in the area around Łokacze can be found in the following archives: DAVO; GARF (7021-55-2); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 14); VHF; and YVA.

Martin Dean and Samuel Fishman

NOTES

1. ChGK report for Gorokhov, GARF, 7021-55-2, p. 20a.
2. Diment, The Lone Survivor, pp. 38–45; see also Black-book of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), pp. 212–228.
3. Diment, The Lone Survivor, pp. 45–50.
4. Ibid., pp. 54–57.
5. Ibid., pp. 64–65.
6. Ibid., pp. 62–72.
7. Ibid., pp. 76–78.
8. Ibid., pp. 78–84; on the selection of forced laborers to work in the peat bogs, see also Verba and Matlofsky, Sefer Yizkor li-kehillat Lokats', pp. 43–45.
9. Diment, The Lone Survivor, pp. 94–95.

10. Ibid., pp. 96–99.

11. Ibid., pp. 100–105.

12. Verba and Matlofsky, Sefer Yizkor li-kehillat Lokats', p. 48.

13. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001) gives the figure of 1,350 victims and dates the Aktion on September 13, 1942. Verba and Matlofsky, Sefer Yizkor li-kehillat Lokats', p. 21, give the figure of 3,000 Jewish victims, but this is almost certainly too high. A memorial erected in Baltimore in 1983 also dates the liquidation of the ghetto on September 9.

LUBIESZÓW

Pre-1939: Lubieszów, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Liubeshov, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ljubeschow, Rayon center, Gebiet Kamen Kaschirsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Liubeshiv, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Lubieszów is located 25 kilometers (16 miles) east-northeast of Kamień Koszyrski on the Stokhod River. By 1936, the Jewish population of Lubieszów stood at about 1,500. This number probably increased by a few hundred during the Soviet occupation from September 1939 until the end of June 1941, as a number of refugees arrived from the west.¹

At the beginning of July 1941, the first German forces entered the settlement, though a permanent German military presence probably was not established until the end of July 1941. Shortly after the start of the occupation, local antisemitic Ukrainian nationalists seized power and carried out a pogrom. Many Jews were robbed, and a number were killed. Local Jews also organized a self-defense force.²

At the end of July 1941, a squadron of the 2nd SS-Cavalry Regiment arrived in the town. On the next day they arrested 43 male Jews, including Rabbi Yitzhak Aron Weingarten, and locked them in a cellar, accusing them of having collaborated with the Communists. One of the arrestees, Gershon Shniadower, succeeded in escaping and killed a Ukrainian guard in the process. Shortly afterwards the cavalry forces took the remaining 42 Jews outside the town and shot them.³

In September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Lubieszów became part of Gebiet Kamen Kaschirsk, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Kameradschaftsführer Fritz Michaelis was the Gebietskommissar in Kamień Koszyrski.⁴ A Ukrainian local administration was formed in Lubieszów. A Ukrainian police unit headed by a man named Wieromiejczyk served under the command of the German Gendarmerie post, which consisted of several German Gendarmes, and was based in the former monastery building.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a number of discriminatory measures against the Jews: they forced them to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David (subsequently replaced by yellow patches on their clothes); Jews were forbidden to leave the town limits; and they were subjected to beatings by the Ukrainian police. In the fall of 1941, the Gebietskommissar ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Lubieszów, which had to transmit and take responsibility for the implementation of all the orders and regulations issued by the German authorities with regard to the Jewish population. From the start of the occupation, Jews were made to perform forced labor. Among the tasks performed were washing and cleaning and also loading wood at the railway station. Ukrainians and Germans watched over the Jews while they worked.⁵ Between July 1941 and February 1942, the Jewish community was subjected to a series of demands for monetary contributions amounting to some 30,000 rubles.⁶

In April or May 1942,⁷ the Gebietskommissar ordered the creation of a ghetto into which all the Jews of the town and also the surrounding villages of Rayon Ljubeschow were relocated. For example, the Jews from Pniewno were brought into the Lubieszów ghetto at this time. Around 2,000 Jews were confined within the ghetto.⁸ The exact size of the fenced area was 450 meters (1,476 feet) long and 300 meters (984 feet) wide. Jews lived 20 per room within the ghetto.⁹

On August 10, 1942, the Germans conducted an Aktion in which most of the Jews from the ghetto were shot.¹⁰ Apparently it was the Sipo/SD detachment from Brześć that carried out the Aktion, assisted by the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie. About 1,700 Jews were shot. Some 280 were murdered inside the ghetto itself; about 500 or 600 people were shot near the village of Wólka-Lubieszowska. The Germans took 1,100 people into the synagogue and made them undress there. Of these Jews, about 230 people were able to escape, but 870 of them were shot.¹¹ After this Aktion, about 70 craftsmen remained alive, and they were soon joined by most of the 230 escaped Jews, whom the Ukrainian police had rounded up. These people were moved back into the ghetto at the end of the Aktion.¹² Among the tasks these surviving Jews performed were collecting and burying the bodies of many of the Jews who had been shot and searching them at the same time for any valuables, which were also surrendered to the Germans.

The ghetto was liquidated at the beginning of November 1942. On the eve of the liquidation, the German and Ukrainian police tightened the guard around the ghetto and repaired any holes found in the barbed-wire fence.¹³ During this last Aktion, one of the Jews, Machmender, threw himself at Michaelis, the Gebietskommissar, and managed to wound him in the throat with a knife.¹⁴ Of the roughly 300 Jews in the ghetto before the final liquidation, only about 10 survived.¹⁵ Among the few survivors was Sara Szulman, who hid with her family in a concealed bunker within the ghetto and escaped during the night three days after the Aktion.¹⁶

In the postwar period, at the site where the Jews were shot in August 1942, the bodies were exhumed, and the remains of the victims were reburied in a new cemetery.

SOURCES Information about the Jewish community of Lubieszów and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: A.A. Stein et al., eds., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski ve-ha-seviva (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Kamin Koshirsky and Surroundings in Israel, 1965); and Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 108–109.

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Lubieszów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/549); BA-L (B 162/6338); DAVO; GARF (7021-55-11); USHMM; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/2283).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŻIH, 301/549, estimates that about 2,000 Jews lived in Lubieszów just prior to the German invasion in 1941.

2. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem and the Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), p. 66; BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 200; AŻIH, 301/549.

3. AŻIH, 301/549, testimony of Gershon Shniadower, July 20, 1945. Shniadower is probably the most reliable witness, as he was among those arrested but managed to escape. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 200; also Stein et al., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski, pp. 329–330. This last source indicates that there were 70 victims of the Aktion, dating it incorrectly at the time of Purim. All three sources mention the death of the rabbi.

4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

5. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 200.

6. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 96.

7. Ibid., p. 366, gives the date of May 1942. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 199, dates the establishment of the ghetto as around Easter. According to another source (GARF, 7021-5-11, p. 111), the ghetto was established in February 1942.

8. Stein et al., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski, pp. 179–184, 741. The ChGK materials indicate that there were 2,500 people in the ghetto (GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 11). However, this number appears to be too high.

9. YVA, O-5/2-4 (JM/267), testimony of David Epstein; see also Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, pp. 122, 129.

10. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 199. GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 111, dates the Aktion on August 15, 1942.

11. GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 113. DAVO, R66-1-4, p. 118, gives the figure of 1,760 Jewish victims. Other sources give different figures.

12. GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 111.

13. BA-L, B 162/6338, pp. 201–202.

14. GARF, 7021-55-11, pp. 112, 350.

15. Stein et al., Sefer ha-zikaron le-kehillat Kamien Koszyrski, p. 741.

16. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 202.

LUBOML

Pre-1939: Luboml (Yiddish: Libivne), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Liuboml', raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Luboml, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Liuboml', raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Luboml is located about 48 kilometers (30 miles) west of Kowel. At the end of 1937, 3,162 Jews lived in the town.¹

German forces occupied the town on June 23, 1941. In July and August of 1941, the town was run initially by a German military administration (Ortskommandantur). In the first days of the occupation, the military authorities put up posters in the town requesting Ukrainians to report for police duty in return for wages and food. They also ordered Jews to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David, imposed a curfew on them from 7:00 P.M. to 7:00 A.M., and demanded that Jews surrender all gold objects and other valuables on pain of death. The town commandant also ordered the Jews to elect a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The chairman was Kalman Koppelzon. The Judenrat created a Jewish police force and a labor department headed by Eliyohu Hershenhorn.²

During the summer of 1941, German security forces, assisted by the Ukrainian police, conducted a series of Aktions against the Jews of Luboml in which up to 900 Jews were murdered. On July 2, 1941, the Nazis shot 5 Jews they selected after ordering Jews to gather in front of the cinema.³ In a second Aktion conducted on July 22, 1941, units of the 1st Company of the 314th German Police Battalion stationed in Luboml, assisted by the Ukrainian police, rounded up and shot about 300 Jews.⁴ Another large Aktion started on August 21, 1941, and went on for several days. On this occasion, most men went into hiding except for those issued special work permits. However, the Germans also rounded up women and girls. The Jewish Council tried to obtain the release of those arrested by offering bribes, but only a few were released. It is probable that about 400 Jews were murdered at this time.⁵

From the beginning of September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Luboml became the administrative center of Gebiet Luboml. Besides the Luboml Rayon, Rayons Schazk and Golowno also formed part of the Gebiet, which in turn was part of Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Kameradschaftsführer Uhde was appointed the Gebietskommissar in Luboml, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Kurz.⁶ The German occupying authorities also established a local Ukrainian administration in the town and a unit of Ukrainian police that was subordinated directly to the German Gendarmerie post based in Luboml. Sergei Kowalczuk was the Rayon commandant of the Ukrainian police.⁷

After the initial Aktions, the German authorities ordered Jews to surrender all livestock to the German army. At this time, Jews who lived on streets that also had non-Jewish homes were forced to move to purely Jewish streets, which caused considerable overcrowding. The civil administration then took over the vacated Jewish houses. Jews aged between 12 and 60 were also subjected to forced labor. Those working received small rations of bread while those not working received even less. However, these regulations and rations were constantly changed. As a result of the shortage of food, Jews suffered from malnutrition, and some later starved to death. In late September 1941, the Gebietskommissar ordered that Jews should now wear yellow circles on their clothes instead of armbands. The German authorities also demanded a "contribution" of 250,000 rubles, 30 pieces of gold, and 30 pairs of leather boots to be produced by the next morning—failure, they threatened, would result in another Aktion.

On December 6, 1941, on the order of Gebietskommissar Uhde, a ghetto was created in Luboml. The ghetto was located around Kusnitcher (November 11), Ribne, and Koshtshelna Streets. It was not surrounded by a fence but was guarded by several sentries (Ukrainian police) who ensured that nobody left. In the ghetto, 12 to 15 people had to share each room. The Jewish craftsmen issued with red work cards lived in a separate "ghetto" along Koleova, Chelm, and Ludmir Streets.⁸

During Passover in early April 1942, the Jews bribed Gebietskommissar Uhde to be able to bake matzot. Those leaving the ghetto without permission or breaching other German regulations faced a summary death penalty. During the existence of the ghetto, several small groups of Jews were shot for such violations. For example, 6 Jews were shot in July 1942, and 20 in August 1942, not far from the village of Sciba.⁹ Jews leaving the ghetto to work also traded small items, such as tobacco or matches, for food.

Survivors pose in front of a monument they are constructing in memory of Holocaust victims in Luboml, late 1944.

USHMM WS #61732, COURTESY OF NATHAN SOBEL

Two small armed underground groups were formed in the ghetto in 1942. They manufactured false documents giving permission to leave the ghetto, procured weapons, organized escapes, and planned armed resistance. Both groups fled to the partisans around the time of the liquidation Aktion, but only a few members of the resistance organization are known to have survived.¹⁰

On October 1, 1942, the Germans commenced the liquidation of the ghetto.¹¹ A few months before, Jews had been used to dig four large pits about 3.5 kilometers (2.2 miles) outside the town, near the village of Borki. When the Aktion started, Ukrainian police came in from surrounding towns such as Szack and Kowel, and together with the German Gendarmerie they rounded up the Jews at the marketplace and escorted them to the pits. The Germans ordered the Jews to undress and gathered up the clothes. The naked Jews were forced to stand in groups around the edge of the pit and then were shot.¹²

The Germans and their collaborators shot some 3,000 to 4,000 Jews in the process.¹³ Many Jews hid in the ghetto in prepared hiding places. The Ukrainian police tore out floors and destroyed walls in the search for hidden Jews. Local peasants also sneaked into the empty ghetto to loot Jewish property. Despite these searches, some Jews evaded detection and managed to escape to the surrounding countryside. Over the following months, however, most were denounced by the local population or captured by the German and Ukrainian police. By the time the Red Army liberated the area in 1944, only about 35 Jews from Luboml (apart from those who managed to emigrate or flee before the arrival of the Germans in 1941) were still alive.

SOURCES Publications on the destruction of the Jewish population of the town include the following: Berl Kagan, Luboml: The Memorial Book of a Vanished Shtetl (Hoboken, NJ: Ktav Publishing House, 1997), which is an English translation, edited by Nathan Sobel, of the yizkor book edited by B. Kagan and Y. Hetman, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Luboml (Tel Aviv: Luboml Memorial Book Committee, 1975); and Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 103–108.

Documents describing the fate of the Jews of Luboml can be found in the following archives: AŻIH; DAVO; GARF (7021-55-7); USHMM; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem and Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), p. 362.

2. N. Sobel, “Chronology of Destruction,” pp. 247–253, here p. 247, and Chayim Rozenblit(z’l), “Behind the Barbed Wire of Death,” pp. 254–260, here p. 254, both in Sobel, Luboml: The Memorial Book.

3. Rocha Gutman (Sandlboym), “Rescued from the Big Fire,” in ibid., pp. 285–289, here p. 285; Rozenblit(z’l), “Behind the Barbed Wire of Death,” pp. 254–256.

4. Sta. Traunstein, LG-Trau, 5 Ks 11 and Js 9437/78, Verdict, May 26, 1982. According to ChGK materials (GARF, 7021-55-7, pp. 155 with reverse side, 168 with reverse side), on July 22 about 400 Jews were shot in Luboml. This figure is also given by Sobol, “Chronology of Destruction,” in Sobol, Luboml: The Memorial Book, pp. 247–253, here p. 247.

5. GARF, 7021-55-7, pp. 155 and reverse side, gives the figure of 53 deaths; Rozenblit(z’l), “Behind the Barbed Wire of Death,” pp. 254–256, indicates that many more than that were killed, estimating about 900 deaths before the establishment of the ghetto; Sobol, “Chronology of Destruction,” p. 247, indicates some 500 Jews murdered at this time.

6. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

7. After the war Kowalczuk migrated to the United States and was the subject of a denaturalization case in the 1980s conducted by the U.S. Office of Special Investigations.

8. Rozenblit(z’l), “Behind the Barbed Wire of Death,” p. 256, and Sobol, “Chronology of Destruction,” p. 248, both give this date; Gutman, “Rescued from the Big Fire,” p. 286, dates the establishment of the ghetto after the high holidays in the fall of 1941. Rochl Leichter, “Witness to the Destruction of Luboml,” in Sobel, Luboml: The Memorial Book, pp. 276–278, notes that the ghetto was not surrounded by a fence.

9. GARF, 7021-55-7, pp. 155 and reverse side.

10. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, pp. 215, 219, 229; Sobol, “Chronology of Destruction,” p. 249.

11. GARF, 7021-55-7, pp. 155 and reverse side, 181 and reverse side.

12. M. Lifshitz, “The Journey from Spiritual Destruction to Total Annihilation,” in Sobel, Luboml: The Memorial Book, pp. 244–245.

13. GARF, 7021-55-7, pp. 96, 155 with reverse sides, 168 with reverse side, 181 with reverse side, 194. According to the ChGK reports, 4,073 Jews were killed in Luboml in 1941–1942. Leichter, “Witness to the Destruction of Luboml,” pp. 276–278, indicates more than 7,000 Jewish victims in Luboml altogether, but this is most probably too high.

ŁUCK

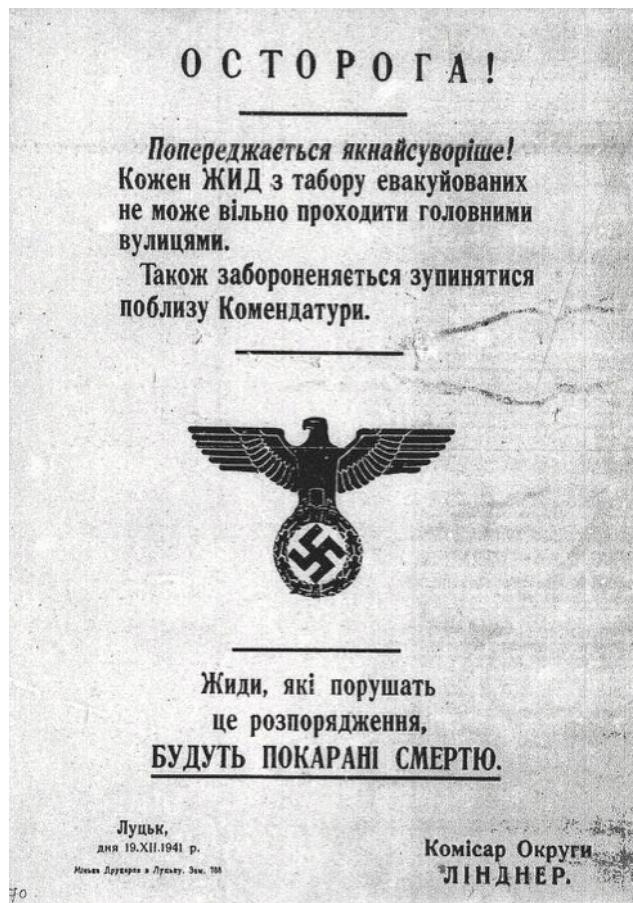

Pre-1939: Łuck, city, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Lutsk, raion center, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Luzk, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Luts’k, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Łuck is located 62 kilometers (39 miles) west of Równe between two branches of the Styr River in southern Volhynia in what is today northwestern Ukraine. From 1921, Łuck was the capital of the Volhynian province of the independent Polish Republic. After 1928 provincial governor Henryk Józewski offered the Jews in Łuck participation in national politics through a nonparty bloc. In 1936, the Bund organized a strike to protest antisemitism. In 1931, Jews comprised about half of the city's population of 35,600; by the end of the decade the percentage was probably closer to 40 percent, roughly equal to the Polish population. The rest were Ukrainians, with a sprinkling of Czechs and Germans.

1412 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

After the German attack on Poland of September 1, 1939, several thousand Jews from western and central Poland fled to Łuck. After the Red Army invaded Poland from the east on September 17, the Soviets made Łuck the center of the Volhynian oblast'. During the period of the German-Soviet division of Poland, Poles in Łuck were the primary target of Soviet repression. Some Jews were drafted into the Red Army, others, mainly refugees, were deported to Kazakhstan or Siberia. Some 19,500 Jews were living in Łuck in 1941 when Germany invaded the Soviet Union.

Ukrainian sign from Łuck, December 19, 1941:

"Caution!

Warning to the highest degree!

Any JEW evacuated from the camp may not freely pass the main streets.

Likewise it is forbidden to stop near the Kommandantur.

Jews who violate this order will be punished by death.

Luts'k

19.XII.1941

Gebietskommissar"

USHMMA/RG-31.023

The Wehrmacht reached the city on June 26, 1941. By this time much of Łuck had caught fire due to heavy German bombardments, and many shops were plundered. Very few people were able to flee the city in time.¹ The Germans discovered that the Soviet People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) had murdered some 2,800 prisoners in Łuck. Most of the victims were Ukrainians. Paul Blobel, the commander of Sonderkommando 4a, arrived in Łuck in early July 1941. On July 2, notices appeared in the city summoning Jewish males of the ages 16 to 60 to appear the following day in the courtyard of the Lubart Castle with shovels to repair drainage systems. Instead, they were forced to dig a long trench, which was to become their own mass grave. Over four hours they were shot in groups of 10 to 30 by members of Sonderkommando 4a, Order Police, and army volunteers. Einsatzgruppe C reported the Aktion as a reprisal for the NKVD mass murder, among the victims of which were thought to be 10 German soldiers. The report recorded that 1,160 Jews were murdered in early July, in addition to 300 that had been shot on June 30.² During the first weeks, Jews were forbidden to use the sidewalks, they were only permitted to shop in the marketplace between the hours of 10:00 A.M. and noon, and they were beaten by Ukrainian policemen at every opportunity.³

Within the German civil administration of Reichskommissariat Ukraine, Łuck was the center of Gebiet Łuck, headed by Gebietskommissar Heinrich Lindner. He ordered the Jews of Łuck to choose their own representatives. The Judenrat was thus composed of interwar social and political activists: the head was Fryszberg; other members were Lejzor Dal, Rozenkranc, Korczebny, Henig, Hoffman, Rawicz, and one woman, Ojchmanowa. At some point Fryszberg, Rozenkranc, and Rawicz were beaten by the Germans while being forced to recite that "a German officer never beats anyone." Dal and Rozenkranc resigned from the Judenrat. As of August 1941, all Jews had to wear a white armband, replaced in September by two yellow patches, one to be worn on the chest, the other on the back.⁴ In October 1941 Jewish skilled laborers were taken to an SS workshop on Krasne Street. About 450 people of various professions worked there under miserable conditions.⁵

At the end of November 1941, the Gebietskommissar issued an order for the establishment of a ghetto in an old part of the city, where Jews had lived before. On December 11, 1941, the Jewish population was marched, under the eyes of their Polish and Ukrainian neighbors, to a ghetto between the two branches of the Styr River. Jews were allowed to take only what they could carry, often a child. The terrain was marshy, and the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian militiamen shot many stragglers. Jewish Police carried some of the children. On December 12, these Jews were joined by the Jews of the nearby suburb of Krasne.⁶ Not everyone managed to find suitable housing; the homeless were moved into schools, synagogues, and former stores and warehouses.⁷

Henceforth the Judenrat supplied daily labor brigades to perform jobs outside the ghetto. Each morning, workers were escorted through the gate of the walled ghetto by the Jewish Police. Jewish women also had to work, many of them as servants for German officials. Jews who had regular employment were issued identity cards, which in part protected them from being assigned to other forced labor tasks.⁸ The ghetto was guarded internally by the Jewish Police and externally by the Ukrainian policemen and German Gendarmes.

In the ghetto, Jews suffered from cold, hunger, and overcrowding. Łuck was warmed by wood rather than coal, and there was no wood inside the ghetto. Food rations were 150 grams (5.3 ounces) of bread for workers, 75 grams (2.6 ounces) for nonworkers, and 30 grams (1 ounce) for children. People soon swelled from starvation. About 30 to 40 people had to share a single room. Due to these conditions, typhus spread (despite attempts to check it with medication). Each day the dead were removed from the ghetto by horse-drawn wagon.⁹ Due to the fear of typhus spreading to the non-Jewish population, notices were posted around the ghetto banning members of the Wehrmacht from entering.¹⁰

In the ghetto there was an orphanage, a public kitchen, and an old age home run by the Judenrat. During the initial five months of 1942, the Germans demanded regular “contributions” of money, valuables, furniture, warm clothing, and other items, holding hostages as guarantees of delivery.¹¹ Raising taxes to pay these fines made the Judenrat unpopular, but they knew they had little choice, as their own lives were on the line. Ojchmanowa of the Judenrat was killed as a hostage.

By the summer of 1942, the Jews in the ghetto had become aware of the mass shootings of Jews in other nearby towns and started to look for an escape route from the ghetto. Dr. T. Kunitsa-Goldshteyn recalled that a group of youths tried to join the partisans, but every attempt to establish contact with them led nowhere. Those who escaped to the forests never returned. . . . Many people who had no chance of getting on the list of the “fortunate” [categorized as skilled workers] and did not have enough money to buy Aryan papers or take refuge with Poles dug out bunkers and hiding places inside the ghetto. These people planned to defend themselves to the bitter end. But their arms consisted of no more than axes or bottles of sulfuric acid. It was difficult even to acquire that much—it cost a large amount of money. Thus began the hunt for false Aryan papers. They were very expensive and could only be purchased with gold pieces. In addition, the documents were not a free pass out of the ghetto. It was very important to have “good looks”—i.e., to resemble the Aryan type. Women dyed their hair so it would resemble that of non-Jewish women.¹²

The Łuck ghetto was liquidated on August 19–23, 1942, by the German civilian authorities and police, with the help of Ukrainian policemen. First the Jewish Police was ordered to find all Jews in hiding, and Jewish men were sent to Hirka Polanka, 8 kilometers (5 miles) to the southwest. There they dug a trench 150 meters long and 6 meters wide (about 492 by 20 feet), with steps leading down into it. The Germans told them to dig well, laughingly explaining they were preparing the graves of their wives and daughters.¹³ The men were taken to the courtyard of Lubart Castle and shot the next day. Then the women and children were taken to Hirka Polanka. The first group kneeled naked in front of the pits and fell or were pushed in after being shot. Succeeding groups had to lie facedown on the corpses. Younger children were thrown into the pits alive. Around 14,000 people in total were killed during the main part of the Aktion. However, up to another 4,000 or so Jews were pulled out of bunkers or uncovered around the city by Ukrainian policemen over the ensuing days and weeks and then shot as well.¹⁴ On December 12, 1942, the Germans killed the 500 or so laborers of the workshop. During this Aktion, the Jews offered resistance, shooting at the SA man Glück, who was the assistant of the Gebietskommissar.¹⁵

The number of survivors appears to be few: Shoshana Yakubovitsch was rescued by Witold Fomienko in nearby Podhajce; Fanye Pasht, by another Ukrainian peasant named Lavrov;¹⁶ Yoshke Liberman, by his German wife; the convert Bronisława Szczerbińska, by her sister who identified her, at Hirka Polanka, as a “Polish Catholic.” A few Łuck Jews survived in the ranks of the Soviet partisans. A few Volhynian Jews probably fled to Łuck in 1943, along with Poles with whom they had been hiding, to escape Ukrainian nationalist partisans. By then German authority had weakened, and some Jews may have survived in hiding in Łuck to see the arrival of the Red Army in February 1944.

SOURCES The following publications contain useful information regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Łuck: C.F. Rüter and D.W. De Mildt, eds., Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 31 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 694; Sefer Lutsk (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Lutsk be-Yisrael, 1961); Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkiv: Tarbut Laam, 2005); R. Metel’nits’kii, Deiaki storinki ievreiskoi zabudovy Luts’ka (Kiev: Dukh i Litera, 2001); and Timothy Snyder, “The Life and Death of West Volhynian Jews, 1921–1945,” in Ray Brandon and Wendy Lower, eds., The Shoah in Ukraine: History, Testimony, and Memorialization (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2008), pp. 77–113.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AAN (Urząd Województwa Wołyńskiego, 979/85/9, “Strajk pracowników Żydów”; KPZU, 165/VII-1 t. 10 24, “Zvit z zhovtnevoi konferentsii OK KPZU”); AŽIH (301/1982, 301/2565, 301/4000, 301/4941, 301/5657); BA-DH (ZA VI 322, A. 3, Heinrich Lindner); DAVO; GARF (7021-71-7); NARA; USHMM; VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/1446).

Timothy Snyder and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Sefer Lutsk, p. 399.
2. NARA, T-175, reel 232, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 24, July 16, 1941.
3. AŽIH, 301/4941, testimony of Jankiel Baran; Sefer Lutsk, p. 401.

1414 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

4. AŽIH, 301/4941; USHMM, RG-31.017M (DARO), reel 2, Amtsblatt des Gebietskommissars in Rowno, April 1, 1942: Bekanntmachung, Generalkommissar Schoene, September 6, 1941.

5. Sefer Lutsk, p. 441.

6. Ibid., pp. 398, 401, 418; YVA, M-1/E/1446, testimony of Fanya Pasht; AŽIH, 301/4941.

7. Sefer Lutsk, p. 420.

8. YVA, M-1/E/1446; Sefer Lutsk, p. 418.

9. Sefer Lutsk, p. 401; YVA, M-1/E/1446.

10. See the photograph reproduced in Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, ed., Verbrechen der Wehrmacht: Dimensionen des Vernichtungskrieges 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2002), p. 81.

11. Sefer Lutsk, pp. 398, 402.

12. Ibid., p. 422.

13. Ibid., p. 402.

14. GARF, 7021-71-7, pp. 29–30, estimates some 20,000 victims. A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertz fashizma,” 2000), p. 30, estimates that the actual number was probably closer to 15,000. Sefer Lutsk, pp. 441–42, estimates 14,000 killed in the main Aktion and 4,000 subsequently.

15. Sefer Lutsk, p. 399.

16. YVA, M-1/E/1446.

LUDWIPOL

Pre-1939: Ludwipol, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Liudvipoľ, Rovno oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ludwipol, Rayon center, Gebiet Kostopol, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Sosnove, Rivne oblast’, Ukraine

Ludwipol is located 62 kilometers (39 miles) northeast of Rowne, on the Słucz River. In 1941, according to one source, there were as many as 3,000 Jews living in the town, including refugees from central and western Poland. After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, a few Jewish families managed to evacuate to the east, but the vast majority of Jews either did not or could not leave and so remained trapped under German occupation.¹

On July 6, 1941, units of the German 6th Army occupied Ludwipol. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Ludwipol became a Rayon center in Gebiet Kostopol, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. SA-Standartenführer Löhnert became the Gebietskommissar, and Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Wichmann became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.²

A Ukrainian local authority was also formed in Ludwipol. From September 1941 onward, the Ukrainian police unit was subordinated to the local post of the German Gendarmerie.

Just after the occupation of the town by the German army, local Ukrainians channeled their antisemitic mood into a pogrom in which a number of Jews were robbed and assaulted.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupying forces instituted a series of antisemitic measures in Ludwipol. Jews were ordered to wear armbands bearing the Star of David, and they were compelled to surrender all money and valuable items and to perform hard physical labor. They were also prohibited from going beyond the borders of the town and were subjected to systematic robbery and assault by the Ukrainian police. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formed in Ludwipol through which the German authorities passed on their orders and instructions to the Jewish population.

A ghetto was formed in Ludwipol in October 1941; Jews from the surrounding villages were also concentrated there. Altogether there were about 1,500 Jews in the ghetto.³ On September 26, 1942, German security forces liquidated the ghetto. On that day, a squad of the Security Police and SD from Rowne shot more than 1,000 Jews with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the local Ukrainian police.⁴ Initially, some 300 to 400 Jews were able to escape. Most, however, were ultimately captured and shot by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.

Of those who escaped successfully, crossing the Słucz River, a number managed to survive in camps protected by the growing Soviet partisan movement. Among the survivors from Ludwipol was Mordechai Kleinman who as a 12-year-old boy fled to work on a Polish farm in the countryside when the ghetto was set up. Eventually he had to leave, as his employer was afraid of being denounced by Ukrainian neighbors. Mordechai then served in the Medvedev Soviet partisan unit, which included as many as 150 Jews. A partisan detachment led by Alter Fiklin burned the police station and stole German food supplies in 1943. When the Red Army liberated the town on January 10, 1944, about 40 Jewish survivors emerged from the forests.⁵

SOURCES Relevant information on the Jewish community of Ludwipol can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 109–111; Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), pp. 66, 199, 366; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 761.

Documents on the persecution and extermination of Jews in Ludwipol can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/75, 1268, 2189, 2883, and 3298); DARO; GARF (7021-71-57); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. AŽIH, 301/2883.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. AŽIH, 301/1268, gives October 5, 1941, as the date for the establishment of ghettos in all the Rayon towns of Gebiet Kostopol, including Ludwipol.

4. According to ChGK materials, during the period of the occupation, 1,297 people were murdered. GARF, 7021-71-57, p. 1.

5. AŽIH, 301/75, testimony of Mordechai Kleinman.

ŁUNINIEC

Pre-1939: Łuniniec, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Luninets, raion center, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Luninez, Rayon center, Gebiet Pinsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Luninets, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Łuniniec is located approximately 55 kilometers (34 miles) east-northeast of Pińsk. On the eve of World War II, there were more than 2,000 Jews living in the town, above 20 per cent of the overall population.

The Red Army seized Łuniniec in September 1939, shortly after the outbreak of war. The Soviet troops retreated near the end of June 1941, and during the first days of July, forces of the Wehrmacht occupied the town. Shortly after their arrival, the Germans killed all the Jewish doctors. They also ordered all Jews to wear yellow patches on their clothing—one patch on the chest and one on the back—and forbade them to walk on the sidewalks. The Germans then made the Jews form a Judenrat, which consisted of four men. The Judenrat was responsible for providing the Germans with Jewish goods and laborers on demand. Jews were not compensated for their labor. In addition, a non-Jew had to get special permission from the authorities to employ a Jewish artisan.¹

On August 10, 1941, a special German unit arrived in Łuniniec to carry out the first anti-Jewish Aktion. In all likelihood this was the 4th Squadron of the 2nd Regiment of the 1st SS-Cavalry Brigade.² They gathered together all the Jewish men aged 14 and older, announcing on placards that they were going to be taken to work, then took them outside the town and shot them in pits that had been dug in advance. They allowed a handful of tailors and cobblers to live. Although the Germans went from house to house looking for Jews, several managed to hide successfully. Many of the men who survived, and some of the women, were sent to the forced labor camp in Hancewicze during the winter of 1941–1942. Meanwhile, the Germans continued to confiscate Jewish property.³

In the first days of March 1942, a ghetto was formally established in Łuniniec. There had never been a Jewish quarter or neighborhood in Łuniniec, so many Jews and even some Christians were forced to relocate. The remaining Jewish populations of the surrounding villages—including Łunin, Wólka, Dziatłowicze, and Bostyń—were concentrated in the ghetto. It was surrounded by barbed wire, and the local police guarded it. There was tremendous overcrowding in the barracks-like buildings. The daily ration was 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per person. Artisans, who were allowed to leave the ghetto to perform work, were carefully searched upon returning. If they were caught trying to smuggle food back into the ghetto, the police would beat them severely. To prevent the spread of lice and disease, the Germans shaved the heads of Jewish children. They also called for the formation of a new Judenrat to direct Jewish forced labor.⁴

In May 1942, a Security Police and SD Aussendienststelle (outpost) was set up in Pińsk, under the command of SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhem Rasp. Rasp's office in turn set up branch offices in the outlying Rayon capitals, including one in Łuniniec under the command of Otto Scholl. In June 1942, the Reich Security Main Office (RSHA) in Berlin issued a special order to Rasp to liquidate all the Jews under his jurisdiction.⁵ The second anti-Jewish Aktion in Łuniniec took place on September 4, 1942. Scholl and his men, with the help of the Gendarmerie, the local police, and Reserve Police Battalion 306, rounded up the Jews and brought them to pits outside the town. Rasp himself appeared with a small detachment of his men and auxiliary police. A unit of Reserve Police Battalion 69 and members of the Organisation Todt (OT) also participated, at the request of the Security Police. About 2,800 Jews were killed in this massacre. Some 100 craftsmen were permitted to remain alive, but they were killed in a subsequent Aktion in October 1942.⁶

Just prior to the mass shooting, Susi Grunberg-Gelbard wrote a letter to her husband, dated September 1, 1942, describing the situation she faced in the ghetto:

I am sitting perhaps for the last time in this room, in which we were so happy, and write you a few parting words. I feel that you are still alive and hope that these lines come into your hands. The graves are prepared; sooner or later, probably tonight, the inevitable will happen. I don't want to die, but I will die like a "man," if I don't succeed in escaping. What I will do with the child is still not decided. The noose is so tightly closed that one cannot escape.⁷

SOURCES The yizkor book for Łuniniec and Kożangródek, edited by Yosef Ze'evi et al., Yizkor Kehilot Luninyets—Koz'anhorodok (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Luninyets ve-Koz'anhorodok be-Yisrael, 1952), has several useful survivor testimonies. There is also a short article on the Jewish community in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 263–264.

The investigative records and verdict from the trial in Braunschweig, concluded in 1964, of several members of the SS-Cavalry Brigade contain key information on the first Aktion. The verdict has been published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979) vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 570. Information on the second Aktion can be found in BA-L (ZStL, 204 AR-Z 393/59) and also in the records of LG-Bo [see Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2005) vol. 34, Lfd. Nr. 741].

Documentation on the fate of the Jewish community in Łuniniec can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/3042, 3087); GARF; NARB; and YVA.

Andrew Koss

VOLUME II: PART B

NOTES

1. A.P., "Kilyon ha-yishuv ha-Yehudi," in Ze'evi et al., Yizkor, p. 66. Also in Yizkor see Lipe Yosilevski, "Der Untergang," pp. 178–179, 181; and Rivka Yosilevski-Brevda, "Ma she-'eynay ra'u," pp. 67–68.

2. The verdict of the trial of leading perpetrators of the SS-Cavalry Brigade (LG-Braun, April 20, 1964) describes a shooting Aktion and states it is very probable that the place concerned was Łuniniec and that the 4th Squadron carried out the shooting. The details of the Aktion fit closely with descriptions of the massacre in Łuniniec from other sources. In any event, it was almost certainly a unit of the 2nd Regiment that was responsible for the shootings. LG-Braun, 2 Ks 1/63, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, Lfd. Nr. 570a, 20:54–55.

3. Ibid.; Yosilevski-Brevda, "Ma she-'eynay ra'u," pp. 68–69; Khayem Rubinraut, "Luninyets in di letste 25 yor," in Ze'evi et al., Yizkor, p. 120; Yosilevski, "Der untergang," pp. 179–181; see also AŽIH, 301/3087 (Mikolaj Sierzan).

4. Yosilevski-Brevda, "Ma she-'eynay ra'u," p. 69; Yosilevski, "Der untergang," p. 180.

5. BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 393/59, vol. 2, p. 868, testimony of Wilhelm Rasp, December 18, 1961.

6. Ibid.; BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 393/59, vol. 2, Ghetto Vernichtung in Raum Pinsk, p. 1100; A.P., "Kilyon ha-yishuv ha-Yehudi," p. 66; Rubinraut, "Luninyets," p. 120; Yosilevski, "Der untergang," p. 180.

7. AŽIH, 301/3042. This document is in German but may be a transcript or translation of the original. It is presumed that Susi Grunberg-Gelbard was murdered with the other Jews of Łuniniec on September 4, 1942.

MACIEJÓW

Pre-1939: Maciejów, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Matsiov, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mazejewo, Rayon center, Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Matseiv, Turiis'k raion, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Maciejów is located about 28 kilometers (17.4 miles) west of Kowel. According to the 1921 census, 2,206 Jews lived in Maciejów. Based on a natural growth rate of 9 or 10 people per 1,000 annually, it is estimated that approximately 2,600 Jews were living there in mid-1941.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the town in late June 1941. Within a few days, the German occupation forces established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) from among the wealthier Jews. The Jewish Council informed the male Jews where and when to report for work every day. Among the initial work tasks Jews performed was clearing the roads of small mines left behind by the Soviets as they retreated.¹

In July and August, the town was administered by a German military commandant, then from early September 1941, by a civil administration. Maciejów became a Rayon center in Gebiet Kowel. The Gebietskommissar in Kowel was Arno Kämpf until June 1942, while the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant Philipp Rapp of the German Gendarmerie.²

Kämpf was arrested in June 1942, and Erich Kassner succeeded him as Gebietskommissar.

The Germans also set up a local Ukrainian administration and a Ukrainian police force, which was subordinated to a local German Gendarmerie post of several Gendarmes. In the summer of 1942, the Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft Battalion 103, recruited from the region's inhabitants, was also stationed in the town, primarily on railway protection duties.³

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the first anti-Jewish measures were introduced in Maciejów. The German authorities ordered Jews to wear yellow patches on the front and back of their clothes. Jews were instructed to surrender all valuables via the Judenrat. The German authorities also threatened that if any valuables were subsequently found in a Jewish home, the people who lived there would be shot. In addition, the Germans demanded large monetary "contributions," and on one occasion they burned the Torah scrolls from the synagogue and beat the old men.⁴

In the summer of 1941, the first killing Aktions were carried out in Maciejów. These Aktions were organized by a detachment of the Security Police and SD from Kowel together with parts of the 1st and 4th Platoons, 1st Company, Police Battalion 314 (Order Police from Vienna), assisted by the local Ukrainian police. The two Order Police platoons were in Maciejów from mid-July until early September 1941.

The first Aktion took place on July 18, 1941. The Germans collected about 400 Jewish men on the pretext of registration and took them to the former nunnery that served as a German headquarters. Here a form of "selection" took place, and those with useful skills were put to one side, while the larger group was attacked with dogs, beaten, and then shot behind the nunnery. Men of the Security Police and SD squad and the Order Police shot 325 Jews. According to survivor Jacob Biber, in the course of a subsequent Aktion about one month later, 300 Jewish women were arrested and shot in the same place. On another occasion the Germans also beat and murdered the rabbi of the town, apparently when their demands for money could no longer be fulfilled.⁵

In August 1941, the Germans and their collaborators declared a virtual "open season" on the Jews. The German police battalion and especially the local Ukrainian police (Miliz) rounded up hundreds of Jews, whom they then shot in the lime mines close to the town. Many Jews hid or fled to the surrounding countryside, but the local police still hunted them down, boasting about how many Jews they had killed. Apparently the Germans had offered a reward for every Jew discovered. The local population also plundered the abandoned Jewish houses. At least one Jew, the blacksmith Manashe, offered resistance, grabbing a rifle from his Ukrainian police escorts and battling his pursuers in a rye field before he was overpowered. After several weeks of this killing spree, the German police battalion left the town in early September, and the newly established civil administration ordered that the killing of Jews be stopped temporarily.⁶

The first Judenrat had been completely eliminated during the massacres, and a new one was appointed. It made a report to the newly arrived German commandant, whose office was also based in the nunnery, about a German soldier who had stabbed and robbed the Jewish photographer Lichtenstein. To set an example, the new commandant court-martialed the soldier and sentenced him to death. News of this event caused even the Ukrainian police to reduce their harassment of the Jews. A number of Jews then emerged from hiding and were even joined by refugees from nearby towns, including Kowel.⁷

In the fall of 1941 the remaining Jews were made to perform forced labor without pay. Among the tasks assigned to the men were working in the sawmill, cleaning the streets, and loading freight cars, while women also worked as cleaners for the Germans. After mid-November, the trains passing through increasingly carried wounded German soldiers rather than Soviet prisoners of war (POWs), and this also changed the attitude of the Ukrainian overseers, who became somewhat more amenable.⁸

According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, at the end of 1941, a ghetto was created in Maciejów into which Jews from the surrounding villages were resettled. In late May or early June 1942, the 1st Motorized Gendarmerie Platoon from Łuck, together with the local police battalion of Ukrainians, carried out an Aktion against “bandits,” the official word for partisans but often applied as a euphemism for Jews. In the course of this operation, four “bandits” were killed, three or four wounded, and one arrested.⁹ At about this time, 200 young Jews were shot, presumably for providing alleged assistance to the “bandits” (partisans).

In mid-September 1942, word spread that the ghetto would soon be liquidated, and most Jews scattered to prepared hiding places. A detachment of Security Police and SD men arriving from Łuck, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian local police, rounded up all the Jews they could apprehend in the ghetto and shot them in the lime pits on the edge of town. The number of victims of this Aktion is unclear, but it probably lies between 1,500 and 2,500.¹⁰ Most of those who hid initially were denounced or captured by the local police over the following days and months.

Very few Jews managed to survive the German occupation in and around Maciejów. Including several who had escaped into Russia, only about 10 survivors came back to the town after its liberation by the Red Army on July 18, 1944.¹¹ Those who did survive, such as Jacob Biber, relied heavily on their good pre-war relations with individual local peasants and had to change their hiding places often, owing to the generally hostile atmosphere in the area. Jacob and his wife also lost their infant son, Shalom, when surprised in the woods by Ukrainian policemen.¹² From March 1943, many Ukrainian policemen deserted and established their own Ukrainian nationalist (Ukrainian Insurgent Army, or UPA) partisan formations, but most remained antisemitic and killed any Jews they encountered. It was not until 1944 that the emergence of strong Soviet partisan units in the area offered a potential refuge for the few surviving Jews.

SOURCES Information about the persecution of the Jewish population of Maciejów can be found in the memoir written by Jacob Biber, Survivors: A Personal Story of the Holocaust (San Bernardino, CA: Borgo Press, 1986). There is also a personal testimony by his wife, Eva, in the same author’s anthology of survivor accounts, A Triumph of the Spirit: Ten Stories of Holocaust Survivors (San Bernardino, CA: Borgo Press, 1994), pp. 97–122. A brief history of the Jewish community is available in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 137–139. Additional information can be found in Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), p. 366.

Documents about the persecution of the Jews of Maciejów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH; BA-BL; BA-L; DAVO (R66-4-15); GARF (7021-55-9); TsDAVO; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. Biber, Survivors, pp. 42–43.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. BA-BL, R 19/266, report on the strength of the Schutzmannschaft as of July 1, 1942.
4. Biber, Survivors, pp. 49–51.
5. LG-Trau, verdict of May 26, 1982 (forthcoming in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, case no. 878); Biber, Survivors, pp. 43–50.
6. Biber, Survivors, pp. 52–66.
7. Ibid., pp. 64–67.
8. Ibid., pp. 70–72.
9. See the report of the Higher SS and Police Leader in Ukraine, BdS Ukraine, June 1–30, 1942, TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 42.
10. The figure is derived from the number of Jews in Maciejów before the war, an estimate of the number of Jews killed before September 1942, and allowing for the number of Jews resettled to Maciejów from surrounding towns and villages. According to material from the ChGK (January 24, 1945), around 4,000 Jews and Ukrainians were killed in the Maciejów raion during the occupation; see GARF, 7021-55-9, p. 3. This figure is probably an overestimate. Martin Gilbert gives the figure of 1,500 for the number of Jews killed in “August 1942”; see Gilbert, Endlösung. Die Vertreibung und Vernichtung der Juden. Ein Atlas (Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1982), p. 115.
11. “Eva Cherniak Biber” [survivor account] published in Biber, A Triumph of the Spirit, pp. 97–122, here p. 118.
12. Biber, Survivors, pp. 88–89.

MAŁORYTA

Pre-1939: Małoryta, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Malorita, raion center, Brest oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Maloryta, Rayon center, Gebiet Brest-Litowsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Malaryta, Beras’tse voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Małoryta is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) southeast of Brest. Just before the German invasion of the Soviet Union, some 4,000 people lived in Małoryta, of which more than 1,000 were Jewish.

German forces occupied Małoryta on the first day of the invasion, June 22, 1941. A number of buildings in the town were damaged in the initial German bombardment. A few days after the Germans arrived, they announced they needed volunteers to join the police. A Ukrainian police unit was set up, and the police station was located in a private house, which had previously belonged to a Jewish person but was confiscated in 1939 by the Soviets. It was situated on the street that the Germans called Dorfstrasse, which was later called Sovetskaia. There were about 30 people in the Ukrainian police. Yarmoshuk was the commandant; he had also used the surname of Kwiatkowski under Polish rule, as before the war the Ukrainians were not allowed to serve in the Polish police. He was sacked from the Polish police when this deception was uncovered. Another policeman was Filipp Samosiuk. The policemen wore uniforms similar to the greatcoats worn by Soviet soldiers, made of a dark gray material.¹

In the fall of 1941, a German civil administration took over responsibility for the region from the military authorities. Małoryta became a Rayon center in Gebiet Brest-Litowsk, subordinated to the Gebietskommissar (Brest-Land) Curt Rolle. In the fall, a training school for the local police was established in Małoryta, to which policemen from the entire Gebiet were sent to be trained as noncommissioned officers (NCOs). The local German agricultural leader (Landwirtschaftsführer) in Małoryta was Wilhelm Zinn, and the village head (sołtys) was Konrad Strunec, who had also held this position under Polish rule.

Sometime in the fall of 1941, the Germans set up a Jewish ghetto, and all the Jews of Rayon Małoryta were moved into it. The Ukrainians who used to live in houses within the ghetto area were resettled to former Jewish-owned houses outside the ghetto. The ghetto consisted of about 50 houses in the northwestern part of town, surrounded by barbed wire. It was guarded by the local police, though not very closely. Despite official prohibitions and beatings from the local police, the Jews were still able to barter items for food with the local population. The extreme overcrowding resulted in very dirty, unsanitary conditions in the ghetto, and a number of people died.² The Jewish population of Rayon Małoryta was reported by the German authorities to be 1,210 in early 1942.³

According to a German report from March 1942, artisan workshops had been established for blacksmiths, carpenters, tailors, and other craftsmen in Małoryta in order for “Aryans” to be trained, presumably by Jewish specialists.⁴ Some able-bodied Jews from the ghetto were assigned to forced labor under arduous conditions on road construction projects and other work at various sites in the Gebiet, where many died from the inadequate food and poor conditions.⁵

The ghetto was liquidated in July or August 1942, probably by a detachment of the Security Police, assisted by men from the Police Company Nuremberg, the German Gendarmerie, and the local Ukrainian police. The massacre of the Jews was carried out over at least two days. First the remaining male Jews were taken in groups to the ditches prepared on Pieszczałka Hill, which was about 1.5 kilometers (0.9 mile) from the ghetto in a northwesterly direction, where they were shot. A few men tried to escape, but the escorting guards shot them as they fled.⁶ The women and children were held overnight at an assembly point, and then the Germans and their collaborators escorted them to the mass graves in groups of 40 or 50 during the next morning. The victims had to remove their outer clothing and their shoes before being shot in three mass graves. The remaining Jewish property in the ghetto was plundered by the Germans and the local policemen. Among those who participated in the Aktion was the Ukrainian nationalist Markowski, who had been head of the Małoryta Rayon a short time before.⁷

According to the monthly report of the Gebietskommissar dated August 22, 1942, the Jews in Małoryta had been “evacuated” during the previous month; approximately 1,000 people being affected.⁸

SOURCES Captured German documents on the fate of the Jews of Małoryta can be found in BA-BL (R 94). Materials from the various ChGK reports can be found in GABO (514-1-258, p. 38); GARF (7021-83-25, pp. 64–74); TsGAMORF (32-11302-244, pp. 151–160); USHMM; and YVA. Interviews conducted in the 1990s by Britain’s New Scotland Yard War Crimes Unit (WCU) in preparing for the trial of Andrei Sawoniuk, a policeman from the nearby town of Domaczów, also contain some information on the fate of the Jews in Małoryta. These records are now located in the NA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. NA, WCU, Sawoniuk investigation, statement of Vladimir Kharczuk, February 1997.

2. Ibid; GARF, 7021-83-25, p. 64; USHMM, RG-22.008 (TsGAMORF), 32/11302/244, p. 157.

3. BA-BL, R 94/7, Report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, March 24, 1942.

4. Ibid.

5. Ibid., R 94/6, Report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, Labor Office, July 6, 1942.

6. NA, WCU, Sawoniuk investigation, statement of Vladimir Kharczuk, February 1997; USHMM, RG-22.008 (TsGAMORF), 32/11302/244, p. 157, and 233/2374/58, pp. 152–155. Both these sources date the Aktion in June 1942 and name Major Rose of the Gestapo arriving from Lutsk [sic] as being in charge. This was probably, however, Major of the Gendarmerie Rohse, who was at that time based in Brest-Litowsk.

7. USHMM, RG-22.008 (TsGAMORF), 32/11302/244, pp. 157 and reverse.

8. BA-BL, R 94/7, Report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, August 22, 1942. According to Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 789, “883 Jews (including some from neighboring villages) were executed by SD troops and Ukrainian police in Małoryta on July 7, 1942”; unfortunately, it is not clear on what source this information is based. GARF, 7021-83-25, p. 64, gives the figure of 2,500 Jewish victims from the ghetto, but this is certainly too high.

MANIEWICZE

Pre-1939: Maniewiczze (Yiddish: Manievich), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Manevichi, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Manewitschi, Rayon center, Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Prylisne, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

The town of Maniewiczze is located 59 kilometers (37 miles) east-northeast of Kowel. According to the 1921 census, there were 462 Jews living there.¹ Following the German invasion of Poland in September 1939, Maniewiczze was occupied by the Soviets. Its Jewish population was swelled by several hundred refugees from the German zone of occupation, primarily Jews from Terespol, a town near Brest, reaching a total of almost 2,000 people.²

The Soviet army and local authorities evacuated Maniewiczze in the direction of Kiev on June 25, 1941; the German army entered the town on June 28. In the intervening days, peasants from neighboring villages conducted extensive looting in the town. Some local Jews tried to leave with the escaping Soviets, but many stayed behind. The Lorber family, for example, could not leave, as the head of the family remained undecided and soon found that escape was no longer practical.³

The Germans ordered the creation of a Judenrat in July 1941, headed by a refugee lawyer, Dr. Frucht. The local Ukrainian police commander was Mikolai Slipchuk, formerly a teacher in a nearby school for deaf children. His assistant was Andrei Pestrak.

The first killing Aktion, directed mainly against the Jewish intelligentsia, was organized by the Germans on August 25, 1941, when 327 Jews, mostly men, many of whom were heads of families, were arrested and allegedly taken to a work camp; but in fact they were killed that day.⁴

Local Jews were allowed to remain in their homes but were restricted to the area of the town, and a curfew was imposed after dark. They were allocated 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per person per day, distributed by the Judenrat. Jews suffered from hunger. Some Jewish artisans went to nearby villages secretly to work and obtain food for their families. Seven Jewish children were murdered by the chief of police Slipchuk when caught returning from a village in search of food.

The Judenrat organization included a Jewish police force. Comments by survivors indicate that the head of the Judenrat and the Jewish Police behaved properly and tried to alleviate the suffering of the community members. Suffering from cold and hunger was worst during the winter of 1941–1942. Comments by survivors regarding the local population are mixed. Some neighbors, both Poles and Ukrainians, helped with food, goods, and information. Others ignored previous good relations and allowed friends to suffer.

According to some accounts, an “open ghetto” was formed in Maniewiczze in the spring of 1942 between the police station and the railway station. Some Jews were brought there from neighboring villages. It was not closed off and was guarded only ineffectively by the Ukrainian police.⁵ The Germans maintained a skeleton staff of Gendarmes in the town to support the Organisation Todt (OT) civil engineering corps. Several “Todtniks” were tenants in Jewish homes; the homes were comfortable, and the Jews understood German. The Nazis set up a self-financing scheme to cover the costs of administering the ghetto. The Maniewiczze Judenrat was forced to collect and “contribute” the funds, a practice employed throughout Volhynia.

Maniewiczze Jews were not permitted to leave the area of the ghetto, and the Ukrainian police had the power to shoot violators on sight. Nevertheless, it was possible to escape under cover of darkness if one was careful. Faye Merin Porter (the coauthor’s mother) escaped the night before the second Aktion but left behind her two young daughters, sister, and mother. She hid in a barn and later entered the forest, where she was reunited with her husband, Yisroel Puchtik (Porter).

Jewish men worked in the local parquet-flooring factory and in the loading of railroad ties. Women worked at “Polska Góra,” to which they commuted by a local train. Their task was the repair and maintenance of the rail line. These women were employed by the OT, the German government contract firm dealing with large-scale military construction projects. German officials of the OT helped these women by providing them secretly with food rations. They also warned them in time of the impending liquidation of the ghetto.⁶

As a result of these warnings, 70 Jews were able to escape to the nearby forest on September 3 and 4, 1942, at the end of the work shift at the parquet factory. Some hid with a local Polish forest ranger named Słowik. This group met up with another group of young Jews from Lishnivka, a neighboring village in the forests.

One such Jew was Dov Lorber, 27, who first escaped from Maniewiczze to Lishnivka, the village where his father was born. Another man from Gródek, who was warned early on, was Yisroel Puchtik. He also avoided the first Aktion. Eventually they and others joined a partisan group led by a local Ukrainian leader, Nikolai Konishchuk, aka “Kruk,” the former Communist head of the village of Gryva. Kruk readily agreed to accept these young Jews in his partisan unit. Older Jews, women, and children were also accepted into a “family camp” within the forest. Another group under “Maks,” a Polish commander, a major named Joseph Sobesiak, operated in the same area. Eventually several hundred Jews survived as partisans in this family camp guarded by the two partisan groups, later commanded by Soviet Colonel Anton Brinski. They later came under the command of Major General Vasily Begma and were part of the Rovno Division.

Food and other provisions were commandeered from neighboring villages under partisan control. Military supplies were dropped periodically by parachute. The Soviet army liberated the area in February 1944.

A few days before the second and last Aktion, the town’s Jews were forced to move to an enclosed ghetto area in Maniewiczze. The Germans liquidated the ghetto on September 5, 1942. As many as 300 Jews from the nearby village of Trojanowka were brought into the Maniewiczze ghetto just prior to this, on September 3.⁷ On the eve of the liquidation, German and Ukrainian police guards, including some brought in from Kowel and Powursk, surrounded the ghetto. Then some 2,000 Jews slowly marched through the town and were escorted to a site in the direction of Czerewucha. Here they were made to strip naked and then slaughtered in four mass graves near the Christian cemetery in a wooded area called ferdishe mogiles (Horse Graves). The Germans gathered watches, gold teeth, and other valuables in a silk bag at the killing site. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, there was a total of 1,840 “primarily” Jewish victims, of whom the children were buried alive.⁸

Andrei Pestrak was under investigation by the British War Crimes Inquiry when he died in the United Kingdom in the late 1980s.

SOURCES The yizkor book edited by Yehuda Merin, Sefer yizkor li-kebilat Manyevits', Horodok, Troyanovkah, Lishnivkah u-Povursk (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Manyevits', Horodok, Troyanovkah, Lishnivkah u-Povursk voha-sevivah ba-Erets, 2002), contains a number of relevant testimonies. The International Association of Volhynian Jews also publishes its own journal, Yalkut Volyn, in Givatayim, Israel. This magazine includes an article on “Maniewiczze” by Yehuda Merin in vol. 45 (1989), p. 17.

On partisan activity in the area, see Jack Nusan Porter and Yehuda Merin, eds., Jewish Partisans: A Documentary of Jewish Resistance in the Soviet Union during World War II, 2 vols. (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1982; repr., Newton, MA: Spencer, 2002). Another relevant publication is the collection in Hebrew edited by Nathan Livne, Tall as Pine Trees: Jewish Partisans in Volhynian Forests (Tel Aviv, 1980). Finally, there is a self-published article by Joseph M. Voss (with the assistance of Dr. Levis Kochin), “Nekamah mit sekhel,” which is the transcript of a lecture and memorial to the life of Dov Lorber, given at the Congregation Bikur Cholim, Seattle, WA, on February 12, 1997.

Documentation on the Holocaust in Maniewiczze can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/926); GARF (7021-55-8); MA (A.103); NA (Home Office War Crimes Inquiry); USHMM; and YVA (e.g., O-3/1332, 2367).

Jack Nusan Porter and Yehudah Merin

NOTES

1. Blackbook of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), pp. 212–228. In 1921 in the nearby village of Trojanowka, there were 212 Jews, and in Poworsk, 37.

2. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 790, gives the figure of 1,900 Jews under Soviet rule in 1939–1941.

3. Information from Dov Lorber, who later became a Jewish partisan commander in the region. For his testimony, see YVA, O-3/2367.

4. AŽIH, 301/926, testimony of Samuel Melchior; GARF, 7021-55-8.

5. Interview with Vasili Nesterovich Kulchitski conducted by Sir Thomas Hetherington in Lutsk, Ukraine, January 27, 1989. See also interview with Sevastian Stanislavovich Solubchuk by Hetherington on January 28, 1989. These records are currently located in the NA.

6. See Tzvi (Vora) Verba, “Deeds of a Child,” in Porter and Merin, Jewish Partisans, 2:115–122; his testimony can be found in file YVA, O-3/1332.

7. Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005), p. 317; interview with Arhip Anyisomich Mifanik conducted by Sir Thomas Hetherington in Lutsk, Ukraine, January 27, 1989; interview of Isaac Kirzner and Ben Finkel by William Chalmers on September 8, 1988; interviews in the NA. See also V. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni: Zhertvy i pamiat' (Lutsk, 2003), p. 33; and AŽIH, 301/926.

8. The ChGK report, GARF, 7021-55-8. See also the interview with Aleksei Stepanovich Slipchuk conducted by Sir Thomas Hetherington in Lutsk, Ukraine, January 26, 1989, NA.

MEDZHIBOZH

Pre-1941: Medzhibozh, town and raion center, Proskurov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Medshibosh, Rayon center, Gebiet Letischew, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Medzhybizh, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Medzhibozh is located about 35 kilometers (22 miles) east of Proskurov, at the confluence of the Southern Bug and Buzhok Rivers. Just prior to the German invasion, the Jewish population of Medzhibozh was approximately 5,000.¹

The German army occupied Medzhibozh on July 8, 1941.² On the first day of the occupation, the Germans forced Jewish men to shovel sand. Others were required to lie facedown in the mud so that officers could walk across their backs as a bridge. Others were required to sing, grovel in the grass, and dance for photographers.³

Within a few days, SS men came and formed a ghetto in the main part of town. The Jews were driven to one of the worst streets of the town—Bath Street—with 15 to 20 people squeezed into each room of a number of small houses. There was also considerable plundering of Jewish property during the move, as the Gestapo allowed only a short time for the move to be completed. Everything that was left behind was lost. The ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by the Ukrainian police. Those who went too close to the fence were severely punished. The German captain in charge was Willy Kepke.⁴ The head Ukrainian local policeman was named Pavlovsky. Another local policeman was named Blonsky.⁵

The elder of the ghetto was Moishe Viener.⁶ Work consisted of clearing snow in the winter. In the spring of 1942, work details were involved in hauling stones (in a quarry 14 kilometers [9 miles] outside of town) and road construction.⁷ Workers at the quarry not only had to walk all the way there and back but also received terrible beatings. On April 14, 1942, 200 men were transferred from the ghetto to work at the front as slave laborers. What remained of Jewish property was consumed by contributions, taxes, bribes, and robbery. Food rations got smaller and averaged 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per day. Some Jews left the ghetto to beg or barter remaining items for food. By 1942, the Jewish inhabitants of the ghetto began to die of starvation. Initially people were taken out on a cart to be buried in the cemetery. Local inhabitants who observed these frequent processions became aware of the high rate of mortality in the ghetto. However, once the authorities began demanding money for this, they were buried in a yard.⁸ Several weeks before the mass shooting in September, the Ashkenazi synagogue was razed to the ground, and fragments of the Sefer Torah were scattered to the winds.

On September 21, 1942,⁹ more than 1,000 people were shot at a mass grave near Rusanovtsy, on the western outskirts of Medzhibozh at a ravine leading to the Southern Bug River. By November 2, 1942, the ghetto was completely liquidated. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) reports, the Germans and their collaborators massacred 2,558 to 2,588 people in total, in three trenches at the mass killing site.¹⁰

In the predawn hours of September 21, a truck unloaded 50 SS men at the gate of the ghetto. Fearing another pogrom (there were several perpetrated during the month of August), many people hid in bunkers they had prepared. People were so anxious that they slept in their clothes. At dawn, more than 1,000 people were driven to the mass killing site and shot. By noon, the killings were completed. SS soldiers tore apart the ghetto looking for valuables and hidden Jews. That afternoon, approximately 250 Jews were found and brought to barracks in the castle. About 80 were selected for a work detail the next morning; the rest were shot. Throughout the next three days, more Jews were discovered in the ghetto and brought to the barracks. During their time in the barracks, workers were fed 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread a day. The work detail was transferred to the prison camp at Letichev.¹¹

There was no known resistance in the area. Moishe Einhorn and Rose Huberman spent some time in the Medzhibozh ghetto and were part of the work detail transferred to Letichev after the first mass killing. They escaped from Letichev and sought refuge in Proskurov. Later, they escaped together from the Proskurov ghetto to Transnistria.¹² Huberman returned to live the rest of her life in Medzhibozh.¹³ Thirteen-year old Bronya Zats ran from the mass killing site during the executions. She swam across the Southern Bug River, and presumably the Nazis thought she had drowned. She was helped by Ukrainian farmers, and her identity was hidden throughout the rest of the occupation.¹⁴ These three are the only survivors of the ghetto on whom documentation could be found. Apparently some Jews may also have survived by passing as Ukrainians and being sent to Germany as forced laborers in the mines.¹⁵

A Ukrainian policeman named Blonsky was arrested in Medzhibozh and sentenced to 25 years in prison by the Soviet authorities after the war.¹⁶ Pavlovsky was rumored to have fled to Canada.

SOURCES Translations of many of the relevant testimonies used for this article can be found in David Chapin and Ben Weinstock, The Road from Letichev: The History and Culture of a Forgotten Jewish Community in Eastern Europe, vol. 2 (Lincoln, NE: iUniverse, 2000), chap. 16, "Holocaust."

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-92); USHMM; and YIU (no. 618).

David Chapin and Ben Weinstock

NOTES

1. Computed by adding 9 percent to the 1926 figures, accounting for population growth.

2. Newspaper Za Chest' Rodiny, no. 27, March 30, 1944.

3. Testimony of Moshe Einhorn, from the 1981 edition of the Yiddish-language periodical Sovietish Heimland, published in translation in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road, pp. 683–696. The photographs could not be located.

4. Ibid.; YIU, Témoin no. 618.

5. Tevye Goldberg, interviewed by Yuliy Lifshits, Jewish Preservation Committee of Ukraine, 1998. Translated in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road, pp. 805–810.

6. Einhorn testimony.

7. I. Goland and V. Dymshits, "Report of a Trip to Staray Sinyava and Pilyava: An Interview with Bronya Khalfina July 31, 1989," in V. Dymshits, The History of Jews in Ukraine and Byelorussia, Expeditions, Monuments, Finds (St. Petersburg: Petersburg Jewish University, History and Ethnography, Series Issue 2, 1994). Translated in part by Chapin and Weinstock in The Road, pp. 697–698. Note: Bronya Zats Khalfin was very sick at the time of the interview, and her thoughts are somewhat incoherent. A better source may be Hershel Polianker, "In Medzhibozh," Sovietish Heimland, no. 1 (1982): 148–158.

8. Einhorn testimony; Khalfin testimony; YIU, Témoin no. 618.

9. Einhorn testimony.

10. USHMM, RG-22.002M (GARF), reel 2, 7021-64-92, p. 2. See also DAKhO, Fond 363, case 39, p. 78, "About concentration camps and places of mass killing of Soviet people by the Fascists in the Territory of Khmel'nitsky Oblast' at the time of the Fascist occupation." Summary translations in English are available in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road, pp. 746–750.

11. Einhorn testimony.

12. Ibid.

13. Sonya and Charles Bick visited her in Medzhibozh on July 26, 1990.

14. Khalfin testimony.

15. Ibid.

16. Goldberg testimony.

MIĘDZYRZECZ

Pre-1939: Międzyrzecz, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Velikie Mezhirichi, initially, raion center, Rovno oblast', then, village, Korets raion, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Meshiritschi, Rayon center, Gebiet Rowno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Velyki Mezhyrichi, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Międzyrzecz is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) east of Równe. According to the 1921 population census, 1,743 Jews lived in the village. By the middle of 1941, allowing for a population growth of 0.9 percent per annum, there would have been approximately 2,108 Jews living there.¹

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the village on July 6, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration (the Ortskommandantur in Korzec) governed the village, and from September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Międzyrzecz (renamed Meshiritschi) became a Rayon center in Gebiet Rowno. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Beer.² There was a German Gendarmerie post in Międzyrzecz, as well as a Ukrainian police squadron.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, an antisemitic mood prevailed in the village, and Ukrainian nationalists organized a pogrom. Many Jewish homes were looted, and a number of Jews were assaulted.³

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in the village. A Judenrat was formed. Jews had to wear distinguishing marks in the form of the Star of David.⁴ They were ordered to perform heavy labor, mostly without pay. Jews could not leave the borders of the settlement. They were subjected to systematic robbery and assault by the local Ukrainian police.

According to Isaiah Trunk, the chairman of the Jewish Council, Abraham Shvetz, committed suicide after the Germans ordered him to deliver more than 100 young and healthy Jews, ostensibly for labor in Kiev. Reports from local non-Jews indicate that these Jews were subsequently killed in a mass grave.⁵

On May 22, 1942, an SD detachment arrived from Równe and directed an Aktion against the Jews in the village, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and local Ukrainian police. Around 1,000 Jews were killed.⁶ The 37 members of the 1st Company of the 33rd Police Reserve Battalion also took part in the Aktion.⁷

Shortly after this Aktion, the Gebietskommissar ordered the establishment of an open ghetto in Międzyrzecz. All the Jews who had survived the Aktion on May 22, and also a number from surrounding villages, were forcibly resettled into an area composed of a few empty dwellings on only two streets. The ghetto probably remained unfenced, but it was closely guarded by the Ukrainian police, so it was impossible for the Jews to leave.⁸ According to Trunk, there was a youth resistance group in the ghetto, which planned to escape to the forests, but when they consulted the new chairman of the Judenrat, Isaiah Rubinstein, he replied: "Believe me, I too would have escaped together with you, but how can one abandon the ghetto? You may escape, but next day the Germans will kill everyone, including your families." Thus the German policy of threatening reprisals, if any Jew went missing, held back the youth of the Międzyrzecz ghetto from executing their escape plans.⁹

On September 26, 1942 (the Sukkot holiday), the ghetto was liquidated. The SD unit from Równe together with the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police shot around 800 or 900 Jews altogether.¹⁰ Only a few Jews managed to evade the initial roundup and ensuing searches. Some of them found refuge with local peasants and managed to survive until the end of the German occupation in early 1944.

SOURCES Information on the destruction of the Jewish population of Międzyrzecz can be found in the following publications: "Miedzyrzec," in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 127–130; B.H. Ayalon-Baranick, Mezeritch gadol be-vinyana u-be-burbana (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Mezhritch, 1955); Isaiah Trunk, Judenrat: The Jewish Councils in Eastern Europe under Nazi Occupation (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996), pp. 444, 462; and "Velikie Mezhirichi," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:223.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Międzyrzecz under German occupation can be found in the following archives: DARO (R48-1-10); GARF (7021-71-58); TsGAVO (3676-4-317); VHF (e.g., # 1222, 40997); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2218, 3479-80).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel and Tatyana Feith

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), p. 363.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 66.

4. See the order of the Ortskommandantur Korez of August 6, 1941, for the Rayons of Beresowo, Hoschtscha, Korez, and Meshiritschi, DARO, R48-1-10, p. 16.

5. VHF, # 1222, testimony of Samuel Honigman.

6. According to Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, 4:223, the number of Jewish victims was 950.

7. See the report of the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer in Ukraine for the period June 1–30, 1942, TsGAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 29.

8. VHF, # 40997, testimony of Mordekay Tenenb'om; # 1222, Honigman, however, states that the ghetto was fenced.

9. Questionnaire 815, as cited by Trunk, Judenrat, pp. 444, 462.

10. Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, 4:223, gives the figure of 900 victims. VHF, # 40997, estimates that there were around 800 Jews in the ghetto prior to the liquidation Aktion.

MIELNICA

Pre-1939: Mielnica (Yiddish: Melnitz), village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Mel'nitsa, Goloby raion, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mielniza, Rayon Goloby, Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Mel'nytsia, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Mielnica is located about 30 kilometers (19 miles) east of Kowel. According to the population census of 1921, 875 Jews lived in Mielnica. The town came under Soviet control in September 1939 and received an influx of refugees from western and central Poland. In 1941, just prior to the German invasion, there were probably slightly more than 1,000 Jews in the village.¹

German military forces occupied the village on June 26, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered Mielnica. Authority passed to a German civil administration in September 1941. Mielnica was included in Gebiet Kowel, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Regierungsrat Arno Kämpf became the Gebietskommissar, a position he held until June 1942. Leutnant Philipp Rapp became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.² In July 1942, Kämpf was arrested and executed for taking bribes from the Jews. He was replaced as Gebietskommissar by Erich Kassner, Kämpf's former chief of staff (Stabsleiter).

An elder was named to run local matters in the village. A number of Ukrainian policemen were also appointed. They served under the command of the German Gendarmerie outpost, based in Hołoby.

In July 1941, the first two Aktions were carried out against the male Jewish population in Mielnica: 56 young Jewish men were shot in the course of the "first Aktion," which took place at the start of the month. Some of them were betrayed by a local Polish antisemite who had been a headmaster under Polish rule and alleged that they had been Communists and political activists. The second Aktion took place in the middle of July, when some 280 men were killed. The Aktion was probably conducted by the 2nd Company of the 314th Police Battalion, which was deployed in Hołoby on July 14, 1941.³

In the summer and autumn of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Mielnica. First the Jews were registered and ordered to wear distinctive markings on their clothing. According to Leya Rog, their food ration was limited to 90 grams (3.2 ounces) of pumpernickel bread mixed with straw each day. Jews were forced to give up the land surrounding their houses to Ukrainians, including their vegetable gardens, and were compelled to cease their previous professions and other paid work. The Germans also demanded a ransom in money and gold from the Jews. A Judenrat was established that organized forced labor for the Jews, mostly in the form of cutting peat. The Jews were otherwise more or less confined to their houses and had to rely on any food that neighbors periodically brought to them secretly.⁴ The remaining Jews from the Rayon town of Hołoby were brought to Mielnica in late 1941.⁵

In the middle of August 1942, a ghetto was created in the village. It was established on Bozhichnaia Street, where two synagogues were located, and was cordoned off from the rest of the village.⁶ The Jews were given only a few minutes to leave their homes and all the contents. They were made to run as they carried their meager possessions with them into the ghetto, being beaten and threatened by shots fired into the air. Several families were now crammed into each house.⁷

The total number of Jews in the ghetto may have been as many as 1,200, including Jews brought in at this time from surrounding villages, such as Kaszówka. These Jews brought with them the disturbing news that non-Jews had been preparing pits on the outskirts of town.⁸ The Jews were left to starve for a number of days, as they could not leave the ghetto either to work or to beg for food. At the end of August 1942, the Germans demanded a further ransom, and when the Jews were unable to meet this demand, the Germans murdered the rabbi and the head of the Judenrat.⁹

On September 3, 1942, at 4:00 A.M., five Germans and around 100 Ukrainian policemen surrounded the ghetto. They gathered the Jews at an assembly point and then marched them out to a sand quarry near the southwestern border of the village, where they shot them all. Those in hiding heard the desperate prayers of old people, the crying of children, and the constant sound of gunshots. After the Jews had been murdered, the local police continued to search for Jews hiding in and around the ghetto, murdering any they could find. Local Ukrainians also looted the empty houses, and some subsequently took them as their own homes. Only a few Jews were able to escape the mass shooting. Among them was 12-year-old Zoja Baler, who, after hiding for a few days in the empty ghetto and fleeing to the forests, found shelter for some time in a family camp protected by a well-disposed Soviet partisan commander named "Max."¹⁰ Some escapees were murdered by Ukrainian bandits (Banderowcy) who roamed the forests and also killed Poles in 1943, after deserting from the local police. On March 16, 1944, when Mielnica was liberated by the Red Army, only six Jews returned to the town.

In 1974 the Ukrainian policeman Ivan A. Klovich returned to Mielnica and was arrested by the Soviet authorities. He was tried together with his accomplices, P.D. Pravo-shchik, Volka Redoshinsky, S.S. Zagurski, and A.D. Gogolyuk, for participation in the murder of Jews, Poles, and Soviet partisans in Mielnica, Kowel, and the surrounding area. All were initially sentenced to death, but for two of them the sentences were reduced on appeal to 15 years' hard labor.¹¹

SOURCES The yizkor book for Mielnica contains a section in English that includes several personal accounts and articles on the Holocaust period: Joshua Lior, ed., Melnitsab: Pelekh Voblin, Ukra'inah: Sefer hantsabah, 'edut ve-zikaron li-kehillat Melnitsab (Tel Aviv: yots'e Melnitsah be-Yisrael uva-tefutsot, 1994). A short article on the fate of the Jewish population of Mielnica can also be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 134–135. The testimony of Leya Rog has been published in Boris Zabarko, ed.,

Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 246–247. Additional information can be found in Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), pp. 73, 363.

Documentation and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews in Mielnica can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/299 and 2871); DAVO; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Lior, Melnitsab, pp. 19–45; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 820. A colorful impressionistic sketch map of the village as it was in the 1930s, including all the houses, can be found in the USHMM Archives, RG-03.017*01.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. Zelda Baller Lior, “A Childhood without Childhood,” in Lior, Melnitsab, pp. 54–60.

4. Testimony of Leya Rog, in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 246–247; Lior, Melnitsab, p. 78.

5. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 84. In 1931, 350 Jews were residing in Hołoby.

6. Testimony of Rog, in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 246–247.

7. Lior, “A Childhood without Childhood,” p. 55.

8. Ibid., and Leya Rog, “In the Footsteps of the Ukrainian Murderers,” in Lior, Melnitsab, pp. 48–52. In this testimony, Rog dates the establishment of the ghetto on September 1, 1942.

9. Lior, Melnitsab, p. 78.

10. Testimony of Rog, in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 246–247; Rog, “In the Footsteps of the Ukrainian Murderers,” pp. 48–52; AŻIH, 301/299, testimony of Zoja Baler (born 1930); and Lior, “A Childhood without Childhood,” pp. 54–60. According to some sources, approximately 200 Jews from Powórsk were also brought to Mielnica and killed at this time: see Spector and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, p. 1019. The Jewish survivor Basia Katz, however, maintains that the Powórsk Jews were killed in trenches dug to hold gasoline tanks close to the village of Powórsk; see interview by Mr. William Chalmers on September 9, 1988.

11. Rog, “In the Footsteps of the Ukrainian Murderers,” pp. 48–52.

MIKASZEWICZE

Pre-1939: Mikaszewicze, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Mikashevichi, Luninets raion, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Mikashevitsche, Rayon center, Gebiet Pinsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Mikashevichy, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Mikaszewicze is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) east-northeast of Pińsk. According to the 1921 population census, there were 178 Jews living in Mikaszewicze. By June 1941, allowing for an annual increase of 9 or 10 persons per 1,000, there would have been more than 200 Jews in the town. The actual number was probably higher, owing to the arrival of a number of Jewish refugees from western and central Poland in the fall of 1939.

German forces occupied Mikaszewicze at the start of July 1941. In July and August, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled Mikaszewicze. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Mikaszewicze was incorporated into Gebiet Pinsk in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Mikaszewicze. They established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) as an intermediary body between the Jewish population and the German authorities. In November 1941, the civil authorities in Mikaszewicze issued an order that Jews over the age of 10 must wear yellow markers on the front and back of their clothes and that Jews were forbidden to use the sidewalks.¹ Jews were also required to perform forced labor and were robbed and beaten by the local police.

At some date before July 1942, probably in May 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto in Mikaszewicze into which some Jews were also resettled from nearby villages.² Between March and May of 1942, a number of men capable of work and aged between 14 and 60 years were selected from among the Jews in Mikaszewicze and, together with Jews from Lenin and Łachwa, were transported in railroad cars to a forced labor camp in Hancewicze.³

On August 6, 1942, a detachment of the Security Police and SD from Pińsk traveled to Mikaszewicze to conduct an Aktion against the ghetto. Assisted by forces of the Gendarmerie and the local police (Schutzmannschaft-Einzeldienst), officers of the Security Police shot the Jews next to the railway line. After the slaughter and in accordance with standard practice, the Security Police commander in Pińsk, SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhelm Rasp, prepared a report for the Commanding Officer of the Security Police (KdS) in Równe in which he stated that on August 6, 1942, 102 men, 159 women, and 159 children (420 Jews in total) were “executed” (shot) in Mikaszewicze. For economic and hygiene-related reasons, three engineers and two doctors were temporarily spared.⁴ On the day of the massacre, the local factory in Mikaszewicze ordered that the medical instruments of one of the doctors, the female doctor, Epshtein, be collected from her house in the ghetto, as they were necessary for her work at the factory.⁵

A Jewish photographer from the nearby ghetto of Lenin, Faye Schulman, took photographs for the Germans in the summer of 1942. After she escaped to the partisans in September 1942, she was able to save some of her photographs, including one of the bodies of the Jews shot in Mikaszewicze.⁶

SOURCES Information on the extermination of the Jews in Mikaszewicze can be found in “Mikaszewicze,” in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities:

Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 269. The ghetto in Mikaszewicze is mentioned in V.I. Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: Staatskomitee für Archive und Aktenführung der Republik Belarus, 2001), p. 91.

Documents concerning the extermination of the Jews in Mikaszewicze can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/2441); GABO (2733-1-5, 36, and 40); IPN; USHMM (Acc.1996.A.0169, reel 22); and YVA (e.g., M-41/1024 and 1026-27).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0169 (YVA, M-41/1026), Order issued by the local authorities in Mikaszewicze, November 17, 1941.

2. Ibid., Acc.1996.A.0169 (YVA, M-41/1024), an order issued by the local authorities in Mikaszewicze, dated July 25, 1942, mentions the existence of a ghetto in the town. The ghetto in nearby Lenin was established on May 10, 1942.

3. L. Bakal and Z. Tsukerman, eds., Poslednie svideteli (Moscow, 2002), pp. 223–230; Shalom Cholawsky, The Jews of Bielorrussia during World War II (Amsterdam: Harwood, 1998), p. 109.

4. IPN, GKŚZpNP, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 2, report of Sturmscharführer Rasp to KdS Rowno, August 8, 1942.

5. USHMM, Acc.1996.A.0169 (YVA, M-41/1027), factory in Mikaszewicze, order regarding the collection of medical instruments belonging to the Jewish female doctor Epshtein, August 6, 1942.

6. See Faye Schulman, Die Schreie meines Volkes in mir: Wie ich als jüdische Partisanin den Holocaust überlebte (Munich: Lichtenberg, 1998), p. 99.

MIKHALPOL'

Pre-1941: Mikhalpol', village and raion center in Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Michalpol, Rayon center, Gebiet Jarmolinzy, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Mikhaylivka, Iarmolyntsy raion, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Mikhalpol' is located about 30 kilometers (19 miles) south-southeast of Proskurov. In 1897, the Jewish population was 1,392. Under Soviet rule in the 1930s, there was a Jewish kolkhoz close to the village. According to the 1939 population census, there were 728 Jews living in Mikhalpol' (34 percent of the total population) and 909 Jews within what was then the Mikhalpol' raion. After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, more than 100 Jews managed to evacuate to the east or joined the Red Army. Not more than 600 Jews are estimated to have remained in Mikhalpol' at the start of the occupation.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Mikhalpol' on July 11, 1941. In July and August, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. A local Ukrainian named Nachubski was appointed as mayor of the town. In September 1941, authority was passed to a German civil administration. Mikhalpol' became a Rayon center in Gebiet Jarmolinzy, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Kameradschaftsführer Ernst Mertes was the Gebietskommissar in Iarmolintsy. Under the civil administration, the only Germans based in Mikhalpol' were the agricultural leader (Sonderführer [Landwirtschaft]), Wilhelm Knöchelmann, and his assistant, who were responsible for the various estates in Rayon Michalpol and were subordinated to the Kreislandwirt, Karl Wiegmann, in Iarmolintsy. There was also a squad of more than 10 Ukrainian police based in Mikhalpol', subordinated to the head of the Ukrainian police in Iarmolintsy. A German Gendarmerie post was not established in the village until after the increase in partisan warfare in the region during 1943.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Mikhalpol'. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was set up as an intermediary body between the Jewish population and the German authorities, and Jews were ordered to wear identifying badges. In addition, Jews were ordered to perform forced labor and forbidden to leave the limits of the village. According to a Soviet postwar publication, in the middle of July 1941, the Ukrainian Nachtigall Battalion arrived from Lwów, and its members took part in the shootings of Jews in the village.¹

According to the postwar testimony of German agricultural leader Wilhelm Knöchelmann, there was already a ghetto for the Jews in Mikhalpol' on his arrival there (in around November 1941). He estimated that there were about 100 to 150 Jews in the ghetto, but the actual number was most probably higher. The ghetto was a part of the village, and the Jews were housed separately from the rest of the population. "The 'commandant' of these Jews [head of the Judenrat], himself a Jew, often came to me and placed Jews at my disposal for work." The Jews were used mainly in agricultural work in and around the village.²

In late October 1942, the Jews from the ghetto in Mikhalpol' were rounded up and transferred under close escort to Iarmolintsy by forces of the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, including about 14 members of the local police in Mikhalpol'. In Iarmolintsy, all the Jews gathered from Gebiet Jarmolinzy were confined within a derelict barracks compound close to the railway station for a number of days.³ On the arrival of a detachment of Security Police and SD from Starokonstantinov, under the command of SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Graf, the Jews were shot in groups into three pits prepared nearby. The Ukrainian police were stationed around the execution site to isolate it and to prevent the prisoners from escaping. In total about 6,400 Jews were shot there over the course of about six hours.⁴

During the occupation, which lasted from July 11, 1941, to March 27, 1944, there were 662 residents of the village killed altogether, the majority of whom were Jews.⁵ Some 60 Jews were shot in Mikhalpol' itself.⁶ The remainder was killed in Iarmolinty. Very few Jews from Mikhalpol' are known to have survived.

SOURCES Documents of the ChGK and the testimonies of witnesses and survivors regarding the extermination of the Jews of Mikhalpol' can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/5072); DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-802, 818); VHF (# 8453); and YVA (M-52/179).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Krovavye zlodeianiia Oberlendera: Otchet o press-konferentsii dlia sovetsskikh i inostrannykh zhurnalistsov, sos-toiavsheisia v Moskve 5 aprelia 1960 g. (Moscow, 1960), p. 16.

2. BA-L, B 162/5072, pp. 394–395, statement of Wilhelm Knöchelmann, September 19, 1967. The existence of a ghetto and the use of Jews for forced labor are also mentioned in VHF, # 8453, testimony of Sonia Bershtein.

3. GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 203. See also BA-L, B 162/5073, pp. 649–657.

4. BA-L, B 162/5071, pp. 89–92, statement of Wilhelm Kurt Paul Grosse, January 8, 1960.

5. M.I. Mekheda, ed., Istoriia mist i sil Ukrains'koi RSR: Kbmel'nyts'ka oblast' (Kiev: Holovna Redaktsiia Ukrains'koi Radians'koi Entsiklopedii Akademii Nauk URSR, 1971), pp. 655–656.

6. YVA, M-52/179, p. 19.

MIN'KOVTSY

Pre-1941: Min'kovtsy (Yiddish: Minkovits), village and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Minkowzy, Gebiet Dunajewzy, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Min'kovtsy, Dunaiivtsi raion, Kbmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Min'kovtsy is approximately 45 kilometers (28 miles) northwest of Kamenets-Podolskii. According to the 1939 census, there were 1,635 Jews living in Min'kovtsy, accounting for 46.6 percent of the total population, and another 777 Jews in the rest of what was then the Min'kovtsy raion (2,412 Jews in total).¹

German armed forces occupied the village on July 12, 1941, three weeks after their invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. In these three weeks, a small number of Jews managed to evacuate eastward, and some of the men were conscripted into or volunteered for military service in the Red Army. At the same time, some Jewish refugees arrived in the village.

In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the village. It appointed a village elder (starosta) and formed an auxiliary police force. In September 1941, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Min'kovtsy became a Rayon center in Gebiet Dunajewzy, which in turn was part of Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.

In July and August 1941, the German military authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Min'kovtsy: a Judenrat was set up; Jews were required to wear distinguishing markings bearing the Star of David; they were used for forced labor, such as carrying stones; they were forbidden to leave the village; and they were systematically robbed, beaten, and mocked by the Ukrainian police.

According to the The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, in early August 1941, all the Jews remaining in the village were forced to move into a ghetto.² Jews from the surrounding villages, and most likely the Jewish refugees as well, also were herded into the ghetto.

The ghetto was in existence only for about three weeks; it was liquidated on August 30, 1941, when the 320th Police Battalion (commanded by Police Major Kurt Dall) shot 2,200 Jews.³ According to a local witness, Ivan Bodnar, the German and local police rounded up all the Jews on the main street and escorted them to three large pits, which had been prepared nearby. There the Jews were forced to undress and were shot in the pits in groups of 10 to 15 people. The local policemen played an active role in the shooting. Local inhabitants looted the Jewish houses, and some were sold to people in need of a place to live.⁴

After the Aktion, the Ukrainian police caught another 70 or so Jews who had been hiding in various places. According to Bodnar, these Jews were not shot but were placed in a single building, marked with a yellow Star of David on the front door, forming a remnant ghetto. The building was not guarded, but all the Jews were registered and had to wear distinguishing markings on their chest and back. Some local inhabitants gave food secretly to the Jews, who suffered from hunger.⁵

Initially these Jews were used for various types of forced labor, and then they were sent to the Dunaevtsy ghetto and shot there in October 1942, along with the other Jews in that ghetto.⁶

SOURCES Information about the Jewish community of Min'kovtsy can be found in Avraham Rozen, H. Sarig, and Y. Bernshtain, eds., Kaminits-Podolsk u-sevivatah: Sefer-zikaron li-kehillot Yisrael ba-'arim Kaminits-Podolsk, Balin, Dunivits, Zamibov, Zvanits, Minkovits, Smotrits', Frampol, Kupin, Kiteygorod she-bushmedu bi-yeme ha-Sbo'ah 'al-yede ha-Natsim bi-shenat 701/arukh bi-yede (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Kamenets-Podolsk u-sevivatah be-Yisrael, 1965). The Min'kovtsy ghetto is mentioned in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 826.

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Min'kovtsy can be found in the following archives: DAKhO (863-2-44); GARF (7021-64-802); YIU (no. 684); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Centre for Research and Documentation of East-European Jewry, 1993), p. 50.

2. Spector and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, p. 826.

3. VHAP, Kommando-Stab Reichsführer SS, Radiogram from the HSSPF Russland Süd, no. 56, August 31, 1941, published in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 gg (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), p. 247. According to ChGK documents (GARF, 7021-64-802, p. 88), 1,840 people were shot in Min'kovtsy on August 31, 1941.

4. YIU, Témoigné no. 864, Ivan Timofevich Bodnar (born 1924), February 5, 2009.

5. Ibid.

6. Spector and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, p. 826.

MIZOCZ

Pre-1939: Mizocz, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Mizoch, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Misotsch, Rayon center, Gebiet Sdolbunow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Mizoch, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Mizocz is located on the Stubla River, about 26 kilometers (16 miles) south–southwest of Równo. In 1921, the town's Jewish population was 882. By June 1941, it had increased to more than 2,000, including a number of refugees from the German-occupied region of Poland. When Germany attacked the Soviet Union, a few Jews fled with the retreating Red Army.

Under the Soviets, as many refugees from German-occupied Poland fled German atrocities, the Jewish population of Mizocz swelled considerably. Many of the newcomers, however, were deported into the Soviet interior before the German invasion.¹

On June 29, 1941, two days after the Germans entered Mizocz, “local Ukrainians carried out a pogrom against the Jews” in which several Jews were killed.² The German military stopped it. Almost immediately, a curfew was established, and Jews were ordered to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David. This was replaced later by patches, two yellow circles, one to be worn on the left side of the chest and the other on the right side of the back. Jews had to step down from sidewalks when encountering a German. Men had to take off their hats. Signs such as “Nicht für Juden” (Jews prohibited) were posted in public areas around town. Relations with Ukrainians had also changed; many refused to acknowledge their former Jewish friends, and for their own safety they needed to act like everyone else and express their hatred for the Jews.³ The Germans established a Ukrainian police force, headed by Mizoczkyk; its main purpose was to persecute and rob the Jews.

The Judenrat was established shortly after the arrival of the Germans. According to Asher Gilberg, Aba Shtivl was the chairman.⁴ Its members included Shmuel Bunis, Melekh Guskak, Moshe Berez, Yona Nemirover, Avraham Vaynshteyn, and Hirsh Goldbrener, who represented the refugees. Moshe

Rudman served as secretary. There was a Jewish police force, headed by Goldbrener. Gilberg comments positively on the heads of the Judenrat and the Jewish Police. In the summer and fall of 1941, the Jewish Police assisted in collecting money, valuables, and other items demanded by the Germans as a “contribution.”

In the spring of 1942, the Gebietskommissar in Zdołbunów announced that a ghetto would be established in Mizocz. All Jews from Mizocz and the surrounding villages were ordered to move into the ghetto, but the actual transfer was probably not completed until June.⁵ The precise number of Jews in the ghetto is not known, but the number probably exceeded 2,500, with some sources putting it as high as 3,500. The ghetto was located in the old part of town called “miasto” (the town). It bordered on the Market Square on one side and the Stubla River on the other. It remained an open ghetto and was not surrounded by a wall or other physical barriers and was not closely guarded. People were able to move in and out rather freely, conduct business, buy food, and trade belongings. There was no starvation in the Mizocz ghetto. According to Asher Gilberg, the area of the ghetto was actually enlarged after its initial establishment.⁶

From the very beginning, Jews had to perform forced labor. The work included washing wounded soldiers' laundry, snow removal, farmwork, and construction work in nearby Zdołbunów for the German firm Josef Jung from Solingen.

Despite the public hanging of Zeyde Gelman for illegal slaughtering, and several arrests, the German administration of Mizocz was relatively benign.⁷ The Germans promised members of the Judenrat and others who worked for them that their lives were safe because they were needed. Despite the slaughters that were taking place in surrounding areas, the Jews of Mizocz largely believed the Germans.

Early in the morning of October 13, 1942, the ghetto was cordoned off and surrounded by a combined force of the SD from Równe, German Gendarmerie, and armed Ukrainian Schutzmannen. Everyone was herded to the “Platz” in the market square with the assistance of large dogs. Helen Segall recalls that “the crowd of people moved as one huge body as they were being chased to the market square by Ukrainian Schutzmannen, and that the collective scream of the victims sounded inhuman, deafening, and unbearable.” She also remembers that as she and her Aunt Natalie ran back to the house where they had been staying, to the safety of a hiding place located between the walls of two buildings, she saw a man in brown trousers, a trench coat, and a fedora hat pouring gasoline from a large rectangular can onto the houses as he ran in the opposite direction. Segall further recalls that later as smoke began to penetrate their hiding place, they had to leave it. They discovered that the whole town was a burning inferno. Surrounded by burning buildings, together with others, they ran along the widest street downhill towards the river. They were flanked on both sides by walls of raging hot flames.⁸

Late the same afternoon, people herded to the Platz were organized into a column and marched under guard to the end of town where, on a knoll opposite the sugar factory, a huge

2-meter-deep (6.6-foot-deep) trench dug for the neighboring brick factory had been prepared, awaiting its victims. As in other Volhynian towns, people had to undress and walk in small groups into the trench and lie facedown, where they were shot by an SS man helped by a Ukrainian Schutzmann.⁹ The slaughter lasted long into the night and continued the next day as people trying to escape were caught and brought there. Thus, after two days, October 13 and 14, 1942, the Jewish community of Mizocz ceased to exist.

During the summer and fall of 1942, there seems to have been the beginning of a planned resistance movement in Mizocz, when a number of young people attempted to buy weapons in Zdołbunów, but they did not succeed. Thus, the major signs of resistance were the huge fire set by ghetto residents and a brief struggle with blunt weapons while the ghetto was in the process of being liquidated. Spector and others describe the Mizocz fire as an act of resistance intended to create panic and confusion, to make it possible for a large number of people to escape. Segall writes that “at the time I resented the fire which forced us from the seeming safety of our hiding place. I believed that the fire was set to destroy all material goods and possessions so that they would not fall into German and Ukrainian hands.” Actually, there is little doubt that the fire did cause panic and commotion and indeed helped a large number of people escape, although many were later caught and shot. The next day (October 14, 1942) dead bodies were strewn on the banks of the river and on both sides of the road leading from Mizocz. One of the side tragedies caused by the fire was that about 200 people died in the flames, most probably caught in their hiding places.

The Soviet army liberated Mizocz in February 1944. Very few Jews had survived. Those who survived had hidden in the forests, joined the partisans, or were concealed by their Polish, Czech, and Ukrainian friends. In 1963–1964 a series of trials of the German Gendarmerie officials were held in Nürnberg-Fürth. Joseph Paur and Wilhelm Wacker were tried and convicted for their role in the ghetto liquidations in Zdołbunów, Mizocz, and Ostróg. Paur received a seven-year prison sentence, and Wacker was sentenced for three years.¹⁰

Thus, the Jewish community of Mizocz, which had been there for 300 years, was exterminated during those two days in October 1942. After the old town and its ghetto were reduced to ashes, Mizocz lost its “town status.” It is now listed as “a settlement with urban characteristics.”

SOURCES Relevant publications regarding the Mizocz ghetto include the following: Asher ben-Oni, ed., Mizocz: Sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Mizots’ be-Yisrael, 1961); Ray Brandon and Wendy Lower, eds., The Shoah in Ukraine: History, Testimony, Memorialization (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2008); Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 19 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 553, pp. 319–361; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1003; and A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 209.

Relevant documentation on the fate of the Jews of Mizocz during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/1795); BA-L (B 162/1585-1601, 4691, 14154); DARO; GARF (7021-71-59); USHMM; and VHF (e.g., # 7722, 46341). In addition, reference has been made to the author’s own unpublished manuscript, Helen Segall, “When the Lilacs Bloom: A Memoir.”

Helen Segall

NOTES

1. Yehuda Bronshteyn, “The Judenrat in Mizocz,” in ben-Oni, Mizocz, pp. 90–94.
2. Nachum Kopit, “In the Ghetto, Forced Labor, and in the Forests,” in ibid., pp. 33–53.
3. Bronshteyn, “The Judenrat in Mizocz,” pp. 90–94.
4. Asher Gilberg, “The Life and Death of Mizocz,” in ben-Oni, Mizocz, pp. 5–28.
5. JuNS-V, vol. 19, Lfd. Nr. 553, p. 328.
6. Gilberg, “The Life and Death,” pp. 5–28. Bronshteyn, “The Judenrat in Mizocz,” pp. 90–94, gives the figure of 3,500.
7. Gilberg, “The Life and Death,” pp. 5–28; JuNS-V, vol. 19, Lfd. Nr. 553, p. 329.
8. Segall, “When the Lilacs Bloom.”
9. The document compiled by the ChGK (GARF, 7021-71-59) erroneously states that “the police consisted of Germans and Hungarians.” The interrogation of Vinogradski and the entry in the Diary of a Young Man located in Rivne Archive (DARO) confirm that the Schutzmannen were Ukrainians.
10. JuNS-V, vol. 19, Lfd. Nr. 553, pp. 323–334.

MŁYNÓW

Pre-1939: Młynów (Yiddish: Mlinov), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Mlynov, Rovno oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mlinow, Rayon center, Gebiet Dubno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Mlyniv, raion center, Rivne oblast’, Ukraine

Młynów is located approximately 40 kilometers (25 miles) southwest of Równe. According to the 1921 census, 615 Jews were residing in Młynów; allowing for a natural growth rate of 9 people per 1,000 per year, it is estimated that there were some 730 Jews in the town in 1941. Besides the local Jews, several hundred Jewish refugees from the western parts of Volhynia settled in Młynów, so that there were approximately 1,500 Jews in the town at the start of the occupation. The Jewish population of Murawica (Yiddish: Muravits), the other main settlement in the Rayon, was 167 (total population, 376) in 1921.

Młynów was occupied by units of the German 6th Army on June 24, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German local commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) governed Młynów, and in September 1941, authority was transferred to a civil administration. Młynów then became part of Gebiet Dubno.

The Gebietskommissar was Nachwuchsführer Broks, and from the spring of 1942, the SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Eberhardt.¹ There was a Gendarmerie post in Młynów, as well as a squad of local Ukrainian police.

Soon after the occupation, Jews were ordered to wear a white armband with a blue Star of David, and they were also assigned to compulsory work. Notices posted on the streets required that Jewish men and women of ages 14 and older had to present themselves in the market square for labor, equipped with tools and cleaning equipment. Anyone who did not show up would be shot. In general, Jewish women were sent to do cleaning work and the men to work in the fields of the estate of Count Hudkiwicz. About 200 men were sent to work on the estate of Count Liudochowski, in the village of Smordwa. Jews were also brought there from the neighboring villages of Boremel and Demidówka. The director of the estate was an ethnic German (Volksdeutscher) named Grüner, a cruel sadist who made the men run downstairs and beat them in the middle of the night.

Immediately upon the arrival of the Germans, a Ukrainian police force was organized. They wore a blue and yellow armband on their left sleeves. On July 5, 1941, the first anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out in the town: more than 10 Jewish youths were shot as alleged Soviet activists, including Chaya Kupergloz, Rivka Bar, Freydl Rivits, and Yentl Mendlkern.² A few weeks later, between 10 and 15 Polish political activists (together with 1 Jew) were arrested and murdered. The town's rabbi, Yehuda Gordin, was also among the first victims in the summer of 1941. He was imprisoned by the Germans and interrogated for several days before he was killed. During August 1941, the mayor of Młynów collected Jewish gold, silver, and other valuable items, which were forwarded to Berlin via Równe by the Wehrmacht.³ Official receipts were even issued for the items collected. In a subsequent Aktion, Germans and hundreds of Ukrainian police with wagons confiscated everything they could get their hands on: bicycles, sewing machines, and furniture belonging to the Jews. This operation ended suddenly when a whistle was blown, causing some furniture to be left behind, as there was insufficient time to load it all.

In the fall of 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and a Jewish police force were set up. The former shopkeeper Hashas was appointed as the first chairman of the Judenrat; other members included Mordekhai Litvak, Chaim Yitskhak Kupergloz (the former kehillah chairman), Mordekhai Liberman, and Moshe ben Yaakov Holtsker. Among the policemen were Zelig Zider, Shlomo Shakhman, Perets Tesler, and Tsvi Gring. At this time the civil administration ordered the replacement of the white armbands for Jews with a yellow patch sewn on the chest and back.

In the fall of 1941, the Gebietskommissar in Dubno ordered the recruitment of about 50 Jews from Młynów for construction work in Równe. Ukrainian and Jewish police went from house to house looking for the men, using a list drawn up with the help of the Judenrat. Some of the men fled to the surrounding fields and villages. In place of those who had fled, the police took whomever they could find. The families of these men wept bitterly on their departure. The Germans murdered all the men once they had finished their work.

Prior to the construction of the ghetto, there was no acute lack of food, as most Jews still had some stores at home. However, in the fall of 1941, a Hungarian army unit came and confiscated the remaining stores of grain and beans from the Jews. Jews were still able to barter for food with the peasants after that time, in spite of the official ban.

At the end of 1941, the Judenrat announced that people with work certificates would not be taken into the planned ghetto. Therefore, Jews did everything they could to obtain these work certificates. There were also different categories of certificates. The "best" were "iron certificates," which were issued to dentists, goldsmiths, doctors, and other craftsmen employed personally by the Germans. In Młynów it was difficult to obtain these certificates, so some Jews traveled to Dubno with Ukrainian peasants, risking their lives to get them. On one of these illegal journeys, Yaakov Nudler—who was trying to obtain arms for the resistance—was discovered and killed.

On May 22, 1942, a ghetto was established. Two streets served as its borders: Szkolno and Duwinska. Permission was given for Jews from other streets to take their personal belongings with them. Those who were expelled from their homes moved into the houses on these streets. In a few instances, the Judenrat determined where people would stay. At this time the Jews of Murawica (about 150 people) were also brought into the Młynów ghetto. Owing to the overcrowding, the sanitary conditions worsened severely. In general, 7 or 8 people shared each room. The ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire and had two gates guarded by Ukrainian police. The Jewish Police usually accompanied those leaving the ghetto to work. Except for those who left to do work, nobody was allowed to leave the ghetto.

Immediately after the ghetto was set up, a general feeling set in that this was the prologue to the ghetto's liquidation. A few youths, among them Moshe Mendlkern, the Nakunitshnik brothers, the Liberman sisters, and several Jewish Police tried to organize resistance. At the head of the group was Avraham Ben-Tsion Holtsker. Shlomo Nakunitshnik had connections with people in the forests who had weapons. One of the partisans, a Pole, promised to provide arms for the Jewish youth in Młynów. The youth also prepared gasoline to burn down the ghetto in order to create confusion so they might escape during the liquidation. The group obtained two rifles, which they carefully hid, but ultimately they were unable to take concerted action.

In September 1942, rumors came of the ghetto liquidations in other towns nearby, and it was discovered that local peasants had been ordered to prepare a large pit in the valley between the towns of Młynów and Murawica, known as the kruzbuk, about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) from town. The first victims killed in this pit were the Taytman brothers, Fishl and Shlomo, who had left the ghetto without permission.

Before the liquidation, all the Jews who worked outside the ghetto on various farms were ordered to return. Some returned willingly to be with their families, while others had to be brought forcibly by the Ukrainian police.

The Ukrainian police, under German command, then surrounded the ghetto. Loudspeakers announced that it was forbidden to leave. Men, women, and children went out onto the streets. Panic and hysteria broke out. People prayed, wept, screamed, and reunited with their families. From time to time, lone gunshots and the rattle of the police motorcycles were heard. According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), on September 22, 1942, a team of the Security Police and SD from Równe, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, shot 980 Jews, and in October of 1942, another 520 Jews (sources differ as to the exact dates).⁴

On the liberation of Młynów by the Red Army in February 1944, only some 35 survivors returned to the town, and they all had moved to Równe by the end of the year.

SOURCES Much reference has been made in this article to the yizkor book edited by Yitshak Siegleman, Sefer Mlinov-Muravits (Haifa: Va'ad yots'e Mlinov-Muravits be-Yisrael, 1970); a brief article on the town can also be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 133–134.

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Młynów can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2882); DARO; GARF (7021-71-60); TsDAVO (4620-3-367); and YVA (O-3/3247, O-3/1878, M-1/E/1443, M-1/E/816).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. GARF, 7021-71-60, p. 5.

3. BA-BL, R 2104/21, pp. 341–462.

4. GARF, 7021-71-60, pp. 5–6. See also TsDAVO, 4620-3-367, pp. 5–6.

MOKROWO

Pre-1939: Mokrowo, village, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Mokrovo, Pinsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Mokrow, Rayon Luninez, Gebiet Pinsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Mokrovo, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Mokrowo is located about 90 kilometers (56 miles) east of Pińsk. In the 1930s, there were around 250 Jews altogether living in Mokrowo and the neighboring village of Sienkiewiczze.

German armed forces first occupied the two villages on July 3, 1941. Soon after the start of the occupation, all Jewish men over the age of 16 had to register for hard labor, and much Jewish property was confiscated.

According to the postwar testimony of Wilhelm Rasp, the head of the Security Police outpost (Aussendienststelle) in Pińsk from May 1942 until December 1943, a ghetto had been established in Mokrowo for the Jews living there (probably together with the Jews from Sienkiewiczze), at some date before August 1942, probably in the spring of 1942. At that time there were about 280 Jews living in the ghetto. The Jews had been left in Mokrowo, rather than being transferred to a larger ghetto, as there was a plywood factory in Mokrowo, which belonged to a Jewish engineer and probably supplied war materials for the German army.

According to Rasp, in around June 1942 he received a written order from Adolf Eichmann that all the Jews in his area of command were to be liquidated. The Kommandeur der Sicherheitspolizei (Sipo) und SD (KdS) in Równe, Dr. Pütz, Rasp's immediate superior, also confirmed this order verbally. When Rasp objected that he had neither appropriate weapons nor ammunition for this task, he received a visit from the Befehlshaber der Sipo und SD (BdS) in Kiev, SS-Brigadeführer Dr. Max Thomas, who accused him of disobeying orders and tasked him with counting the number of victims and securing the valuables during the ghetto liquidation Aktions. It was also his job to ensure that about one third of the Jews were kept back as workers and that there were no excesses of cruelty.

At the beginning of August 1942, Rasp traveled to Mokrowo together with the deputy Gebietskommissar in Pińsk, Alfred Ebner, to liquidate the ghetto. Ebner had received an order from Dr. Pütz to this end and insisted that Rasp and some of his men accompany him. According to Rasp, the Jew who owned the plywood factory in Mokrowo had refused to sell an industrial patent to the Germans, and this provoked the order to liquidate the Mokrowo ghetto first. Rasp and Ebner traveled by train, accompanied by a couple of Rasp's subordinates and about 5 or 6 Gendarmes, as well as around 10 or 12 members of the Ukrainian police. In Mokrowo, pits had been prepared in advance by the local mayor.

On the next morning, men of the Ukrainian police and Gendarmerie drove the Jews out of their houses and escorted them in a column to the site in the forest where the pits were ready. Here the Jews had to undress and surrender their valuables. Then they were forced to lie down in a pit and were shot in the back of the head by Petsch of the Security Police and one of the Gendarmes. Each successive group had to lie down on top of the corpses of those already shot. In total, 280 people were shot. According to Rasp, the Jewish engineer/previous owner was not shot on this occasion; he lived at this time outside the ghetto in the factory.¹

SOURCES Some information on the Jewish communities of Mokrowo and Sienkiewiczze can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities:

Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 268–269. This source, however, indicates that the Jews of the two villages were transferred to the Łachwa ghetto in April 1942, where they shared the fate of the other Jews there.

The main sources for this entry are the interrogations of Wilhelm Rasp, which were conducted by the West German authorities in 1961 and 1962 as part of a larger investigation into the ghetto clearances in the Pińsk region. Rasp himself was not tried, as he committed suicide before he could be brought to trial. The interrogations can be found in BA-L (B 162/4949-4971).

Martin Dean

NOTE

1. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59 (B 162/4952-60), statements of Wilhelm Rasp, December 18, 1961, November 22, 1962, and letter of Rasp, May 14, 1962.

MOROCZNA

Pre-1939: Moroczna, village, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Morochnoe, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Morotschnoe, Rayon center, Gebiet Kamen Kaschirsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Morochne, Zarechnoe raion, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Moroczna is located about 32 kilometers (20 miles) south-southwest of Pińsk. On the eve of the German invasion of June 1941, in what was then the Morochnoe raion, there lived around 2,000 Jews. Many of these Jews resided in the village of Serniki (987 people, according to the 1921 census) and in the village of Pohost-Zarzeczny (264 people, according to the same census).

German forces first passed through the village at the start of July 1941, but authority in the region was initially seized by local Ukrainians. In August 1941, a German military administration ran the settlement. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civilian administration. Moroczna became a Rayon center in Gebiet Kamen Kaschirsk, which in turn became part of the Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Kameradschaftsführer Fritz Michaelis was named Gebietskommissar in Kamień Koszyrski.¹

A local Ukrainian administration was formed in the village, along with a Ukrainian auxiliary police squad, which served under the German Gendarmerie.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Moroczna: Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing marks in the shape of the Star of David (later a yellow circle). They were compelled to perform forced labor. They were not permitted to leave the boundaries of the settlement without permission. Finally, the Ukrainian police robbed and beat them more or less at will.

In early 1942, a ghetto was created into which the Jews of Moroczna and some of the surrounding villages were forcibly resettled. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the ghetto was liquidated in August or September 1942, when a unit of the Security Police and SD from Brześć shot 542 Jews in the village (121 men, 147 women, 274 children) with the help of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.² At around the same time, 140 Jews were killed in the village of Pohost-Zarzeczny, where, according to Pinkas ha-kehillot, an open ghetto also existed,³ and the ghetto in the village of Serniki was liquidated a few weeks later.

According to another source, however, Jews brought in from Moroczna were among some 1,600 to 1,700 Jews who were murdered by the Security Police and SD from Brześć in mid-August 1942 during an Aktion conducted against the ghetto in Lubieszów.⁴ Some corroboration for this version of events is given by a report of the Security Police based in Równe that a verbal communication had been received from the Security Police outpost in Brześć that 3,399 Jews in Gebiet Kamen Kaschirsk had been given “special treatment” (Sonderbehandlung).⁵

SOURCES Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Moroczna can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/6338); DARO; GARF (7021-71-121); and IPN.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. GARF, 7021-71-121, p. 7.
3. Ibid.; Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 275.
4. BA-L, B 162/6338, p. 350; see also GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 111, which dates the Aktion in Lubieszów on August 15, 1942.
5. IPN, GKŚZpNP Zbiór Zespołów Szczatkowych Jednostek SS i Policji, Sygn. 77, report dated August 17, 1942.

MUROVANNYE KURILOVTSY

Pre-1941: Murovannye Kurilovtsy, town (PGT) and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Murovanny Kurilowzy, Rayon center, Gebiet Bar, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Murovani Kurylivtsi, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Murovannye Kurilovtsy is located about 100 kilometers (62 miles) southwest of Vinnitsa. According to the census of 1939, there were 1,014 Jews living in Murovannye Kurilovtsy (25 percent of the total population). In the villages of Murovannye Kurilovtsy raion there lived an additional 1,065 Jews.

Following the German occupation of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, several hundred of the local Jews managed to evacuate. Men were drafted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Only about 60 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Murovannye Kurilovtsy at the start of the occupation.

Axis forces occupied Murovannye Kurilovtsy on July 19, 1941. In July and early August 1941, the settlement was initially administered by seven Hungarian soldiers, and a local Ukrainian militia had not yet been organized. At this time, Feldkommandantur 675 in Vinnitsa was responsible for the military administration of the region and had appointed Anton Kornitzki as the Rayonchef in charge of the local Ukrainian administration.¹

In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Murovannye Kurilovtsy became a Rayon center in Gebiet Bar, which in turn was part of Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. A German civil servant, Regierungsassessor Steffen, served as the Gebietskommissar in Bar.² Leutnant der Gendarmerie Petrich served as the head of the German Gendarmerie in Gebiet Bar. Subordinated to him were several Gendarmerie posts, including the post in Murovannye Kurilovtsy. Subordinated to this post in turn was a detachment of Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (Schutzmannschaft).

At the end of July 1941, the German military administration registered 4,800 inhabitants in Murovannye Kurilovtsy, including 600 Jews.³ During the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a number of anti-Jewish measures. Initially the German military authorities ordered that the Jews were to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David. Those caught disobeying this order were severely beaten.⁴ Under the German civil administration, these armbands were later replaced by a yellow circle to be worn on the chest and back of outer clothing. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established under the leadership of Iosik Gas. The Judenrat had to enforce German orders, especially the collection of money, valuables, and clothing to be given to the Gendarmerie. It was assisted in this task by an unarmed Jewish police force.⁵

At some time between October 1941 and January 1942, a ghetto was established for the Jews in Murovannye Kurilovtsy.⁶ Most of the Jews were confined in a small area near the market square, which was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by the Ukrainian police. The ghetto was overcrowded, with three or four families sharing each small house with only about one room per family. One survivor mentioned that due to lack of space some additional barracks were built for the Jews, and another stated that there were two ghettos separated by a road.⁷

Jews from the ghetto were required to perform forced labor. The tasks included work at a local quarry, in warehouses, at a grain silo, digging military fortifications, and agricultural work at a kolkhoz. Only those who worked in the offices of the "Kommandantur" (headquarters) received anything to eat. Food was scarce, and people had to eat rotten potatoes and other scraps. Once a week Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto for one hour to barter remaining possessions for food at the market. Some Jews working outside the ghetto were also brought food and clothing by Ukrainian acquaintances while at work. In the winter of 1941–1942, some Jews from Bukovina and Bessarabia arrived in the ghetto.⁸

On August 20, 1942, the Jews of the Snitkov ghetto were rounded up and transferred to the ghetto in Murovannye Kurilovtsy. Children and the elderly were transported by horse and cart, and people were instructed to take enough food for two days. On arrival they were assigned to a few buildings, each holding 50 or 60 people.⁹

On Friday, August 21, 1942, the German police organized a large-scale Aktion against the Murovannye Kurilovtsy ghetto.¹⁰ Men of the Gendarmerie and local police surrounded the ghetto. Then all the Jews were ordered to assemble at a central square with food for three days and all their valuables, as they were told they would be relocated. Once they had assembled, the Jews were first required to surrender their valuables to the local police. Then a number of Jews were selected out as capable of work and were allowed to return to the Murovannye Kurilovtsy ghetto. The remaining 1,170 Jews were escorted about 3 or 4 kilometers (2 or 2.5 miles) outside the settlement to the Iankovo Forest, where they were all shot in three large pits that had been prepared a few days in advance. The men, women, and children were each shot in separate pits.¹¹ The Aktion was organized by an SD detachment from the office (Aussendienststelle) of the Security Police in Kamenets-Podolskii, headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Andreas Fermer. The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police assisted in rounding up the Jews, escorting them to the place of mass killing, and searching for those who had gone into hiding or escaped.

Of those selected out, about 80 young Jews were sent to the Bar ghetto in early September, where they were used to unload coal at the railroad station until the liquidation of that ghetto on October 15, 1942. On Friday, October 16, 1942, the ghetto in Murovannye Kurilovtsy was liquidated, and all the remaining 120 Jews were shot.¹² After the liquidation Aktion, Ukrainians came into Murovannye Kurilovtsy from the surrounding villages to loot any remaining Jewish property. Only a few Jews managed to escape the roundups and find refuge in the countryside or by escaping into the Romanian-occupied zone, where by the end of 1942 the chances of survival for Jews were considerably better.

Among those tried by the Soviet authorities for collaboration with the German occupants was Valentina Iosifovna Mohyla-Sternat, who was accused of serving as a translator for the German Gendarmerie in Murovannye Kurilovtsy and benefiting from Jewish property. In February 1948, she was sentenced to 25 years in prison and the loss of her citizen's rights.¹³

SOURCES The ghetto in Murovannye Kurilovtsy is mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 41; and in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 861–862.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Murovanye Kurilovtsy can be found in the following archives: DAVINO (R6023-4-28506); GARF (7021-54-1244); IPN; RGVA (1275-3-662); USHMM (RG-31.018M, reel 28); VHF (# 20754, 25153, 34310, 46977); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-662, Report of the Feldkommandantur 675 (V), Abt. VII in Winniza, an Sicherungsdivision 444 (Abt. VII), August 11, 1941.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. RGVA, 1275-3-662, Report of the Feldkommandantur 675 (V), Abt. VII in Winniza, an Sicherungsdivision 444 (Abt. VII), August 11, 1941.
4. Ibid.; VHF, # 20754, testimony of Zoia Korenblit.
5. VHF, # 46977, testimony of Lina Laterman; # 20754.
6. DAVINO, R6023-4-28506, dates the ghetto from January 1942; VHF, # 20754, dates it from October 1941.
7. VHF, # 20754, on overcrowding; # 46977, mentions two ghettos separated by a main highway; # 25153, testimony of Leonid Garfinkel, mentions the construction of additional barracks.
8. Ibid., # 20754, # 46977, # 25153; # 27207, testimony of Sofia Nudel'man; # 20062, testimony of Boris Vaitsman; # 43183, testimony of Polina Zil'berman.
9. Ibid., # 34310, testimony of Dina Bril.
10. GARF, 7021-54-1244, p. 3.
11. IPN, Zbiór zespołów szcztatkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, k. 10, Petrich Report, August 27, 1942; this figure includes the Jews of Murovanye Kurilovtsy, Snitkov, and other nearby locations. VHF, # 20754; USHMM, RG-31.018M, reel 28, Vinnitsa oblast', Delo 21215, trial of Valentina Iosifovna Mohyla-Sternat in 1948.
12. VHF, # 20754.
13. USHMM, RG-31.018M, reel 28, Vinnitsa oblast', Delo 21215, trial of Valentina Iosifovna Mohyla-Sternat.

NOVAIA USHITSA

Pre-1939: Novaia Ushitsa, village and raion center, Khmel'nitskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Nowaja Ushitsa, Rayon center, Gebiet Bar, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Nova Ushytsia, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Novaia Ushitsa is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) east-northeast of Kamenets-Podolskii. According to the 1939 census, 1,547 Jews (55 percent of the total population) were living in Novaia Ushitsa, and 1,059 more in the villages of the Novaia Ushitsa raion. These included the villages of Kalius and Zamekhov.

After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate. Men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. More than 1,000 Jews are estimated to have remained in Novaia Ushitsa at the start of the occupation.

This figure includes some Jewish refugees who arrived from Bessarabia.

German forces occupied Novaia Ushitsa in mid-July 1941. In the rest of July and in August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. The German military authorities appointed a village elder (starosta) and recruited a Ukrainian auxiliary police force, which was headed by a man named Semenov. The new local authorities took over the buildings used previously by the Soviet authorities.

In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The village became a Rayon center in Gebiet Bar, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.¹ The German Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Bar in 1942 was Leutnant Willi Petrich. Several Gendarmerie posts, including the one in Novaia Ushitsa, served under his command. The Ukrainian auxiliary police was subordinated to the Gendarmerie post in Novaia Ushitsa.

Mass-shooting Aktions against the Jewish population in Gebiet Bar were carried out in 1942 by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Kamenets-Podolskii. This Aussendienststelle was headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Andreas Fermer.

In the summer of 1941, Jews were ordered to wear armbands bearing a Star of David; in the fall, these were replaced by yellow patches on their chests and backs. A few individual Jews were killed during the initial months of the occupation, including a man who was hanged and a 16- or 17-year-old boy, Itzek, who was shot by Germans or local policemen who caught him observing them robbing Jewish apartments. In addition, the authorities arrested a number of Jews, including Rabbi Shai Ruva, demanding a large ransom payment for their release. When Roitman, who was ordered to collect the ransom from the Jewish community, tried to escape, he was caught, and all those under arrest were shot.²

In September 1941, the German authorities established a ghetto in Novaia Ushitsa. The ghetto was located on part of the market square up to the ravine, including the synagogue courtyard and Pochtovaia Street. A 2-meter-high (6.6-foot-high) barbed-wire fence enclosed the ghetto, and there was a gate near the entrance to Pochtovaia Street. The gate was guarded constantly by the Ukrainian police. Ukrainian families living within the ghetto area had to move out, and Jewish families outside the ghetto had to move in. The overcrowding was such that many people had to live in basements. As soon as the ghetto gates were closed, the police and other local inhabitants burst into the abandoned Jewish homes and stole whatever they could find.³

After the arrest of Roitman, the German authorities appointed Chaim Dinits to serve as the Jewish elder (starosta). He was an observant Jew of 50 years of age. As his assistants he selected two of his sons, Yankel and Moishe, and other relatives. Among his first tasks was organizing the transfer of the Jews into the ghetto. Subsequently he also assisted the Germans in selecting younger Jews to be sent to forced labor camps in Letichev to work on road construction projects.⁴

Up until the spring of 1942, a few hundred Jews from nearby villages and settlements were resettled into the ghetto. The villages included Ol'khovets, Zamekhov, Pilipkovtsy, Kucha, Slobodka, Pesets, and Pilipy-Khrebtiievskii. These resettlements brought the Jewish population in the ghetto to around 1,500. The ghetto population consisted primarily of women, children, and the elderly, as well as some artisans, such as tailors and glove makers.

Anyone caught trying to leave the ghetto faced the death penalty, which was also the penalty for starting a fire in the evening or early morning hours or even for allowing children to cry. Once a week, however, the Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto on Sundays, in columns of four people, hand in hand, to go to the market to exchange their personal items for food. Before they left, the police conducted an inspection. They confiscated any valuable items they found. Once per day, for 15 or 20 minutes, the Jews were allowed to leave to get water from a well located in the ravine near the ghetto. This usually resulted in a mad scramble, due to the limited time. Some Jews also left the ghetto illegally through the barbed-wire fence in search of food. Most Jews had non-Jewish acquaintances, former coworkers or neighbors, who did what they could to help them. Some had buried valuables, as a safeguard against an uncertain future.⁵

Each day, all the able-bodied Jews who were not craftsmen left the ghetto at 7:00 A.M. to perform various kinds of forced labor, including road repairs, street cleaning, chopping wood, cleaning the homes of local administrators, and farmwork. They returned again at 6:00 P.M. Those whose work was deemed inadequate were beaten. This work was unpaid, but leaving the ghetto provided an opportunity to exchange items for food. Inside the ghetto, a group of "concubine girls," all Bessarabian refugees, were kept for the pleasure of the police and the Germans. These girls were not required to perform physical labor, and they were fed and clothed. There were also periodic raids by the Germans and local police in the ghetto, during which they robbed and beat the Jews. In the winter of 1941–1942, the officers and policemen arrested several Jews in the ghetto. They were tortured and then murdered in a nearby forest.⁶

There was no organized resistance within the ghetto, but some Russian newspapers were smuggled in, and one group of men was arrested and shot for listening to an illegal radio after the Germans had ordered all radio sets to be surrendered. The ghetto inhabitants were aware of the destruction of the Jews in Min'kovtsy, Kamenets-Podolskii, and other places, and this made them uneasy.

On August 20, 1942, German security forces conducted a large Aktion against the ghetto in which 707 Jews were shot.⁷ The Aktion was carried out by the Sipo-Aussendienststelle in Kamenets-Podolskii with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police. First the Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto during the night. Then in the morning, assisted by Dinits and his helpers, they drove the ghetto inhabitants from their homes. The Germans conducted a selection on Pochtovaia Street. A few hundred of the younger, able-bodied Jews were sent to the labor camp in Letichev, and the craftsmen with valid work papers and their families were also selected out. Then those not selected were escorted out of the ghetto. They were informed that they would be sent to Palestine. Initially they were led along the road to Dunaevtsy, but when they turned left off the road into the forest, behind the Catholic cemetery, the Jews understood that they would be shot. The Ukrainian police took an active part in the shooting. First the Jews were made to undress, and then they were shot in groups of 5. The children were buried alive to save ammunition.⁸

After this Aktion, the Jews who remained consisted of the artisans and their families, a few hundred people in total, plus a few others who had successfully hidden during the Aktion. These Jews were then resettled into a remnant ghetto, known as the small ghetto, which consisted of only 15 houses in the original ghetto area. Each family had their own room. All of these Jews were shot during a second Aktion, on October 15, 1942.⁹

After the liquidation of the ghetto, a search for Jews in hiding was ordered. Those who were captured were sent to prison and then shot near the tile factory.¹⁰ It is estimated that only about 15 former inmates of the ghetto survived the German occupation, including a few who successfully escaped into the Romanian-occupied zone known as Transnistria.

SOURCES Information on the ghetto in Novaia Ushitsa and several personal testimonies of Jewish survivors can be found in Anatolii Shtarkman, Novaia Ushitsa (Novaia Ushitsa and Ramat Gan, 1976 and 1999), pp. 105–147. The testimony of Mikhail Borisov Eisen, "Hard Memory: WWII Memoir [Nova Ushitsa]," 1997, has been published on the Web by Jewishgen.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Novaia Ushitsa can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-803); IPN; and YVA (M-33/97, M-52/179, O-3/1266).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. Shtarkman, Novaia Ushitsa, pp. 108–118, 134–138.
3. Ibid., pp. 108–118, 134–138; Eisen, "Hard Memory," pp. 1–2.
4. Shtarkman, Novaia Ushitsa, pp. 108–118, 134–138. In 1944, Dinits was sentenced to 10 years in prison for collaborating with the occupiers. After serving his sentence, he returned to Novaia Ushitsa.
5. Ibid., pp. 108–118; YVA, M-33/97, M-52/179, O-3/1266.
6. Shtarkman, Novaia Ushitsa, pp. 108–118, 134–138; Eisen, "Hard Memory," p. 3.
7. Report of the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Bar, Leutnant Petrich, August 27, 1942, regarding the anti-Jewish Aktions, IPN, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 10. According to the materials of the ChGK (GARF, 7021-64-803, p. 77), 2,620 persons were shot in four ditches to the west of the village. This figure is probably too high.

8. Shtarkman, Novaia Usbitsa, pp. 108–118, 122–130, 134–138; Eisen, “Hard Memory,” pp. 4–5.

9. YVA, testimony of Maria Laster, O-3/1266; Shtarkman, Novaia Usbitsa, pp. 108–118, 134–138.

10. After liberation of the settlement, 15 corpses were found in two ditches near the fence. GARF, 7021-64-803, p. 77.

OŁYKA

Pre–September 1939: Ołyka, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Gebiet Luzk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Ołyka is located 33 kilometers (21 miles) east of Łuck. According to the 1921 census, 2,086 Jews lived in Ołyka. By mid-1941, assuming a natural growth of 0.9 percent per year, there were probably about 2,500 Jews in the town at the outbreak of the war. Besides these Jews, there were many Jewish refugees from central and western Poland who settled in the town in the fall of 1939, as well as 60 Jewish refugees from Czechoslovakia.¹ After Germany attacked the USSR on June 22, 1941, and as the German forces approached Ołyka, about 150 Jews evacuated eastward,² but the vast majority of Jews remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

Units of the German 6th Army entered the town on June 27 or 28, 1941. The town was caught in the fighting for several days and was severely bombarded by the Germans. By the time they had gained control of Ołyka, most of the houses had been destroyed, and many people had been killed or wounded.³ In July and August 1941, a German military administration governed the town, and from September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Ołyka was a Rayon center in Gebiet Luzk, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsassessor Lindner.⁴ Survivor testimonies mention the important role played by a local administrator named Max Tauber, but they do not mention his exact rank.⁵ A Ukrainian local council was set up in Ołyka as well as a local police force, which was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post (created in the fall of 1941), consisting of several German Gendarmes.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupation forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Ołyka: a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created in the town (chaired by Faya Borodata), through which the Germans transmitted orders and commands to the Jewish population. The Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (first an armband with a Star of David, later a yellow patch) and to surrender all gold and valuables. They were also compelled to engage in forced labor and were forbidden to leave the town. In addition, the Ukrainian police subjected them to systematic robberies and beatings.⁶

In August 1941, the first anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out in Ołyka: 682 Jewish men were caught and collected in the Radziwiłł Castle, where they were told they would perform forced labor. But instead they were escorted to the Jewish cemetery and shot.⁷ A squad of the Security Police and SD from Łuck probably carried out this Aktion, with the assistance of the local Ukrainian police.

On March 13, 1942, a ghetto was created in Ołyka⁸ into which Jews from the surrounding villages were also brought. The ghetto was surrounded by a barbed-wire fence. A Jewish police force, headed by Rosenzweig, was created to maintain order in the ghetto. The ghetto residents were forced to do various unpaid jobs. For instance, 120 people loaded timber into railroad cars at the Ołyka station 10 kilometers (6 miles) from the town; other Jews performed the same jobs at the Cuman and Rudoczka railroad stations; many Jews were also employed in agriculture.⁹

In late July 1942, a squad of the Security Police and the SD from Łuck, together with the German Order Police and Ukrainian police, liquidated the ghetto. On the night of July 25, 1942, Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto. The next morning, July 26, all the ghetto residents were rounded up at the castle of former Polish duke Radziwiłł; they were told that they were going to be resettled. Meanwhile, Ukrainian police killed several sick, elderly, and disabled people in the ghetto and on the way to the castle. The attempt of several Jews to organize resistance was impeded by the Judenrat. After the liquidation of the ghetto, Ukrainian police looted all the houses in the former ghetto. Of the Jews gathered in the castle, a small group of specialists was separated from the others, and the women and children were then placed in an enormous garage in the castle, while the men were herded into a wooden barracks nearby. The doors and windows of the garage were tightly closed, and the shortage of air, intolerable heat, and overcrowding caused several women and children to suffocate there; others had been crushed as the Ukrainian police chased them into the garage, beating them cruelly. The Ukrainian police took their bodies in large wagons to the cemetery and buried them there. On July 27, the shootings began, in ditches on the former shooting range near the village of Czemyryn. Ukrainian police drove the Jews in groups of 50 to the ditch; the Jewish Police forced them to undress and to lie in the ditches facedown, after which drunken German and Ukrainian policemen shot them in the back of the head. Ukrainian peasants covered the bodies of those killed and wounded with a layer of earth, at which point a new group of Jews was brought in. At the end of the Aktion, the Jewish Police were ordered to undress. When they refused to do so, Ukrainian policemen brutally beat them, ripped off their clothing, and shot them.¹⁰ A small number of Jews, who hid in the former ghetto or fled during the night from the barracks, were able to survive. In early 1943, the 130 remaining Jewish artisans were shot in Ołyka.¹¹

According to the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 5,500 civilians were killed in the Olyka raion during the occupation, including 5,220 Jews: 720 in early August 1941 and about 4,500 in late July 1942.¹²

SOURCES Information about the ghetto in Olyka can be found in the yizkor book edited by Natan Livneh, Pinkas ha-kehillot Olyka: Sefer yizkor (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Olika be-Yisrael, 1972); and in an article by Shmuel Spector in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 27–31.

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Olyka can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/2859); DAVO (R2-1-196); GARF (7021-55-11); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Andrew Koss
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Elisheva Kohen, “Shnatayim goralivot be-Olika (1939–1941),” in Livneh, Pinkas ha-kehillot Olyka, pp. 271–272; Yitshak Lapid, “Va-yehi bi-yemey ha-Rusim,” in ibid., p. 291.
2. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), p. 53.
3. Mikha’el Grinshteyn, “ha-Kivush ha-Germani,” in Livneh, Pinkas ha-kehillot Olyka, p. 311; Shloyme Tsam, “Di letste date: T’v bov tsh’b,” in ibid., p. 331.
4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
5. Tsam, “Di letste date,” pp. 331 ff.; Dvoyre Nakonetshtnik, “A meydele fun unter der erd,” in Livneh, Pinkas ha-kehillot Olyka, p. 341.
6. Tsam, “Di letste date,” p. 332. Also see Berl Gal, “Di toyt-marsh fun Olikar Yidn,” pp. 301–302; and Hayim Hayat, “Yeled ba-Sho’ah,” p. 323—both in Livneh, Pinkas ha-kehillot Olyka.
7. Spector, Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 73; according to other sources (GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 133) on August 1, 1941, 720 Jews were shot in Olyka; Gal, “Di toyt-marsh,” pp. 298–299; Grinshteyn, “ha-Kivush,” pp. 312–313; Tsam, “Di letste date,” p. 332.
8. GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 133.
9. Gal, “Di toyt-marsh,” pp. 300–302; Hayat, “Yeled,” pp. 323–324.
10. Gal, “Di toyt-marsh,” pp. 302–309; Grinshteyn, “ha-Kivush,” p. 314; Hayat, “Yeled,” p. 324; Tsam, “Di letste date,” p. 333. See also DAVO, R2-1-196, pp. 218a–218b, Report to the Generalkommissar Wolhynien u. Podolien on gasoline supplies for the “special treatment” of Jews in Gebiet Luzk, August 27, 1942, which notes that the “special treatment” of the Jews in the Kolki, Zuman, and Olyka Rayons was conducted from July 26 to 29, 1942.
11. Spector, Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 186.
12. GARF, 7021-55-11, pp. 126, 130. According to other sources, on July 27–28, 1942, 5,673 Jews were shot (Spector, Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 185; testimony of Tsam); this figure is probably exaggerated, as other witnesses mention 3,000 to 4,000 victims.

OPALIN

Pre-1939: Opalin, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Liuboml’ raion, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Golowno, Gebiet Luboml, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Vyshtnivka, Liuboml’ raion, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Opalin is located in northwestern Ukraine, on the Bug River, 24 kilometers (15 miles) west-northwest of Luboml. According to the 1921 census, 516 Jews were living in the village out of a total population of 1,226. In September 1939, as per the agreement between Germany and the Soviet Union, Opalin was occupied by the Red Army and subsequently incorporated into the Ukrainian SSR. By the middle of 1941, it is estimated that there were probably about 600 Jews in the village.

At the end of June 1941, soldiers of the German 6th Army occupied Opalin. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Opalin was a village in Rayon Golowno, in Gebiet Luboml. Kameradschaftsführer Uhde was appointed as the Gebietskommissar in Luboml, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Kurz.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, German occupying forces in Opalin introduced a number of antisemitic measures. Jews initially had to wear armbands bearing the Star of David and, from September 1941 onward, yellow patches sewn onto the front and back of their outer clothing. Jews had to hand over all money, gold, and valuables; they had to perform forced labor for little or no pay, probably in agriculture; they were prohibited from leaving the boundaries of the village; and they were subjected to systematic robbery and assaults by Ukrainian policemen.

At the end of 1941, the Jews of Opalin were resettled into a ghetto, probably around the same time as in Luboml, where the ghetto was formed on December 6, 1941. Those leaving the ghetto without permission faced the death penalty.

The ghetto was liquidated on October 2, 1942. According to testimonies given at the trial in March 1945 of the head of the local Ukrainian police, Omlian Timoshvits, five Germans and several dozen Ukrainian police officers from Luboml arrived in Opalin on October 2, 1942. The Germans and Ukrainians gathered 582 Jews (305 men and 277 women) and brought them to a large pit prepared in the Jewish cemetery. The Jews were forced to undress and were then shot and buried in the pit.

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jewish community of Opalin during the Holocaust include the following: “Vishnevka,” in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2000), 4:263; and “Opalin,” in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities:

Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 41–42.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTE

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

ORININ

Pre-1939: Orinin, village and raion center, Kbmel'nitskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Gebiet Kamenez-Podolsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Orynyn, Kam'ianets'-Podil's'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Orinin is located 16 kilometers (10 miles) northwest of Kamenets-Podolskii. According to the population census of 1939, 1,508 Jews lived in Orinin, or 25.3 percent of the total population. There were 115 additional Jews living in the villages of what was then the Orinin raion.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a small number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east or were inducted into the Red Army. Around 1,300 to 1,400 Jews remained in Orinin at the start of the occupation.

In early July 1941, troops of the Hungarian army occupied Orinin. In August 1941, a few hundred Jews arrived in Orinin, having been deported from Hungary for being of alleged questionable citizenship. They found refuge with the Jews of Orinin, who had been living since before the war in a section of the village apart from the non-Jewish population. The Jews of Orinin worked as shopkeepers and artisans, and there was also a Jewish kolkhoz nearby. The Hungarian Jews tried to support themselves by working mainly as laborers in agriculture.

After only a few weeks, the Hungarian Jews were assembled, having been told they would be allowed to return to Hungary. They were escorted in a column to an earthwork, which had been prepared before the war as a form of defensive entrenchment. Then a number of armed Germans arrived in vehicles and quickly surrounded the Jews. A few of the younger Jews attempted to flee, but most were recaptured or shot. A local peasant working in the fields nearby was also killed by a stray bullet. Then the Germans shot all the remaining Hungarian Jews in the entrenchment, and the grave was filled in by local non-Jews. There were probably about 250 victims of this Aktion.¹

In September 1941, authority passed to the German civil administration. Orinin was included in Gebiet Kamenez-Podolsk, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Regierungsrat Reindl became the Gebietskommissar in Kamenets-Podolskii. Leutnant der Polizei Albert Reich was appointed as the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in the spring of 1942.² A German Gendarmerie post was established in Orinin, to which the Ukrainian auxiliary police was subordinated.

In the late summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Orinin. The Jews were ordered to wear distinctive marks in the form of a yellow patch on their chest and back. The Jewish elder was required to collect a certain sum of gold and other valuables from the Jews and deliver it to the Germans. The Jews were prohibited from leaving the limits of the village, and they were forbidden to have any contacts with the non-Jewish population.³ As the Jews already lived apart from the non-Jews, these regulations established a form of “open ghetto” in Orinin. The Jews were also required to perform forced labor tasks, which included clearing snow from the main roads in the winter.⁴

At some time during the summer of 1942, the Germans liquidated the open ghetto in Orinin. The Jews of the village had an idea of what would happen, as a few days before they received news that the Jews of the neighboring village of Liant Skorun' had been shot.⁵ First the village was surrounded by Ukrainian and German policemen early in the morning. Then the Jews were driven out of their houses and assembled. With the aid of the Jewish elder a number of skilled workers and their families were separated out and permitted to remain in Orinin. The main group of Jews, composed mainly of women, children, and the elderly, was formed into a column and escorted out of the village, having been told they were going to Kamenets-Podolskii. When after a short time they turned away from the direction of Kamenets-Podolskii, the Jews realized that they would be shot, and they started to tear up their money. They were led to a large pit that had been dug by local peasants about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside of Orinin. There they were made to strip naked and were shot in the pit. One Jew who was naked managed to flee during the Aktion and was given some clothing and shelter for a time by local non-Jews who lived nearby. In total, up to about 1,000 Jews were shot. The Jews who were spared from this Aktion, about 250 people, were escorted to the Kamenets-Podolskii ghetto about one month later.⁶ The mass murder was carried out by a detachment of the Security Police and SD from Kamenets-Podolskii, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police.

SOURCES A brief article on the fate of the Jews of Orinin can be found in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 943.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Orinin can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-799, 803); YIU (nos. 638–642); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. YIU, Témoins nos. 638, 639, 640, 641, 642.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. YIU, Témoins nos. 639, 642.

4. Ibid., Témoins no. 639.

5. Ibid.

6. GARF, 7021-64-803, p. 261; also 7021-64-199, p. 194 (testimony of the former policeman I.P. Chaikovskii, May 14, 1944). The records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) indicate that 1,700 Jews were murdered: 480 men, 650 women, and 570 children. This figure probably includes the Hungarian Jews killed in 1941 but may still be too high. On the specialists, see also YIU, Témoins no. 639.

OSTRÓG

Pre-1939: Ostróg (Yiddish: Ostrab), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ostróg, Rayon center, Gebiet Sdolbunow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Ostroh, raion center, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Ostróg is located 37 kilometers (23 miles) southeast of Równe. In 1921, there were 7,991 Jews living in Ostróg (62 percent of the total); in 1931, there were 8,171 (62 percent). In September 1939 it fell within the Soviet zone of control.

After Germany attacked the USSR on June 22, 1941, a substantial proportion of the population was able to evacuate eastward, so that about 7,000 Jews remained in the town. On June 28, 1941, German forces captured the southern part of the town, but Soviet troops continued to hold the western part of Ostróg, and the fighting lasted until July 3. In this fighting, the town was badly damaged. In July and August 1941, the town was administered by a German military administration. In September 1941, Ostróg was placed under civil administration, becoming a Rayon center in Gebiet Sdolbunow, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Sdolbunow was Hundertschaftsführer Georg Marschall.

In Ostróg, a Ukrainian Rayon administration and a Ukrainian police force (commanded by Stefan Tkachenko) were established. The Ukrainian police received orders from the German Gendarmerie post, which consisted of three German Gendarmes, whose leader was Komorowski. The Ostróg post was subordinated to the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Sdolbunow, who from May 1942 was Bezirksleutnant der Gendarmerie Josef Paur.¹

During the first week of the war, about 1,000 Jews managed to leave Ostróg—some as conscripts in the Red Army, while others fled eastward together with the Soviet authorities.² In the summer and autumn of 1941, the German authorities implemented a number of anti-Jewish measures in Ostróg. During the very first days of the German occupation, all Jews aged 16 to 60 were ordered to report to work (on pain of death). Men were put to work clearing the streets of debris and corpses, washing military vehicles, and doing other menial tasks, while women were made to clean German offices and so forth. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was set up; Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing symbols such as the Star of David (later on, a simple yellow patch); and they were not allowed to leave the boundaries of the town. They were also subjected to beatings by the Ukrainian police. In August 1941, units subordinated to German Security Division 213 collected more than 64 kilograms (141 pounds) of ritual items from the synagogues and prayer houses in Ostróg.³

The first anti-Jewish Aktion conducted in the town occurred soon after its capture: 300 Jews from the intelligentsia were arrested and shot at the old Jewish cemetery.⁴ On August 4, 1941, the Germans conducted a second Aktion in Ostróg. On this day, the 3rd Battalion of the 10th Regiment, 1st SS-Motorized Infantry Brigade, assisted by Ukrainian police, gathered the entire Jewish population in the town square and marched them through what was known as the New Town to a forest southwest of Ostróg. The SS then counted and sorted them by gender, marital status, and ability to work. Women with children were sent back to town. Over the course of that afternoon, between 1,000 and 3,000 of the remaining Jews were shot, primarily those who were ill or elderly. The Aktion was overseen by the battalion commander, SS-Obersturmbannführer Emil Sator.⁵

On September 2, 1941, the 45th Reserve Police Battalion, commanded by Major der Polizei Besser, entered Ostróg in the early hours of the morning and rounded up the Jewish males, who were preparing to report for their forced labor duties. Women and children were ordered to remain at home. The men were told that they were being sent for 10 days of forced labor outside of Ostróg. The Ukrainian police then led them to the sawmill outside of town. This time, many of the Jews were not deceived by the Germans' ruse, and a large number managed to escape on the way.

At the sawmill, the Jews were surrounded by members of the 45th Battalion, who sorted them by age, profession, marital status, and so forth. The Jews were then taken on trucks, in shifts, to pits in the forest where they were shot. While the Aktion was taking place, Christian leaders in Ostróg, having realized what was happening, intervened with the Germans on behalf of the Jews. It seems that this intervention may have led the Germans to release about 500 Jews who had been designated for execution. Approximately 2,500 Jews were killed in this Aktion.⁶ Altogether, in the second half of 1941, around 3,500 Jews were killed in the town.

Shortly after the September Aktion, the Germans ordered that a new Judenrat be formed, as the members of the first had all been killed. Avraham Komendant was made chairman. A Jewish police force, consisting of five policemen with special uniforms, was later organized as well.⁷

In the spring of 1942, the Germans informed the Jews that they would be transferred to a ghetto. The transfer was carried out in June 1942. Non-Jews were evicted from the area of town that had been most severely damaged by the bombing, and the Jews were concentrated therein. It was then surrounded by a high barbed-wire fence. At this point, there were approximately 3,000 Jews remaining in Ostróg.

On October 12, 1942, the Jews of nearby villages were moved into the ghetto, and on October 15, a squad of the Security Police and SD from Równe, with help from the Ukrainian police and the German Gendarmerie, liquidated the ghetto by shooting about 2,000 Jews in the forest near Novogo. Some Jews hid or ran away. The Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie conducted intensive searches to capture these Jews. Thus, in the second half of October 1942 around 1,000 Jews were captured and shot (October 16—about 200, October 17—about 300, October 20—about 600, October 29—about 150).⁸ The commandant of the Ukrainian police, Stefan Tkachenko; his deputy, Artem Meshva; the policemen Peter Tkachenko, Artem Gulichku, Ivan Martinovski, Pavel Gomenok, and others played an active role in these operations.

All in all, between 1941 and 1942, at least 6,500 Jews were killed in Ostróg. A few hundred were able to flee into the forest. Some of them died from hunger or were captured during the searches, while others survived by joining partisan detachments. Among the most notable partisans were Yakov Kaplan, Mendel Treiberman, and Pesach Eisenstein.

The Red Army recaptured the town on February 5, 1944; about 30 Jews who survived by hiding in the vicinity returned to the town, as well as a similar number from the partisans. After the war, many evacuated families returned but did not stay, leaving soon for Poland, then on to Israel and the United States.

SOURCES Publications on the destruction of the Jewish population of Ostróg include the following: M. Grinem, Ven dos lebn bot geblit (Buenos Aires, 1954); H. Ayalon-Baranick, ed., Pinkas Ostra: Sefer Zikaron (Tel Aviv: Association of Former Residents of Ostrog, 1960); Judah Loeb Levin, Ostraa: Megilat Polin (Jerusalem and Tel Aviv: Yad Yahadut Polin, 1966); Y. Alperowitz, ed., Sefer Ostrog (Voblin): Matsevet zikaron le-Kehilah kedoshah (Tel Aviv: The Ostrog Society in Israel, 1987); Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 34–41; and R. Shpizel', Katastrofa evreev Ostroba: Katastrofa evropeiskobo evreistva nid chas Druhoy svitovoy viiny. Refleksii na mezhi stolit'. Zbirnyk naukovykh prats'. Materialy konferentsii 29–31 serpnia 1999 g. (Kiev, 2000), pp. 141–145.

Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Ostróg can be found in the following archives: AŽIH; DARO; GARF (7021-71-62 and 64); TsDAVO; USHMM (RG-50.226*013); VHF (e.g., # 5883, 1692); and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/144).

Alexander Kruglov and Andrew Koss
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Verdict against Joseph Paur (January 26, 1899) and others, LG-Nürnberg, 1070 Ks 7/62, May 27, 1963.
2. "Ostrog," in Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 5:39.
3. BA-BL, R 2104/21 (Reichshauptkasse Beutestelle reports), p. 256.
4. Shpizel', Katastrofa evreev Ostroba, p. 142; Aharon Valdman, "Di Oysgemordete Yidishe Ostra," in Alperowits, Sefer Ostrog, p. 175.
5. See report of 1. SS Mot. Brigade, August 3–6, 1941, in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), pp. 232–233. According to other sources, between 1,600 and 1,800 Jews were shot (GARF, 7021-71-64, pp. 14 and reverse, 29, 31); Valdman, "Di Oysgemordete Yidishe Ostra," pp. 175–178. Also see Shmuel Klipatsh, "Unter der Daytshishe Okupatsye in Ostra," p. 196; Bet Ayzenshteyn-Kashav, "Di Yidn in Volin 1941–1944," p. 229; Tova (Gitele) Shteynberg-Re'uveni, "Zikhronot mi-yemey ha-Shoah," p. 250; and "Mikhtavah shel Bluma Shtirnberg," p. 245—all in Alperowits, Sefer Ostrog.

6. Valdman, "Di Oysgemordete Yidishe Ostra," pp. 181–182; and Ayzenshteyn-Kashav, "Di Yidn in Volin 1941–1944," p. 230.

7. Valdman, "Di Oysgemordete Yidishe Ostra," pp. 184, 186; Sima Klipatsh, "17 Khodshim in a Bunker in Ostra," in Alperowits, Sefer Ostrog, p. 192.

8. GARF, 7021-71-64, pp. 20–21; Valdman, "Di Oysgemordete Yidishe Ostra," pp. 188–189; Shteynberg-Re'uveni, "Zikhronot mi-yemey ha-Shoah," p. 241.

OSTROPOL' [AKA STARYI OSTROPOL']

1930–1941: Ostropol', village and raion center, Kamenets-Podol'skii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ostropol, Rayon center, Gebiet Starokonstantinow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Ostropol', Starokostiantyniv raion, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Ostropol' is located 88 kilometers (55 miles) west-northwest of Vinnitsa. By 1897, the Jewish population had grown to 2,714 (36 percent of the total population). According to the 1939 population census, 1,063 Jews lived in Ostropol'. An additional 256 Jews lived in the villages of the Ostropol' raion.

Units of the German army occupied the village on July 9, 1941. During the two and a half weeks since the start of the invasion, part of the Jewish population fled to the east, and some Jewish men were conscripted or enlisted voluntarily into the Red Army. About 70 of the Jews who attempted to flee soon became trapped by German forces in the town of Liubar on the main road towards Zhytomyr, where they shared the fate of the Jews there. Around 650 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. The occupying forces appointed a village elder and formed an auxiliary police squad. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Ostropol' became a Rayon center in Gebiet Starokonstantinow. Regierungsrat Schröder became the first Gebietskommissar; he was later succeeded by SA-Standartenführer Curt Rolle. Leutnant Otto Gent was named Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in the spring of 1942. There were only about five or six Germans based in Ostropol', including several members of the German Gendarmerie who supervised the local Ukrainian police.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Ostropol'. Jews were ordered to wear white armbands bearing a Star of

David and were not permitted to leave the limits of the settlement. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was also appointed. In August 1941, local police from Ostropol' arrived in the village of Khizhniki and ordered the 12 Jews residing there to move to Ostropol', where they moved in with other Jewish families already living there.¹

Living conditions deteriorated over the following months. In the fall of 1941 or in early 1942, the German authorities established an open ghetto in the village. A number of Jewish houses were demolished, and all the Jews were moved together into the remaining Jewish dwellings. The ghetto, however, was unfenced and unguarded. By the spring of 1942, there were as many as 20 people sharing one room. Some Jews died of illness and starvation.²

All adult Jews had to report to the local administration each day and perform various forced labor tasks, including excavation work for the men and cleaning for the women. Only a few were lucky enough to receive some food in payment. Others had to survive on potato peelings or whatever they could find.³

The Germans liquidated the Ostropol' ghetto on May 20, 1942. On May 19, members of the Jewish Council passed on German orders for all Jews to assemble at the school at 6:00 A.M. the next morning. Once the Jews had assembled, a German accompanied by an Alsatian dog gave a speech and ordered the Jews to form a column 4 abreast to march to Starokonstantinov. On the road to Starokonstantinov, in the village of Ladygi, around 40 elderly and infirm Jews were put onto carts, ostensibly to convey them the rest of the way. Instead, they were shot in the village once the main column had moved on. On that day, more than 400 Jews were conveyed to Starokonstantinov, guarded by German and Ukrainian police.

According to Anna Nasarchuk, on their arrival they were placed into the empty ghetto in Starokonstantinov, which had just been cleared by the shooting of most of its inhabitants.⁴ Almost all of the Ostropol' Jews in the Starokonstantinov ghetto were shot over the ensuing months. At the time of the liquidation of the Ostropol' ghetto, the Germans selected a number of craftsmen to remain in Ostropol' to work. These Jews were also shot in turn sometime later.⁵

SOURCES Documents and witness testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Ostropol' can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67); DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-804); USHMM (RG-22.002M); VHF (# 33782); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, pp. 328–340, statement of Anna Nasarchuk, March 28, 1973. According to the ChGK report, GARF, 7021-64-804, pp. 50–62, 117–122, in 1942, 12 Jews from Khizhniki and 6 Jews from the village of Korzhovka were shot in 1942.

2. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, pp. 328–340.

3. Ibid., and pp. 267–273, statement of Sophija Kamenjez-kaja, April 2, 1973; and VHF, # 33782, testimony of Liudmila Blekhman.

4. GARF, 7021-64-804, p. 124, gives the date of June 23, 1942, and reports that 581 Jews were sent to Starokonstantinov. According to another source, the ghetto was liquidated on May 20, 1942; see ZSSta-D, Ermittlungsverfahren 45 Js 20/73 StA Dortmund, Abschlussverfügung, August 10, 1976, p. 7.

5. VHF, # 33782.

OSTROŻEC

Pre-1939: Ostrożec, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Ostrozhets, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ostroshez, Rayon center, Gebiet Dubno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Ostrozhets, Mlyniv raion, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Ostrożec is located about 16 kilometers (10 miles) from Łuck. According to the 1921 population census, 632 Jews were living in the village.¹ By mid-1941, assuming an annual growth rate of 0.9 to 1 percent, there probably were about 750 Jews in Ostrożec. In the area around Ostrożec, many Jews also lived in the village of Targowica (located about 16 kilometers [10 miles] to the southwest). According to the 1921 population census, 660 Jews were living in this village. By mid-1941, assuming an average rate of population increase, there probably were slightly more than 750 Jews in Targowica. A few more Jews lived in other nearby villages, including the village of Peremiłowka to the southeast of Ostrożec (which in 1921 had a Jewish population of 16). Witnesses confirm that Ostrożec was an entirely Jewish shtetl on the eve of the German occupation; the non-Jews lived in a more or less separate village nearby, also called Ostrożec.²

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Ostrożec at the end of June 1941. At first, in July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of the village. Then authority was transferred to a German civil administration in September 1941. Ostrożec became the center of Rayon Ostroshez in Gebiet Dubno. Nachwuchsführer Brocks became the Gebietskommissar. Leutnant der Gendarmerie Eberhardt was appointed the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Dubno in the spring of 1942.³ A village elder (starosta) was appointed for Ostrożec by the German military administration. A local Ukrainian police unit was also recruited.

In the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Ostrożec. Jews were ordered to wear distinctive markings: according to one witness, the Star of David was later exchanged for yellow patches to be worn on the front and backs of their clothes.⁴ They were required to perform forced labor, prohibited from leaving the limits of the village, and subjected to systematic beatings and robberies by the Ukrainian police.

In August 1941, German security forces carried out a first Aktion in Ostrożec in which 40 Jews were shot.⁵ On August 1, 1941, 130 Jews were also shot in the village of Targowica.⁶

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established on German orders, which had to collect “contributions” in the form of money and goods for the German authorities and supply Jews for forced labor. During the winter of 1941–1942, Jews sneaked out of the village to collect firewood, but if caught, the Ukrainian police shot them. Only a few Germans were based in the village, including an officer named Vogel. Witnesses state that Vogel had sexual relations with one or more Jewish women; as a result, allegedly he tipped off the Judenrat in advance of German roundups.⁷

In the spring of 1942, probably in April, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Ostrożec. According to Jewish survivor Anatoly Burstein, his family was transferred to the Ostrożec ghetto from Peremiłowka in March or April 1942.⁸ At around this time, the Jews of Targowica were also transferred on foot to the Ostrożec ghetto, carrying what they could in their arms.⁹ Local witnesses from Ostrożec disagree about when the ghetto was established, with dates ranging from late 1941 to the summer of 1942; this was perhaps because Ostrożec was a completely Jewish shtetl before the war, and the ghetto was set up incrementally, first confining Jews to the village and later bringing in Jews from outside and erecting a fence.¹⁰

The ghetto consisted of about half of the shtetl surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by the Ukrainian police. Living conditions were very overcrowded, with about four or five people sharing a room. The Judenrat assigned the newcomers to private homes, trying to distribute them evenly among the local Jews. There was no medical assistance available in the ghetto, but some women gave birth successfully despite this. According to one witness, Jewish girls were raped by drunken members of the Ukrainian police. Jews were starving but were able to exchange possessions with local inhabitants for food.¹¹

After the ghetto was set up, forced labor tasks included sorting potatoes, moving stones, and road construction. Some Jews continued to work for farmers in the surrounding area—a circumstance that proved fortunate for those who were still outside the ghetto when the final roundup took place. The Jews quickly received news about local farmers digging huge graves at the Jewish cemetery, and at least 200 Jews managed to flee from the ghetto in the hours before the final roundup.¹²

On October 9, 1942,¹³ German police assisted by the local Ukrainian police began the liquidation of the ghetto. Detailed accounts of the ghetto liquidation have been provided by local witnesses interviewed by Father Patrick Desbois in 2007. First Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto, and then the Jews were rounded up and put onto black trucks. The trucks were then driven to the prepared pits, where the Jews were forced to disembark in a column with the rabbi at its head. Then the Jews were made to undress. They placed their clothes and valuables into a cart, on which these items were subsequently transported back to the ghetto. The Jews were then shot in groups of five people in the main pit. Small children were simply thrown into the pit, and some Jews were only wounded, so many of the victims were probably buried alive. One or two individuals attempted to flee, but the guards shot them and their bodies were brought back and buried with the others.¹⁴

According to witnesses, many of the Jews who escaped initially were found hiding in the ghetto, were denounced, or returned of their own free will over the following days and weeks. Shooting Aktions against smaller groups of Jews carried on for at least two more weeks. Once the main mass grave had been filled in, the earth continued to move eerily for several days. In total, at least 700 Jews were shot. The Aktion was carried out by a detachment of the Sipo and SD from Równe, with the assistance of local Ukrainian police and the German Gendarmerie.

Local witnesses state that a few Jewish girls were kept alive after the massacre and cooked for the German officer Vogel, who had intimate relations with them but more or less kept them as his prisoners. These last Jews, as well as other Jews found in hiding, were shot in the smaller pit at the Jewish cemetery at some time in the fall of 1942.¹⁵ A few Jewish escapees managed to survive with the help of local farmers, including some from the Czech minority that lived in the area.

SOURCES Published sources on the Jewish communities of Ostrożec and Targowica and their fate during the Holocaust include the following: Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), pp. 73, 363, 367; and Leonid Koval, ed., Kniga spaseniiia (Urmala: Golfstrim, 1993), 2:307–308.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews in Ostrożec can be found in the following archives: DARO; GARF (7021-71-61); VHF (# 3150, 21494, 22892, 44907); YIU (nos. 78-79); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 363.
2. VHF, # 21494, testimony of Pola Grinstein; YIU, Témoin no. 78, Leonid Khvil (born 1935), March 27, 2007.
3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
4. VHF, # 21494.
5. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 73.
6. Ibid.
7. VHF, # 21494; see also YIU, Témoin no. 79, Leonid Khvil (born 1935) and Mykola Krystitch, March 2007, who accuses Vogel of exploiting Jewish girls.
8. Anatoly Burstein, in Koval, Kniga spaseniiia, pp. 307–308, states April; VHF, # 44907, testimony of Anatoly Burstein, states March 1942.
9. VHF, # 22892, testimony of Irvin Miller, who was among those transferred, dates it in the spring of 1942.
10. Ibid., # 3150, Nathan Peters, dates its formation in late 1941; # 21494, dates it in the summer of 1942.

11. Ibid., # 3150; # 44907, mentions cases of rape.
12. Ibid., # 3150; # 22892.
13. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 367.
14. YIU, Témoign nos. 78 and 79.
15. Ibid.

PIŃSK

Pre-1939: Pińsk, city and powiat capital, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Pinsk, oblast' capital, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: raen center, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Pińsk is located at the confluence of the Pina and Pripet Rivers, 222 kilometers (138 miles) south-southwest of Minsk.

The Soviet army occupied Pińsk on September 20, 1939, in accordance with the terms of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact.

On Friday, July 4, 1941, 13 days after Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, the first advance units entered Pińsk. According to German estimates, Pińsk had around 80,000 inhabitants, of whom 35,000 to 40,000 were Jews.¹ This estimate is probably too high, however. The historian Tikva Fatal-Knaani suggests a lower figure of about 26,000 Jews.

Immediately upon the German arrival, Jewish men were seized in the streets and arrested as "Bolshevists," "looters," and "partisans," including 16 young men who were taken out of their houses on Listovskaia Street under false pretenses and subsequently shot and buried. Only 1 of them survived by hiding, wounded, under a pile of dead bodies, and reported the events to town leaders. Antisemitic decrees made normal life impossible. On the second day of the occupation, Jewish bakeries were required to supply bread for the German army under threat of the execution of 10 Jews for each missing loaf of bread. Survivors testified that Jews were forbidden to leave the city or to be seen on the streets after 6:00 P.M. or to shop in the marketplace. All Jewish men, women, and children were ordered to wear a white armband with a Star of David on their left arm; noncompliance was punishable by death. German soldiers entered homes at will and engaged in spontaneous looting. Later, there were frequent official demands for items such as radios, clothing, fur coats, fabric, gold, and china. Each requisition order carried threats of reprisal. Men were often abducted for labor details and hence avoided the streets. Those abducted returned starving after a long hard day, often bruised from beatings. Jews were afraid to go to synagogues. The streets emptied, and shops, offices, and schools closed. The Tarbut High School was used to accommodate German staff. Those working in free professions lost their livelihood, and only factory and some workshop workers received work permits.²

A view of Pińsk during World War I; the photo caption reads, "Russian Jews fish on the frozen Pina."

USHMM WS #48262, COURTESY OF TOMASZ WISNIEWSKI,

Christian inhabitants welcomed the end of Soviet rule and greeted the Germans with bread, salt, and flowers, while Jews watched in fear behind closed shutters. Many in the non-Jewish population collaborated with the occupation forces and observed the altered status of their Jewish neighbors with glee. Non-Jews in Pińsk did their share of looting. Soon the Nazis forbade all contacts between Jewish and Christian residents of Pińsk.

On July 30, 1941, the Ortskommandant issued an order to establish a Jewish Council (Judenrat) consisting of 24 Jews, whose chairman was personally responsible for receiving orders and guaranteeing their "conscientious and timely implementation."³ David Alper, principal of Tarbut High School, was chosen as first chairman of the Judenrat. He resigned two days later, realizing the nature of his task, and was killed along with 20 other Judenrat members during the first Aktion. The remaining 8 members of the Judenrat continued in this capacity until the end. Vice-chairman Motl Minsky served as acting chair because of his fluent German. Benjamin Bokshansky was nominal chairman; Efraim Feinbron was responsible for finance; Menahem Goldman, for legal affairs; Mendl Cooper, for labor; and Moshel Aizenberg, Jechiel Silberblat, and Meir Greenstein, for supplies. The Judenrat was organized into departments providing basic services, such as labor, sanitation, health, judiciary, supplies, and welfare. After the establishment of the ghetto, the Judenrat operated a soup kitchen and the Chevra Kadisha burial society. The Judenrat's main source of income was a bread tax, used to comply with German demands, pay salaries of employees, and provide social services. Many documents in the State Archives of the Brest Oblast' (GABO) record the Judenrat's persistent negotiations to establish bakeries, increase the flour supply, and secure bread for the orphanage and hospital.

The Jewish Police maintained order, especially around the Tarbut school, where the Judenrat offices were located and thousands of people converged to arrange their affairs. The chief of police (Asher Feldlait, later replaced by Goldberg) and 12 policemen were paid by the Judenrat. After the establishment of the ghetto, the number of policemen grew to 50. On the whole, witnesses did not recall them as cruel or abusive.

On the night of August 4, 300 men were detained as hostages to force the Judenrat to comply with the order to assemble all men between 16 and 60 for a three-day work detail. Thousands of men were herded to the railway station, robbed of their belongings, and arranged in two long columns of 5 abreast. They were forced almost to run to Posenichi, an hour march outside Pińsk. Photos of this Aktion taken by a German soldier show the bodies fully dressed in open pits.⁴ A small number escaped after being wounded and buried alive under dead bodies in the pits. One survivor, Arye Dolinko, informed the Judenrat, but this information was kept quiet to avoid endangering escapees and living witnesses.⁵ During the next two days, the Nazis rounded up more Jews, including younger boys and older men as well as some women. On August 7, 2,500 more people were shot in the village of Kozliekovich. By Thursday, August 8, at least 8,000 people had been murdered, and the community's leadership was especially hard-hit. Most cultural, educational, and religious activities came to a halt. The vast majority of the survivors were women and children. Abruptly, the 2nd SS-Cavalry Regiment left Pińsk on August 9.⁶

On August 11, the Ortskommandant decreed forced labor ("without wages . . . food may be given")⁷ for all men between 14 and 60 and all women between 15 and 50. The German civil administration arrived in Pińsk during September 1941. The first Gebietskommissar was Römpler. Upon his death in late 1941, he was replaced by Paul Gerhard Klein; the deputy Gebietskommissar was Alfred Ebner. During the winter of 1941–1942, the community's members suffered from hunger, looting, and summary murders, but remained in their homes.

The German authorities did not establish a ghetto in Pińsk until relatively late, that is, on May 1, 1942.⁸ On April 30, the Jews were ordered to move to the ghetto within 24 hours. Few belongings were permitted, although people brought more than was officially permitted. Non-Jewish neighbors took advantage of this sudden evacuation to steal and loot. The assigned area was the poorest and most crowded part of town, shaped roughly like a rectangle. It was enclosed by a barbed-wire fence measuring 2,345 meters (1.5 miles) in length and had three gates.⁹ The ghetto contained 240 wooden, one-story houses on 23 streets, with only two water pumps. The allocation of living space per person was about 1.2 square meters (almost 13 square feet), and each room was occupied by at least 10 people.¹⁰ Health conditions deteriorated drastically, and documents from the Jewish clinic and the Gebietskommissariat health department record dysentery, typhus, and starvation-related illnesses.¹¹

A list of ghetto inhabitants compiled by German authorities registered nearly 18,300 people by surname, given name, date of birth, street address, and occupation. Statistical analysis shows that men over the age of 15 made up 14 percent of the ghetto population; women over 15, 50 percent; and children, 36 percent. A total of 5,112 people were listed with workplaces: of these, 1,944 were men, and 3,168 (62 percent) were women. There were 44 distinct places of employment for ghetto workers. The Judenrat employed 1,175 people in its diverse departments. There were 999 workers who provided services to the Germans, while another 1,284 supplied the city's residents with goods and services; among them, 364 women worked in Christian households. Another 859 people labored in factories and lumber mills, and 795 in various workshops.¹²

The Judenrat offices moved to the ghetto and operated several stores to distribute daily food rations. Judenrat workers on payroll raised vegetables in a lot near the Judenrat building. Bakers were allowed a weekly excursion to bring in flour, and they often smuggled in an extra quantity, to be sold as black market bread.¹³

Some people from Pińsk joined the partisans; however, no significant military resistance is recorded for Pińsk itself. The Judenrat's members discouraged young people from fighting for fear of reprisals and because they believed German reassurances that work performed in the ghetto was essential and would ensure survival. Although some young people had managed with great difficulty to collect weapons, their plans were postponed until it was too late.¹⁴ Some residents escaped into the swamps of Polesia and tried to join the partisans before the destruction of the ghetto, but many died in the attempt. There was very little assistance from non-Jews in Pińsk, and after the war only 17 Jews are recorded as emerging from hiding in and around Pińsk. A few righteous non-Jews had risked their own lives to save them.¹⁵

On October 27, 1942, Heinrich Himmler gave the order to "liquidate and destroy the ghetto of Pińsk immediately."¹⁶ The ghetto in Pińsk was one of the last to be destroyed in Reichskommissariat Ukraine. Preparations, including the digging of pits, had been under way. According to Himmler's order, 1,000 men were to be kept alive as laborers, but in the end only 60 to 70 men and women survived the massacres between October 29 and November 1, 1942.

The killings are described in Captain Helmut Saur's "Experience Report."¹⁷ On October 29, SS and police units arrived in Pińsk at 4:00 A.M. and sealed off the ghetto by 4:13 A.M. Many Jews gathered voluntarily in the streets, still believing that reporting for work might spare their lives. Others tried to break out of the ghetto but were shot trying. Alfred Ebner had prepared a list of 400 workers for the plywood and match factories who would be spared. Captain Saur reports that nearly 10,000 Jews were killed on that first day, but his numbers are ambiguous and can be read as referring to either 16,200 or 26,200 victims. Given the list of residents dated January 1942, a total death toll of 20,000 people by November 1 appears probable.¹⁸ The ghetto was searched four times, and many sick and elderly were killed inside the ghetto. Patients and preselected skilled workers, temporarily housed on hospital grounds, were shot in the hospital yard. All the others were marched to Dobrovalia, a village 5 kilometers (3 miles) outside the ghetto, where a pit 40 meters long, 4 meters deep, and 3 meters wide (131 by 13 by 10 feet) had been dug by local peasants. People were ordered to strip, walk into the pit, and lie facedown on top of the previously murdered; then they were shot in the head.

Those selected for work were held in jail for 11 days and then moved to a new "small ghetto" near the former Karlin Yeshiva building. Approximately 140 people lived there, including some who had survived the massacres in hiding. The medical doctors among this group were selected and killed after being denounced by local non-Jewish doctors.

People knew their end had come when tailor Leibl Sherman's workshop stopped receiving new work orders and customers came to pick up their unfinished clothing. On December 23, 1942, the remaining Jews were murdered in the Karlin cemetery.¹⁹

Franz Magill was sentenced to five years' imprisonment for his role in the first killing wave (2 Ks 1/63, LG-Braun).²⁰ Gebietskommissar Paul Gerhard Klein died in 1945. The trial of Kuhr et al. (4 Ks 1/71, LG-Frank) resulted in short prison sentences for members of Police Battalion 306, engaged in the second killing wave, but for medical reasons there was no conviction of deputy Gebietskommissar Alfred Ebner.²¹

SOURCES Survivor accounts are collected in the Pinsk Memorial Book (hereafter PMB), published in three volumes by the Association of Pinsk-Karlin and the Vicinity in 1966–1977, including the testimony of David Gleibman-Globe, Yehoshua Naidich, Motl Schukhman, Haya Sherman, Golda Sherman-Galetzky, and Tzila Dolinko. Published memoirs include: Arye Dolinko, How Pinsk and Karlin's Communities Were Destroyed (Tel Aviv: Society of Former Residents of Pinsk and Karlin in Eretz-Israel, 1946); and Werner Müller, ed., Aus dem Feuer gerissen: Die Geschichte des Pjotr Ruwinowitsch Rabzewitsch aus Pinsk (Cologne: Dietrich, 2001). Nahum Boneh's The Holocaust and the Revolt, Offprint from the Pinsk Memorial Book, vol. 1, pt. 2 (Tel Aviv: Association of the Jews of Pinsk-Karlin in Israel, 1977) relies on survivor testimony. E.S. Rozenblat and I. Elenskaia's Pinskie evrei: 1939–1944 (Brest: Brestskii Gosudarstvennyi Universitet, 1997) is based on documents in GABO, as is the more recent analysis by Tikva Fatal-Knaani, "The Jews of Pinsk, 1939–1943, through the Prism of New Documentation," Yad Vashem Studies 29 (2001): 149–182. Stephen Phillip Pallavicini's "The Liquidation of the Jews of the Polesie: 1941–1942: A Case Study: Pinsk and Surrounding Areas" (Ph.D. diss., Macquarie University, Sydney, Australia, 2001) also uses German postwar criminal investigations. In Polish, there is: Fanny Sołomian-Łoc, Getto i gwiazdy (Warsaw: Czytelnik, 1993).

Documents from the ghetto are kept in GABO and are available on microfilm at Yad Vashem (YVA) and USHMM as Record Group M-41. The Zentrale Stelle der Landesjustizverwaltungen in Ludwigsburg (now BA-L) holds much of the documentation used to prepare the trials against Magill (Braunschweig) and Kuhr et al. (Frankfurt/Main) (see, for example, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59). The full trial records are kept in the relevant state archives of Lower Saxony and Hesse. Survivor testimonies taken by Israeli police are located in the Moreshet Archives (MA) in Givat Haviva, Israel; additional survivor testimonies can be found in YVA.

Web sites: www.pinskjews.org.il; www.jewishgen.org/yizkor/pinsk1/pinsk1.html; www.jewishgen.org/databases/PinskGhetto.htm; and www.jewishgen.org/databases/Belarus/PinskGhetto-YalkutMoreshet.htm.

Katharina von Kellenbach, Nahum Boneh, and Ellen Stepak

NOTES

1. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 393/59, Ghetto Vernichtung im Raum Pinsk (28 März 1963), Abschlussbericht Dr. Arzt.

2. Cf. David Gleibman-Globe, New York, 1962; Haya Sherman, Tel Aviv, 1955; Melekh Bakalchuk, Buenos Aires, 1958, and Arye Dolinko—all in So Perished the Communities of Pinsk and Katolin (Moscow, 2005) [English], pp. 102–103.

3. YVA, M 41/945, Ortskommandantur Pinsk (OK II/333), July 30, 1941.

4. Erich Mirek, "Enthüllung faschistischer Grausamkeiten," in Institut für Marxismus-Leninismus beim Zentralkomitee der Sozialistischen Einheitspartei Deutschlands, ed., In den Wäldern Belorusslands: Erinnerungen (Berlin: Dietz, 1976), pp. 172–177.

5. Dolinko, How Pinsk and Karlin's Communities Were Destroyed, p. 14.

6. Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 1999), pp. 560–566; Nahum Boneh, "Pinsk Jews in the Ghetto: Current State of Affairs," Yalkut Moresbet (Mordechai Anilevich Study and Research Center, Israel), no. 64 (November 1997).

7. YVA, M-41/942, Ortskommandantur Pinsk an Bürgermeister in Pinsk, August 8, 1941.

8. Pallavicini, "The Liquidation," pp. 88–100.

9. In 1993 N.M. Polehovich, a Polish Christian resident of Pinsk, drew a map that can be accessed at jewishgen.org/database/Belarus/PinskGhetto.htm.

10. Müller, Aus dem Feuer gerissen: Die Geschichte des Pjotr Ruwinowitsch Rabzewitsch aus Pinsk; Boneh, "Pinsk Jews in the Ghetto."

11. Fatal-Knaani, "The Jews of Pinsk," pp. 172–173.

12. Boneh, "Pinsk Jews in the Ghetto."

13. Boneh, PMB [English], 1:113.

14. Ibid., 2:343 (chap. 6).

15. Ibid. [English]: 1:129.

16. The order was received by the HSSPF in Ukraine, Prützmann, on October 27, 1942 (BA-BL, R 19/319), and involved units of the KdS Aussendienststelle Pinsk, Security Police, Order Police, and Ukrainian Schuma. Cf. Dr. Yosef Kermish, Yad Vashem News (Jerusalem), nos. 6–7 (January 1956).

17. GARF, 7021-148-2, pp. 355–356, Saur Erfahrungsbericht.

18. Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde, pp. 720–723.

19. Boneh, PMB [English]: 1:126–129.

20. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 20, (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 570.

21. Katharina von Kellenbach, "Vanishing Acts: Perpetrators in Postwar Germany," Journal of Holocaust and Genocide Studies 17:2 (2003): 305–329.

POCZAJÓW

Pre-1939: Poczajów (Yiddish: Potchayev), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Pochaev, Tarnopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Potschajew, Rayon center, Gebiet Kremenez, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Pochaiv, Ternopil oblast', Ukraine

Poczajów is located 101 kilometers (63 miles) north of Tarnopol'. According to the 1921 census, 1,083 Jews lived in the town. By mid-1941, assuming a natural growth of 0.9 percent per decade, there were probably about 1,300 Jews in Poczajów. After the beginning of the war, in late June 1941, several dozen Jewish men were drafted into the Red Army, and a number of others were able to evacuate to the east, so that just over 1,000 Jews came under German occupation in the town.

The Germans occupied Poczajów on June 30, 1941. During July and August, a German military administration governed the town, and in September 1941, authority was transferred to a civil administration. Poczajów was a Rayon center in Gebiet Kremenez, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Kremenez Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Müller.¹ A Ukrainian local administration and police were created in Poczajów. The Ukrainian police were subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post in the town, which was manned by several German Gendarmes.

Soon after the establishment of the German administration, three Jews from Poczajów went to the Gebiet center in Krzemieniec on behalf of the Poczajów Jewish community. Here they received instructions to create a Judenrat consisting of 12 members and a Jewish police force of 30 people in Poczajów.²

The first German repressive measures were directed against members of the Communist youth organization, whom they rounded up, tortured, and shot. Then on July 8, 1941, the Ukrainian police and a few Germans collected 106 Jews and imprisoned them in the cellar of the police station. After being beaten, the victims were taken out at night and shot in a nearby forest.³

In the summer and fall of 1941, a succession of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Poczajów: Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (a Star of David), they were compelled to engage in forced labor, they were forbidden to leave the village, and they were subjected to systematic robberies and beatings by the Ukrainian police. In addition, an order was issued to establish a brothel for the Germans, employing 20 girls aged 18 to 20. Fathers and mothers bribed the authorities to keep their daughters from being taken. On another occasion, 10 alleged young Communists were arrested, and a ransom of 50,000 Reichsmark (RM) was demanded from the Jewish community. When the money was paid, however, it was discovered that the 10 victims had already been shot.⁴

In January 1942, a ghetto was established in the town, which contained approximately 1,000 Jews.⁵ The ghetto was surrounded by a 2-meter-high (6.6-feet-high) wooden fence with barbed wire on top. The Jews were compelled to erect the fence themselves. Inside the ghetto, conditions were very overcrowded, and there was a severe shortage of water. Jews were permitted to get water from the well outside the ghetto only during a two-hour period each day. Some Jews paid bribes to get permission to use horses for the collection of water.

As Jews no longer had access to the mills, inside the ghetto people used stones to make flour from wheat. At the beginning, residents of the ghetto received 150 grams (5.3 ounces) of bread per day. Subsequently, for two months the ration was reduced to 120 grams (4.2 ounces) per day, and finally it was abolished altogether. To prevent Jews from smuggling food into the ghetto, there were Ukrainian guards on the outside of the ghetto and Jewish Police on the inside. Sometimes the Jewish Police bribed the Ukrainian guard to allow people to smuggle in food. About 200 or 300 men performed forced labor daily, usually working on road construction or cleaning up vacated Jewish houses. Work outside the ghetto presented an opportunity to find food or firewood. Nothing could be bought for money. However, despite strict regulations to the contrary, Jews were able to barter food from the peasants in exchange for clothing or other items.

On one occasion, 40 people who were working near a village paid off the guard to let them go to the village to forage for food. In the village, Ukrainian policemen caught them and took them to the German civil administration. The German official then selected 19 of the youngest people and ordered the Judenrat to dig a grave in which the victims were buried alive.

After the Germans denied the ghetto further bread rations, the Jews formed a committee that collected money from those who still had some left and set up a soup kitchen. People waited daily outside the canteen in long lines for a bowl of soup. In this way the ghetto inmates were able to ameliorate the effects of starvation.⁶

At the beginning of August 1942, 200 Ukrainian policemen arrived in Poczajów and stayed for several days. On Saturday, when everyone had returned from work, they sealed off the ghetto. When the Judenrat asked why nobody was allowed to leave, they were told that it was a punishment for smuggling food into the ghetto.

On the following Tuesday, two vehicles containing 30 men under the command of the Security Police (Sipo) and SD arrived. The head of the Sipo ordered the Judenrat and Jewish Police to come to the gate of the ghetto. He asked the Judenrat how many Jews were in the ghetto. The Judenrat and Jewish Police then received instructions to gather all the Jews at the ghetto gate. Not all Jews came voluntarily, however, and members of the German and Ukrainian police drove people out of their homes, beating and killing those who refused to come along.

At the ghetto gate, the men and women were separated, and the sick were loaded onto wagons. The people were then escorted through the fields to a grave that had been prepared in advance. Here they had to undress. Then the Germans lined them up in groups and shot them into the grave. Finally, a few grenades were thrown in to finish off any people who were only wounded.⁷

According to internal German documentation, the ghetto was liquidated on August 12, 1942,⁸ when a squad of the SD, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, shot 794 people (182 men, 374 women, and 238 children).⁹ About 30 Jewish craftsmen were kept alive for various tasks. Once they had cleaned out the ghetto, they were made to dig their own graves and were also shot. Some of the Jews hid and were able to escape the shootings on August 12. The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police hunted for these people and shot any Jews they found at the Jewish cemetery. Only a few young Jews managed to survive until the arrival of the Red Army.

SOURCES A detailed article by A. Kuperman and V. Veytsman, “The Death of Pochayev’s Jews,” can be found in the yizkor book for the town: H. Gelernt, ed., Pitchayever Yizkor-bukh (Philadelphia: Pitchayever Wohliner Aid Society, 1960), pp. 165–174. There is also a brief entry in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 150–152.

Documentation regarding the extermination of Poczajów’s Jews can be found in the following archives: DATO; GARF (7021-75-11); IPN; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. See Kuperman and Veytsman, “The Death of Pochayev’s Jews,” pp. 165–174.

3. Ibid. This source also includes a list of some of the victims of this Aktion.

4. Ibid.

5. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), pp. 363–366.

6. These internal details about the ghetto are all taken from Kuperman and Veytsman, “The Death of Pochayev’s Jews.”

7. Ibid.

8. R. Kravchenko-Berezhnoi, Moi XX vek (Stop-kadry) (Apatity, 1998), p. 121. Before the Aktion in Poczajów, a squad of the Security Police and SD conducted a mass shooting of Jews in Krzemieniec on August 10, 1942, and on August 11, 1942, they left for Poczajów and Wiśniowiec, where they also murdered the Jews.

9. IPN, GKŚZpNP, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, pp. 2–3, transcription of a Security Police report dated Rowno, August 15, 1942, on the “special treatment” of Jews in the Krzemieniec district. Poczajów is listed in third place after Krzemieniec and Wiśniowiec. It is known that the Aktion in Poczajów occurred after the Aktion in Wiśniowiec. According to materials found in the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report for the Poczajów (Pochayev) raion and town, in August 1942, up to 1,900 Jews were shot; later over 500 Jews were caught and executed in the cemetery (GARF, 7021-75-11, p. 10). It appears that these numbers are much too high. According to Kuperman and Veytsman, “The Death of Pochayev’s Jews,” there were some 800 victims of the ghetto liquidation.

POLONNOE

Pre-1941: Polonnoe, city and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Polonnoje, Rayon center, Gebiet Schepetowka, Generalkommissariat Wollhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Polonne, raion center, Khmel’nyts’kyi oblast’, Ukraine

Polonnoe is located 83 kilometers (52 miles) west of Zhitomir. In 1897, the Jewish population was 7,910. According to the 1926 census, 5,337 Jews resided in Polonnoe. The January 1939 census recorded 4,171 Jewish residents; they comprised 30.2 percent of the total population. In addition, 675 Jews lived in the town of Poninka, and another 883 Jews lived elsewhere in the Polonnoe raion, mostly in the settlement of Novolabun’.

After Nazi Germany attacked the USSR on June 22, 1941, some Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for the Red Army; other Jews were able to evacuate to the eastern regions of the Soviet Union. It seems likely that about 4,000 Jews remained in the Polonnoe raion at the start of the German occupation.

Polonnoe was occupied by units of the German 17th Army on July 6, 1941. In July and August 1941, the city was governed by a series of German military commandant’s offices (Ortskommandanturen). The military administration formed a local authority and an auxiliary police force recruited from local non-Jewish inhabitants. Polonnoe became a Rayon center within Gebiet Schepetowka. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsassessor Worbs, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Richard Höse.¹

In early August 1941, German security forces murdered 19 Jews in Polonnoe as alleged Communist activists. On August 23, a German police cavalry squadron, subordinated to the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) Russland Süd, Friedrich Jeckeln, shot 113 Jews in the city.²

On September 2, 1941, a mass shooting of the Jews was carried out by German Police Regiment South, assisted by their accomplices in the local police. The Jews were hunted down, loaded onto trucks, taken to the woods near a railway station, then shot and buried in pits. Before they were killed, they were made to strip naked, and gold teeth were removed from their mouths. According to German records, approximately 2,000 people were killed on this occasion. At the same time, in all likelihood most of the Jews of Poninka, about 500 in all, were murdered by the same police regiment.³ More than 80 Jews from Labun’ and Novolabun’ were murdered in the nearby forests in the summer and fall of 1941.⁴

Another 15 families (about 50 Jews) from Polonnoe were shot in the nearby town of Liubar on September 13, 1941, by the German 45th Reserve Police Battalion.⁵

During October and November 1941, a ghetto was created in Polonnoe in three or four barracks at the granite quarry on Berezovskaia Street, which were fenced in with barbed wire. Subsequently all the Jews from Poninka, Novolabun’, Berezhnia, Vorobevka, and Kotelianka who were still alive were brought to the ghetto. According to Maria Tribun, in the barracks Jews slept on the concrete floor and on shared bunks; there was no heat, and food was sparse. Some local residents tried to help by bringing potatoes, beets, and bread for those in the ghetto. Nevertheless, disease, including typhus, spread among the ghetto inhabitants as a result of the miserable conditions.

Nobody was permitted to leave the ghetto, and on the way to work the local police guarded the Jews. The ghetto inhabitants were ordered to wear a special symbol on their clothes: yellow circles on the front and back, which replaced the white armbands with a Star of David initially ordered by the military authorities. Anyone deemed guilty of the slightest misdeed was subjected to corporal punishment or even shot dead. Among the forced labor tasks was the carrying and destruction of Jewish gravestones in the cemetery.⁶ In the recollection of Boris Timoshenko, “[T]he conditions of life there were terrifying—cold and hunger were common.”⁷

According to Anna Kalika, the remaining Jews of Labun’ were brought into the Polonnoe ghetto in mid-February 1942. “While letting us through the gate into the ghetto, we were repeatedly hit by clubs; our valuables were taken away; those who dared to disobey were shot dead right on the spot.”⁸

As mentioned, most of the Jews of Poninka had been murdered before the winter of 1941–1942, and the remaining Jews, except for three families, were sent to the Polonnoe ghetto. These last three families, except for Yasha the barber, who escaped, were then escorted to the ghetto by the local police in mid-March 1942.⁹

On June 25, 1942, the German police from Shepetovka and local collaborators surrounded the ghetto. First they shot several people to intimidate the Jews. Then they selected about 15 young men and women to be sent to the Shepetovka ghetto a week later to work as craftsmen. Then the remaining people, mainly women, children, and the elderly, about 1,270 in total, were shot near Poninka.¹⁰

Maria Tribun escaped from the ghetto before the liquidation and was hidden with her sister in the village of Kotelianka by the family of Radion Ianiuk, whom they had known previously. Anna Kalika was transferred to Shepetovka in July 1942, where she survived the mass shooting by hiding in a ditch and was subsequently helped by forest wardens. Maria Shafranskaia was hidden by Anastasia Boriskina, even though part of her house was for a time occupied by the local chief of police and those found to be hiding Jews were threatened with the death penalty.¹¹

SOURCES Several personal accounts by survivors of the Polonnoe ghetto and other information on the fate of the Jews of the Polonnoe raion can be found in the yizkor book edited by S.L. Bentsianov, Sefer Zakorrem: Book of Memory. Suffering of Jews that Died during the Nazi Occupation: History of Polonnoye Jews (1993), which has been translated into English and made available on the Web by Jewishgen. There is also a survivor testimony concerning the ghetto in Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 288–291.

Additional information on the Jewish communities in the Polonnoe raion and their fate during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1012; A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertz fashizma,” 2000), pp. 181, 185–186, 197, and 230.

Relevant documentation on the anti-Jewish Aktions carried out by the German police under the authority of the HSSPF Russland Süd, Friedrich Jeckeln, in the Shepetovka-Polonnoe region in August and September 1941 can be found in the following archives: VHAP; and USHMM (RG-48.004M). Additional information can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF; VHF; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. VHAP (USHMM, RG-48.004M), HSSPF Russland Süd, Jeckeln Telegram, no. 154, August 24, 1941.

3. Ibid., HSSPF Russland Süd, Jeckeln Radiogram, no. 61, September 4, 1941; Mariya Moiseyevna Tribun, “I Ought to Tell . . .” in Bentsianov, Sefer Zakorrem, pp. 27–28. The ChGK report gives the figure of some 4,000 Jews murdered in Polonnoe on this occasion.

4. O. Lochkin, “On the Roads of War,” p. 49; Anna Moiseyevna Kalika, “Memoirs of a Former Prisoner of a Jewish Ghetto,” pp. 29–30—both in Bentsianov, Sefer Zakorrem.

5. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg. Entsiklopedicheskii spravocchnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 197.

6. Tribun, “I Ought to Tell . . .,” pp. 27–28.

7. Testimony of Boris Timoshenko, in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, p. 289.

8. Kalika, “Memoirs,” pp. 29–30.

9. “Fight with Death,” in Bentsianov, Sefer Zakorrem, pp. 43–46.

10. “The Tragedy of Black September,” in ibid., p. 78.

11. “The Saviour,” in ibid., p. 49.

PORYCK

Pre-1939: Poryck, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Pavlovka, raion center, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Porizk, Rayon center, Gebiet Wladimir-Wolynsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Pavlivka, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Poryck is located on the Luga River, 29 kilometers (18 miles) south-southeast of Włodzimierz Wołyński. In 1921, there were 1,205 Jews living there. By mid-1941, allowing for an annual increase of 9 to 10 persons per 1,000, there would have been about 1,500 Jews in Poryck and about 1,000 more living in the villages of the Pavlovka raion.¹

Forces of the German 6th Army occupied Poryck on June 23, 1941. At first, in July and August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of the town. Authority was transferred to a German civil administration in September 1941. Poryck became a Rayon center in Gebiet Wladimir-Wolynsk, where Nachwuchsführer Wilhelm Westerheide was the Gebietskommissar from late 1941.² The leader of the Gendarmerie (SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer) from July 1942 was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Grigat. He was in command of 18 Gendarmerie officials spread over several Rayons, including Poryck. Several German Gendarmes and a local Ukrainian police unit (consisting of a few dozen members) were stationed in the town.

At the beginning of September 1941, the first anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out in Poryck. German forces arrested about 100 Jewish men and then shot them.³

In the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Poryck. A curfew was imposed on the Jews at night, and they were ordered to wear distinctive markings, initially armbands bearing the Star of David, then later a yellow circle sewn onto their chests. They were called on to perform heavy forced labor, prohibited from leaving the limits of the village, and subjected to systematic beatings by the Ukrainian police. The Germans also established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) to transmit their orders to the Jewish population. From the summer of 1941 and into 1942, the German authorities imposed a series of “contributions” on the Jewish population, compelling them to surrender all valuables and fur clothing.

In the winter of 1941–1942 or the spring of 1942, the Germans established some form of ghetto in Poryck (possibly an “open ghetto”), as they resettled the Jews from the surrounding villages into the town. This resulted in considerable overcrowding and the spread of disease, including cases of typhus. A hospital existed inside the Jewish quarter of Poryck to deal with those who fell sick.

On September 1, 1942, Ukrainian local police, supervised by the German Gendarmerie, encircled the Jewish houses early in the morning. Then the Ukrainians burst in, driving out the Jews, shooting immediately the elderly and those too sick to walk, including all the occupants of the hospital. The remaining Jews were escorted to a farm surrounded with barbed wire, about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside the town. The Ukrainian militiamen beat them and stabbed them with bayonets on the way, killing anyone who fell down wounded, such that the route was littered with corpses. At the farm the Jews were held for three days in the open air without food or drink and were brutally beaten and humiliated by the Ukrainian guards, who also robbed them of any remaining valuables. About 300 Jews, including many babies, died under these conditions or were shot during the course of these humiliations. Then the Ukrainian police chief, Pasalski, gave the order for the remaining Jews to be taken to the pits that had been prepared. Pasalski and his assistant Mojch then shot the Jews personally, after the small children had been bayoneted and thrown into the grave first. Ukrainians had gathered from the surrounding villages in search of loot and assisted the German forces by filling in the graves. One Ukrainian woman even asked for the pretty woolen dress that one of the Jewish victims was wearing as she waited to be shot.⁴

The Aktion was concluded on September 5, 1942, and in total at least 1,800 Jews from Poryck and the surrounding Rayon were murdered.⁵ About 100 Jews had fled from Poryck at the start of the Aktion, but most were soon recaptured and brought back into the town. There the Ukrainian police murdered them in a most brutal way, cutting off their hands or other limbs and then burning them alive in the remaining Jewish houses.⁶ This report appears to be corroborated in the diary of Michael Diment, who records an encounter with another Jewish survivor, Yankel, who had briefly hidden in the burned-out homes in Poryck after the mass killing there.⁷ Sonie Rubinsztejn, who fled successfully at the last moment before the mass shooting, found refuge with a local priest whom she knew near Łokacze, who gave her shelter and trained her to pass as a Christian.⁸ The Red Army liberated Poryck on July 18, 1944.

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Poryck can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 152–153.

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Poryck can be found in the following archives: DAVO; GARF (7021-55-11); MA(A262); and YVA(M-1/E/1494).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Among the villages in the raion were Iwanicze (Jewish population of 61 in 1921) and Litowiz (Jewish population of 32 in 1921). See Blackbook of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), pp. 216–219.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. GARF, 7021-55-11, pp. 6, 8.

4. YVA, M-1/E/1494, testimony of Sonie Rubinsztejn, August 1, 1947.

5. GARF, 7021-55-11, pp. 6, 8. Other sources put the number of Jews in the Poryck ghetto at around 3,000; YVA, M-1/E/1494.

6. YVA, M-1/E/1494.

7. Michael Diment, The Lone Survivor: A Diary of the Łukacze Ghetto and Svyntukhy, Ukraine (New York: Holocaust Library, 1992), p. 150.

8. YVA, M-1/E/1494.

POWÓRSK

Pre-1939: Powórsk, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Povorsk, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Poworsk, Rayon and Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Povors'k, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Powórsk is located about 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) to the east of Kowel. In 1921, the Jewish population was only 37, but by the 1930s it had increased to more than 200.¹ In September 1939, the village fell within the Soviet occupation zone.²

German forces occupied the village on June 26, 1941. There was no permanent German garrison in the town, but a Ukrainian police force was recruited from local inhabitants, led by a man named Zakuta.

In late August or early September 1942, the Ukrainians received an order from the Germans to establish an “open ghetto” in Powórsk, and all the Jewish families came to live on one street. There were three or four families living in each house. Just before the Jewish holidays in early September 1942, the Germans and their collaborators murdered all the Jews of the village (about 200 in total). On either September 2 or September 4, 1942, the Ukrainian police rounded up the Jews and escorted them to ditches that had been prepared previously by the Soviet occupying forces to hold gasoline tanks. Before they were shot, the Jews had to sit on the ground and were made to surrender any jewelry or valuables they possessed. The rabbi was the first to be led to the pits and also the first to be shot.³

Among the Jewish survivors from Powórsk were Basia Katz (née Eisenberg), who escaped with her entire family and migrated to Canada after the war, and Bella Fleishman.

SOURCES The yizkor book edited by Yehuda Merin, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Manyevits', Horodok, Troyanovkah, Lishnivkah u-Povursk (Tel Aviv: Irgun yotse Manyevits', Horodok, Troyanovkah, Lishnivkah u-Povursk veka-sevivah ba-Erets uve-hu.l., 2002) [in Hebrew, Yiddish, and partly in English], was first published in 1980 and republished in Givatayim, Israel, in 2002.

The Jewish survivor Basia Katz was interviewed in 1988 by the British Home Office War Crimes Inquiry. The original transcript of this interview is now held at the British National Archives (NA) in London.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Blackbook of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), pp. 212–228; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 1018–1019.

2. This entry is based mainly on the recollections of Basia Katz, a Jewish survivor from Powórsk, interviewed by William Chalmers for the British Home Office War Crimes Inquiry on September 9, 1988.

3. Testimony of Basia Katz, interviewed by William Chalmers on September 9, 1988, gives the date of Friday September 4, 1942; A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertv fashizma,” 2000), p. 34, gives the date of September 2, 1942.

PROSKUROV

Pre-1941: Proskurov, city and raion center, Kamenets-Podol'skii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Proskurov, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Khmel'nyts'kyi (Proskuriv), Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Proskurov is located about 340 kilometers (211 miles) southwest of Kiev, on the Bug River. In 1939, 14,518 Jews lived in the city (38.7 percent of the total).

Units of German Army Group South entered Proskurov on July 8, 1941. Between June 22 and July 8, only a few Jewish families left the city. Able-bodied men aged 19 to 36 volunteered for or were drafted into the Red Army. Precise figures are unavailable, but it appears that around 10,000 Jews remained in Proskurov at the start of the occupation.

A mass grave in Proskurov, 1941–1942.

USHMM WS #17880, COURTESY OF JULIUS SCHATZ

Proskurov became the center of Gebiet Proskurov in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Proskurov, Hundertschaftsführer Schmerbeck, made his residence on Aleksandrovskaia Street.

From the start of the German occupation, a pattern of plunder, humiliation, abuse, and murder of Jews emerged. Units of Einsatzgruppe C, as well as a self-organized Western Ukrainian Bukovina Battalion, headed by Peter Voinovsky, carried out these measures.

The Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Proskurov, and Liza Lindenboym was appointed its chairwoman. She was responsible for implementing all the directives issued by Gebietskommissar Schmerbeck. She appointed 10 other Jewish men and women to serve on the Judenrat. Its main function was to provide Jewish forced laborers for the Germans. Many Jews hated Lindenboym. Most survivors maintained that there was no Jewish police force in Proskurov. Iosif Groysman, however, stated that “Jewish policemen” assembled the Jews for work.¹

In September 1941, Gebietskommissar Schmerbeck ordered Jews to assemble in a ghetto—two blocks on Kupecheskaia and Remeslennaia Streets—near the open market, surrounded by barbed wire with only one gate. Prisoners failing to appear would be shot. Ukrainian policemen supervised the assembly. The majority of people did not resist the order. The barbed wire gave the Jews a false sense of security that it “protected” them from the Germans and hostile Ukrainians. Most of the residents on Kupecheskaia and Remeslennaia Streets were Jews. Jews from other parts of the city moved in with them. Three to five families crowded into each house, 15 to 20 people per room. No one was allowed to leave the ghetto without a permit. Ukrainian policemen guarded the ghetto.²

The first ghetto existed less than four months. Jews worked as forced laborers. The work included harvest collection, fruit concentration, demolition of the Jewish cemetery, the clearing of ruined houses, shoveling snow in winter, and other jobs outside the ghetto. Unless they possessed their own tools, the laborers performed nearly all work manually. Ukrainian and Lithuanian policemen guarded the Jews to and from work. They beat men and women with whips and occasionally shot those who were unable to work any longer. Shoemakers, tailors, tanners, welders, coopers, and other skilled workers labored inside the ghetto, and many received permission to work in shops outside the barbed wire, under close supervision. Children of the specialists worked with their parents. Elderly Jews, the sick, and toddlers lived in constant fear of the Germans and policemen when the able-bodied Jews left for work.³

Forced laborers received 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread daily. The nonworking Jews were not entitled to food. Skilled laborers, also not entitled to food, received food in compensation for their work from local non-Jews and Germans. Townspeople and villagers traded food at the barbed-wire fence for clothing, utensils, and any commodities that the Jews still owned. Both sides risked being beaten or shot. Volodymyr Lanko, a Ukrainian agronomist, helped many people in the ghetto. Young people crawled out of the ghetto at night and begged their former non-Jewish neighbors for food. The barbed wire hardly presented an overwhelming physical barrier to young people, and the Stars of David were easy to remove; however, by daylight, the local policemen knew the faces of the Jews and would shoot anyone without a permit. Jews who did not live in the city before the war and those youths who could pass as non-Jews had a better chance of smuggling themselves in and out of the ghetto.⁴

In the first ghetto, radios and newspapers were confiscated. News passed through the barbed-wire fence by word of mouth. Ukrainian pottery makers, who traveled from town to town, carried letters and messages. The Jews in Proskurov knew that throughout the region Jews were subjected to the same conditions. In the fall of 1941, the Germans shot a Jewish minyan in the center of the ghetto. Nazi officers and administrators raped Jewish women. To protect themselves, Jewish girls smeared their underwear with lipstick; Germans cringed from the site of "blood." Following the orders of Schmerbeck, Lindenboym collected gold, jewelry, and valuables from the Jews. The Jews perceived the collection of valuables as a "contribution" to stay alive. Young people got married, and women bore children. They still believed they would survive.⁵

On November 4, 1941, SS-Obersturmführer Theodor Salmanzig organized a large-scale Aktion against the Jews in which the main ghetto was liquidated. The pretext for the Aktion was the discovery, in the basement of the State Political Directorate (GPU) building, of 25 to 30 corpses of German servicemen. On Hermann Göring's orders, a special commission headed by Salmanzig was sent to Proskurov to investigate the circumstances of these deaths. Several days later, Salmanzig reappeared in the town with a detachment of 20 to 30 men to "restore order," which meant that the Jews would be shot.⁶

Just before the Aktion, Gebietskommissar Schmerbeck ordered the Judenrat to distribute a limited number of "work certificates" to the skilled workers. The certificates contained two words (Jude and a trade), Schmerbeck's signature, and no names. Not every specialist received a work certificate. On November 4, 1941, after the skilled laborers left the ghetto for work, their wives, parents, and children woke up surrounded by the SS. The members of the Judenrat circulated on the street, ordering Jews to come out with their belongings, documents, and jewelry, for resettlement to Kamenets-Podolskii. A pogrom was threatened if they failed to come out. The majority of people hid in shelters in their houses. Those who came out and hundreds who were discovered were driven on foot to the textile factory on Kamenetskaia Street. Those who tried to resist or to escape on the way to the factory were shot by the SS and local policemen.⁷

Inside the textile factory, Jews left their documents, valuables, and other possessions on long tables. Nazis and policemen then drove the Jews on foot to Ruzhichnoe on the city's outskirts. The people were forced to undress before being shot. The Nazis and policemen with machine guns and dogs lined up wailing people in a long line on the edge of a natural ravine. At the edge of it, they shot rows of 15 to 20 people in the back of the head or in the back of the neck. Most executioners were drunk. After the war, the Soviets found 5,300 corpses at Ruzhichnoe, some embracing and others clutching tightly to corpses of children. Everyone in Proskurov heard and saw that the Jews were being driven to be shot that day. Some indigenous non-Jews rejoiced and plundered abandoned Jewish homes. Others were powerless to help. Approximately 20 Jews remained at the textile factory on the evening of November 4. About 5,300 Jews from Proskurov were killed.⁸ In late December 1941, a new census recorded only 3,040 Jews in the city.

Two days after the first pogrom, Schmerbeck ordered the partitioning of the first ghetto into an "old" ghetto, which remained behind the barbed wire, and a "second" ghetto located across the street between Remeslennaia and Kupecheskaia Streets and Aptekarskaia and Sobornaia Streets. The skilled workers moved into the second ghetto along with specialists from neighboring towns who were resettled into the same ghetto. The Jews left in the old ghetto shoveled snow on the highway throughout the winter of 1941–1942. Germans confiscated winter clothing from Jews, non-Jews, and Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). Ukrainians continued to toss food over the barbed-wire fence of the old ghetto. During the first winter, some Jews were killed at work, others died from exhaustion, and still others died from hunger and cold.⁹

In the spring and summer of 1942, it became easier to obtain food because of new crops. Germans confiscated horses from kolkhozy in Gebiet Proskurov and conscripted approximately 70 Jews, selected by the Judenrat, to drive the horses to the Donbass front line.¹⁰

Concurrently, throughout 1942, the Germans gathered and concentrated young Jewish men and women remaining in the Proskurov region in several camps along the main road from Proskurov to Vinnitsa (Durchgangsstrasse [highway] IV). They used these people as forced laborers and hired Ukrainian workers for wages to do construction work for the Organisation Todt (OT) highway construction project.¹¹

The Jews in the old ghetto were ravaged by typhus and famine fever in November 1942. Dr. Khromoy took care of the sick, although no medicine was available. Famine fever did not spread to the second ghetto. A number of escapees from nearby camps, ghettos, and mass shootings hid in Proskurov temporarily.

Rumors about an imminent pogrom spread in Proskurov in the late fall of 1942. Approximately 80 to 100 Jews fled the ghetto before the second pogrom and hid with Ukrainian friends. Many were discovered and shot, sometimes together with their hosts. Only Jews with no family left attempted to flee in the snow to Transnistria, 90 kilometers (56 miles) southeast of Proskurov.¹²

The Jews in Proskurov had no weapons for an uprising. Many able-bodied Jewish men and women wanted to join underground partisan brigades, which they believed to exist in the woods. After the war, E. Lantsman testified that in Proskurov “the shooting lasted several hours. Jews killed three SS men and five policemen recruited from the local population. Several young people succeeded in breaking through to the forest and escaping.” However, it is unclear when and under what circumstances this incident took place.¹³

There is no consensus on the exact date of the second large-scale Aktion. More than 7,000 people who remained in the two ghettos of Proskurov, from the labor camps, and from the nearby village of Nikolaev were killed. The murder Aktion lasted more than one week. Most probably, it began on the night of November 30–December 1. SS men, Lithuanian Schutzmannen, and local policemen broke into the homes of the Jews in the old ghetto and into the homes of the specialists. Crying, beatings, shouts, pleading, and shootings accompanied the roundup of the Jews. People were driven daily to the execution pits dug in the village of Leznevo. Mikhail Orlov, a local policeman, testified after the war that Germans “shot them [Jews] point-blank in the back of the head and threw the children alive into pits.”¹⁴

Including those brought into the city from outside, more than 12,000 Jewish civilians are believed to have perished in Proskurov. Only some 60 Jewish men, women, and children from Proskurov are known to have survived the Holocaust.¹⁵

For days after the start of the second pogrom, more than 100 Jews remained in hiding without food or water. One by one, they tried to sneak away, but most were immediately picked up by local policemen and the Germans. Policeman Ivanov saved the life of Hana Gritsershteyn by sneaking her into the house of Volodymyr Lanko, who hid Hana and Byata Beyter for 11 months. At the end of 1943, both Hana and Byata fled to Transnistria.¹⁶

By December 1942, Romanian-governed Transnistria offered the best possibility of survival. Iosif Groysman and Veniamin Grinberg were among those Jews who escaped to Transnistria. However, some escapees were betrayed by the locals. Every Jew who reached Transnistria met a non-Jew who helped him or her with a piece of bread or advice or simply did not betray them. The Blekhman family bribed a Ukrainian train conductor to smuggle them onto a train to Zhmerinka. In Transnistria, the survivors from Proskurov then found shelter with the local Jews.¹⁷

After the Soviet victory on May 8, 1945, the few Jews who had evacuated from Proskurov before July 7, 1941, gradually returned home. Only a few Jewish soldiers came back from the front alive. Three monuments, established by Jews after the war, commemorate those who perished in the Holocaust in Proskurov.

SOURCES Most of the information for this entry came from the author’s unpublished M.A. thesis, “The History of Jews in Proskurov, Ukraine” (master’s thesis, Union College, 2001). The article by P.M. Shkrobot, “Navichno v pam’iati narodnii,” in A.G. Filiniuk, ed., Ploskyriv, Proskuriv, Khmel’nyts’kyi, 1493–1993 (Khmelnytskyi: Podillia, 1993), pp. 46–53, includes some relevant information on the fate of Proskurov’s Jewish population. The book by David A. Chapin and Ben Weinstock, eds., The Road from Letichev (San Jose: Writer’s Showcase presented by Writer’s Digest, 2000), also includes several testimonies that touch on events in Proskurov.

Documents and testimonies in relation to the Proskurov ghetto and the fate of the city’s Jewish population can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-9-813); USHMM (e.g., RG-31.002M); VHF (# 44315); and YVA (O-3/3734, 3766). A number of oral testimonies, videos, letters, and telephone interviews with survivors from Proskurov have been collected by the author and are in her own personal archive (PADV).

Diana Voskoboinik

NOTES

1. YVA, O-3/3766, Hana Vaiskop, p. 5; Etya B., letter to the author, January 8, 2000; Lyusya Blekhman, personal interview, October 14, 2000; Iosif Groysman, personal interview, January 2, 2001; Veniamin Grinberg, personal interview, January 7, 2001.

2. Tatyana Uzenkel, letter to the author, December 2000; VHF, # 44315, Lyusya Blekhman, May 17, 1998; Iosif Groysman; Moishe Einhorn, “In the Medzhibozh Ghetto,” in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road from Letichev, p. 693.

3. Etya B.; VHF, # 44315; Iosif Groysman; Lazar Bover, letter to the author, December 15, 2000; Klara Melamud, telephone interview concerning her husband, Mikhail Melamud, a Holocaust survivor, January 21, 2001.

4. YVA, O-3/3766, Hana Vaiskop, p. 9; VHF, # 44315; Yefim Lerner, personal interview concerning his late wife Sima Lerner (Blekhman), a Holocaust survivor, December 16, 2000.

5. Etya B.; VHF, # 44315; Iosif Groysman; Yefim Lerner; Klara Melamud; Tatyana Uzenkel.

6. BA-L, B 162/20816, pp. 165ff, testimony of Karl Bauernfeind, December 22, 1964.

7. Iosif Groysman; YVA, O-3/3766, Hana Vaiskop, p. 4. Available sources disagree about the precise date of the first pogrom. The testimony of Hana Vaiskop is probably the most reliable source, as she was a high school graduate at the time.

8. USHMM, RG-22.002M (GARF), reel 2, 7021-9-813, Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, Act of the Judicial-Medical Committee for Investigation of the German-Fascist Atrocities in Proskurov; VHF, # 44315; Lazar Bover; Iosif Groysman; Klara Melamud; YVA, O-3/3766.

9. Einhorn, "In the Medzhibozh Ghetto," p. 693; Iosif Groysman. Although in Letichev and Zinkov (neighboring towns) there were no pogroms in the fall of 1941, the Jews of those towns survived the first winter under conditions similar to those of the remaining Jews in Proskurov; see the testimonies of Vladimir Goykher and Semyon Gluzman, in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road from Letichev, pp. 710–714 and 730–736, respectively.

10. Iosif Groysman; Veniamin Grinberg.

11. Veniamin Grinberg; Goykher, in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road from Letichev, pp. 712–714. Also see Moyshe Rekhtman, "Hard Labor in the Letichev Camp," testimony on file in USHMM; also Rekhtman, in The Road from Letichev, pp. 701–702.

12. VHF, # 44315; Lyusya Blekhman, October 14, 2000; Etya B.

13. Iosif Groysman; Shkrobot, "Navichno v pam'iaty narodnii," pp. 48–53.

14. Veniamin Lukin and Boris Khaymovich, eds., Sto evreiskikh mestechek Ukrainy: Podoliia, ser. 1 (Jerusalem and St. Petersburg, 1997), p. 184. There is no consensus on the start of the second pogrom. Witnesses give various dates in November and December. Since the pogrom lasted more than a week, November 30, 1942, seems most plausible as the first night of the pogrom; Mikhail S. Orlov, protocol of interrogation, May 10, 1944, ChGK materials, USHMM, RG-22.002M, reel 2 (GARF, 7021-9-813).

15. ChGK report, USHMM archives, RG-22.002M, reel 2 (GARF, 7021-64-792); list of the inmates of the ghetto and concentration camps who belong to the Khmel'nyts'kyi Oblast' Organization, signed by Boris Levin, September 11, 1994; Etya B.; Lyusya Blekhman, October 14, 2000; YVA, O-3/3766, p. 13.

16. Veniamin Grinberg; Klara Melamud; Eva Oksman testimony in PADV; YVA, O-3/3766, pp. 10–13.

17. Veniamin Grinberg; Iosif Groysman; VHF, # 44315; Lyusya Blekhman, October 14, 2000; YVA, O-3/3766, p. 11; Etya B.; Einhorn, "In the Medzhibozh Ghetto."

RADZIWIŁŁÓW

Pre-1939: Radziwiłłów, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Chervonoarmeisk, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Radziwilow, Gebiet Dubno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Radiviliv, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Radziwiłłów is located 88 kilometers (55 miles) southwest of Równe. At the end of 1937, there were 3,120 Jews living in the town. The town came under Soviet occupation in mid-September 1939. The Soviet authorities deported many Jewish refugees from western and central Poland to the Soviet interior when these people opted not to take Soviet citizenship.

Forces of the German 6th Army occupied Radziwiłłów at the end of June 1941. In July and August, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the settlement. A man named Matejko was appointed as mayor, and initially Misza Zalewski was head of the local Ukrainian police. In September 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Radziwiłłów became a Rayon center in Gebiet Dubno. Nachwuchsführer Brocks was the Gebietskommissar. In the fall of 1941, a German Gendarmerie post consisting of six to eight Gendarmes under the command of a man named Krause was established in Radziwiłłów in the house of a Jew named Fidel. The Gendarmerie assumed control of the Ukrainian police, now renamed the Schutzmannschaft. In the spring of 1942, Polizeileutnant Eberhardt became the SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer.¹

In the first days of the occupation, local Ukrainians and Germans robbed the Jews. On July 15, 1941, a German SS unit arrived in Radziwiłłów and organized the first Aktion, in which 27 Jews were murdered allegedly as Communist activists. Among those killed were also some wealthy Jews who had given property to local Ukrainians for safekeeping but were denounced to the Germans. On July 16, 1941, Ukrainian thugs organized the public burning of prayer books and Torah scrolls from the synagogue and forced the rabbi to dance a jig around the bonfire. Then on August 15, all the Jews were ordered to wait in the market square for two to three hours, during which time their houses were ransacked and looted of all valuable possessions.²

A blue and white child's dress worn by Sabina Heller (née Kagan), while in hiding with the Roztropowicz family in Radziwiłłów, during the Holocaust. Sabina and her parents escaped from the Radziwiłłów ghetto. Sabina's rescuers made the dress from doll clothing. USHMM WS #N09622, COURTESY OF SABINA HELLER

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Radziwiłłów. The Jews were ordered to wear distinctive markings (initially white armbands with a blue Star of David; later, yellow circles on their chest and backs); they were prohibited from leaving the town without permission, from using the sidewalks, or from trading with the local non-Jews; and most items of Jewish property were confiscated or used to pay a succession of onerous “contributions” imposed on the community.³

Soon after their arrival, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Jakob Furman took over as chairman of the Judenrat in the summer of 1941 after its first head, Viderhorn, an assimilated Jew from Hungary who spoke German, resigned his post once he realized the Judenrat was only a tool for the Germans to extort money from the Jews. In February 1942, a number of Jewish workers were rounded up and sent to a labor camp near Vinnitsa. In March 1942, the Germans, assisted by mayor Matejko, conducted a “robbery Aktion” against the Jews, seizing any remaining valuables from Jewish houses.⁴

On April 9, 1942, the Gebietskommissar ordered the establishment of a ghetto in the town, and Jews from the surrounding villages also had to move into it. In total, 2,600 Jews were registered in the ghetto.⁵ The ghetto was located in the poorest Jewish houses close to the market square. It was split into two sections divided by Poczajowska Street. About 400 Jews with certificates designating them “productive” Jews lived in the “Karee,” and the remaining 2,200 “unproductive” Jews lived in the “Teich.” Both ghetto sections were surrounded with barbed wire and were guarded internally by the Jewish Police and externally by the Ukrainian police. Due to the extreme overcrowding, with people sleeping on bunk beds and living in attics and cellars, disease and hunger were rife in the ghetto. Some Jews performed forced labor every day outside the ghetto and were escorted to their work sites by the Jewish Police. Forced labor tasks included work for the Organisation Todt (OT) on construction projects such as at the airfield, while others worked at the railroad station or for various German offices.⁶

On May 29, 1942, the Germans and their collaborators conducted an Aktion against the “unproductive” section of the ghetto (those Jews not issued with work cards by the Judenrat). A detachment of the Security Police and SD, assisted by men of the 1st Company of Reserve Police Battalion 33, local Gendarmes, and Ukrainian police, surrounded this section of the ghetto early in the morning.⁷ Those unable to walk or who attempted to escape were murdered inside the ghetto. First the Jewish men who had been rounded up were escorted out of town past the railroad station to a sandy place known as Suchodolie. Here the Germans forced them to undress and shot them with machine guns into large ditches prepared in advance by Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). Then they did the same with the women and children. Altogether, the German-led forces shot about 1,350 people. A number of Jews managed to escape and hide on the eve of the Aktion.⁸

In the summer of 1942, Jews faced the death penalty if caught outside the ghetto without permission. Those working outside continued to smuggle food in, and some local peasants threw food over the ghetto fence. However, the Ukrainian guards now began to punish non-Jews who came too close to the fence.⁹ In August 1942, two Jewish girls who were caught traveling from Dubno on “Aryan papers” were handed over to the Gendarmerie in Radziwiłłów and shot on orders from the German police.¹⁰

By late September 1942, news of the complete liquidation of other nearby ghettos convinced the Jews that their days were numbered. As there was little chance to hide in the forests, since most non-Jews were either hostile or too scared to protect Jews, people built hiding places or sought “Aryan papers.” Some hid their children during the day, fearing an Aktion while they were out at work. Then news came that Soviet POWs were again preparing ditches nearby. To preserve some record of the community, the Radziwiłłów Jews prepared lists of those who had died and those who were still alive and buried them near the Great Synagogue. When the Germans and their collaborators surrounded the ghetto, a number of Jews committed suicide, and others went to their hiding places or tried to escape.¹¹

On October 6, 1942, German Security Police subordinated to the outpost in Równe organized the liquidation of the Radziwiłłów ghetto, shooting about 950 Jews at Suchodolie with the assistance of the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie. About 500 Jews managed to escape on the night before the Aktion.¹² Many of these runaway Jews were subsequently caught and shot by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police at the Jewish cemetery. A few managed to escape to the town of Brody in Distrikt Galizien, where a formal ghetto was only established in early December 1942. Only 51 Jews from Radziwiłłów managed to survive until the Red Army drove out the Germans after fierce fighting around Brody in the summer of 1944.¹³

SOURCES Information about the persecution and murder of the Jewish population of Radziwiłłów under German occupation can be found in the following publications: Ya’akov ‘Adini, ed., Radzivilov: Sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Radzivilov be-Yisrael, 1966); and Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 189–192. A personal testimony by Simon Winston, “I Was Born in Radzivillov,” was published in The Holocaust Centre (Laxton, Notts., UK: Beth Shalom, 2001), pp. 16–20. Reference has also been made to the unpublished manuscript of Yitzhak Veinshein, “The Destruction of the Radzivillover Ghetto,” made available to the authors by his son Simon Winston.

1454 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

Documentation on the fate of the Jews of Radziwiłłów during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/5211-14); DARO; GARF (7021-71-56); TsDAVO (3676-4-317); VHF (# 8639, 14471, 30242, 30256, and 46396); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” in ‘Adini, Radzivilov: Sefer zikaron, pp. 329–331, 336; BA-L, B 162/5214, Zwischenbericht Nr. 1, Tel Aviv, July 3, 1963, and testimony of Jafa Oks, June 26, 1963.

2. Veinshein, “The Destruction of the Radzivillover Ghetto”; “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” p. 330, dates the Aktion in mid-July 1941. GARF, 7021-71-56, p. 15, dates it on July 4, 1941. BA-L, B 162/5211, pp. 153–154, letter of Jack Donick, Ohio, December 12, 1964, dates the Aktion at the end of June and notes that a woman was among the victims. Other sources date this (or another) Aktion in early August 1941.

3. BA-L, B 162/5214, Zwischenbericht Nr. 1, Tel Aviv, July 3, 1963, and testimony of Anita Goldgart, June 4, 1963; and “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” pp. 329–330.

4. “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” pp. 329–333.

5. Ibid., p. 333.

6. Ibid., pp. 333–334; BA-L, B 162/5214, Zwischenbericht Nr. 1, Tel Aviv, July 3, 1963, and testimonies of Anita Goldgart, June 4, 1963, and Mendel Turczyn, June 10, 1963.

7. BA-L, B 162/5211, p. 155, letter of Jack Donick, Ohio, December 12, 1964, dates the Aktion precisely on May 29 (day 13 of Sivan). See also the report of the HSSPF and BdS Ukraine for the period June 1–30, 1942, in TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 29. “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” pp. 335–336, however, dates the Aktion on June 29, 1942.

8. GARF, 7021-71-56, p. 17; BA-L, B 162/5214, Zwischenbericht Nr. 1, Tel Aviv, July 3, 1963, and testimony of Mendel Turczyn, June 10, 1963.

9. “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” pp. 333–334.

10. BA-L, B 162/5214, Zwischenbericht Nr. 1, Tel Aviv, July 3, 1963, and testimony of Cwi Kiperman, June 19, 1963.

11. “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” pp. 336–337.

12. BA-L, B 162/5211, p. 156, letter of Jack Donick, Ohio, December 12, 1964, dates the Aktion precisely on October 6 (day 25 of Tishrei). GARF, 7021-71-56, p. 18. See also Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), p. 199. According to Spector’s sources, there were 600 Jews who escaped. “Yitzhak Weinstein dertseyt,” p. 337, states that the Aktion started on September 29, 1942.

13. “Radziwillow,” in Encyclopaedia Judaica, 2nd ed. (Detroit: Thomson Gale, 2007), 17:60. This source dates the final Aktion on October 5, 1942. BA-L, B 162/5211, p. 157, letter of Jack Donick, Ohio, December 12, 1964.

RAFAŁÓWKA

Pre-1939: Rafałówka, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Rafalovka, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rafalovka, Rayon center, Gebiet Sarny, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Rafalivka, Rivne oblast’, Ukraine

Rafałówka is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) west of Sarny. According to the 1921 census, 556 Jews lived in the town: 224 people resided in Nowa Rafałówka (the new part of the town) and 332 people in Wielka Rafałówka (the large part). The two parts were about 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) apart. Based on an average natural growth rate of 9 persons per 1,000 per year, it is estimated that in 1941 about 660 Jews would have been living in Rafałówka at the time of the German invasion.

Following the German invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, many Jewish refugees from western Poland arrived in Rafałówka. After the Soviets occupied the area in mid-September, private enterprise was abolished. After war broke out on June 22, 1941, the Soviets did not allow people to cross the former 1939 border of the USSR. However, as the Soviet forces began their withdrawal on July 4, a number of Jews managed to escape to the east. Most of these people survived the war.

Units of the German 6th Army did not occupy Rafałówka until mid-July 1941, several days after the Soviet authorities had left. In the interregnum, a Ukrainian authority and local militia took charge. In these days, robbery, abuse, and occasional murders of Jewish townspeople were widespread. When representatives of the Jewish community sought protection, the response was scornful and negative. During the remainder of July and August 1941, a German military administration controlled the area. In September 1941, a German civil administration took charge of local affairs. The town of Rafałówka was incorporated into Gebiet Sarny, and Kameradschaftsführer Huala was appointed as the Gebietskommissar. In Rafałówka, a police station comprising several German Gendarmes was established, which also supervised the local Ukrainian auxiliary police, commanded by Rivachevski. Among other Ukrainians remembered for their crimes were the brothers Vladimir and Arsentii Panasiok, the brothers Georgi and Ivan Palamarchok, and Aleksei Skivchok.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupation forces imposed a series of anti-Jewish measures in Rafałówka. Jews were forced to wear distinctive markings; they had to perform forced labor; and they were forbidden to leave the town without special permission.

Soon after the start of the occupation the Germans ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) to serve as an intermediary authority, which also included representatives from the neighboring small Jewish communities in Olizarka and Zoludsk. The members included Hershel Brezniak (chairman), Zelig Lesnik, Yosef Morik, David Tanenbaum, and Gershon Gruber. The Judenrat sought to ameliorate the suffering resulting from increasingly draconian German decrees.² On the orders of the local German authorities, the Jews had to collect a poll tax (Kontribution) of 5 gold rubles (1.5 grams [.05 ounces]), or 5,000 rubles per person. Some gave more than requested, while others had to be coerced into giving. An unending stream of German demands followed: the confiscation of silver items, furs, coffee, pepper (a scarce commodity) and an order to knit socks, gloves, and sweaters for German soldiers. For almost a year the Jews stayed in their own homes, obeyed the curfew, and submitted to the German demands, including monthly roll calls.³

On May 1, 1942, the Germans established a ghetto in Rafałówka around the area of the community synagogue and school building, which was surrounded by barbed wire. This area contained not only the local Jews of the town but also Jews from the neighboring villages, including Nowa Rafałówka, Olizarka, Wielkie Zoludsk, and Bielska Wola.⁴ Altogether about 2,500 Jews were confined within the Rafałówka ghetto. People who lived within the ghetto confines remained in their own houses but had to take in those who were displaced from other neighborhoods and villages. Each family, regardless of size, was given one room. With each passing day, life grew harsher and increasingly bitter. Those who arrived without extra food were afflicted by hunger; those who had no goods to barter for food from the non-Jewish local inhabitants faced starvation. A few Jews planted vegetables in their yards. Gangs of forced laborers were sent out to work from the ghetto, cutting lumber in the forests, loading trains, and repairing roads and bridges.⁵

A Ukrainian guard overseeing one group of Jewish workers told a female acquaintance that the Germans were preparing pits where the Jews would be murdered and buried. When she reported this in the ghetto, her story was met with denial and disbelief. On Monday, August 24, 1942, the ghetto was closed off and surrounded by Ukrainian police, and no one was allowed in or out. Most people chose to remain with their families; only a few hundred Jews tried to hide or escape, as they suspected their impending fate. Zelig Lisak, who headed the Judenrat in the last days, took poison to end his life at home. On Saturday, August 29, the day set for the liquidation of the ghetto by the Gebietskommissar, the Jews were ordered into the central square for a roll call. Panic seized them when they saw military vehicles with German and Ukrainian police that had just come from the massacre of Jews in Sarny. The remaining inmates of the Rafałówka ghetto were held in the blazing sun as they waited for their deaths. Then in groups of 100 people they were escorted to a forest some 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) north of the ghetto towards Nowa Rafałówka. There they were forced to undress, and each was shot in the back of the head into two large pits. Farmers brought in from the surrounding area covered the bodies, whether dead or alive, with a layer of sand. Police deputy Aleksei Shivchok was assigned to collect the victims' clothing and other belongings and bring them to a German warehouse.⁶

During the days after the liquidation, Ukrainian police tracked down Jews still in hiding and delivered them to the Germans. They were rewarded well for their efforts with large quantities of salt for each captive. Most of the escapees were captured and killed. The area was liberated by the Red Army on February 5, 1944. Those who survived the remainder of the German occupation hid in dugouts in the forests, found shelter with Ukrainian Baptists ("Shtundists") or local farmers, or connected up with small partisan bands. Among the Jewish partisan leaders remembered were "Yudl" (from the village of Sopaczew) and Pesach Bindes. Only some 30 Jews from the Rafałówka ghetto survived the war.⁷

At a war crimes trial conducted in June 1972 in the nearby town of Włodzimierzec, several of the Ukrainian perpetrators were convicted and punished for their murderous acts.⁸

SOURCES Personal accounts of the fate of the Jewish population of Rafałówka during the Holocaust can be found in the yizkor book edited by Pinhas Hagin and Malkah Hagin, Sefer zikaron le-'ayarat Rafalówka ba-yeshenah, Rafalówka be-hadashah, Olizarka, Zoludzk veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yotse Rafalówka ha-yeshenah, Rafalówka he-hadashah, Olizarkah, Zoludzk veba-sevivah, 1996). A brief summary in Hebrew of the main events can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 204–205.

Documents and testimonies concerning the persecution and murder of Rafałówka's Jews can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/291 and 1487); BA-BL; BA-L; DARO; GARF (7021-71-66); USHMM (RG-50.120*0197 and RG-31.018.M [DASBU-Ri, Case No. 19090, vols. 1–15]); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Samuel Fishman
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; Hagin and Hagin, Sefer zikaron le-'ayarat Rafalówka, p. 16.

2. Hagin and Hagin, Sefer zikaron le-'ayarat Rafalówka, p. 176.

3. Ibid., p. 179.

4. According to the 1921 census, Olizarka had a Jewish population of 321, and Wielkie Zoludsk, 418.

5. Hagin and Hagin, Sefer zikaron le-'ayarat Rafalówka, pp. 145, 177–179.

6. Ibid., pp. 16–17, 161, 192; GARF, 7021-71-66, pp. 12, 28, 32; BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 113/67 (II 204 AR 1088/64), Sachstandsvermerk (Gebietskommissariat Sarny), June 7, 1967, pp. 4–8; USHMM, RG-50.120*0197.

7. AŻIH, 301/1487.

8. Hagin and Hagin, Sefer zikaron le-'ayarat Rafalówka, p. 18.

RATNO

Pre-1939: Ratno, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Ratne, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Ratno is located 51 kilometers (32 miles) north-northwest of Kowel. In late 1937, there were 2,140 Jewish residents in the town.

German forces captured Ratno at the end of June 1941. In July and August, a German military administration governed the town, and from September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Ratno was a Rayon center in Gebiet Kowel, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Kowel until June 1942 was Regierungsrat Arno Kämpf, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Philipp Rapp.¹ In June 1942, Kämpf was arrested for taking bribes from Jews, and Erich Kassner took over the duties of Gebietskommissar. The Germans established a local administration and recruited a Ukrainian police force in Ratno. The local police was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post consisting of several German Gendarmes.

During the brief power vacuum after the Soviet forces had retreated, but before the German administration had been established, there was some looting of Jewish property by local Ukrainians from the villages, during which one Jew who resisted was killed. On July 6, 1941, local Ukrainian peasants organized a pogrom in Ratno, again looting property and killing several more Jews. However, on July 7, a platoon of German soldiers arrived from Kowel. Local Ukrainians initially mistook the Germans for armed Jews and opened fire. The Germans, returning fire, killed 10 Ukrainians. The German forces then conducted a reprisal Aktion, alleging that the Jews had fired on them. The Jews were made to parade on the square near the monastery, and about 30 Jews were selected and shot. The Germans shot roughly the same number of Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) at the same time.²

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans introduced a number of anti-Jewish measures in Ratno: on July 14, Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (a Star of David), and a curfew was imposed; on July 17, a Judenrat was established, headed by David Shapiro; Jews were compelled to engage in forced labor without pay, they were forbidden to leave the village, and they were subjected to systematic beatings by the Ukrainian police. The German authorities also confiscated all the livestock of the Jews and successively took most of their valuables, furniture, and clothes. In November 1941, workshops were set up in the town for skilled Jewish workers. Survivor accounts also mention that heating materials were scarce and that the murder of Jews became almost a daily occurrence.

The fragmentary accounts in the yizkor book make no explicit mention of a ghetto in Ratno, but other sources indicate that probably in the spring of 1942 the Germans established a ghetto, which held up to 2,500 Jews (including Jews from the surrounding villages, such as Chocieszów, which had 20 families in the 1930s, and 60 families from Kortelisy).³ In June 1942, there was a partisan raid on Ratno in which two German agricultural leaders (Sonderführer) were killed. The partisans called on the youth of the town to join them, but there was no response.⁴

A variety of dates are given in the sources for the liquidation of the ghetto in Ratno, but it probably took place in July or August 1942, when approximately 1,500 Jews were shot near the village of Prokhod.⁵ The shooting was carried out by a squad of the Security Police and the SD, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, who searched the attics and cellars for several days, looking for Jews in hiding. A few hundred Jews were able to escape initially, but many of them were betrayed to the Germans by local peasants and also shot. Some managed to join those Jews who had fled to the forest earlier.⁶

About 30 Jews who remained alive after the massacre continued to work for the Germans in an artel, or group of craftsmen. Jacob Shteingarten, who survived, recalls that he hid in the cellar of his house during the Aktion before fleeing to a forest warden whom he knew, where he worked for a while. At one point he was also denounced and brought to Ratno, but fortunately he was permitted to continue working for the warden. When he heard in early 1943 that the remaining Jewish artisans had been shot, he fled to the forests, where he joined the Soviet partisans.⁷

Some of the Jews who fled successfully from Ratno fought in the Komarov unit of Soviet partisans around Pińsk. When Ratno was liberated on March 22, 1944, 14 survivors initially returned to the town, but most left for other countries shortly afterwards.

On August 11, 1942, the Security Police shot several Jews in the Ratno district, in the villages of Staroścín and Koniszczce,⁸ and the 9th Company of the 15th Police Regiment shot 74 Jews in the village of Samary on the border with Rayon Dywin on October 31, 1942; one Ukrainian family (six people) was shot together with the Jews, for hiding a Jewish woman.⁹

According to the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 5,960 civilians were killed in the Ratno raion between 1941 and 1944, including some 2,600 Jews.¹⁰

SOURCES The yizkor book available in Yiddish, edited by Ya'akov Botoshanski and Yitshak Yanasovitch, Yizkor-bukh Ratne: Dos lebn un der umkum fun a Yidish shtetl in Volin (Buenos Aires: di Ratner landslayt fareyen in Argentine un Nord-Amerike, 1954), contains one or two fragmentary personal accounts of the Holocaust period. Another version of the yizkor book was subsequently published in Hebrew: Nahman Tamir, ed., Ratnah: Sipurah shel kehillah Yehudit she-bushmedab (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Ratnah be-Yisrael, 1983). An article about the Jewish population of Ratno can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 187–189. There is a survivor testimony published in Samuil Gil', ed., Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit (New York, 1995), pp. 80–81; and some additional information in Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), pp. 73, 363.

Documents and witness testimonies regarding the extermination of the Jews of Ratno can be found in the following archives: DAVO; GARF (7021-148-2); and YVA (e.g., O-3/2950; O-22/53).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Botoshanski and Yanasovitch, Yizkor-bukh Ratne, pp. 519–533, 581. See also T. Denysiuk and I.O. Denysiuk, Ratnivshchyna: Istoryko-kraieznavchyi narys (Lutsk, 1998), p. 66. According to Spector, there was another Aktion by the German Security Police in which they shot 280 Jews as Soviet activists; see Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 73, but he gives no precise date for this, so it may be the same Aktion.

3. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: Karavella, 2001), p. 270; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 254, 660.

4. Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, pp. 80–81, testimony of Leon Ginzburg, explicitly mentions a ghetto, noting that it did not exist for very long.

5. Denysiuk and Denysiuk, Ratnivshchyna: Istoryko-kraieznavchyi narys, pp. 68–69, gives the date of July 14, 1942. A memorial was erected at the site of the shooting of the Jews in 1995. According to Botoshanski and Yanasovitch, Yizkor-bukh Ratne, pp. 581–583, the shooting took place on August 26, 1942: of 1,500 Jews, 1,000 were shot and 500 initially managed to escape.

6. Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, pp. 80–81, testimony of Leon Ginzburg, mentions that 30 Jews fled to the forest before the creation of the ghetto, and 50 more escaped just prior to the Aktion.

7. Botoshanski and Yanasovitch, Yizkor-bukh Ratne, pp. 581–583, testimony of Jacob Shteingarten.

8. BA-BL, R 58/222, Meldungen aus den besetzten Ostgebieten, no. 19, September 4, 1942.

9. GARF, 7021-148-2, pp. 346–347, Report of 9th Company, Police Regiment 15, November 1, 1942.

10. Volyn' Radians'ka (1939–1964): Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv, Chastyna 3 (Lviv, 1971), p. 124.

ROKITNO

Pre-1939: Rokitno, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Gebiet Sarny, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Rokytno, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Rokitno is located 43 kilometers (27 miles) east of Sarny. On the eve of World War I, 400 Jews lived in Rokitno, and by Early 1930s view of the Rokitno market place. The synagogue is visible in the background.

USHMM WS #42694, COURTESY OF ANTONINA CHRUPALA

1921, the census listed 663 Jews in the town. Assuming a natural growth rate of 9 persons per 1,000 per year, this number would have increased to about 800 by 1939.

The Nazi-Soviet Non-Aggression Pact of 1939 assigned eastern Poland to the Soviet Union, and on September 17, 1939, the Red Army arrived in Rokitno. The Jews were forced to adapt to a new Soviet regime; several men involved in Zionist and Hebrew teaching were arrested and sent to Sarny for “reeducation.”¹

With the beginning of the German invasion in late June 1941, key targets in Rokitno, including the train station and the Huta glass factory, were bombed by the Luftwaffe. Following the Soviet retreat from Rokitno, the town was in a state of anarchy, and roving gangs assaulted and robbed Jewish residents. Units of the German 6th Army occupied Rokitno in the middle of July 1941.

According to the Rokitno yizkor book, during the temporary interregnum, an ethnic German named Ratzlaw offered to go to the German army in Sarny to persuade them to come and establish order in Rokitno. He demanded and received a wagonload of “gifts” from the Jews—fine foods and liquor—to help make the case. After three days, Ratzlaw returned and announced he had been appointed chief of police in Rokitno. The Jews were ordered to organize daily work teams to clear out the bombed glass factory, repair the train tracks, and clean Ratzlaw’s headquarters. Ten German officers arrived to inspect the situation but departed shortly afterwards. Then a German police unit commanded by an officer named Henkel Sokolowski arrived to restore order and temporarily disarmed the Ukrainian police.²

In August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town. In September 1941, it was replaced by a German civil administration. Rokitno became part of Gebiet Sarny. Kameradschaftsführer Huala was the Gebietskommissar. In the fall of 1941, a local Gendarmerie post consisting of five men was established in Rokitno. The German Gendarmerie also assumed control over the local Ukrainian police, which was still commanded by Ratzlaw. In the spring of 1942, Leutnant Schumacher of the Schutzpolizei became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer based in Sarny.³

In the summer and fall of 1941, the respective German authorities introduced a number of anti-Jewish measures in Rokitno. The Jews were ordered to wear armbands bearing the Star of David and, later, patches on their clothes in the shape of a yellow circle. They had to mark the entrance to their house with a light-blue six-pointed star. The Jews were forced to perform hard physical labor, for which they received only half a loaf of black bread per day. Jews also were forbidden to buy groceries in shops run by non-Jews. In this way, the Jews were condemned to a food ration of only half that received by the rest of the population. Further, the Jews suffered various forms of maltreatment at the hands of the Ukrainian auxiliary police, who took the opportunity to loot and beat the Jews with impunity.⁴

Following an order issued by the chief of the Gendarmerie in Rokitno, the Jews had to hand over all their gold, silver, and other valuables. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) under the leadership of Aharon Slutzki was established in Rokitno. It had four other members: Betzalel Kokel, Avraham Binder, Nachum Katznelson, and Noah Soltzman.⁵ The Judenrat had to intercede between the German occupation authorities and the Jewish population, transmitting the orders issued by the German leadership. To assist the Judenrat, a Jewish Order Police (Jüdischer Ordnungsdienst), consisting of only a couple of individuals, was established to enforce the orders of the German police.⁶

The boundaries of the Jewish ghetto were established by April 1942. On May 1, 1942, Jews were forced to move into the “open ghetto” in Rokitno. About 50 houses on the main street of the town and about 10 houses on the main market square became part of the ghetto area. The ghetto held not only the Jews of Rokitno but also Jews brought in from the surrounding villages. From its inception, the ghetto was very overcrowded; each room held at least one family, sometimes more. Soon after its establishment, the Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto area. The daily rations consisted of only 40 grams (1.4 ounces) of bread per person per day and 400 grams (14 ounces) of thin, watery porridge or millet every week.⁷ A second, smaller ghetto was established to alleviate the crowded conditions. There was no access between the two ghettos without permission from the Judenrat.⁸

Soviet partisans were active in the area, sabotaging rail lines and bridges. Their operations agitated the Germans and led to increased cruelty towards the Jews, whom they accused of collaborating with the partisans. During this period, roll calls began, allegedly to determine whether any Jews had fled to join the partisans. Every Jew was ordered to report to the market square to be counted. After the first two roll calls, they were sent back to the ghetto. Then, on August 25, 1942, a third roll call was announced.⁹ On that day, the Jews were ordered to gather the next morning for registration on the main square. Almost all the residents of the ghetto appeared on this occasion: altogether 1,630 people were counted.¹⁰ After the registration, the Jews were not allowed to return to their apartments in the ghetto. The Germans split them into two separate groups, men in one, women and children in the other. Some Jews who suspected the seriousness of the situation tried to escape. At this point, the German and the Ukrainian police started firing at the Jews who had gathered on the market square. About 300 people were murdered at this location, about 700 people managed to escape, and about 600 people were deported in freight cars to Sarny, where they were shot on August 27, 1942.¹¹

Although many Jews who managed to flee Rokitno during the third roll call were turned over by the local population to German and Ukrainian forces, others managed to find shelter by joining the partisans or through the protection of peasants, some of whom were members of the Baptist church of Russia, referred to locally as “Shtundists.”¹²

SOURCES The yizkor book for Rokitno edited by Eliezer Leoni, Rokitno: (Voblin) veba-sevivah; sefer 'edut ve-zikaron (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yots'e Rokitno veba-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1967), includes several accounts dealing with the wartime period. A survey of the history of the Jewish community can also be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 200–204. An analysis of the fate of the Jews in Rokitno can be found in Yehuda Bauer, “Sarny and Rokitno in the Holocaust: A Case Study of Two Townships in Wolyn (Volhynia),” in Steven Katz, ed., The Shtetl: New Evaluations (New York: New York University Press, 2007).

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Rokitno can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/317, 717, 719, 955, 1046, 2865, 2899, and 3179); DARO; GARF (7021-71-65); USHMM (RG-50.030*0160); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Samuel Fishman
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Leoni, Rokitno, p. 237.
2. Ibid., pp. 260–263.
3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
4. According to the Rokitno yizkor book, these anti-Jewish edicts commenced in mid-September; see Leoni, Rokitno, p. 264.
5. Ibid., p. 266.
6. Baruch Shehori (Schwarzblat), “The Destruction of Rokitno,” in ibid.
7. Ibid.; see also p. 271.
8. Ibid., p. 272.
9. Ibid., p. 273.
10. See testimony of B. Schwarzblat (AŽIH, 301/317) for a description of the August 26, 1942, Aktion.
11. Ibid.; according to the ChGK report (GARF, 7021-71-65, pp. 32 and reverse), there were 1,649 people in the ghetto, of whom 411 were murdered in Rokitno, 238 managed to flee, and about 800 were taken to Sarny and killed. According to Schwarzblat’s testimony (AŽIH, 301/317), 700 people were brought from Rokitno to Sarny. Altogether, the Germans murdered approximately 14,000 Jews of Sarny and its vicinity on August 27–28, 1942. See also Leoni, Rokitno, pp. 274, 301–335.

12. Leoni, Rokitno, p. 334.

RÓWNE

Pre-1939: Równe, city and powiat center, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Rovno, raion and oblast' center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rowno, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien, and capital, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Rivne, raion and oblast' center, Ukraine

Równe is located about 62 kilometers (39 miles) southeast of Łuck. At the end of 1937, about 25,000 Jews were residing in Równe, and by mid-June 1941, due to a large influx of refugees from parts of Poland occupied by the Germans, the Jewish population had increased to 28,000, despite the deportation of many refugees to Siberia for refusing to take Soviet citizenship. After the invasion of the Soviet Union by German troops on June 22, 1941, several thousand Jews managed to escape to the eastern regions of the USSR. Around 23,000 Jews remained in Równe at the start of the occupation.

Równe was occupied by units of the German 6th Army on June 28, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration controlled the area. It was replaced by a German civil administration in September 1941. Under the German authorities, the city became the administrative center of Gebiet Rowno, which also included the following Rayons: Meshiritschi, Klewan, Korez, Alexandria, Hoschtscha, and Tutschin. Regierungsrat Beer became the Gebietskommissar. Gebiet Rowno was part of Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien, and the city also served as the capital of Reichskommissariat Ukraine and the residence of the Reichskommissar, Gauleiter Erich Koch.¹ In July and August 1941, an operational unit (Einsatztrupp) of the Security Police (Sipo) and SD was based in Równe. Between September 1941 and February 1942, the headquarters of the 320th Police Battalion, commanded by Major der Polizei Dall, and its 3rd Company (commanded by Hauptmann der Polizei Scharway) were deployed in Równe. As of October 1941, the 33rd Reserve Police Battalion under the command of Major der Polizei Braschnewitz was present there. In October 1941, a Security Police detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 was sent to Równe. The head of this detachment was SS-Sturmabführer Herrmann Ling. In February 1942, this detachment was reorganized as an office of the Kommandeur der Sipo und SD (KdS) in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. SS-Sturmabführer Dr. Karl Pütz served as the KdS until October 1943.² It was this office that organized and carried out anti-Jewish Aktionen in Równe and in the entire region of Wolhynien und Podolien. Under the Sipo and SD in Równe, there was also a Ukrainian Criminal Police force, headed by Petr Grushevski. Between August 1941 and February 1942, Równe was also the location of the headquarters of the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer, SS-Brigadeführer Gerret Korsemann.

A group of religious Jews pose outside a building in the Równe ghetto, ca. 1941–1942.

USHMM WS #50152, COURTESY OF IPN

The first Aktion against the Jews of Równe was carried out on July 8 and 9, 1941. On the evening of July 8, members of Sonderkommando 4a, in collaboration with Ukrainian auxiliary police units, arrested 130 Jews. They forced the victims to spend the night in the courtyard of the building of the State Bank. On the morning of July 9, the victims were shot on the edge of the city.³ The headquarters of Einsatzgruppe C, located in Równe on July 12, 1941, carried out the shooting of about 100 more Jews on the grounds of a brickyard about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from Równe.⁴ Several hundred more Jews were killed by a Sipo and SD squad of the Einsatzgruppe Special Duty (z.b.V).⁵ Altogether, about 1,000 Jews were killed in the city in the summer of 1941. During the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Równe. Initially Jews were forced to wear armbands bearing a Star of David. In September 1941, this was replaced by circular yellow patches worn on the chest and back of their outer clothing. The Jewish population was forced to carry out physically demanding work. They were not allowed to leave the city. In addition, the Jews were forced to pay the German occupation authorities 12 million rubles (1.2 million Reichsmark [RM]) as a so-called contribution. Jews were systematically robbed and beaten by the Ukrainian auxiliary police.⁶ A Jewish Council (Judenrat), with 12 members, and a “Jewish Order Service” (Jewish police force) consisting of 20 people (reporting to the Judenrat) were established in Równe. The head of the Judenrat was Dr. Moshe Bergmann, the headmaster of a local gymnazium (high school).

In early November 1941, a major Aktion took place in Równe. The victims were mostly those unable to work. On November 5, notifications were distributed directing all Jews who had no work permit to appear in the Church Square (Kostel’nyi Ploshchad’) at 6:00 A.M. to wait for their resettlement. After the Jews had gathered, they were ordered to leave their luggage in the square and were herded in columns to the village of Sosenki. Near the village were several pits, dug by Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) in late October. Over the course of two days, all the Jews who had assembled for “re-settlement” were shot in these pits.⁷ Ereignismeldung UdSSR [Union of Soviet Socialist Republics] no. 143, dated December 8, 1941, states that “between November 6 and 7, 1941, a long-planned anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out, during which about 15,000 Jews were killed. On the orders of the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF), the Order Police was in charge of its organization. The detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 in Równe actively participated in its execution.”⁸ The organizer of the Aktion was HSSPF z.b.V. SS-Brigadeführer Korsemann. The 315th Police Battalion (under the command of Hauptmann der Polizei Klaus) and the 320th Police Battalion, assisted by the Ukrainian auxiliary police and at least one company of the 33rd Police Reserve Battalion (company commander Hauptmann der Polizei von Wiekmann), took part in the Aktion.

In December 1941, a ghetto, declared the “Jewish residential area” (an open ghetto), was established on the edge of the city of Równe. The Jews were given several days to resettle there. In this ghetto there were about 5,200 Jews, including 1,182 children under the age of 14.⁹

In April 1942, the German mayor of the city ordered the Judenrat to have all Jews clean up the streets and yards of the Jewish quarter on Sundays, or they would face the stiffest punishment.¹⁰ On May 7, 1942, the head (Obmann) of the Judenrat, Dr. Bergmann, was instructed to appear before the German mayor the following day to discuss a specific matter. Presumably as a result of this meeting, the mayor issued a written order to Dr. Bergmann on May 8, stating that the 2,000 Jews still fit for work had to perform compulsory labor on two Sundays every month to clean up the Jewish quarter.¹¹

On May 10, 1942, Dr. Bergmann replied in a surprisingly sharp tone to the German mayor that the German offices that employed the 2,000 able-bodied Jews were opposed to their use for unskilled cleaning tasks on Sundays, as it adversely affected their ability to do their normal work. Dr. Bergmann stressed that in accordance with his responsibility for maintaining cleanliness and other public works within the Jewish quarter, he had already instructed the sanitary commission of the Judenrat to perform a variety of tasks. The few able-bodied Jews available for work on Sundays were already employed in carrying out the sanitary work required. In view of these circumstances, Dr. Bergmann noted that he had reached an agreement with the Distribution Office for the Jewish Workforce—which received its instructions from the supervisory German Labor Office—by which 100 to 150 workers would be available for the two days of work each month. He concluded: “as I ask you, Mr. Mayor, to please revise your instruction, I hope that this number, in view of the advanced spring season, will prove to be adequate for the task.”¹²

On June 19, 1942, the Judenrat in Równe complained to the German mayor that unknown persons were frequently entering the Jewish cemetery illegally and destroying or damaging gravestones. The Judenrat wanted to erect a sign warning that entering the Jewish cemetery without permission was strictly forbidden on the orders of the German mayor.¹³

The liquidation of the Równe ghetto came during the night of July 13–14, 1942. Refusing to assist the German authorities in the killing of Jews, Dr. Bergmann and another Judenrat member, Leon Sukharchuk, both committed suicide around this time.¹⁴ The 1st Company of the 33rd Reserve Police Battalion, units of the German Security Police, and members of the Ukrainian auxiliary police forced the Jews to leave their houses in the ghetto. The police herded the victims to the railroad station and forced them into freight cars. The trains transported the Jews in the direction of Kostopol. At a quarry outside the city, the Jews were shot by the German Security Police and Ukrainian auxiliary police units.¹⁵ The chief engineer of the German construction company Josef Jung of Solingen, Hermann Friedrich Graebe, was an eyewitness to the liquidation of the Równe ghetto. On November 10, 1945, he testified under oath:

Shortly after 10:00 p.m., the ghetto was surrounded by a large SS detachment and three times as many Ukrainian auxiliary policemen. After that, the spotlights installed inside and around the ghetto were switched on. Groups of four to six SS men and policemen broke into or tried to break into the houses. If the windows and doors were locked and the residents were unwilling to open up, the SS and police units broke down the doors and forced their way in. The people living there were driven into the street just as they were, regardless of whether they were dressed or not. Because most Jews refused to leave their homes and offered resistance, the SS and police employed force. Finally, using whips, kicks, fists, and rifle butts, they managed to empty the houses. The victims were chased out of their homes with such haste that in some cases small children were left behind in their beds. In the streets, the women called their children, and the children called their parents. That did not keep the SS men from beating the victims to make them run along the road until they reached the freight train. One freight car after another was filled, as the women and children screamed, whips cracked, and rifle shots rang out. Because some Jewish families barricaded themselves in especially strong buildings and attempts to open the doors with crowbars and beams failed, the doors of these buildings were blown open with hand grenades. Because the ghetto of Rovno was located close to the railroad station, the younger people tried to escape over the railroad line. Since the spotlights could not illuminate this sector, it was lit up with signal flares. All night long, persecuted, beaten, and wounded people moved through the illuminated streets. Women carried their dead children in their arms. Some children were dragged to the train hanging on to the legs or the arms of their parents. The entire time, the ghetto was filled with shouts: "Open the door, open the door!"¹⁶

While the ghetto was under siege, dozens of the residents tried to escape. Some victims also attempted to jump off the moving trains. Most of the escapees were young people, who formed groups or roamed in the forests on their own. Before long they joined up with Soviet partisan units, especially that of Major General Vassily Begma. After the liquidation of the Równe ghetto, the German and Ukrainian police systematically searched the ghetto territory for hidden Jews. Those found and captured were shot in the area of Belaia Street in Równe. The number of victims is not known. Altogether in the city of Równe between 1941 and 1943, between 22,000 and 23,000 Jews were murdered.

During the liquidation of the Równe ghetto on July 13 and 14, 1941, a few dozen Jews managed to hide with Graebe's help. From the chief of staff of the Gebietskommissar, Ordensjunker Beck, Graebe obtained a document stating that Jewish workers of the Jung company (100 people) were not subject to the Aktion, and during the night he protected a house in which Jewish workers were sleeping from intrusion by the Ukrainian police and SS. After the Aktion was over, he sent the Jewish workers to Zdobunów.¹⁷ Another small group of Jews from the Równe ghetto was saved by the initiative and support of some Ukrainian civilians. One of them, Iakov Sukhenko, was shot in 1943 for helping the Jews.¹⁸

In 1947, Gerret Korsemann was sentenced to 18 months in prison. He was released in 1949 and died in Munich on July 16, 1958.

SOURCES Information on the persecution and murder of the Jewish population of Równe can be found in the following publications: Y. Margulyets et al., eds., A Zikorn far Rovne (Rovner Landsmanshaft in Daytshland Amer. Zone, 1947); A. Avitachi, ed., Rovneh, sefer zikaron (Tel Aviv: Hosa'at "Yalkut Vohlin," Irgun yotse Rovneh be-Yisrael, 1956); Rovno 700 Rokiv. 1283–1983. Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (Kiev, 1983); Barbara Baratz and Ruth Oelschlaegel, Flucht vor dem Schicksal: Holocaust-Erinnerungen aus der Ukraine, 1941–1944 (Darmstadt, 1984); Douglas Huneke, The Moses of Rovno. The Stirring Story of Fritz Graebe, a German Who Risked His Life to Lead Hundreds of Jews to Safety during the Holocaust (New York: Dodd Mead, 1985); Barbara Barac, Escape from Destiny (Melbourne, Australia, 1990); Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas hakehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 192–220; Varvara Barats, Begstvo ot sud'by, vospominaniia o genotside evreev na Ukraine vo vremia vtoroi mirovoi voyny (Moscow: "Art-biznes-centr," 1993); Khaia Musman, Gorod moi rasstrelenny (New York: Kh. Musman, 1994).

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Równe can be found in the following archives: AŻIH; BA-L; DARO; GARF (7021-71-67); USHMM; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Katrin Reichelt and Samuel Fishman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Pütz died in Poznań in February 1945.

3. Ereignismeldung (EM) UdSSR, no. 19, July 11, 1941, and no. 28, July 20, 1941, in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), pp. 30, 37. See also Barats, Begstvo ot sud'by, pp. 11–12.

4. See Sta. bei dem Landgericht Itzehoe, 9 Js 766/67, Indictment, November 30, 1971, in the case against Dr. Phil. Hans Krieger and Alois Köldorfer, in the archive of Sta. bei dem Landgericht Itzehoe. See also testimony of Kiebach, the former telegraph operator at the headquarters of Einsatzgruppe C, November 1, 1963, in Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov i materialov, p. 31.

5. See diary of Wehrmacht Hauptmann Hanns Pilz, in E. Klee and W. Dressen, "Gott mit uns." Der deutsche Vernichtungskrieg im Osten 1939–1945 (Frankfurt am Main, 1989), p. 141.

6. "The Holocaust," in Avitachi, Rovneh, sefer zikaron.

7. See testimony of Kristina Novakovskaia, in Yitskhak Arad, ed., Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoï okkupatsii (1941–1944). Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1991), pp. 151–152.

8. EM, no. 143, in Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov i materialov, p. 105. According to ChGK materials, 17,500 Jews were shot in Rovno (see Rovno 700 rokiv, pp. 96–99). There is a monument at the site where the Jews were killed.

9. DARO, R22-1-19, p. 14.

10. USHMM, RG-31.017M, reel 2, p. 5, German mayor of Rowno to Judenrat, April 16, 1942.

11. Ibid., pp. 12–13, letters of German mayor of Rowno to Judenobmann, Dr. Bergmann, on May 7 and 8, 1942.

12. Ibid., p. 14, Judenrat in Rowno to German mayor of Rowno, May 10, 1942.

13. Ibid., p. 21, Judenrat to German mayor of Rowno, June 19, 1942.

14. Ibid.

15. Sta. Bielefeld, Vermerk, October 26, 1973 (5 Js 703/70) in the case against Dr. Med. Fritz Pustkuchen.

16. Statement under oath of Hermann Friedrich Graebe on November 10, 1945, N-Doc. 2992-PS.

17. See Huneke, The Moses of Rovno. The document Graebe obtained from Beck stated: "To the Jung company, Rowno. The Jewish workers at your firm are not subject to the Aktion. You have until Wednesday, July 15, 1942, to move them to the new worksite."

18. See Baratz and Oelschlaegel, Flucht vor dem Schicksal; Barac, Escape from Destiny; Barats, Begstvo ot sud'by.

ROŻYSZCZE

Pre-1939: Rożyszcze, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Rozbishche, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Roshischtsche, Rayon center, Gebiet Luzk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Rozhyshe, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Rożyszcze is located 19 kilometers (12 miles) north-northwest of Łuck and 51 kilometers (32 miles) southeast of Kowel.

According to the 1921 census, 2,686 Jews were residing in Rożyszcze.

Following the German invasion of Poland in mid-September 1939, a few local Communists organized a militia to welcome the expected arrival of the Red Army. However, they clashed first with a retreating Polish force before the Red Army entered the town. The Jewish population of the town was increased by the arrival of hundreds of refugees from central Poland, but the Soviets also deported some Jews to Siberia, which paradoxically saved their lives. The Soviet authorities also expropriated land around Rożyszcze, establishing kolkhozy for agricultural production.¹ In mid-1941, there were in excess of 3,000 Jews living in the town.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Rożyszcze on June 25, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration governed the town, and from September 1941, power was transferred to a civil administration. Rożyszcze was a Rayon center in Gebiet Luzk, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Łuck was Regierungsassessor Lindner.²

A Ukrainian local authority and a local police force were formed in Rożyszcze. The local police was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post (established after September 1941), which consisted of several German Gendarmes.

As soon as the Germans occupied the town, they killed several Jews, and Ukrainian nationalistic antisemites also started victimizing Jews through robbery, extortion, and cruelty.³ Within a few days, the temporary German military authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and a Jewish police force. During July 1941, there followed a series of round-ups of Jews, supposedly for work assignments outside the town. First a group of about 80 of the wealthiest and most influential Jews were escorted out of town and were never heard of again. A few days later, the Germans and local police rounded up several hundred Jewish men, who also did not return. In a further roundup, the Germans took away even old people, women, and children, as all the men had gone into hiding. These people were all murdered and buried in a pit outside town.⁴ These Aktionen were probably conducted by a squad of the Security Police and SD, which was based in Łuck, assisted by the local Ukrainian police. Another Aktion was carried out in Rożyszcze in October 1941, when 603 people were shot (600 men and 3 women).⁵

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Rożyszcze. Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols, and they were forced to surrender horses, cows, bicycles, and radios. They were compelled to perform work, organized by the Jewish Council, during which they were beaten and otherwise abused. According to German regulations issued by the new civil administration in September 1941, Jews were forbidden to leave the town limits without special permission.

In the fall of 1941 (according to another source, on February 15, 1942), a ghetto was established in Rożyszcze. The Jews were given only two hours to move into the ghetto, taking only what they could carry with them. As the Jews entered the ghetto in the northern section of town, "Oyfn Barg" (On the Hill), most were severely beaten.⁶ The ghetto, consisting of 60 one-story houses, had to accommodate not only the local Jews but also Jews brought in from surrounding villages (such as Kopaczowka Nowa and Wołnianka).⁷ This influx resulted in considerable overcrowding in the ghetto's small confines, with several families sharing a single room. Altogether, there were about 4,000 Jews in the ghetto, which was surrounded by a barbed-wire fence.

The food allocation in the ghetto was only 50 grams (less than 2 ounces) of bread per person per day. Those assigned to work outside the ghetto were sometimes able to smuggle in extra food, which they obtained by bartering. One enterprising group of Jews even risked going to the Kowel ghetto to obtain rare items such as needles and thread, which were much sought after by the local peasants. However, Jews caught smuggling were severely beaten by the Ukrainian police.⁸

Among the tasks performed by Jews in the ghetto were sweeping the streets around the town, cooking for the Germans, and working in the wool factory. The German authorities also demanded "contributions" from the Jews in the form of money or leather goods. In the summer of 1942, the Jewish Council was arrested to ensure the collection of an additional tribute. Even though the "contribution" was delivered on August 10, 1942, most members of the Jewish Council were shot anyway, including Spector, Bruner, Klimbord, and Kleisman.⁹

The ghetto was liquidated about 10 days later, on or around August 22, 1942,¹⁰ when a unit of the Security Police and SD from Łuck, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, shot most of the Jews: in excess of 3,000 people. The Jews were transported from the ghetto to the killing site in trucks, with logistical support provided by the Luzk Gebietskommissar. Some Jews also were collected from surrounding kolkhozy or work camps. Local workers dug the grave in advance in a sandpit 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside the town.¹¹ As the Jews received some warning of the impending Aktion, several hundred of them were able to hide or escape to the forest. Most of these Jews who evaded the initial roundup were captured by the Ukrainian police and subsequently shot at the Jewish cemetery.¹² A few dozen Jews managed to survive in the forests, receiving food and shelter from Polish farmers or Seventh-Day Adventists living in the vicinity.

After the liberation of Rożyszcze by the Red Army, a group of Jews returned and lived together in one house. Some of them tried to harass those who had assisted the Germans until the Soviet authorities started putting the collaborators on trial. However, a local Ukrainian murdered one Jewish woman when she tried to retrieve her family's possessions.¹³ Within a few years after the war, there were no Jews living in Rożyszcze.

SOURCES The following published sources include sections on the ghetto in Rożyszcze: Gershon Zik, ed., Roz'ishts'

'ayarati/Mayn shtetl Rozshishtsb (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Roz'ishts' be-Yisrael veba-irgunim be-Artsot ha-berit, Kana-dah, Brazil, ve-Argentinah, 1976); and "Rozyszcze," in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 200–202.

Documents and witness testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Rożyszcze can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2172 and 2435); DAVO (R2-1-196); GARF (7021-55-11); NARA (N-Doc., PS-302); and YVA (e.g., testimony of Eva Tuzhinska Trauenstein).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, pp. 10–30 [English section].
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, pp. 31–32; AŻIH, 301/2435, testimony of Zofja Finkelsztayn.
4. Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, pp. 31–32, 38.
5. GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 66. According to another account, the Aktion took place in December 1941 when the Germans in 10 vehicles rounded up and shot some 600 Jews in the villages of the Rayon; see GARF, 7021-55-11, pp. 68–69. The shootings were probably carried out by the 2nd Company of the 320th Police Battalion, which was based in Łuck from early September 1941 until February 1942. The commander of the company was Hauptmann der Polizei Hans Wiemer.
6. Berl Schneider, "The Rozhishch Ghetto," in Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, p. 33, dates the formation of the ghetto in about November 1941 ("four months after the German conquest"); AŻIH, 301/2435, testimony of Zofja Finkelsztayn, gives the date of February 15, 1942. The discrepancy could perhaps be explained by a time lapse between the establishment of the ghetto and its enclosure with barbed wire.
7. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem and the Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), p. 129; according to the 1921 census, there were 274 Jews residing in Kopaczówka Nowa and 266 in Wołnianka (Mała and Wielka).
8. Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, pp. 33–34, 37.
9. Ibid., pp. 33, 38.
10. This date for the massacre of the Jews can be found on the monument at the site of the mass grave. The yizkor book also gives the dates of August 20 and August 23, 1942, in separate accounts; see Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, pp. 15, 39.
11. DAVO, R2-1-196, pp. 218a–218b, Report to Generalkommissar Wolhynien u. Podolien on gasoline supplies for the "special treatment" of Jews in Gebiet Luzk, August 27, 1942; in the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report for the Rozhishche raion, mention is made of 4,600 Jews being shot (GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 66), but this figure appears to be too high. Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, p. 42, mentions trucks collecting Jews who had been working in the surrounding villages.
12. GARF, 7021-55-11, p. 66.
13. Zik, Roz'ishts' 'ayarati, p. 44.

SARNY

Pre-1939: Sarny, city and powiat center, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: center, Rayon and Gebiet Sarny, General-kommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Sarny is located 83 kilometers (52 miles) north-northeast of Równe. The Jewish population numbered 2,808 people in 1921 (47 percent of the total population); 3,414 (45 percent) in 1931; and 4,950 (45 percent) in 1937.

After the start of World War II in 1939, many Jewish refugees from central and western Poland arrived in Sarny. Under Soviet occupation from September 21, 1939, Jewish communal property was confiscated and Jewish institutions were disbanded. More than 1,000 of the refugees from western and central Poland, together with a few local Jews accused of "crimes against the state," were transported to the Soviet interior. In June 1941, there were about 6,000 Jews living in the city.¹

German armed forces occupied Sarny on July 5, 1941. Following the departure of the Soviets, local Ukrainians and Poles went on a killing spree for three days, murdering a number of Jews. In July and August 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the city. In September 1941, a German civil administration was established. Sarny became the administrative center of Gebiet Sarny, which also included Rayons Klesow, Wladimirez, Dombrowiza, Rafalowka, and Rokitno, as well as Rayon Sarny. Kameradschaftsführer Huala was appointed Gebietskommissar. Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Albert Schuhmacher was made the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in the spring of 1942.²

A view of Ul. Handlowa [Commerce Street] in Sarny during the 1920s.
USHMM WS #08011, COURTESY OF BRENDA SZYR SENDERS

In the city of Sarny itself, a German Gendarmerie post was established, along with an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. The Germans appointed a lawyer named Mariniuk as city mayor, and a man named Kostermann served as the labor supervisor. From the beginning of September 1941 to March 1942, the 1st Company of German Police Battalion 320 was stationed in Sarny. It was commanded by Hauptmann der Polizei Alfred Beber.

Almost immediately upon their arrival, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) to implement their demands. A regime of forced labor was imposed on the Jews. Men were put to work clearing the destruction at the train depot and repairing the rail lines, which had been blown up by the retreating Soviet army. Women were forced to clean toilets with their bare hands. The daily quota of forced laborers organized by the Judenrat was 300 males and 100 females. The Judenrat was also ordered to deliver 70 suits, 100 pairs of boots, and 50 sets of silverware for the officers' club, as well as an unspecified number of gold watches, chains, diamonds, and pearls.

Initially Jews were ordered to wear blue-and-white armbands with an identifying Star of David. On October 1, 1941, the armbands were replaced with a yellow circular patch on the front and back of their clothes. Jews also had to mark their homes with a blue six-pointed star. In addition, they were prohibited from leaving the limits of the city and from buying goods from non-Jews. A "contribution" of several rubles per head also was demanded from the community. Forced laborers received no monetary payment, only about 80 grams (less than 3 ounces) of bread per day. Hunger set in as the community was deprived of most basic necessities.

As additional Germans arrived, their demands increased. They required new quarters with fine furnishings. On October 28, 1941, the German Wirtschaftskommando (Economic Office) in Sarny issued an order to the Jews, giving them until October 31 to hand over all of their livestock: horned cattle, sheep, pigs, geese, and ducks. The livestock that the Ukrainians had purchased from Jews also had to be turned over. Jews were subject to a curfew from 6:00 P.M. to 6:00 A.M. The synagogues were seized and turned into stables and warehouses. In December, all fur coats had to be surrendered for the use of German soldiers at the front, and in 1942 the German authorities demanded 36 kilograms (79 pounds) of gold from the Jewish population.³

The Judenrat served as the means of communication between the occupying authorities and the Jewish population, passing on and implementing German orders and regulations concerning the Jews. A Jewish police force, headed by Yona Margulies and small in size, was organized to assist the Judenrat in its tasks.

Around Passover, on April 2–4, 1942, a ghetto was created in Sarny. It existed for four and a half months. The area was surrounded by barbed wire, and Ukrainian guards were stationed at intervals of 100 meters (328 feet).⁴ Any Jew who crossed over the fence was shot on the spot. In April 1942, Jews were forcibly resettled into the ghetto from the outlying villages of Niemowicze, Czudel, Głuszyca, Horodec, Antonówka, Bielatycze, Lubikowicze, Cepcewicze, Strzelsk, and Luchcze.⁵ About 8 to 10 people had to live in a single room, and sanitary conditions were unspeakable. Sickness went untreated in the absence of medical help and drugs. A number of Gypsies—around 200 to 300 people—also were resettled into the ghetto.⁶ According to historian Yehuda Bauer, there was also a separate ghetto for craftsmen and their families, which was liquidated at the same time as the main ghetto.

On August 25, 1942, the Judenrat was summoned to receive a demand for a third "assessment" of 7 gold rubles per person. Utterly lacking such resources, people had to surrender the gold in their teeth to fulfill the quota. Worthy of note is the general respect accorded to members of the Judenrat in recognition of the impossible circumstances in which they found themselves. On that day, Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto, and no one was sent out to perform forced labor.⁷

Yitzhak Geller organized a few men into a resistance group, named for Samson's final cry: "Let my soul perish with the Philistines!" Among the members were Portnoy, Simcha Monk, and Moshe Pikmann. With a few rifles, pistols, and grenades stolen from the Ukrainians, they planned to blow up the power station, burn the houses in the ghetto, and create confusion so that people could run for their lives. But Neumann, the secretary of the Judenrat, threatened them with arrest and prevented them from taking any action.⁸

On the night of August 25–26, 1942, several people committed suicide. The next day, starting at 5:00 A.M., additional Jews from a number of surrounding towns in the Gebiet were brought to Sarny and held captive in a staging area next to the regional administrative center. There were 2,800 Jews from Dąbrowica, around 600 from Rokitno, 580 from Klesów, 1,000 from Bereznica, and 150 from Tomaszgorod. The addition of these arrivals (in excess of 5,000 people) brought the total Jewish population assembled in Sarny to around 14,000.⁹

The slaughter began on August 27, 1942, at 2:00 P.M. The Jews from Rokitno were ordered to deliver the first 500 people to four pits that had been dug outside the town; then came the turn of the Jews from Klesów. At this point, 2 Jews with wire clippers and an axe cut a hole in the barbed-wire fence. Three buildings of the administrative center were set on fire.¹⁰ As people fled through the opening in the fence, they were fired on with machine guns and hand grenades. Survivors estimate that some 2,500 people were shot in the rush to the fence. Another 1,000 perished in the burning buildings. Several hundred managed to escape. The rest, about 13,000 in total, were murdered and thrown into the pits. Among the victims were about 100 Gypsies, who died protesting that they were not Jews. The local people rushed to loot whatever Jewish property was left.¹¹

The mass shootings were organized by a squad of the Security Police and SD from Równe, assisted by German and Ukrainian police.¹² The forces that participated in the shootings included part of German Police Battalion 323, subordinated to Security Division 68. The unit of this battalion, commanded by Unterführer Willi Meyer, killed around 1,400 people with machine guns in the course of two days. Meyer personally shot around 200 of them.¹³

Of those Jews who managed to escape from the ghetto before and during the Aktion, many were captured and killed by the Ukrainian and German police thereafter, but some managed to organize a partisan detachment within Rayon Sarny in October 1942. This unit was based mainly in and around the village of Karasin.¹⁴ Other escapees went into hiding if they could find sympathetic local peasants. One group of survivors mentions the courage of the “Shtundists” (Baptists), who were especially favorable towards Jews seeking help. Others found refuge with Polish villagers who feared attacks from Ukrainian nationalist partisans.¹⁵ At the end of the war, a few survivors returned to Sarny to provide a decent burial for the victims of the massacre and to erect a memorial stone in their memory.

SOURCES Articles about the fate of the Jewish population of Sarny during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Yosef Kariv, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarni (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Sarni vеха-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1961); Yehuda Bauer, “Sarny and Rokitno in the Holocaust: A Case Study of Two Townships in Wolyn (Volhynia),” in Steven Katz, ed., The Shtetl: New Evaluations (New York: New York University Press, 2007); and “Sarny,” in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 140–143.

Documents and testimonies regarding the persecution and destruction of the Sarny Jews can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/707, 1237); BA-BL; BA-L; DARO; FVA (HVT-1457, 2484, and 2819); GARF (7021-71-70); USHMM (RG-06.025*02); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Samuel Fishman
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-71-70, p. 11; Kariv, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarni, pp. 266–268.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. DARO, R293-2-2a, p. 49; Kariv, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarni, pp. 272–274. Also see statement by witness Josef Wolf on December 19, 1945, USHMM, RG-06.025*02 Kiev, 1945–1946 (N-18762, vol. 10).
4. GARF, 7021-71-70, p. 15; Kariv, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarni, p. 274.
5. In 1921, there were 774 Jews residing in these villages and therefore probably about 1,000 Jews in 1941.
6. GARF, 7021-71-70, pp. 24, 46.
7. Ibid., p. 15; Kariv, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarni, p. 275.
8. Kariv, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarni, pp. 276, 318.
9. See also BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 113/67 (II 204 AR 1088/64), Sachstandsvermerk, June 7, 1967 (Gebietskommisariat Sarny), pp. 1–8.
10. Kariv, Sefer yizkor li-kehillat Sarni, pp. 276–277.
11. Ibid., p. 278.
12. GARF, 7021-71-70, pp. 46 and reverse side.

13. Willi Meyer’s interrogations on October 3, 1945; on December 29, 1945; and on January 9, 1946: USHMM, RG-06.025*02 Kiev, 1945–1946 (N-18762, vol. 10).

14. Ibid., statement by witness Josef Wolf on December 19, 1945.

15. See, for example, AŽIH, 301/1237, testimony of Gitla Szwarblatt.

SERNIKI

Pre-1939: Serniki, village, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Pinsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Wysozk, Gebiet Stolin, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Sernyky, Rivne oblast’, Ukraine

Serniki lies in the southern sector of the Pripet marshes, just on the Ukrainian side of the border with Belarus, about 30 kilometers (19 miles) south of Pińsk. According to the 1921 census, the Jewish population was 987.

Thanks to its remote location, Serniki was largely ignored by the advancing German forces in July 1941. According to witness reports, local Ukrainians seized power on the retreat of Soviet forces and took part in the looting and murder of Jews in Serniki at the end of July 1941.¹ In late July 1941, the 3rd Squadron of the 2nd SS-Cavalry Regiment also began its murderous sweep through the Pripet marshes in the Ratno area, advancing via Kamiień Koszyrski, Kuchekawola, Łachwa, Serniki, and Dawidgródek.² It probably passed through Serniki during the first week of August 1941. According to local witnesses, more than 100 Jewish men were arrested at the synagogue in early August 1941. They were then taken to the local schoolhouse, where they were ridiculed and humiliated for three days before being taken to the Jewish cemetery in Serniki to be shot by German-led forces.

Initially, the Germans did not have a permanent garrison in the village, but the Ukrainian police commanded by Ivan Polyukovich (known as Polivik) administered the village, and German officials visited periodically to check on things. It is not clear exactly when the ghetto was established, but Jews from the surrounding villages were forced to move into the ghetto, which definitely had been set up by April 1942 and was probably surrounded by barbed wire.³ Jews in the ghetto were taken for forced labor, mostly felling trees in the surrounding forests. By the end of the summer, the remaining men looked like “skeletons,” owing to the hard labor and insufficient food. The bulk of the ghetto’s population consisted of women, children, and the elderly.

The Jews of Serniki had some intimation of the impending Aktion in the fall of 1942, as most of the other surrounding ghettos had already been liquidated. Among the warning signs was the fact that Jews no longer were sent to work outside the ghetto, and the owners of items delivered to Jewish craftsmen for repair collected them, regardless of whether the work was finished. By early September, there also were rumors that pits were being prepared nearby. Then local policemen, reinforced by the German Gendarmerie, surrounded the ghetto at night.⁴

The liquidation of the ghetto in Serniki took place in September 1942, when about 850 Jews were murdered. Local villagers had dug the pits in the forest some 3 or 4 kilometers (1.9 to 2.5 miles) outside Serniki beforehand. The exact units responsible cannot be ascertained from German sources. On the basis of Jewish eyewitness statements, however, it is possible to conclude that between September 9 and 29, 1942, the Serniki ghetto was liquidated on the instructions of the SD in either Stolín or Lubieszów, with the support of the Gendarmerie, local militia units, and other local helpers.⁵ On the day the ghetto was liquidated, a number of Germans arrived in Serniki by truck. According to one eyewitness, who also filled in the pit, some 50 Germans and policemen escorted the Jews to the pit, with the Germans at the head and the rear of the column, while Ukrainian police guarded the flanks.⁶ As the column made its way to the pit, two Jewish boys broke away from the column, fled down towards a nearby river, and were shot by the armed escorts as they ran.⁷

The size of the ghetto did not warrant calling in elements of Polizei Reiterabteilung II or other police battalions in the area. However, since about one quarter of the ghetto inhabitants managed to escape, the German forces probably regretted not arranging for more reinforcements. According to one account, the Gestapo chief made a speech before the mass shooting, chastising the assembled Ukrainian police and local peasants (who had come in search of loot) for failing to guard the ghetto effectively. After this speech, the Stoliner Hasidic rabbi, Meir Viener, led the condemned Jews in a confessional (vidui) prayer, which many small children repeated after him word for word.⁸

The head of the Jewish Council (Judenrat), Shlomo Turkenitz, assisted the flight of many ghetto inhabitants on the eve of the liquidation, although he remained behind for family reasons. About 272 people, more than half of them men between the ages of 8 and 40, managed to escape and reach the forests. The close proximity of dense forests to the ghetto, which bordered on the Stubło River, helped many Jews to escape. Of the escapees, 102 perished in the forests: between 10 and 12 died fighting as partisans; and the rest succumbed to hunger, cold, and illness or were killed by police and other local inhabitants.⁹

Forensic investigations conducted by the Australian Special Investigations Unit revealed that the victims were forced down a ramp into the pit. Some were forced to the left and others to the right. The majority were shot in the head, but some were clubbed to death. The bodies were aligned face-down, parallel, and in rows. At one end, the bodies were disorganized, suggesting that there had been some panic. The bodies that lay in the middle tended to have fewer bullets to the head. Clothing was found scattered throughout the grave, which suggested that after the executions the grave had been picked over. The investigations revealed that the perpetrators used German ammunition manufactured in the years 1939 to 1941.¹⁰

After the Aktion, the Jews hiding in the forest continued to be hunted down by local police and other available forces loyal to the Germans, including local foresters receiving German pay. For example, shortly after the massacre in Serniki, a neighbor observed a local forester escorting a group of Jews at gunpoint: "There were 13 people. I recognized the wife of a former [Jewish] resident of Serniki and his seven daughters, who were 10 to 20 years old. All of them lived in Serniki. The forester herded his victims up two high hills. I heard sub-machine gun fire shortly after. I was terrified. He returned alone."¹¹

SOURCES Information about the Serniki ghetto and its destruction can be found in the following publications: Meylekh Bakalchuk-Felin, Zikbroynes fun a Yidishn partisan (Buenos Aires, 1958), pp. 9–19; and D. Bevan, A Case to Answer: The Story of Australia's First European War Crimes Prosecution (Kent Town: Wakefield Press, 1994).

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Serniki can be found in the following archives: ANA; AŽIH; BA-L; DAVO; USHMM; and YVA (e.g., O-3/1138; M-1/E/457, 550, and 2306).

Stephen Pallavicini and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990), p. 66.

2. BA-L, ZStL, 2 Ks 11/63, Magill Trial, Hans Schmidt testimony, March 12, 1964, p. 62.

3. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 366, dates the establishment of the ghetto in January 1942.

4. Bakalchuk-Felin, Zikbroynes fun a Yidishn partisan, pp. 9–19.

5. Ibid., p. 18, dates the mass shooting on September 9, 1942 (three days before Rosh Hashanah). Other sources give the date of September 29, 1942.

6. ANA, SIU investigation into the case of Ivan Polyukovich (Ivanekchko), witness statement of Stepan Sidorevich Polyukovich. Ivan Polyukovich was acquitted by a court in Adelaide in 1993 on two counts of murder under the Australian War Crimes Act.

7. Witness testimony regarding this incident is quoted in Mark Aarons, War Criminals Welcome: Australia, a Sanctuary for Fugitive War Criminals since 1945 (Melbourne: Black Inc., 2001), p. 480.

8. Bakalchuk-Felin, Zikbroynes fun a Yidishn partisan, p. 19.

9. Ibid., pp. 17, 176; YVA, O-3/1138, testimony of D. Saltzman (Gavish), gives the figure of 300 fugitives; see also M. Kahanovich, Milhemet ha-Partisanim ha-Yehudim be-Mizrab Eiropan (Tel Aviv, 1954), p. 93.

10. ANA, SIU investigation into the case of Ivan Polyukovich. Excavations by the SIU in 1990 determined that the pit in which the Jews were murdered was some 40 meters (131 feet) long and 5 meters (16 feet) wide. It was about 2 meters (6.6 feet) deep. The bodies in the pit were stacked like wood.

11. ANA, SIU, Soviet allegation in the Australian case of Ivan Polyukovich.

SHEPETOVKA

Pre-1941: Shepetovka, city and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Schepetowka, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Shepetivka, raion center, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Shepetovka is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) east-southeast of Równe. According to the 1939 census, 4,844 Jews (19.5 percent of the total population) were living in the city. Another 1,621 Jews lived in what was at the time the Shepetovka raion. This included 1,311 Jews in the village of Sudilkov.

Shepetovka was occupied by units of the German 6th Army on July 5, 1941. In the two weeks following the German invasion on June 22, probably about 1,500 Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Men were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 3,200 Jews remained in Shepetovka at the start of the occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the city. The Ortskommandantur formed a local authority and established a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Shepetovka became the administrative center of Gebiet Schepetowka, which included the neighboring Rayons of Polonnoje, Slawuta, and Beresdow, as well as Rayon Schepetowka. Regierungsassessor Worbs was appointed as the Gebietskommissar, and Leutnant Höse became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.¹

A German Gendarmerie post was established in the city in the fall of 1941, when it assumed control over the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, which was renamed the Schutzmannschaft. The first head of the Ukrainian police was Stanislav Kashperuk. At the end of 1941, he was relieved of his duties because his wife was Jewish. (In May 1942, Kashperuk was shot along with his wife, two children, and mother-in-law.) The deputy head of the police was an ethnic German, Eduard Miller, who replaced Kashperuk as the head of the police. In 1942, a Ukrainian Criminal Police (Kripo) unit was also set up, and it was headed by an ethnic German named Konstantin Neyman. Among the Ukrainian police, a man named Boleslav Kovalevskii personally killed dozens of Jews and earned a reputation for his cruelty.

Cleansing Aktions against the Jewish population in Gebiet Schepetowka, including the city of Shepetovka, were carried out by the Security Police department (Sipo Aussendienststelle) based in Starokonstantinov. The department was headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Graf. The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian auxiliary police also played an active role in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Shepetovka. During the summer, Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing markings bearing the Star of David, later a yellow circle. They had to perform heavy physical labor, frequently without pay, and were prohibited from leaving the limits of the city. Survivors mention that young girls were threatened and abused by the Ukrainian police. Jews also had to surrender their valuables and pay onerous "contributions."

On July 28, 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in the city. The 2nd Company of the 45th Reserve Police Battalion rounded up more than 800 Jews on the pretext of forced labor and then shot them.² On August 23, the same battalion shot 61 Jews in Shepetovka and Korzec.³ On September 1, another 45 Jews were shot in Shepetovka.⁴

On December 20, 1941, a ghetto was created in the city, and three streets of one-story houses were cordoned off for this purpose. The ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire and closely guarded by the Ukrainian police. In January 1942, more than 600 Jews were brought into the ghetto on foot from Sudilkov⁵ and dozens more from other nearby villages. The living conditions in the ghetto were atrocious—five to six families (35 to 45 people) lived in each house, and people had to sleep on the floor. The Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto, and some of those who were caught outside illegally were shot. Each morning, a guard detachment manned by the Ukrainian police would arrive, and Jews would be escorted away in groups to be exploited for different kinds of labor. The growing of food in the ghetto was forbidden, as was the exchange of personal belongings for products—although this continued to some extent illegally. The main sources of nourishment were potato peelings and other leftovers. The ghetto population suffered from typhus and other diseases. The infirm were not quarantined from the rest of the population, and the German authorities did not provide any medicine to treat serious illnesses. Instead, they undertook regular searches and shot those who were sick.⁶

The doctor, O. Stetsiuk, who on the orders of the city administration surveyed the ghetto, could only conclude that sick people should not be sent out to work, to ensure that the infectious diseases were not spread outside the ghetto. Officially, the provision of help to the infirm inside the ghetto was forbidden. Nevertheless, she wrote prescriptions for the Jews in the ghetto under Ukrainian surnames, collected the medicine from the pharmacy, and distributed it inside the ghetto, providing considerable help to the Jews. The same kind of help was given by N. Ivanets, the doctor's assistant.

On June 25, 1942,⁷ under the supervision of the Gebietskommissar, the first large-scale Aktion was carried out against the ghetto in which probably around 2,500 people were shot. After this operation, only artisans and their families (about 500 people) remained in the ghetto. They were also shot on September 6 and September 10, 1942.⁸ Following the last Aktion, Ukrainian police continued to search for Jews hidden in the ghetto and the surrounding area for days afterwards. Genia Bryla, one of the few survivors of the ghetto, managed to escape from her hiding place in the ghetto at night, after creating a hole in the barbed wire with her bare hands.⁹

In total, there were around 4,000 Jews killed in 1941–1942 in Shepetovka, although Soviet sources generally place the number of victims somewhat higher.¹⁰

On October 21, 1944, a Soviet tribunal sentenced Neyman to death. In 1963, Kovalevskii was sentenced to death and shot.

SOURCES Information on the extermination of the Jewish population of Shepetovka can be found in the publication of Deko O. Kedoishim, Povist'-kbronika Shepetivs'koho betto (Kiev, 1995).

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Shepetovka can be found in the following archives: DAKhO (863-2-44); GARF (7021-64-818); DASBU-Kh (No. 25883); NARA (NO-4818); VHF (# 3403, 5914, 32022, 34306); and YVA (M-33/104, M-52/182, M-53/164, M-53/105).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. See the indictment on February 2, 1970, in the case of Rosenbauer, Besser, and Kreuzer (Sta. Regensburg). The indictment was published in part in A. Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), pp. 290–291. See also Kedoishim, Povist'-kbronika Shepetivs'koho betto, p. 32.

3. Telegram from the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer Russland-Süd, SS-Obergruppenführer Jeckeln (no. 154), August 24, 1941, VHAP, file “Kommando-Stab Reichsführer-SS.” The telegram is published in Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov, p. 242.

4. Telegram from the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer Russland-Süd, SS-Obergruppenführer Jeckeln (no. 242), September 2, 1941, VHAP, “Kommando-Stab Reichsführer-SS.” The telegram is published in Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov, pp. 248–249.

5. GARF, 7021-64-818, p. 57; VHF, # 5914, testimony of Anna Kalika, # 34306, testimony of Genia Bryla.

6. DAKhO, 863-2-44, p. 14; YVA, M-33/104, M-52/182, M-53/164, M-53/105; VHF, # 3403, testimony of Maria Tsimberg.

7. Kedoishim, Povist'-kbronika Shepetivs'koho betto, pp. 85–86.

8. Ibid., p. 103.

9. VHF, # 34306.

10. According to the ChGK materials in GARF, 7021-64-818, pp. 9 and 14, around 9,000 Jews were killed in Shepetovka. This would have meant that there were 6,000 Jews in the ghetto and another 2,000 who were brought in from Sudilkov. Based on pre-war and postwar population data, this figure is probably too high.

SIENKIEWICZÓWKA

Pre-1939: Sienkiewiczówka (Yiddish: Senkevitsbivka), village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Senkevichevka, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Senkewytsbivka, Rayon center, Gebiet Lutzk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Senkevychivka, Horokhiv raion, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Sienkiewiczówka is located about 38 kilometers (24 miles) southwest of Łuck. After World War I, the Jewish population was 120 out of a total of 500 inhabitants. On the eve of World War II, there were about 60 Jewish families living in the village.

Forces of the German 6th Army occupied Sienkiewiczówka on June 26, 1941. In July and August 1941, the village was controlled by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). In September 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Sienkiewiczówka became a Rayon center in Gebiet Lutzk, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Lutzk was Regierungsassessor Lindner.¹

In Sienkiewiczówka, the Germans set up a local Ukrainian administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. The Ukrainian police was subordinated to the local Gendarmerie post that consisted of a few German Gendarmes.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans introduced a number of antisemitic measures in Sienkiewiczówka. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) of five people was created, through which the Germans passed on instructions and regulations to the Jewish population. The Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing markings in the image of the Star of David and, after September 1941, in the form of a yellow patch. They were ordered to hand over all hard currency and items of value. Jews had to perform forced labor, and they were not permitted to leave the limits of the village.

According to Jewish survivor Sonia Resnick-Tetelbaum, in February 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto in Sienkiewiczówka. All the Jews were collected together on a few streets, and additional Jews from the surrounding villages were also resettled there. About 500 people lived in the ghetto altogether. There was considerable overcrowding in the ghetto, with entire families having to share one room. The ghetto was subjected to blackout restrictions at night, and Jews were forbidden to trade with non-Jews. Despite these restrictions that threatened the death penalty, Czech farmers living nearby would bring the Jews food.² Information gathered by Rafael Noachowicz from local non-Jewish inhabitants indicates that the ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by the Ukrainian police. Twice a week the peasants were allowed to enter the ghetto to sell bread or flour to the Jews, but otherwise all contacts were forbidden. Jews were rationed to 250 grams (8.8 ounces) of bread per person. Nonetheless, Jewish craftsmen manufactured items to trade with the local farmers illegally.³

On or around October 5, 1942, a unit of the Security Police and SD, assisted by the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian local police, surrounded the ghetto. The Jews from the ghetto were rounded up, loaded onto trucks, and taken to a site at a railway crossing near the railway station, where two large trenches had been prepared. Here the Jews were made to undress and then forced to lie down flat in the trenches in groups of 4. Then a German dressed in an apron stepped on top of the Jews and shot them in the back of the head. In the very first truck were women carrying children in their arms. Before going into the trench the names of all the Jews were recorded. Thus, the Germans would know how many Jews were missing so that they could search for them. In between groups the German marksman would take swigs to drink before reentering the trench.⁴ Soviet sources indicate that more than 800 Jews were shot in the Senkevichevka raion, but this figure may be too high.⁵

In 1942, there were 11 Jews killed in the village of Uhrynów, 6 Jews killed in the village of Hubin, and 6 Jews killed in the village of Dębowa Korczma.⁶

SOURCES Some brief information about the Jewish community of Sienkiewiczówka can be found in the following publications: “Sienkiewiczówka,” in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 148–149; and V. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni: Zbertvy i pamiat’ (Lutsk, 2003), p. 24.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Sienkiewiczówka can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/2814); DAVO; GARF (7021-55-13); VHF (# 9702); YIU (no. 458); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. VHF, # 9702, testimony of Sonia Resnick-Tetelbaum (born 1924), 1995.

3. AŽIH, 301/2814, information gathered from local non-Jews by Rafael Noachowicz.

4. Ibid.; YIU, Témoignage no. 458.

5. P.T. Tron’ko et al., Istoriia mist i sil URSR, Volyn’ska oblast’, (Kiev, 1970), 26:201. This source gives the number of 800 victims. A memorial stone placed at the site in 1990 is inscribed with the number of 1,293 Jewish victims, but this figure is considerably too high; see Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni: Zbertvy i pamiat’, p. 24.

6. GARF, 7021-55-13.

SLAVUTA

Pre-1941: Slavuta, town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Slawuta, Rayon center, Gebiet Schepetowka, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Slavuta, raion center, Khmel’nyts’kyi oblast’, Ukraine

Slavuta is located 18 kilometers (11 miles) northwest of Shepetovka. According to the census, 5,102 Jews lived in Slavuta in January 1939, and 1,410 additional Jews resided in the Slavuta raion (primarily in the village of Annopol’). Thus, there was a total of 6,512 Jews in the raion. Additionally, in 1939, 2,106 other Jews resided in the Berezdov raion (primarily in the villages of Berezdov, Krasnostav, and Kilikiev), which currently belongs to the Slavuta raion. Many of the Jews of this raion were massacred together with the Jews of Slavuta.

In 1939, then, more than 8,600 Jews lived in Slavuta and the surrounding area. After Nazi Germany attacked the USSR on June 22, 1941, several hundred Jewish men were drafted into or volunteered for the Red Army, and several hundred more Jews were able to evacuate to the eastern regions of the Soviet Union. As German forces occupied the Slavuta area only two weeks after the start of the war, the majority of Jews were unable to escape. Approximately 8,000 Jews remained in Slavuta at the start of the occupation.

Units of the German army occupied Slavuta in early July 1941. In July and August 1941, the town was governed by a series of German military commandant’s offices (Ortskommandanturen), which formed a local administration and an auxiliary police force recruited from local citizens. In September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Slavuta became a Rayon center in Gebiet Schepetowka. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsassessor Worbs, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Richard Höse.¹ The Ukrainian police and Gendarmerie posts were under his command, including the Gendarmerie posts in Slavuta and Berezdov. In the summer of 1942, Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Mohngach replaced Höse.

Gebiet Schepetowka was part of Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. SA-Obergruppenführer Heinrich Schöne served as the Generalkommissar and the immediate superior of Worbs. Höse was subordinated to the Kommandeur der Gendarmerie (KdG) in the region, Major der Gendarmerie Rohse.

On July 28–30, 1941, the 1st SS-Motorized Infantry Brigade swept through Rayon Slawuta. This unit shot several dozen Jews altogether in various villages of the Rayon, ostensibly for supporting the Bolshevik system.

From August 15 until September 3, 1941, the 2nd Company of the 45th Reserve Police Battalion was located in Slavuta; the company commander was Oberleutnant der Polizei and SS-Obersturmführer Engelbert Kreuzer.² This company conducted several Aktions in Slavuta: on August 18, they shot 322 Jews; on August 29, they shot 65 Jews; and on August 30, they shot 911 Jews—making a total of 1,298 Jewish victims.³

In August 1941, shootings of Jews, conducted primarily by the 45th Reserve Police Battalion (commanded by Major der Polizei and SS-Sturmbannführer Martin Besser), also took place in Berezdov (152 people),⁴ in Annopol’ (over 100 people),⁵ and in Kilikiev (several dozen people).⁶ In Krasnostav (Rayon Beresdow), almost all of the Jews were murdered (approximately 800 people).⁷ Altogether, about 2,500 Jews were killed in Slavuta and the surrounding area in the summer of 1941.

On March 1, 1942, a ghetto was established in Slavuta; it was surrounded with barbed wire and guarded by Ukrainian policemen. Besides Jews resident in the town, Jews from the Slawuta and Beresdow Rayons were also brought into the ghetto. For example, on March 2, 1942, Jews from Annopol’ (Rayon Slawuta) were driven into the ghetto, while the elderly and handicapped were selected out and shot immediately.⁸ On March 4, 1942, the remaining 175 Jews of Krasnostav were brought to the Slavuta ghetto via Berezdov.⁹ Jews from

1470 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

Kilikiev were not transferred to Slavuta, and approximately 150 of them were shot near the village in early 1942.¹⁰

Some 500 Jews from the Slavuta ghetto were sent to work in Berezdov and Pechivody in March 1942. Of this number, several dozen people died of hunger and illness or were shot for being unable to work. The remaining Jews were returned to the Slavuta ghetto in late June 1942, and those who were too emaciated to walk back were shot on the way. For example, 7 Jews were killed near the village of Zhukov.¹¹

The Slavuta ghetto was liquidated on June 25, 1942. On this day, a squad of Security Police and SD men, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, shot the majority of the Jews in a deep hollow near the water tower on the edge of town; approximately 300 children were drowned in a well in the ghetto.¹² On June 25, 1942, a total of about 5,000 Jews were killed. Only Jewish craftsmen and their families (several hundred people) were temporarily spared; they were shot in September 1942.

On August 5, 1971, the regional court in Regensburg (Germany) sentenced the former commander of the 2nd Company of the 45th Reserve Police Battalion, Kreuzer, to seven years' imprisonment. The court refrained from punishing the former commander of the 45th Police Battalion, Besser, taking into consideration his advanced age (in 1971, Besser was 79 years old) and poor health.

SOURCES The author published several documents regarding the annihilation of Slavuta Jews in August of 1941; see A. Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), pp. 239, 246, 247, 291.

Documents and the testimonies regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Slavuta can be found in the following archives: BA-L; GARF (7021-64-794 and 814); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. For extracts of the indictment issued on February 2, 1970, by the Sta. Regensburg against the defendants Rosenbauer, Besser, and Kreuzer, see Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov, p. 290.

3. Telegrams nos. 113 and 208 sent by HSSPF Russland Süd on August 19, 1941, and August 30, 1941, and radiogram no. 56 of August 31, 1941, published in Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov, pp. 239, 246–247.

4. GARF, 7021-64-794, p. 84. The shooting took place on August 10, 1941.

5. See the testimony of Sofia Iosifovna Malinskaia (September 1994), published in D. Hoshkis, ed., Nezaboena rana (Slavuta, Netyshin, and Iziaslav, 1996), pp. 48–50.

6. Ibid., p. 81.

7. Zverstva nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatchikov: Dokumenty. Vypusk 13. (Moscow, 1945), p. 35. At this place, 47 Jewish men were shot on August 7 and about 700 Jews on August 28–29, 1941.

8. See the testimony of Malinskaia (September 1994). In Annopol', by November 1941, the Jews from the surrounding villages (Dolzhki, Klepachi, Velikii Sknit, Golovli) had been concentrated and resettled on one street there together with the local Jews.

9. Zverstva nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatchikov, p. 35.

10. Hoshkis, Nezaboena rana, pp. 81–82.

11. See the testimony of Malinskaia (September 1994).

12. Hoshkis, Nezaboena rana, pp. 6, 50.

SMOTRICH

Pre-1941: Smotrich, town (PGT) and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Smotritsch, Rayon center, Gebiet Kamenez-Podolsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Smotrych, Dunaivtsi raion, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Smotrich is located about 30 kilometers (19 miles) north of Kamenets-Podolskii. In 1939, the Jewish population of Smotrich was 1,075, 18.5 percent of the total. In addition, there were another 1,227 Jews living in the other villages and settlements of the Smotrich raion. At this time 1,139 Jews were living in nearby Chemerovtsy, and another 1,204 Jews in the rest of the Chemerovtsy raion.

German forces occupied Smotrich on July 8, 1941. In the first two and a half weeks after the start of the invasion on June 22, a number of Jews were able to flee or were evacuated to the east. During the first days of the occupation, German security forces killed 40 Jews. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the village; it appointed a local authority and organized an auxiliary police force. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Smotrich became the center of Rayon Smotritsch in Gebiet Kamenez-Podolsk, which in turn was part of Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.

At some time before June 1942, probably in the fall of 1941, the German authorities established a separate Jewish residential area (an open ghetto) in Smotrich. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, the area was not separated by a fence, but its borders were marked and the Jews were prohibited from crossing them.¹

Under the German occupation, some of the Jews of Smotrich were forced to work at the train station close to Balin, loading and unloading cargo trains. In winter they were assigned the task of clearing snow, both at the train station and from the highways. Other assignments included cleaning the horse stables belonging to the Gendarmerie, cleaning the police station and also the Gendarmerie headquarters, cleaning shoes, and doing the laundry for the Germans. A specially assigned Jewish boy had to bring milk for the Germans from the village of Balin, which lay 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) away from the Balin train station. None of the Jewish forced laborers received any payment for this work. The half-starved Jews assigned to work outside the ghetto had to walk up to 9 kilometers (5.6 miles) to their workplace and then work for the entire day. Those who were exhausted and could not keep up with the pace of work ordered by the guards were severely beaten. For a handful of dry peas, a rotten potato, or anything else that could at least partially still their hunger, the Jews ran the risk of being brutally beaten. If they were caught stealing food, their community also had to pay a fine for the “theft” either in cash or in food to compensate for the “losses incurred by the Germans.” The Jewish community of Smotrich was once forced to pay a large fine in gold to put an end to the beatings of one of its members, so the Jews had to surrender their wedding rings, jewelry, and even pre-1917 gold coins.²

At some time in the summer of 1942, probably in late July or early August, the remaining Jews in the Smotrich ghetto, together with the Jews of Chemerovtsy, were transferred to Kamenets-Podolskii. Semjon Waisblei, a survivor from Chemerovtsy, spent one night in Smotrich on his way to Kamenets-Podolskii. It is possible there was also an open ghetto in Chemerovtsy, but Waisblei does not mention this. He states that on arrival in Kamenets-Podolskii, he was among about 20 or 30 Jews who were placed in the ghetto there, from which he escaped about three months later, when children of his age started to be killed.³

In Kamenets-Podolskii, most of the Jews brought there from Smotrich and Chemerovtsy were shot on August 11, 1942, by members of the Security Police and SD outpost (Sipo/SD Aussendienststelle Kamenez-Podolsk). According to the report sent to the Commanding Officer of the of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Równe, Dr. Pütz, 813 Jews were shot in total.⁴

It is estimated that during the entire period of the occupation, about 670 Jews from Smotrich were murdered.

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews of Smotrich during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukraïnskogo evreïstva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 290; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1205.

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Smotrich can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-799); IPN; and USHMM.

Martin Dean
trans. Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-22.002M, reel 2 (GARF, 7021-64-799, pp. 98–116), Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report for Kamenets-Podolskii.

2. Ibid.

3. Boris Zabarko, ed., “Nur wir haben überlebt”: Holocaust in Ukraine—Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004), p. 428.

4. IPN, GKSZpNP, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, pp. 5–6, report of Sipo u. SD Aussenstelle Kamenez-Podolsk to KdS Rowno, August 13, 1942.

SNITKOV

Pre-1941: Snitkov, village, Murovannye Kurilovtsy raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukraine; 1941–1944: Snitkoff, Rayon Murovanny Kurilowzy, Gebiet Bar, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Snitkyv, Murovani Kurylivtsi raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Snitkov is located 82 kilometers (51 miles) southwest of Vinnitsa. According to the 1926 census, there were 1,181 Jews living in Snitkov. The Jewish population decreased significantly in the 1930s, owing to the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933 and the resettlement of Jews to other areas.

After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, there was no organized evacuation from Snitkov, but some Jews were able to escape to the east. Men of eligible age were drafted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. About 500 Jews remained in the village at the start of the German occupation.

Snitkov was occupied on July 19, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village, and it appointed a village elder (starosta) and set up a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. In September 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. The village was incorporated into Rayon Murowanny Kurilowzy, in Gebiet Bar, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the German military authorities appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat), consisting of 12 people, which was headed by a Jewish elder. Then one day a force of 25 Germans (or possibly Hungarian soldiers) arrived and conducted a roundup, taking a number of Jews as hostages. These Jews were only released once a large monetary “contribution” had been raised. This procedure was repeated shortly afterwards by the Germans, this time to induce the Jews to surrender all their gold and silver items and any other precious metals, such as copper.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, Jews in the village, as elsewhere in Ukraine, were subject to persecution through the implementation of a number of anti-Jewish policies. The Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing marks initially in the form of a white armband bearing a blue Star of David and later in the form of yellow patches on their chests and backs.² They were forced into heavy labor, mostly without pay, and forbidden to leave the village. Young Jewish women were rounded up and held in the police station overnight, where they were beaten and raped by both German and Ukrainian police.³ Forced labor tasks performed by the Jews included cleaning the streets, carrying water and wood, washing horses, and performing odd jobs for the commandant.

At some time in the fall of 1941 or the spring of 1942, a ghetto, or “Jewish residential district,” was created in the village. All the Jews were concentrated on one side of Snitkov, away from the school building, where the Germans were based. The ghetto included the center of the village. It was guarded by Ukrainian police, but the Jews continued to barter their remaining possessions to obtain food from the local peasants. One survivor states that Jews were permitted to leave the ghetto for just one hour each day, which was when the bartering took place. Another, however, describes how food was passed through a wire fence, but this is not corroborated by other accounts.⁴

From early 1942 onward, a group of Jews from Snitkov was taken to the labor camp in Letichev, where they were put to work doing road construction and repair.⁵ Other Jews arrived in the Snitkov ghetto, including dozens of Jewish families from Bessarabia, who moved in to live with the local Jews.

The ghetto was liquidated on August 20, 1942, when the Jewish population was resettled into the ghetto in Murovannye Kurilovtsy. Children and the elderly were transported by horse and cart, and people were instructed to take enough food for two days. On arrival they were forced into a few buildings, each holding 50 or 60 people.⁶ The Murovannye Kurilovtsy ghetto was liquidated the next day, when the majority of the Jews, including those from Snitkov, were shot and killed.⁷ On the evening before the shooting, about 300 able-bodied Jews were selected out, including some from Snitkov. These Jews were employed to clean up clothing from the Jews who had been shot and to work at a tobacco factory for another few weeks, before they too were shot. During this period some Ukrainian inhabitants of Snitkov came to Murovannye Kurilovtsy to see if any of their Jewish friends were among those who had survived. Everyone knew about the massacre of the Jews, and people reported that the earth on top of the graves continued to move for at least three days.⁸

A few Jews from the Snitkov ghetto survived by escaping across into the Romanian-occupied zone, some paying bribes to be transferred to the Kopaigorod ghetto from the remnant ghetto in Murovannye Kurilovtsy.⁹

SOURCES The Snitkov ghetto is mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Gbetos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 41; and in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1207.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Snitkov can be found in these archives: DAVINO (R 6023-4-28506); GARF (7021-54-1244); VHF (# 8775, 24924, 26687, 34310, 38930, 47296); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel and Tatyana Feith

NOTES

1. VHF, # 34310, testimony of Dina Bril; # 8775, testimony of Dina Bortsukhovich; # 26687, testimony of Israel Kats.

2. Ibid., # 26687.

3. Ibid., # 8775; # 26687; # 38930, testimony of Iakov Ronshtein.

4. Ibid., # 26687; # 24924, testimony of Maiia Gol'tsman; # 34310.

5. Ibid., # 34310.

6. Ibid.

7. GARF, 7021-54-1244, p. 3. During this Aktion, 1,170 Jews were shot. This figure includes the Jews of Murovannye Kurilovtsy, Snitkov, and possibly some other nearby locations.

8. VHF, # 34310.

9. Ibid., # 47926, testimony of Riva Goikhman.

STARAIA SINIAVA

Pre-1941: Staraia Siniava, town (PGT), raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Staraja Sinjawa, Rayon center, Gebiet Starokonstantinow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Staraia Siniava, raion center, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Staraia Siniava is located 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) northeast of Khmel'nitskii. According to the 1939 census, 1,237 Jews were living in Staraia Siniava (27.3 percent of the total population). An additional 605 Jews lived in the villages of what was then the Staraia Siniava raion.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the town on July 9, 1941. In the two and a half weeks since the start of the German invasion on June 22, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Some Jewish men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 1,000 Jews remained in Staraia Siniava at the start of the occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military administration ran the settlement. The military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) appointed a local authority and formed a Ukrainian auxiliary police unit. In September 1941, authority was transferred to the German civilian administration. Staraia Siniava became a Rayon center in Gebiet Starokonstantinow. Regierungsrat Schröder became the first Gebietskommissar, and he was replaced later by SA-Standartenführer Curt Rolle. In the spring of 1942, Leutnant der Gendarmerie Otto Gent became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer. The Ukrainian police and Gendarmerie posts were subordinated to him, including the Gendarmerie post in Staraia Siniava.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures was implemented in Staraia Siniava. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created. Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing marks: at first, an armband with a Star of David; later, a yellow patch. They were compelled to perform heavy labor without pay. They were not permitted to leave the boundaries of the settlement. Finally, they were subjected to systematic robbery and assault by the Ukrainian police.

On August 19, 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in Staraia Siniava and in the neighboring village of Piliava. The Stabskompanie (headquarters company) of the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) Russland-Süd, SS-Obergruppenführer Jeckeln, shot 511 Jews.¹ The mass shooting took place in a ditch near a sugar refinery. Jeckeln personally directed the shooting.

At the end of 1941 or the start of 1942, a ghetto was created in the town. It was liquidated on July 23, 1942. On that day, the Jews of Staraia Siniava and the villages of Rayon Staraja Sinjawa, about 1,000 people in all, were driven forcibly to the Starokonstantinov ghetto and subsequently shot there.² At a later date, the Ukrainian police caught 80 Jews who had hidden in various places around Staraia Siniava and shot them near the sugar refinery.³

According to a survivor from Ostropol', Anna Nasarchuk, the Jews of Staraia Siniava were confined in the Starokonstantinov ghetto for several months together with other Jews from the Gebiet, before being killed when the ghetto was liquidated at the end of November 1942.⁴

SOURCES Documentation regarding the destruction of the Jews of Staraia Siniava can be found in these archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-816); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. This telegram from the HSSPF Russland-Süd, no. 120, dated August 20, 1941, can be found in VHAP, "Headquarters of the Command of the Reichsführer SS." The telegram is reprinted in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), p. 240. See also BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 86 of September 17, 1941, and GARF, 7021-64-816, p. 21. There were 300 Jews from Staraia Siniava who were shot, and 186 Jews from Piliava. The remaining 25 victims were likely from the village of Novaia Siniava.

2. "Staraia Siniava," in V. Lukin and B. Khaimovich, eds., 100 evreiskikh mestechek Ukrainy: Istoricheskii putevoditel': Vyypusk 1. Podoliia (Jerusalem and St. Petersburg, 1998), p. 224.

3. GARF, 7021-64-7021, p. 21.

4. BA-L, B 162, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, pp. 328–340, statement of Anna Nasarchuk, March 28, 1973.

STARAIA USHITSA

Pre-1941: Staraia Ushitsa, village and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Staraja-Ushchiza, Rayon center, Gebiet Kamenez-Podolsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Stara Ushytsia, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Staraia Ushitsa is located about 48 kilometers (30 miles) east of Kamenets-Podolskii. In 1939, there were 753 Jews living in Staraia Ushitsa and an additional 354 Jews residing elsewhere in the Staraia Ushitsa raion, mostly in the village of Studenitsa.

Staraia Ushitsa came under German occupation in the summer of 1941, and the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures. They registered the Jews, required them to wear distinguishing markings, and prohibited them from leaving the limits of the village. The Jews were also required to perform forced labor.

Portrait of Ukrainian rescuer Piotr Gutzol and his wife, Anna Berman. Gutzol helped Berman escape the massacre of Staraia Ushitsa's Jews in 1942 and was honored by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations in 1994.

USHMM WS #57656, COURTESY OF JFR

At some time before July 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto in Staraia Ushitsa. According to research conducted by Yad Vashem to honor the Righteous Among the Nations, a young non-Jew named Piotr Gutzol often brought food into the ghetto to help a young Jewish woman named Anna Berman. He offered to help her to escape, but at this time she was too scared.¹

On July 23, 1942, the German and Ukrainian police conducted an Aktion against the Jews in the Staraia Ushitsa ghetto. According to a former local policeman (Schutzmann), by then the Jewish population of Staraia Ushitsa had been ghettoized or at least collected together in a specific quarter of the village (an open ghetto). The Aktion was carried out with the participation of the head of the SD, the head of the Gendarmerie, Leutnant Reich, deputy Gebietskommissar Peters, German Gendarmes, and local Ukrainian policemen. The head of the Judenrat had to announce to the Jews that they were to gather at the square. Family members carried the sick and the old. Some people who did not move fast enough were beaten half-conscious, causing panic and weeping among those at the square. Men and women were separated, and all were forced to sit on the ground in silence. The head of the SD announced that the Jews would be taken to Kamenets-Podolskii, and some women were allowed to return home to collect some clothes, as they had left their houses without time to dress properly.

The German and Ukrainian police searched the flats, attics, and basements for Jews in hiding, discovering quite a few, mainly men, hiding in chimneys, in between double ceilings, in cellars dug specifically for the purpose, with stacks of food and clothing in them, in barns, and in heaps of manure. Those discovered were beaten, and some were shot. Along with the Germans, who zealously hunted down the Jews, the local policemen were instrumental in identifying Jewish homes and possible hiding places, as well as exposing Jews (especially those in mixed marriages) trying to pass as non-Jews. Regardless of their religious affiliation (being raised as Christians or atheists) or personal circumstances (marriages with non-Jews), everybody who had a Jewish relative up to the third generation was automatically considered Jewish and thus subjected to the same fate as the others. After all the Jews were brought to the square, the “specialists” among them—such as carpenters, tailors, and shoemakers—were told to take their tools and equipment with them and, together with their families, were escorted to Kamenets-Podolskii. The rest, approximately 300 to 320 people, were put in columns of 3, men first followed by women, with the carts carrying the sick and the old, and were taken down the old road from Staraiia Ushitsa to Kamenets-Podolskii. As they marched, the head of the Gendarmerie ordered the Jews of Studenitsa (80 to 100 people) to be brought to join the Jews of Staraiia Ushitsa.

Although the Germans kept assuring the column of the marching Jews that they were all being taken to Kamenets-Podolskii, the children and women started to weep as soon as they left the village. When the group turned towards the pit, the Jews recognized their fate and wept bitterly. Some people prayed, and children begged their parents to carry them in their arms; in response the Germans and local police beat and cursed them. The doomed people started to throw away any valuables, such as rings, watches, photographs, and letters. They tore up money, denying it to their tormentors. The pit measuring 12 by 6 meters and 1.5 meters deep (about 39 by 20 by 5 feet), had been dug by local peasants on the orders of Rayonchef Belokon'. During the shooting, the peasants were removed from the scene to prevent them from watching.

The Jews were ordered to undress and enter the pit in groups of five. The Germans, the Ukrainian police, and other locals who participated pushed the Jews into the pits, beating those who resisted. They were then forced to lie on the bottom of the pit, with their faces down, and were shot in the nape of the neck. The next group had to lie on top of the corpses, and they were shot in turn. A German official kept count of those murdered, making a checkmark for each group of five or more, in case a larger family refused to be separated and were shot together.

After the shooting the peasants who had dug the pit were ordered to fill in the mass grave. The Schutzmannen searched the clothing of the murdered Jews for valuables, which were sometimes sewn into the lining or hidden inside belts. Some items were taken by the Germans to be sent home as presents, given to local prostitutes in payment, or sold to the local population.²

The Jews of Studenitsa were murdered at the same time as those of Staraiia Ushitsa. Estimates of the number of Jews killed vary from around 400 up to 700. The Jewish craftsmen and their families were transferred at this time to the ghetto in Kamenets-Podolskii.³ After the Aktion, local policemen and other local inhabitants looted the Jewish houses. When Piotr Gutzol found the ghetto empty, he went to Kamenets-Podolskii and managed to get Anna Berman out of the ghetto there with the help of fake identity papers. Then they went to live in a small village where nobody knew them until the Red Army liberated the area in 1944. Most of the other Jews transferred to Kamenets-Podolskii were murdered there between August 1942 and the spring of 1943.

SOURCES Mention of the existence of a ghetto in Staraiia Ushitsa can be found in Il'ja Al'tmann, Opfer des Hasses: Der Holocaust in der UdSSR 1941–1945 (Zurich: Gleichen, 2008), p. 109.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Staraiia Ushitsa can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-799 and 816); NA (HW 16/6); USHMM (RG-22.002M); YIU (no. 683); and YVA (M.31).

Martin Dean
trans. Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. See www.jfr.org. After the war Piotr and Anna were married. Piotr Gutzol was honored by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations in 1994.
2. USHMM, RG-22.002M, reel 2 (GARF, 7021-64-799, pp. 98–116), ChGK report for Kamenets-Podolskii.
3. Ibid.; NA, HW 16/6, Radiogram of the SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer in Kamenez-Podolsk, summary for the period July 1, 1942–July 31, 1942, p. 5, as cited by Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005), p. 92.

STAROKONSTANTINOV

Pre-1941: Starokonstantinov, town and raion center, Khmel'nytskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Starokonstantinov, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Starokostiantyniv, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Starokonstantinov is located 107 kilometers (66 miles) northwest of Vinnitsa. According to the January 1939 census, the Jewish population stood at 6,743 people; Jews accounted for 31 percent of the total population.

After Nazi Germany attacked the USSR on June 22, 1941, some Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for the Red Army, and other Jews were able to evacuate to the eastern regions of the Soviet Union. Thus, about 6,000 Jews remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Starokonstantinov on July 8, 1941. In July and August 1941, a series of local military commandant's offices (Ortskommandanturen) governed the town and formed a local administration and an auxiliary police force recruited from among local inhabitants. In September 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Starokonstantinov became the administrative center of the Gebiet, which also included Rayons Ostropol, Staraja Sinjawa, Polonnoje, and Grizew. In total, the Gebiet included some 200,000 inhabitants and 196 collective farms. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Schröder, who was later replaced by SA-Standartenführer Curt Rolle. The Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer from the spring of 1942 on was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Otto Gent.¹ The Ukrainian police and Gendarmerie posts were under his command.

In May 1942, an outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) was created in Starokonstantinov, headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Graf. This outpost carried out anti-Jewish Aktions in 1942 in the Gebiet Starokonstantinov and also in adjacent Gebiete. Graf received orders to carry out such Aktions from the Kommandeur der Sipo und SD (KdS) in Równe, SS-Sturmbannführer Dr. Pütz.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Starokonstantinov. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formed; Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (initially, an armband with a Star of David; later, a yellow circle sewn onto the front and back of their clothing); they were compelled to engage in forced labor; and they were forbidden to use the sidewalks.

In July 1941, soon after the occupation of the town, 20 Jews were shot.² On August 3, another Aktion took place. On this day, four companies of SS-Infanterie-Regiment 8, SS-Panzergranadier-Brigade 1, arrested 1,404 Jews (812 women and 592 men) in the town, of whom 489 (302 men and 187 women) were shot. The remaining Jews were divided up into several groups for forced labor.³ The supposed pretext for this “reprisal” Aktion is described in Einsatzgruppen report no. 59:

In Starokonstantinov . . . Jews were engaged in cleaning the barracks. Since Jews had not been reporting to work recently, the military units already were forced to round up the Jewish work force early in the morning. While working, the Jews behaved impudently and even refused to work. Of the approximately 1,000 Jews engaged in field labor, only 70 showed up to work on the following day. Furthermore, acts of sabotage on the harvesting machines were discovered. The Judenrat even spread rumors about a Russian offensive, which the Jews immediately used as a pretext to publicly threaten and curse Ukrainians.⁴

According to the account of a Jewish survivor, however, about 1,100 Jewish men and women were ordered to assemble and then transported out to the barracks. Here they were assigned to various work tasks, and those who were sick (including some who hoped to avoid work by feigning ill health) were loaded onto 18 trucks and taken away. Subsequently it was learned that these people were shot in the Novitskii Forest.⁵

Two weeks later, on August 18, 1941, approximately 150 more young Jewish men and women were shot in the Novitskii Forest.⁶ Another anti-Jewish Aktion took place in the town on September 2, 1941. On this day, Police Battalion 304, which was in the town from August 21 through September 4, captured and shot at least 500 Jews.⁷

In the fall of 1941, probably in late September or early October, a ghetto holding about 5,000 people was established in the town. This first ghetto consisted of a group of houses surrounded by barbed wire, guarded by the local police. It was located behind Middle School no. 8 and extended back to the Ikopot River. Conditions in the ghetto were very crowded: people had to sleep on the floor in rows. Ghetto inmates received little food. Only craftsmen were permitted to leave the ghetto, wearing a black stripe across their yellow circles to denote this privilege.⁸

At the beginning of 1942, the ghetto was moved to the district along Iziaslav Street, on the road to Shepetovka, not far from the Novitskii Forest. Here there were a few old Jewish houses and some barracks. The new ghetto had about three times the area of the old ghetto; however, conditions deteriorated, as inmates received no food or heating materials. The unsanitary conditions caused disease to spread. A Russian woman who had close relatives there smuggled some medical supplies into the ghetto. The new ghetto was also more closely guarded, making it harder for the Jews to barter illegally. On the inside, there was a Jewish police force that wore armbands and carried clubs. Outside, the barbed-wire fence was guarded by the Ukrainian police.⁹

Just before May 20, 1942, the Germans demanded from the Judenrat payment of a “war tax” of about 10 kilograms (22 pounds) of gold and 30 kilograms (66 pounds) of silver.¹⁰ Then, also on May 20, 1942, another Aktion was carried out. A team of the Sipo and SD under the leadership of SS-Hauptscharführer Graf, aided by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, shot most of the Jews from the ghetto, as well as some of the Jews who were brought into Starokonstantinov from the surrounding Rayons at that time. Approximately 6,500 people were murdered on this day. The Jews were driven to the “red barracks” near the Machine Tractor Station (MTS), where a ditch had been dug. Skilled craftsmen and their families were separated and returned to the town (some lived outside the ghetto), and the remaining Jews were forced to lie down in groups of 10 in the ditch, where Graf and another SS man, Werner, shot them with submachine guns.¹¹

At the time of the May 20 Aktion, Jews from the surrounding Rayons of Grizew, Ostropol, Staraja Sinjawa, and Polonnoje were brought into the ghetto. A Jewish survivor, Anna Nasarchuk, recalls arriving in the empty ghetto with about 400 others from Ostropol’ just after the previous inmates had been shot. The German official in the ghetto, Hedrich, warned them that the others had been killed for refusing to work and carry out German instructions. No water was available in the ghetto, and people were permitted to fetch it from the river only once a day. Nasarchuk was made to work cleaning the German barracks. The guards mistreated the ghetto inmates, and on one occasion German soldiers raped two young Jewish girls.

Over the summer there were frequent shootings of Jews from the ghetto in the nearby Novitskii Forest. In the weeks before the ghetto’s final liquidation, the Jews were assembled regularly on Sundays at the Zhdanov kolkhoz, where a few people were killed publicly as a warning. One Sunday, for example, 11 alleged saboteurs, all non-Jews, were hanged along with one Jew who had failed to report for the assembly.¹²

At the end of November 1942, the ghetto was completely liquidated. On this day, all the Jews in the ghetto were escorted to a field near the Novitskii Forest. The Jews were then led in groups of 10 to a ditch 300 meters (328 yards) away. They were forced to undress and lie down in the ditch, and then German and Ukrainian policemen shot them with carbines and submachine guns. The shooting was supervised by Graf. The Ukrainian Schutzmannschaftsbataillon 101 also took part in the operation, and its members, on the orders of the battalion commander Hauptmann Paul Salitter, cordoned off the execution site.¹³ Approximately 4,000 people were shot during this Aktion.¹⁴

At the killing site, Anna Nasarchuk recognized another Jewish woman from her village of Chishniki who was trying to flee, but the cordon guards shot her. Anna subsequently fell into the grave unconscious, not seriously wounded. After dark she escaped with her child, and she was even helped by a local Ukrainian policeman, whom she convinced that she was not Jewish and had been arrested by mistake.¹⁵

Altogether, some 11,000 Jews were killed in Starokonstantinov during the years of 1941 and 1942.

The commander of the 8th SS-Infantry Regiment, SS-Standartenführer Hans-Wilhelm Sacks, the commander of the 1st battalion of this regiment, SS-Sturmabführer Hermann Schleifenbaum, and the commander of the 2nd battalion of this regiment, SS-Obersturmbannführer Erwin Tzschoppe, were primarily responsible for the Aktion of August 3, 1941. Sacks was fatally wounded in battle on August 19, 1941; Schleifenbaum died on August 30, 1943. The investigation in Germany regarding Tzschoppe was terminated following his death on August 21, 1972.

In the 1970s, in the former German Democratic Republic (GDR), several former policemen of the 304th Police Battalion who participated in the murder of over 500 Jews in Starokonstantinov in early September 1941 were found guilty and sentenced. SS-Hauptscharführer Graf, who was primarily responsible for the annihilation of the town's Jews in 1942, died in Germany on November 19, 1953.

SOURCES A brief article on the annihilation of the Jews of Starokonstantinov can be found in Podillia u Velykii Vimchyzniani viini (1941–1945 rr.). Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (L'viv, 1969), pp. 75–77.

Documentation regarding the murder of the Jews of Starokonstantinov can be found in the following archives: BA-L (II 204 AR-Z 441/67 and 442/67); DAKhO; GARF (7021-64); YVA (M-33); and ZSSSt-D (45 Js 20/73).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; BA-

L, II 204 AR-Z 441/67, Abschlussbericht, March 20, 1973. Gent died on April 11, 1956.

2. ZSSSt-D, 45 Js 20/73, concluding report (Abschlussverfügung), August 10, 1976.

3. See the report of the 1. Mot. SS Brigade dated August 3, 1941, for the period July 30 to August 3, 1941, published in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), p. 232.

4. USHMM, RG-30, Acc.1999.A.0196 (NARA, RG-242, T-175), reel 233, Ereignismeldung UdSSR, no. 59, August 21, 1941. According to the Einsatzgruppen Report, only 438 persons were shot (300 Jewish men and 138 Jewish women).

5. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, Galina M. Bolshovskaia, March 29, 1973.

6. ZSSSt-D, 45 Js 20/73, Abschlussverfügung, August 10, 1976. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report of March 11, 1944, notes that 300 civilians were shot near the Nove Miasto Forest by the Gestapo and SD field units in August 1941 (DAKhO, R683-2-42, pp. 31–34); an English translation is available in A.F. Vysotsky et al., eds., Nazi Crimes in Ukraine, 1941–1944: Documents and Materials (Kiev: Naukova Dumka Publishers, 1987), pp. 134–138.

7. See the verdict of Bezirksgericht Halle, October 26, 1978, concerning three members of Police Battalion 304, extract published in Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov, p. 300.

8. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, pp. 320–327, Aleksandra A. Mysnikova, March 27, 1973.

9. Ibid., Bd. I, pp. 246–250, Nikolai Bugaishchuk, March 28, 1973; pp. 262–266, Iuvenalii Gulenko, March 29, 1973.

10. Ibid., Bd. I, pp. 320–327, Mysnikova, March 27, 1973.

11. ZSSSt-D, 45 Js 20/73, concluding report, August 10, 1976; Aleksandr Kruglov, Entsiklopediia Kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii Sovet Ukrainy, 2000), p. 182.

12. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, pp. 328–340, Anna Nasarchuk, March 28, 1973.

13. ZSSSt-D, 45 Js 20/73, concluding report, August 10, 1976. Most sources give November 28, 1942, as the date of the Aktion, but some date it just before or just after this. The commander of the local Ukrainian police in Starokonstantinov at this time was Kononchuk; see BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, pp. 358–362, Andrei Sagoruiko, March 29, 1973.

14. Podillia u Velykii Vimchyzniani viini (1941–1945 rr.), p. 76.

15. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 442/67, Bd. I, pp. 320–327, Mysnikova, March 27, 1973.

STEPAŃ

Pre-1939: Stepań, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Stepań, Sarny raion, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Stepan, Rayon center, Gebiet Kostopol, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Stepań, Sarny raion, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Stepań is located approximately 60 kilometers (37 miles) north of Równe. According to the census, 1,337 Jews lived in Stepań in 1921. In mid-1941, assuming a natural growth rate of 9 people per 1,000 per year, there would have been some 1,600 Jews in Stepań.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Stepań in July 1941. Before the German infantry arrived, the Luftwaffe bombarded the town, killing several Jews and damaging many houses. In July and August of 1941, the town was governed by a series of German military commandant's offices (Ortskommandanturen). The military confiscated foodstuffs, bicycles, and other items from the Jews but did not treat them harshly. From September 1941, command was transferred to a German civil administration, and Stepań became part of Gebiet Kostopol. The Gebietskommissar was SA-Standartenführer Löhnert, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Wilhelm Wichmann.¹ There was a Gendarmerie post in Stepań, as well as a squad of Ukrainian police. The head of the Gendarmerie post in Stepań from the fall of 1941 was Beckmann; in 1943, he was killed by partisans.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans implemented a number of anti-Jewish measures in Stepań: Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (first, an armband bearing the Star of David and, later, a yellow circle on their clothes); they were compelled to engage in forced labor (e.g., repairing the bridge over the Horyn River); and they were forbidden to leave the town. They were also subjected to systematic robberies and beatings by the Ukrainian police, who supervised them at work. The Ukrainian police chief was named Sasha Krumpf. The Germans harassed the Jews, cutting off the beards of old men. On the orders of the head of the Gendarmerie post, Beckmann, Jews had to surrender all gold and valuables. Later, fur coats, cattle, and horses were confiscated as well. Jews from the surrounding villages were ordered to bring these items to Stepań to hand them over to the Germans.²

In early October 1941, a ghetto was created in the town.³ The ghetto was located in the same district as the synagogue. The ghetto territory was surrounded by a 3-meter-high (9.8-foot-high) wooden fence, the top of which was covered with barbed wire. Another fence divided the ghetto into two parts: the synagogue and the adjacent street were reserved for adult men under the age of 55. The nearby streets were for women, children, and the elderly. A small group of skilled workers was allowed to live outside the ghetto. Not long after the construction of the ghetto, Jews from the surrounding villages—Chorost, Kryczyłsk, Wołosza, Wielke Werbcze, and Kazimirka—were also concentrated there.⁴ Altogether, there were approximately 2,000 Jews in the ghetto.⁵

A Judenrat was placed in charge of the ghetto. The Jews were brought together in the main synagogue and ordered to elect a chairman of the Judenrat. They chose Avraham Guz for this position, and Josef Vaks, who knew German well, as vice-chair. However, Guz stepped down under pressure from Vaks, who then assumed his position. Dodye Guberman was made secretary. A majority of the Jews saw Vaks as arrogant and unsympathetic and resented his leadership. A Jewish police force was organized to carry out the orders of the Judenrat and the Germans. An upper chamber of the synagogue was turned into a jail for Jews who disobeyed the ghetto police.⁶

Among the responsibilities of the Judenrat was the selection of able-bodied men to meet German demands for forced labor. Groups of Jews were sent out of the ghetto daily to work in the vicinity of Stepań and return in the evening. A large number of Jewish males was sent to a labor camp in Kostopol. At regular intervals, they would be returned to the ghetto and replaced by fresh workers.⁷ Peasants could also "rent" Jews to work for them in the fields by paying the Germans a small fee.⁸

The Jews in the ghetto suffered from hunger and severe overcrowding. The daily ration for men consisted of 250 grams (8.8 ounces) of bread and a bowl of soup with potatoes or onion. Women and children received only 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread and the same watery soup. Jews were forbidden to receive any fat, and the commandant of the Rayon even checked the bowls of the Jews to enforce this ban. Nevertheless, the Jews made a concerted effort to maintain public health in the ghetto. There was a hospital with a walk-in clinic run by Drs. Ashkenazi and Zamer. They sent nurses to maintain sanitary conditions and make house calls in the women's ghetto. A refugee from Łódź named Rayzman was in charge of sanitation for the men's ghetto.⁹

In the spring of 1942, the Jews made an effort to celebrate Passover. Local rabbis ruled that matzot could be made out of rye. There were also a series of self-declared prophets, mainly laymen, who pointed to various omens and numerological formulas to prove to their brethren that redemption was on its way.¹⁰

The ghetto was liquidated on the night of August 21, 1942: approximately 50 Jews incapable of marching were killed on the spot, several hundred Jews were able to escape, and the rest of the Jews were driven to Kostopol and shot near the village of Korczewie; on the way to the killing site, another 50 to 60 Jews were killed. As the Jews were taken to the killing site on wagons, many escaped simply by jumping off the wagons and running into the forests. Near Korczewie, approximately 1,500 Jews from Stepań were shot; some Jews were able to flee from the shooting place.¹¹

The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police organized roundups for Jews who had fled, over the course of which several hundred Jews were captured and shot. In particular, one mass shooting of Jews captured during the roundups took place in September 1942 near Kolen'.¹² For informing on Jews, the occupants gave a reward of 1 liter (1 quart) of kerosene, and the punishment for hiding Jews was death. Despite this, several Ukrainian families hid Jews and provided them with produce, thanks to which these Jews were able to survive and lived to see the liberation in January 1944.

According to the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 731 civilians were killed in Rayon Stepan in 1941–1944, including 553 Jews (not counting those Jews who were taken to Kostopol and shot near Korczewie).¹³

SOURCES An article about the annihilation of the Jewish population of Stepań can be found in: Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 145–147. There is also a memoir of the Holocaust period by Moyshe Voshtshina (Michel Woszczyzna): Der mentsh iz shtarker fun ayzn: Mayne yorn unter di Natsis in Ukrayine (Buenos Aires, 1991). The author is a Jew from the nearby village of Korost who was interred in the Stepań ghetto. As well as containing ample information about the ghetto, this memoir provides a rare look into the fate of village Jews in the Third Reich's Occupied Eastern Territories during World War II.

Documents and testimonies regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Stepań can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (see, e.g., the recollections of Mosze Woszczyzna [also available at the USHMM, RG-02.208M, reel 16, no. 107] or 301/1268 and 2363); DARO; GARF (7021-71-71); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Andrew Koss

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; Yehsa'yahu Fri, "Beyn mitsrey avadon ve-shikul," in Ganuz and Fri, eds., Ayartenu Stepan' (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots'e Stepan yeha-servivah be-Yisrael, 1977), pp. 221–222. Also see Y. Fri, "Haftsatsot ha-Germanim ve-hakamat ha-Geto," p. 280; and Meir Grinshpan, "Aharitah shel Stepan," p. 299—both in Ganuz and Fri, Ayartenu Stepan.

2. Fri, "Avadon ve-shikul," pp. 222–225; Grinshpan, "Aharitah," p. 299. Also see Y. Koyfman and Avraham Tekhor, "Hurbana shel kehilat Stepan," p. 274; and Yitshak Vaks, "Beyn hayim le-mavet," p. 286—both in Ganuz and Fri, Ayartenu Stepan. And see Voshtshina, Der mentsh, pp. 51–52, 67.

3. The report of A. Dereczyński, AŽIH 301/1268, gives the date of October 5, 1941, for the establishment of ghettos in all the Rayon centers of Gebiet Kostopol.

4. M. Pinchuk, "Vtecha z pekla," in Tsinoiu vlasnobo zhyttia (Rivne: Uporiadnyk Kyrylo Kindrat, 1995), pp. 187, 191; Fri, "Avadon ve-shikul," pp. 223–226; Koyfman and Tekhor, "Hurbana," p. 274; Fri, "Haftsatsot," p. 280; Voshtshina, Der mentsh, p. 77. Note that according to Voshtshina and a few other sources, the ghetto was not created until January 1942 (see Vaks, "Beyn," p. 286; and Grinshpan, "Aharitah," p. 299).

5. Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 5:145–147, gives the figure of 3,000 Jews inside the ghetto.

6. Fri, "Avadon ve-shikul," p. 224; Koyfman and Tekhor, "Hurbana," p. 275; "Yosef Vaks—Yoshev Rosh ha-Yudenrat be-Geto Stepan," in Ganuz and Fri, Ayartenu Stepan, pp. 300–301; Voshtshina, Der mentsh, pp. 77–78. Note that while Koyfman states that the Judenrat was chosen in August 1941, Voshtshina claims that it was chosen in January 1942, around the time that the Jews were forced into the ghetto. Other accounts from the yizkor book also imply that the Judenrat was selected immediately before or after the establishment of the ghetto.

7. Fri, "Avadon ve-shikul," pp. 224–226.

8. Voshtshina, Der mentsh, p. 82.

9. Ibid., pp. 78–81; Fri, "Avadon ve-shikul," p. 226; AŽIH, 301/1268.

10. Fri, "Avadon ve-shikul," pp. 228, 230; Koyfman and Tekhor, "Hurbana," pp. 274–275.

11. GARF, 7021-71-71, pp. 4, 17–18; Fri, "Avadon ve-shikul," pp. 231–232. Also see Y. Fri, "Sipurey nitsulim" p. 293; and Batya Sheynboym, "Beriha me-malta'ot harotsehim," p. 294—both in Ganuz and Fri, Ayartenu Stepan. Grinshpan, "Aharitah," p. 299, gives the date of the liquidation as August 24.

12. GARF, 7021-71-71, pp. 8, 10; M. Pinchuk, "Tragediia y Stepani," in Tsinoiu vlasnobo zhyttia, p. 96.

13. GARF, 7021-71-71, pp. 1–3.

STOLIN

Pre-1939: Stolin, town and powiat center, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: raion center, Pinsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Bera'stse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Stolin is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) east-southeast of Pińsk. In 1921, 2,966 Jews were living in Stolin (62.4 percent of the town's total population).

The local population greeted the Red Army with joy when it occupied the town in the second half of September 1939. Under Soviet rule, about 20 Jewish families were deported to Siberia. In June 1941, the Jewish population was probably about 5,000, owing to the influx of many Jewish refugees from Poland in the fall of 1939.

Following the German invasion of June 22, 1941, the first German units passed through Stolin on July 12. At this time, local Ukrainians started a pogrom against the Jews, but the intervention of a Jewish Self-Defense force managed to contain the violence. A man named Urbanovich was appointed head of the local militia. His subordinate, Mitior, raped Jewish women repeatedly.¹

On August 10, 1941, forces of the 2nd SS-Cavalry Regiment conducted a mass shooting of Jewish men in the nearby town of Dawidgródek, after which the women and children were driven from the town. Many of these refugees, as well as some from other villages, made their way to Stolin, where the Jewish Council (Judenrat) prevailed on the authorities to permit them to stay.²

On August 22, 1941, the new German Gebietskommissar arrived in Stolin to set up a civil administration. Stolin became the administrative center of Gebiet Stolin, incorporating the Rayons of Dawid-Gorodok and Wysozk, in addition to Stolin itself. SA-Standartenführer Dziembowski was named Gebietskommissar, and his deputy was a man named Stark.³ On his arrival, Dziembowski ordered the Jews to parade and appointed Nathan Bergner, a refugee from Łódź who spoke German, as chairman of the Judenrat. With the assistance of a small Jewish police force, the Judenrat had to pass on and enforce all the German demands and regulations. Immediately, Dziembowski imposed an extensive list of anti-Jewish measures. Jews were ordered to wear the Star of David on their clothing. All Jews over the age of 16 had to perform forced labor. Jews were forbidden to pray in the synagogue, forbidden to eat fat or meat, and prohibited from engaging in conversation with Christian peasants. In addition, a “contribution” of 1 million rubles from the Jews had to be paid within 30 days.⁴

With great effort, the Judenrat managed to raise the contribution within a few days, but shortly afterwards 50 Jews were arrested by the local police as alleged Communists. Most were released after payment of a further ransom, but 2 young Jews were taken out and shot in the Zotishia Forest.

In the fall of 1941, a German Gendarmerie post was established in Stolin, which took over responsibility for the local police (renamed Schutzmannschaft). Wilhelm Wacker served as head of the Gendarmerie post from April 25 to July 4, 1942. In August and September 1942, the 1st Squadron of Polizeireiterabteilung II was stationed in Stolin. Its commander was Oberleutnant der Polizei Heinz-Dieter Teltz. The anti-Jewish Aktions conducted in Gebiet Stolin in the summer and fall of 1942 were coordinated by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Pińsk, which from May to November 1942 was commanded by SS-Sturmscharführer Wilhelm Rasp. In July or August 1942, a Security Police post also was established in Stolin, subordinated to Rasp in Pińsk.

In the spring of 1942, the Gebietskommissar tried deputy police chief Mitior for his abuse of Jewish women and sentenced him to death. Shortly afterwards, the head of the police, Urbanovich, was killed by Soviet partisans on his way back from Pińsk. The Jews feared a terrible reprisal, as the Gebietskommissar took a roll call under the watchful eye of the German and Ukrainian police to see whether any Jews had joined the partisans. Since none were missing, the Gebietskommissar took other measures to restrain the Jews instead.⁵

In May 1942 (on the eve of the Shavuot holiday), Gebietskommissar Dziembowski ordered the Jews to move into a ghetto, which was surrounded by a tall barbed-wire fence. They were joined by Jews from the neighboring villages, raising the total population to around 7,000. The ghetto area, enclosed on one side by the Bank River, consisted of America Street, part of Kotsushki Street on both sides as far as the house of Rabbi Ephraim Tessler, and also Burkan Street and both sides of Dąbrowski Street. Jews were permitted to bring with them only what they could carry in their arms.⁶ Living conditions were poor, with the inhabitants receiving a daily ration of only 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread. Typhus, dysentery, and diphtheria were rife.⁷ The ghetto was closely guarded, and the Jews who worked outside could bring nothing in or out. As one survivor recalled, “[T]he death rate reached 12 per day. Many times I saw how a mother threw a wrapped bundle—a child—on the wagon. People were swollen, deformed.” Jews were also forced to pay a poll tax of 10 rubles per month.⁸

By early September, news reached Stolin of the liquidation of the Dąbrowica ghetto nearby. Rebbe Moyshelch Perlov tried to raise people’s spirits, exclaiming with complete faith, “Jews, we will once more merit the defeat of Amalek and imminent salvation!” (Amalek is a biblical figure who led his army to attack the Jews [Exodus 17:8–16]. Yizkor books frequently use the term Amalek [or Amalekite] to refer to Adolf Hitler or the Nazis, and the comparison is still made today.) One Jewish survivor made a memorable visit to the Rebbe on the eve of the Aktion. SS guards and Ukrainian policemen were already positioned around the ghetto. “Suddenly, the Rebbe raised both his hands in the air and called out with great feeling, ‘Our Father, our King, have pity on us and our children’ [a line from the prayer ‘Avinu Malkeinu’ (‘Our Father, Our King’), traditionally said on the High Holidays and during times of extreme crisis], and burst into bitter tears.”⁹

The Germans liquidated the Stolin ghetto on September 11, 1942. Just prior to the Aktion, the Gebietskommissar summoned the Judenrat. He had them arrested, and they were taken out and shot, becoming the first victims. Perhaps as a result, plans for resistance within the ghetto were not realized. On September 10, a detachment of the Security Police commanded by Rasp arrived from Pińsk. During the night, men of the 1st Squadron of Polizeireiterabteilung II and the Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto. Then at 4:30 A.M., about 6,000 Jews were driven into the marketplace in front of the ghetto. Those unable to walk were shot in their beds.¹⁰ A doctor, a dentist, and about 10 artisans were released, as their work was still required. The Germans and their collaborators then marched the Jews in groups under close escort to a wooded area 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) northeast of town, where the SD men Petsch, Balbach, Dohmen, and Kotschi shot them in a large trench. The clothes of the Jews were collected in a pile to one side of the ditch.¹¹

The next day, the Germans searched the ghetto, looking for Jews in hiding. They shot those they found.¹² Very few Jews managed to escape from the ghetto and survive with the partisans until the Red Army recaptured the area in 1944.

Wilhelm Rasp committed suicide in West Germany in the early 1960s while under investigation for war crimes. Adolf Petsch and Heinz-Dieter Teltz were sentenced to 15 years and to 3 years and 6 months in prison, respectively. Dohmen died not long after the war. The fates of Balbach and Kotschi remain unknown.¹³

SOURCES Articles about the Jewish community of Stolin and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in these publications: Avatihi ve-Y. Ben-Zakai, ed., Stolin: Sefer-zikaron li-kehillat Stolin veba-sevivah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yotse Stolin veba-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1952); Havah nizakherab: Tseror zikbronot u-firke havai ‘al ‘ayaratenu Stolin/mesupar ‘al yede Pinbas Doron (Dorts’in) (Jerusalem: P. Doron and Z. Blizovski, 1960); and “Stolin,” in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesia (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 271–273.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Stolin can be found in the following archives: AŻIH; BA-L (B 162/4966); GABO; GARF (7021-71-70); USHMM; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel and Andrew Koss

NOTES

1. Shamaï Tukel, "The Liquidation of the Stolin Community," in Ben-Zakai, Stolin: Sefer-zikaron.
2. Ibid.
3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
4. Tukel, "The Liquidation of the Stolin Community."
5. Ibid.
6. Second letter to Detroit from Michael Nosantchuk, January 15, 1946, published in The Forward, by Yakov Nosantchuk of Detroit; and Tukel, "The Liquidation of the Stolin Community."
7. BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z, 393/59 (Ghetto Liquidation in Pińsk), p. 2528, statement of Willi Leister, August 20, 1964.
8. Second letter to Detroit from Michael Nosantchuk, January 15, 1946. Tukel, "The Liquidation of the Stolin Community," however, cites a death rate of five persons per day.
9. Batyah Kampinski-Liberman, "The Last Days of the 'Rebbe' Moyshelch Perlov," in Ben-Zakai, Stolin: Sefer-zikaron.
10. BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z, 393/59, p. 2522, statement of Willi Leister, February 15, 1962; BA-L, B 162/14495, verdict of LG-Frank, 4 Ks 1/71, against Kuhr and others, February 6, 1973, pp. 103–107; and Esther Gissin Blizhuvsky, "In the Stolin Ghetto," in Ben-Zakai, Stolin: Sefer-zikaron.
11. BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z, 393/59, statement of Rudolf Freyer, February 13, 1963, and statement of Wilhelm Rasp, December 18, 1961.
12. Ibid., p. 3359, statement of Ludwig Vorderbrügge, March 14, 1963.
13. BA-L, B 162/14495, verdict of LG-Frank, 4 Ks 1/71, against Johann Kuhr and others, February 6, 1973.

SZUMSK

Pre-1939: Szumsk, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Shumsk, raion center, Tarnopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Schumsk, Rayon center, Gebiet Kremenez, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Shums'k, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Szumsk is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) south of Równe. According to the 1921 census, there were 1,717 Jews in Szumsk. In the fall of 1939, several hundred Jewish refugees from Poland settled in Szumsk (in 1940 many of them were deported to the eastern part of the USSR). After Germany attacked the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, several Jewish families evacuated to the east; however, most Jews did not want to or were unable to evacuate (owing to the rapid advance of the German forces). At the start of the German occupation, there were probably more than 2,000 Jews still present in the town.

Units of the Wehrmacht occupied Szumsk on July 2, 1941. In July and August, a German military administration governed the town; as of September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Szumsk became a Rayon center in Gebiet Kremenez. The Gebietskommissar in Krzemieniec was Regierungsrat Müller.¹ The Germans established a Ukrainian local council and local police force in Szumsk, which was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post (created in September 1941), consisting of several German Gendarmes.

Immediately after the occupation of the town by German forces, local Ukrainians looted Jewish houses despite German public announcements forbidding this. A few days later, anti-semitic Ukrainians organized a pogrom during which several Jews were killed as they attempted to defend their property.²

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Szumsk. They established a Judenrat, whose chairman, Weissler, was a refugee from the Polish town of Katowice. The German authorities used the Judenrat to convey their orders and demands to the Jewish population. Jews were required to wear distinctive symbols (initially an armband, then from September 1941, yellow patches). Jews were prohibited from trading or otherwise communicating with non-Jews. They were forbidden to use the sidewalks and were required to bow before passing Germans. All Jewish women were forced to cut their hair.

The Jewish Council (Judenrat) formed a Labor Office (Arbeitsamt) headed by Szuldrein, a refugee from Łódź. This office assigned Jews to forced labor tasks, for example, in the sawmill, on farms, or clearing snow in the winter. Ukrainians were able to request Jews from the Arbeitsamt to do any kind of work for them. After about three months, a Jewish police force of 15 to 20 people was established, commanded by a man named Horowitz.³ One of the tasks of the Jewish Police was to collect the "contributions" of items, such as gold, silver, and furs, demanded by the civil administration and also by Gestapo officials on regular visits.

In early March 1942 (at the time of the Purim holiday), the German administration issued orders for all the Jews from Szumsk and the surrounding villages (approximately 2,000 people) to be enclosed within a ghetto by March 12.⁴ The ghetto was located in the poorest section of the town, near the synagogue and the baths. Living conditions were terrible. Jews had to live 10 or 12 people to a room, with many dying of hunger and widespread disease, especially typhus.⁵ There was no hospital, but the Judenrat organized soup kitchens for the poor, which many people attended. To survive, Jews had to smuggle into the ghetto food that was bartered for their last possessions from local peasants. The smugglers were often children who escaped the ghetto through tunnels dug under the fence. When caught by the Ukrainian police, the Judenrat had to pay a "ransom" for their release.

On German instructions, several workshops for Jewish craftsmen were established for tailoring and the repair of shoes and watches. Most of the production from these workshops became gifts for the Ukrainian and German police.⁶

After five months the ghetto was liquidated. On the night of Saturday, August 8, 1942, Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto, shooting 11 Jews who tried to escape; they were buried in a grave within the ghetto. The Jews were forbidden to bury them in the Jewish cemetery (outside the ghetto borders) to prevent the Jews from seeing the mass grave that had been prepared for them there. However, several Jews saw peasants returning with shovels and guessed what was happening. After the mass grave was dug, on August 13, 1942, a team of Security Police and SD from Równe, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, gathered the Jews near the large synagogue under the pretext of transferring them to another location; from there, they were taken in columns to the grave behind the Christian cemetery, where they were shot. Altogether, 1,792 Jews were shot on that day (496 men, 724 women, and 572 children).⁷ Some of the Jews were able to hide in previously prepared bunkers. Without food or water, those in hiding had to drink their own urine to quench their thirst. To catch the hidden Jews, the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police regularly combed the territory of the former ghetto over the ensuing few weeks. Some Jews were betrayed by the cries of their own children. The Gendarmerie and local police successively shot all the Jews who they found and captured. The last Jews, including about 100 who had been temporarily spared to help clear up the ghetto and sort the remaining possessions, had all been shot by October 1, 1942.⁸ Only a couple of dozen Jews from Szumsk managed to escape from their places of concealment and survive the ensuing dangers either in hiding or with the partisans, to be liberated by the Red Army in 1944.

SOURCES The yizkor book for Szumsk, edited by H. Rabin, Szumsk . . . sefer zikaron le-kedoshei Szumsk (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Szumsk in Israel, 1968), contains much information regarding the Jewish community of Szumsk; there is also a brief article in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 206–208.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Szumsk during the Nazi German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (e.g., 301/2467 and 4863); DATO; GARF (7021-75-15); IPN; USHMM; and YVA (e.g., M-1/E/2362; M-1/Q-1812/364; M-1/E/1500; O-3/2219; and O-22/54).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. AŻIH, 301/2467, testimony of Ruth Melchoir, and 301/4863.

3. Ibid., 301/2467; Rabin, Szumsk, p. 60, indicates that in the ghetto the head of the Jewish Police was named Ackerman.

4. AŻIH, 301/2467; GARF, 7021-75-15, p. 35.

5. YVA, M-1/E/1500.

6. AŻIH, 301/2467.

7. IPN, GKSZpNP, Zbiór zespołów Szczątkowych jednostek SS i Policji, Sygn. 77, p. 2. The document has also been published in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), p. 395, report by SS-Untersturmführer Selm, August 15, 1942.

8. GARF, 7021-75-15, pp. 37 verso, 42 verso. Altogether, according to the documents of the ChGK, 2,732 people, including 2,432 Jews, were killed in the Szumsk raion during the occupation; therefore, Jews comprised 89 percent of all the victims recorded (see GARF, 7021-75-15, p. 24).

TEOFIPOL'

Pre-1941: Teofipol', town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Teofipol, town and Rayon center, Gebiet Isjaslaw, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Teofipol', Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Teofipol' is located 63 kilometers (39 miles) northwest of Proskurov. According to the 1939 census, there were 1,266 Jews living in the town (36.9 percent of the total population). An additional 183 Jews lived in what was then the Teofipol' raion.

In early July 1941, units of the German 6th Army occupied the town. During the two weeks from the start of the German invasion on June 22, 1941, a small number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Some Jewish men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Probably around 1,000 Jews remained in Teofipol' at the start of the occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. The German military set up a local administration and an auxiliary police force, commanded by P.T. Pasechnik. In September 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Teofipol' was incorporated into Gebiet Isjaslaw; SA-Oberführer Knochenhauer became the Gebietskommissar.¹ In Teofipol' itself, a German Gendarmerie post was established, under which the Ukrainian auxiliary police served.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were introduced in Teofipol'. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formed. Jews had to wear distinguishing marks bearing the Star of David, and they were ordered to perform forced labor. Jews could not leave the borders of the town; and they were subjected to systematic robbery and assault by the local Ukrainian police.

In late 1941 or in January 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto in Teofipol'.² Jews from the surrounding villages were also resettled there. For example, 29 Jews were brought in from the village of Shiben.³ The ghetto was liquidated on January 21 and 22, 1942. On January 21, all the men—more than 400 people—were shot. On January 22, the women and children were shot.⁴ In total, 970 people were killed.⁵ In June 1942, another 85 Jews were shot in the village of Iampol'.⁶

SOURCES A brief article on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Teofipol' can be found in Navichno v pam'iaty narodni: Teofipol'shchyna u Velykii Vitchyzniani viini 1941–1945 gg. (Lviv, 1995). The concentration of the Jews from the surrounding villages and the ghetto in Teofipol' are also mentioned in I.S. Finkel'shtein, "Massovoe unichtozhenie evreev Podolii natsistskimi palachami v 1941–1944 gg.," in Katastrofa

i soprotivlenie ukrainskogo evreistva (1941–1944) (Kiev, 1999), p. 77; and in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Statiskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 87.

Documentation regarding the destruction of the Jews of Teofipol' can be found in the following archives: DAKhO (3784-1-32, pp. 19, 35; R863-2-38, p. 128); and GARF (7021-64-816).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. GARF, 7021-64-816, p. 200; Navichno v pam'iaty narodnii, p. 95.

3. GARF, 7021-64-816, p. 169.

4. Navichno v pam'iaty narodnii, pp. 95–96. DAKhO, 3784-1-32, pp. 19, 35, indicates that the Jews were brought into Teofipol' from the surrounding villages on Janaury 10, 1942, and that 1,540 people were shot there only two days later, as cited by Finkel'shtein, "Massovoe unichtozhenie evreev Podolii," p. 77.

5. GARF, 7021-64-816, p. 200. According to another source, there were 1,400 victims; see Navichno v pam'iaty narodnii, p. 95. This figure, however, is likely too high because the total Jewish pre-war population was 1,449, and a few hundred people were able to evacuate or enter the army.

6. GARF, 7021-64-816, p. 200.

TOMASZÓWKA

Pre-1939: Tomaszówka, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Tomashovka, Brest oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Tomaschowka, Rayon Domatschewo, Gebiet Brest Litowsk (Land), Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Tamashouka, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Tomaszówka is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) to the south of Brześć, just on the eastern side of the Bug River. There were probably a few hundred Jews living in Tomaszówka just prior to the German invasion.

German troops occupied Tomaszówka on June 22, 1941. Soon a local police force was established, initially consisting of just a few policemen, but by 1943 there were 22 policemen serving there, commanded by Gregori Tabala.¹ In the fall of 1941, a German civil administration was established. Tomaszówka was in Rayon Domatschewo within Gebiet Brest Litowsk (Land). The agricultural leader (Bezirkslandwirt) responsible for Rayon Domatschewo was Werner Dressler. From the summer of 1942, a German police cavalry squadron was based in the town, primarily to conduct operations against partisans.

Local inhabitant Kiril Karvat has described the ghetto: "[F]rom the very first days of the occupation, the whole Jewish population living in Tomaszówka was herded by the Germans into a camp, which was called a ghetto. The Jewish ghetto was in the western part of the settlement. . . . The Germans put up a barbed wire fence around it. German police and soldiers patrolled the fence the whole time."² "I can't say exactly how many houses were in the ghetto. . . . Very strict restrictions were introduced; the local people were forbidden to go into the ghetto; if caught they might be shot."³

The Jewish survivor Nachum Knopmacher from Włodawa, who was in the ghetto from the fall of 1941 until the summer of 1942, described his work for the Organisation Todt (OT), including bridge and housing construction. Jews worked outside the ghetto during the day and had to return in the evening. In the fall of 1941, he saw how the German civil official in charge, Hecht, murdered a Jew named Tuwia in a cruel manner, setting his dog onto the man when he was helpless to resist.⁴

In the early summer of 1942, some 400 Viennese Jews were brought into the ghetto from the Włodawa ghetto in the Generalgouvernement for forced labor.⁵ According to Knopmacher, in April 1942, all the Jews of the ghetto were assembled, and Hecht selected some 80 women, children, and old people, who were then taken out of town and shot nearby. Knopmacher mentions also that some 50 Jewish workers (mostly those from Vienna) were shot at the discretion of Krystop, a Reich German in charge of bridge construction.⁶

Kiril Karvat also describes a shooting Aktion at the end of April 1942, although in his opinion the victims probably came from the Domaczów ghetto. He saw three or four German trucks arriving from the direction of Tomaszówka. The trucks turned into a field in which a long antitank ditch had been dug by Soviet soldiers. The people dismounted from the trucks, guarded by Germans and policemen. The victims, men, women, and children, were made to undress and forced to get into the ditch in groups of about 20 people. The policemen and the German soldiers shot the Jews with submachine guns.⁷

According to a German report for June 1942, about 1,000 Jews (men and women) were engaged in construction work for the OT on the bridge in Tomaszówka, having partly been removed from the ghetto there and placed in a separate labor camp.⁸

The available sources differ as to the date of the ghetto's liquidation. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) places it in July 1942, in antitank ditches just off the road from Tomaszówka to Brześć. However, there may be some confusion between the ghetto liquidation and the shooting of Jews working on road construction in the area. Some 500 Jews were taken from the Domaczów ghetto in May 1942 for work on the Brześć-Kowel highway. Apparently those who were exhausted and weakened were shot shortly afterwards.⁹

Most eyewitness accounts, however, confirm the dating given in a contemporary German report. The Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Brześć stated that "on September 19 and 20, 1942, about 2,900 Jews were shot in Domaczów and Tomaszówka by a special command of the SD in connection with the cavalry squadron stationed in Domaczów, the Gendarmerie, and the Schutzmannschaft. The 'Jewish Aktion' took place without any disturbances."¹⁰ One member of the cavalry squadron based in Tomaszówka reportedly committed suicide shortly after the liquidation of the Jews there.¹¹

A Jewish survivor from Domaczów stated that the Aktion in Tomaszówka took place on the day after the liquidation of the Domaczów ghetto. A driver for the Gendarmerie in Brześć dated the ghetto liquidations in Tomaszówka and Domaczów both in September, adding that in Tomaszówka the Jews were killed in an antitank ditch.¹²

Most significantly, the key local witness, Kiril Karvat, confirmed in the 1990s that "in September 1942, together with my friend . . . we saw the Jews from the Tomaszówka ghetto being escorted by Gestapo soldiers and policemen. . . . A very big group of Jews from Tomaszówka were shot on that day. The massacre took place in the same field and ditch as the shooting of April 1942."¹³

One German witness who served in the cavalry squadron based in Tomaszówka from August 1942, Karl Vehrenberg, stated that "Jewish artisans and families, about 30 people in all, were accommodated in several houses on the outskirts of Tomaszówka, surrounded by barbed wire. They did all the work that the squadron needed doing." If his recollection is correct, this was either a remnant left after the main Aktion or those left after the bulk had been transferred to a labor camp closer to their work site. Another squadron member, Erwin Hentschke, recalls that members of the squadron served as perimeter guards during the Tomaszówka ghetto liquidation.¹⁴

It is not possible to determine precisely how many Jews were confined within the Tomaszówka ghetto or how many were killed. Personal accounts of the liquidation of the Tomaszówka ghetto estimate that somewhere between 1,500 and 2,000 Jews were killed during this Aktion.¹⁵ This would imply that additional Jews must have been brought in from elsewhere, apart from the 400 or so Jews from Vienna who were sent across the Bug in April 1942. There is evidence to suggest that some Jews were transferred from Domaczów to Tomaszówka to work on road and bridge construction there.¹⁶

Given that several hundred Jews from the Tomaszówka ghetto probably died or were killed during the course of the summer, the figure of 2,900 killed in Domaczów and Tomaszówka on September 19–20, 1942, seems fairly reliable. Estimates for the numbers killed in Domaczów vary quite considerably.¹⁷ From the conflicting sources, however, it seems that there were probably about 1,800 Jews in Tomaszówka,¹⁸ including any in nearby labor camps, just prior to the Aktion.

After the ghetto liquidation, the Germans and policemen brought the clothes and underwear of those who had been shot back to Tomaszówka by truck and sold them to the inhabitants in exchange for local produce.¹⁹

SOURCES Fragmentary information on the Tomaszówka ghetto can be found in the following archives: AUKG-BRBBO; BA-BL; BA-L; GABO; NA (WCU, trial of Andrzej Sawoniuk); and WAST.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. GABO, 201-1-3, p. 58, Verzeichnis der Schutzmänner der Schutzmannschaft in Tomaszowka, Rayon Domatschewo, August 8, 1943.

2. BA-L (ZStL), II 204 AR-Z 472/67, K. P. Karvat (Karwat), June 17, 1968.

3. NA, WCU, K.P. Karvat, February 18, 1997.

4. BA-L, II 202 AR-Z 472/67 (Hecht investigation), Bd. I, pp. 31–38, Nachum Knopmacher, June 15, 1965.

5. Ibid. Knopmacher dates this transfer in March 1942, but it is unlikely to have been before May, as the transport of 998 Jews to Włodawa from Vienna did not leave the city until April 27, 1942; see Florian Freund and Hans Safrian, "Die Verfolgung der österreichischen Juden 1938–1945: Vertreibung und Deportation," in Emmerich Talos et al., eds., NS-Herrschaft in Österreich: Ein Handbuch (Vienna: öbv & hpt, 2001), pp. 767–794, here p. 793.

6. BA-L, II 202 AR-Z 472/67, Bd. I, pp. 31–38, Nachum Knopmacher, June 15, 1965.

7. NA, WCU, K.P. Karvat, February 18, 1997.

8. BA-BL, R 94/7, report of Brest Gebietskommissar, section Arbeitsamt, for June 1942.

9. GABO, 514-1-195, pp. 4–7.

10. BA-BL, R 94/7, Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer Brest report, October 6, 1942.

11. WAST, Verlustmeldungen, Polizei Reiterabteilung.

12. AUKGBRBBBO, Criminal File 2905, case no. 69 (Nikolai K. Lialko), p. 40, Boris S. Grunstein, September 27, 1944; and file no. 466 (Ivan E. Chikun), vol. 2, pp. 89–93, Ivan S. Khvisyuchik, March 16, 1983. See also the statement on March 24, 1970, of Erwin Glass, a former cavalry squadron member, who recalls that his comrades told him that the Jews of Tomaszówka were killed at the same time as those of Domaczów—BA-L, II 202 AR-Z 472/67, Bd. I, pp. 180–182.

13. NA, WCU, K.P. Karvat on February 18, 1997.

14. See BA-L, 204 AR-Z 369/63 (Hahn investigation), Bd. V, pp. 178–198; ZStL, II 202 AR-Z 472/67, Bd. I, pp. 165–167, statement of Erwin Hentschke on March 16, 1970.

15. See the ChGK reports for the Domachevo raion and accompanying witness statements, in GABO, 514-1-195.

16. NA, WCU, statement of Baruch Greenstein, October 9, 1996. Greenstein's testimony, however, was problematic and not used during the trial of Andrzej Sawoniuk in London in 1999.

17. German witnesses, who were keen to minimize the scale of the Aktion, mention only some 500 Jews in Domaczów at the time of the ghetto liquidation. The ChGK report, however, gives the figure of 2,700 Jews killed in Domaczów; see BA-L, 204 AR-Z 369/63, Bd. I, pp. 194–196; and ChGK report, GABO, 514-1-195.

18. NA, WCU, officer's information, K.P. Karvat, February 10, 1995. Karvat in this interview gave the figure of 1,800 Jews killed in Tomaszówka.

19. BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 472/67, K.P. Karvat, June 17, 1968.

TORCZYN

Pre-1939: Torczyn, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941 and 1944–1990: Torchin, raion center, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Tortschin, Rayon center, Gebiet Luzk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Torchyn, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Torczyn is located 88 kilometers (55 miles) west-northwest of Równe. According to the 1921 census, there were 1,480 Jews living in Torczyn. By the middle of 1941, it is estimated that around 1,700 Jews were living there.

The village was occupied by parts of the German 6th Army at the end of June 1941. In July and August 1941, Torczyn was administered by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). In September 1941, control was passed to a German civil administration: Torczyn became a Rayon center within Gebiet Luzk, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Gebietskommissar in Łuck was Regierungsassessor Heinrich Lindner.¹

In Torczyn, a local Ukrainian administration was formed with a Rayonchef and a Ukrainian auxiliary police unit, which was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post after its establishment in the fall of 1941.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a number of anti-Jewish measures in Torczyn: a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was formed, headed by Leizer Karsh, through which the German occupation authorities conveyed orders and instructions to the Jewish population. A Jewish police force was also established to assist the Judenrat. The Jews were forced to wear distinguishing marks, initially an armband bearing the Star of David, after September 1941, a yellow patch on their chests and backs. Jews were ordered to hand over all their gold and valuables. They had to perform forced labor, such as laying cables, for which they received only some bread and a watery soup. They were forbidden to leave the limits of the settlement; and they were subjected to systematic robbery and beatings by the Ukrainian police.

On August 2, 1941, German security forces conducted an Aktion in Torczyn. They arrested 284 people accused of collaborating with the Soviet authorities and shot them in the woods near the village of Buiani.² The mass shooting probably was carried out by a detachment of the Security Police that was deployed at that time in Łuck.

In February 1942, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Torczyn. The approximately 1,500 Jewish inhabitants of the settlement were given only 10 minutes to dress and grab some of their belongings before being forced into a few Jewish houses in the center of the settlement, which were surrounded with barbed wire. In addition, a number of Jews from neighboring villages were brought to Torczyn, raising the population of the ghetto to more than 2,000 people. There was considerable overcrowding, with five or six families sharing each house. A river ran through the area of the ghetto, but the water was undrinkable. The only

Jews permitted to leave the ghetto were those on work details organized by the Judenrat and some craftsmen who also received better food.³

At the time of Passover (April 2, 1942), the Jews of Torczyn were able to obtain flour to bake matzot with the permission of Gebietskommissar Lindner in Łuck. There was also a kitchen organized by the Judenrat, which distributed soup and bread. Some Jews managed to barter their remaining possessions for food with the local non-Jews and sneaked the food in past the guards.⁴ In May 1942, 150 young Jews who were fit for work were sent away, allegedly to a labor camp.

On August 23, 1942, a detachment of the Security Police and SD from Łuck arrived to liquidate the ghetto, assisted by the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police.⁵ The police forces surrounded the ghetto; after selecting out about 14 specialist workers, who were put into a warehouse, the remaining Jews were taken away on trucks to the old Jewish cemetery at the end of Sadovskaia Street. Here a large pit had been prepared the day before. Nearly 2,000 people were ordered to undress and then shot in the pit.

There was little in the way of organized resistance in the ghetto, but a number of Jews managed to escape on the night before the Aktion, and many others went into hiding at the time of the roundup. Unfortunately, most of them subsequently were caught by the Ukrainian police and shot over the ensuing days and weeks. Few Jews were able to survive. Some Ukrainian families (for example, the Krut' family) hid Jews and helped them survive until the Germans were driven from Torczyn in February 1944.

SOURCES Information on the destruction of the Jewish population of Torczyn can be found in the following publications: "Torczyn," in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kebilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 95–97; and V. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni: Zbertvy i pamiat' (Lutsk, 2003).

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Torczyn in the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: DAVO (R2-1-196); GARF (7021-55-10); VHF (# 2672, 2839, 27130); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ilya Bourtmann

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. "Torczyn," 5:96; Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni, p. 31.

3. VHF, # 27130, testimony of Henry Karsh (born 1922), 1997; # 2672, testimony of Aaron Katz (born 1921), 1995.

4. Ibid., # 2839, testimony of Toby Kolnick (born 1923), 1995.

5. Spector, Pinkas ha-kebilot, 5:97; DAVO, R2-1-196, pp. 218a–218b, report to the Generalkommissar Wolhynien u. Podolien on gasoline supplies for the "special treatment" of Jews in Gebiet Luzk, August 27, 1942.

TUCZYN

Pre-1939: Tuczyn, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941 and 1944–1991: Tuchin, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Tutschin, Rayon center, Gebiet Rowno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Tuchyn, Hoshcha raion, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Tuczyn is located 26 kilometers (16 miles) northeast of Równe. The 1921 census recorded 2,159 Jews living in Tuczyn. Allowing for a natural increase in the population of about 0.9 percent per year, there were probably around 2,600 Jews living in the town in June 1941.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Tuczyn on July 6, 1941. In July and August 1941, the town was run by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). On September 1, 1941, the area around Tuczyn was transferred to a German civil administration. Tuczyn became the center of Rayon Tutschin in Gebiet Rowno. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Werner Beer.¹ The German Gendarmerie maintained an outpost in Tuczyn, to which the local Ukrainian police force was subordinated.

In the first days of the German occupation, antisemites from among the town's Ukrainian population organized a pogrom. In the course of the violence, about 60 or 70 Jews were killed and many homes looted. The next day, an Einsatzkommando of the Security Police (Sipo) and Security Service (SD), drawing on lists prepared by Ukrainians, arrested and shot 20 Jews and 5 Ukrainians as Soviet activists and Communists.²

Other anti-Jewish measures that followed in the summer and autumn of 1941 included the appointment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), the requirement that Jews wear armbands bearing the Star of David (later, a yellow patch), the conscription of Jews to perform forced labor, and the restriction of Jews to the limits of the town. Jews were also subjected to systematic plundering and beatings by the Ukrainian police.

According to one survivor, soon after the start of the occupation, local non-Jews stopped recognizing their Jewish acquaintances. The Germans confiscated Jewish valuables and their livestock, which led to shortages of food. A clothing factory for the German army was established in the town, which used Jews as laborers.³

Until the late summer of 1942, the Jews of Tuczyn lived in a form of open ghetto. Herman Wajcman recalled: "[T]he ghetto was an open ghetto. You could come in and out. We actually moved into the ghetto, but we had passes to go to the factory, where we lived half of the time. It wasn't like the ghettos that were surrounded by police."⁴ Apparently, with the aid of bribes, the Judenrat managed to postpone the establishment of a formal ghetto until early September 1942. Then a ghetto was established in about 50 small houses along Waskadowska Street. Living conditions were very crowded, with many people having to sleep on the floor.⁵ At about this time, all the Jews from the surrounding area were also concentrated there, including from the village of Antonówka, raising the Jewish population in the ghetto up to around 3,000 people.⁶

On September 24, 1942, a unit from the regional Sipo-SD headquarters in Równe liquidated the Tuczyn ghetto with the assistance of the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. An organized resistance effort on the part of the ghetto inhabitants enabled many of Tuczyn's Jews initially to flee.

Following the murder of the Jews in Równe in mid-July 1942, refugees arriving from there told the Jews in Tuczyn what had happened. When news arrived that the Germans were preparing mass graves nearby, the leaders of the Tuczyn community decided to resist. Among the principal organizers of resistance were the chairman of the Judenrat, Hershel Schwarzman, and his deputy, Meir Himmelfarb. They planned to set fire to the houses and to attack the Germans with available weapons to enable the bulk of the ghetto residents to flee into the nearby forests. With Judenrat funds, kerosene was purchased, and some weapons, including five rifles and more than 20 revolvers, were obtained. A group of Jews who worked felling trees in the forests attempted to contact the Soviet partisans to gain some outside support. When the Jews went to pray together for the last time on Yom Kippur (September 21, 1942), Schwarzman and the other resistance leaders revealed their plans to the assembled Jews.

On the evening of September 23, the Germans surrounded the ghetto. The leaders of the uprising alerted the Jews, and those with weapons prepared to resist. At dawn the following day, the Germans and Ukrainian police entered the ghetto. In response, the Jews set fire to the houses in the ghetto and German warehouses nearby. When the Jewish fighters opened fire on their advancing foes, other Jews used the ensuing chaos of fire, smoke, people yelling, and rifle fire to break through the wooden barricades around the ghetto and flee. Herman Wajcman used some of the tombstones in the cemetery as cover as he tried to reach the forests. Several Germans and Ukrainian policemen were killed and wounded.⁷ It is estimated that initially up to 2,000 Jews, including many women and children, reached the forest. Most of the fighters stayed behind to tie down the Germans, and they fell in battle or were captured and then shot. This was the fate of Schwarzman and Himmelfarb as the uprising ended on September 26.

The Germans and Ukrainian police soon organized a manhunt for the Jews who had escaped. Within three days, around half of them had been captured and killed, and many, especially women with children, realized that they could not survive in the forest and returned to Tuczyn, where they were also shot. According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 753 Jews were shot in the Jewish cemetery in Tuczyn during the autumn of 1942, while Ukrainian nationalist partisans in the Kudrinka Forest killed about 240 Jews. The German Gendarmerie shot more than 300 Jews, Ukrainians, and Poles in the town park.⁸

A number of Jews held out in the woods into the winter, but some died of hunger and cold, and others were denounced to the Germans or killed by peasants. A few of the younger Jewish escapees eventually joined Soviet partisan units. When Tuczyn was liberated on January 16, 1944, only around 20 Jews remained in the area.

SOURCES Information about the revolt of the Jews in the Tuczyn ghetto can be found in the following publications: “Tutschin,” in Israel Gutman, ed., Encyclopedia of the Holocaust (New York: Macmillan, 1990), pp. 1518–1519 (a shorter version is available in German as “Tutschin,” in Enzyklopädie des Holocaust: Die Verfolgung und Ermordung der europäischen Juden [Munich: Piper, 1995], pp. 1442–1443); Ben Zion H. Ayalon, ed., Sefer zikaron li-kehillot Tutshin-Kriepsh (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Tutshin-Kriepsh vecha-sevivah be-Yisrael, 1967); Avraham ‘Sadeh and Levi Deror, eds., Yehude Tuts’in u-Kripsh mul rotsbehem: ‘E’srim ve-arba’ ‘eduyot, gavah ‘eduyot ve-khines (Tel Aviv: Va’ad yots’e Tuts’in u-Kriepsh, Moreshet Bet-‘Eduṭ ‘a. sh. Mordekhai Anilevits, 1990); “Tuczyn,” in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 93–95; and Ze’ev Portenoy, “The Revolt of the Totszin Ghetto” [in Yiddish], in Yehuda Merin and Ben Zion Kaminsky, eds., Yalkut Voblin 55–60 (Tel Aviv: Arkhiyon Vohlin be-Erets-Yisrael, 1998), pp. 38–40.

Documents about the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Tuczyn can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (e.g., 301/2901, 3178); DARO; GARF (7021-71-68); USHMM (RG-50.030*0243); VHF (# 7774, 30371, 34403); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of the Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), pp. 64, 67; AŽIH, 301/397. According to materials of the ChGK, 72 Jews were killed; see GARF, 7021-71-68, p. 4.

3. VHF, # 7774, testimony of Avraham Elbert; # 30371, testimony of Arych Katrav.

4. USHMM, RG-50.030*0243, testimony of Herman Wajeman (born 1926).

5. VHF, # 7774; # 30371.

6. USHMM, RG-50.030*0243.

7. Ibid.; VHF, # 7774.

8. GARF, 7021-71-68, pp. 4, 16, 17, 74.

TURZYSK

Pre-1939: Turzysk (Yiddish: Trisk), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Turiisk, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Turisk, Rayon center, Gebiet Kowel, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Turiis’k, raion center, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Turzysk is located 19 kilometers (12 miles) southwest of Kowel. According to the 1921 population census, 1,173 Jews were living in Turzysk. By the middle of 1941, allowing for an annual increase of 9 to 10 persons per thousand, the Jewish population was probably around 1,400.

German forces occupied Turzysk on June 28, 1941. Soon after their arrival, German soldiers and Ukrainians looted the empty stores, and some Jews were also robbed. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town’s affairs. In September 1941, power was transferred officially to a German civil administration. Turzysk became a Rayon center in Gebiet Kowel, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Regierungsrat Arno Kämpf was the Gebietskommissar in Kowel until June 1942, and Leutnant der Gendarmerie Philipp Rapp was appointed Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.¹ In June 1942, Kämpf was arrested for taking bribes from Jews and executed shortly thereafter. His successor as Gebietskommissar was his chief of staff (Stabsleiter) Erich Kassner.

In Turzysk, the civil administration was represented by a Sonderführer (agricultural leader), who proved to be a great enemy of the Jews. A Ukrainian local authority was also established in Turzysk. In addition, the Germans recruited a Ukrainian auxiliary police force, which was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post, composed of several German Gendarmes.

At the end of July 1941, shortly after the occupation of the settlement, 10 Jews alleged to be Soviet activists were shot in Turzysk.²

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupying forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures. The German authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was made up primarily of pre-war social activists. Jehuda-Leyb Ginzburg served as chairman. An unarmed Jewish police force was also established. Among the first tasks assigned to the Judenrat was the obligation to deliver a daily quota of forced laborers. These men initially were used to assist German railway officials to convert the railway to a narrower gauge, for which they were not paid. Jews were issued work cards, on which their assigned days were marked. Other forced labor tasks included agricultural work and the construction of roads and bridges.

Jews were required to wear distinctive markings in plain view from the first days of the occupation. Initially they wore white armbands with a blue Star of David, and later these were replaced by yellow patches sewn onto the front left side and the middle of the back of their outer clothing. Jewish houses were also marked with yellow symbols. The Jewish Council was required to meet onerous “contributions” in money, valuables, and useful items demanded by the German authorities. After a time the Germans started to send some Jews away to work, and these people did not return.³

In the fall of 1941, the Germans spread vicious antisemitic propaganda on posters and leaflets in the town, which scornfully accused the Jews of having assisted the People’s Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) and threatened their destruction. Further new regulations ordered Jews to surrender all their cows and goats and banned them from leaving the limits of the town. Initially the Jews received a bread ration of 200 grams (7 ounces), but this was subsequently reduced to only 100 grams (3.5 ounces). In the winter of 1941–1942, the Germans also required the Jews to surrender all their fur items for the use of the German army. After the German advance was halted in front of Moscow in December 1941, a rumor spread among the Jews that some of their surrendered furs had been recaptured by the Soviets and were being worn by the Red Army. This news was repeated with some satisfaction among the Jews. As no access to radio or newspapers was available, most information was spread by way of gossip and rumors, recycling snippets picked up by eavesdropping on the conversations of non-Jews.⁴

At some time before mid-August 1942, the German authorities established an open ghetto in Turzysk, forcibly resettling Jews there from neighboring villages. The ghetto remained unfenced, and Jews with work cards were still permitted to leave to visit their assigned work sites. For example, a number of Jews were employed regularly digging peat outside of the town.

On August 19, 1942, the Judenrat in Turzysk was confronted by a demand from the German authorities to produce half a million Karbowanez (German occupation currency), 500 good suits, and 500 pairs of shoes within 24 hours. If this demand were not to be met promptly, the Germans threatened to destroy the entire community. With great effort, the Jews managed to collect the required clothes and shoes but were unable to gather such a large sum of money.

The next day, Ukrainian police sealed off the town, not permitting any Jews to leave, shooting those they caught attempting to sneak out. Then on August 23, 1942, German forces arrived in Turzysk to liquidate the ghetto. First the Jews were ordered to assemble on the square in front of the Bet Midrash. They were instructed to bring food for one day and also to take along their most valuable possessions, as they were told that they would be transferred to the Kowel ghetto. The Germans tried to select a few specialist workers who they still needed, but at least one carpenter refused to leave his fellow Jews and remained with the main group. Then the Jews were marched in a column under close guard by the Ukrainian police in the direction of Kowel. After about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles), the Jews were ordered to stop near a clay pit used for making bricks, where a group of 10 Jews were ordered to undress and then shot. Under the supervision of several German officers, the rest of the Jews were then shot in turn. Realizing their fate, some of the Jews tried to commit suicide, and 1 even managed to seize a weapon from one of the Ukrainian guards. In the ensuing confusion, many Jews tried to flee, but most were gunned down before they could get far.

A number of Jews had hidden inside the ghetto, and when some local Ukrainians started to loot the ghetto, it seems that a few Jews may have set fire to the houses, either to deny the Ukrainians their possessions or perhaps to mask their escape. However, the Ukrainian police were still guarding the ghetto perimeter, and some fleeing Jews were forced back into the flames. When the fires eventually died down, many Jews lay dead in the ghetto and the surrounding fields. Local Poles and Ukrainians were instructed to gather the corpses and take them to the pit. They were rewarded with the possessions they found on the bodies. A number of fleeing Jews sought shelter with peasant acquaintances in the surrounding countryside, but most were caught and killed by patrols of the Ukrainian police, which scoured the area for escaped Jews over the following weeks.⁵

According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 1,512 Jews were shot altogether in Turzysk during the ghetto liquidation and its aftermath.⁶ The mass shooting Aktion was organized by a detachment of the Security Police and SD, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian auxiliary police. Also participating in the Aktion was Schutzmannschaft-Bataillon 103 from Maciejów. In 1948, four former policemen from this battalion were tried: Zaichuk, Leskovskii, Maksimchuk, and Sokhatskii.⁷

SOURCES Information about the persecution and destruction of the Jewish population of Turzysk can be found in the following publications: Nathan Livneh, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillat, Trisk: Sefer yizkor (Tel Aviv: Hotsa'at Irgun Yots'e Trisk be-Yisrael, 1975); V. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni: Zbertvy i pamiat' (Lutsk, 2003); and Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–44 (Jerusalem: Achva Press, 1990).

Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Turzysk Jews can be found in the following archives: DAVO; and GARF (7021-55-1).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. Spector, The Holocaust, p. 73; Livneh, Pinkas ha-kehillat, Trisk, p. 322.
3. Livneh, Pinkas ha-kehillat, Trisk, pp. 320–323.
4. Ibid., pp. 321–324.
5. Ibid., pp. 325–328, 349.
6. GARF, 7021-55-1, pp. 70–71 and reverse.
7. Nakonechnyi, Kholokost na Volyni, p. 13.

UŚCIŁUG

Pre-1939: Uściług, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Ustilug, Volyn' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ustilug, Rayon center, Gebiet Wladimir-Wolynsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Ustylub, Volyn' oblast', Ukraine

Uściług is located on the Bug River, 13 kilometers (8 miles) west of Włodzimierz Wołyński. According to the 1921 census, 2,723 Jews resided in Uściług. Allowing for natural increase and the effects of emigration in the 1920s and 1930s, as well as the influx of refugees in 1939, there were probably slightly less than 3,000 Jews in the town in June 1941. In September 1939, German forces bombarded Uściług, killing several Jewish and non-Jewish civilians and destroying almost half the buildings in the town. The German-Soviet Nonaggression Pact placed Uściług just on the Soviet side of the border with the newly created Generalgouvernement. The Soviets deported about one third of the Jewish population, including many refugees from central Poland, primarily to the nearby town of Włodzimierz Wołyński.¹

When the Germans attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941, they bombarded Uściług a second time. The town caught fire, and a majority of the houses were destroyed. Units of the German 6th Army entered the town on June 23. In July and August, a German local military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed Uściług, and in September 1941, authority was officially transferred to a civil administration. Uściług then became a Rayon center in Gebiet Wladimir-Wolynsk. The Gebietskommissar was Wilhelm Westerheide, who had assumed his post by the beginning of November 1941, and the SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer from July 1942 was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Grigat. He was in command of 18 Gendarmerie officials spread over several Rayons, including Rayon Ustilug; this post, manned by three or more Gendarmes, was in charge of a squad of local Ukrainian police (a few dozen men).²

In the summer and autumn of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures was implemented in Uściług: Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing symbols such as the Star of David (later on, a patch in the shape of a yellow circle), they were assigned to forced labor largely without pay, and they were not allowed to leave the boundaries of the town. They were also subjected to systematic looting and beatings by the Ukrainian police. Local Gendarmerie officials organized a Judenrat, appointing Mikhel Shafran as its chairman.³

In the first large anti-Jewish Aktion in Uściług, German security forces shot 30 Jews in late June 1941 for allegedly having collaborated with the Soviet authorities. In October 1941, approximately 890 Jews were gathered together and marched out of town. They and their families were told that they were being relocated to a forced labor camp. In fact, they all were shot.⁴

In March 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto in Uściług. Soon the severe overcrowding and atrocious living conditions in the ghetto led to an outbreak of typhus. To prevent the further spread of the disease, the German Gendarmes sent Ukrainian police into the ghetto to kill anyone who was running a fever.⁵ In the first half of September 1942, a unit of the Security Police and SD from Łuck, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police, murdered 1,847 Jews.⁶ A few hundred Jews escaped to the forests, hid in bunkers, or were temporarily spared as forced laborers. The last two groups were put in a Wehrmacht forced labor camp that was liquidated in the winter of 1942–1943. Of those who escaped to the forest, some were killed by members of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA); others succeeded in joining units of the Polish Armia Krajowa.⁷

SOURCES Articles on the destruction of the Jewish population of Uściług can be found in these publications: Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Commu- nities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 32–34; A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukraińskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 323; and in the yizkor book edited by Arye Avinadav, Kehilat Ustila: Bevinvanah uve-hurbanah (Tel Aviv: Irgun yots’e Ustila be-Yisrael uve tefut-sot, 1961).

Documentation regarding the murder of the Jews of Uściług can be found in DAVO and GARF (7021-55-8).

Alexander Kruglov and Andrew Koss

NOTES

1. Arye Avinadav, “Sippuran shel Shetey Ahiyot,” in Avinadav, Kehilat Ustila, p. 139; Nahman Burlvant, “Hurban Ustila,” also in Kehilat Ustila, p. 239.

2. LG-Dort, Ks 45 Js 32/64, Bd. LXIII, Indictment in the case against Wilhelm Westerheide.

3. Yeshayahu Meltsman, “Al Hurvot Ayartenu,” in Avinadav, Kehilat Ustila, pp. 125–126; Avinadav, “Sippuran,” p. 140; Burlvant, “Hurban Ustila,” pp. 240–241.

4. See Meltsman, “Hurvot,” p. 126; and Avinadav, “Sippuran,” p. 140. The Germans were relatively successful at concealing this Aktion from the remaining Jews, so these two testimonies do not refer to it as such, only to a large-scale deportation. The figures from the ChGK report, however, support the figure posited by Spector in Pinkas ha-kehillot and given here.

5. Meltsman, “Hurvot,” p. 126.

6. GARF, 7021-55-8, pp. 35–37. According to the ChGK report for the Ustilug raion, 2,535 people were killed in total during the occupation; see also Meltsman, “Hurvot,” p. 126; Avinadav, “Sippuran,” pp. 140–141; and Burlvant, “Hurban Ustila,” p. 240.

7. Meltsman, “Hurvot,” pp. 140–141; Burlvant, “Hurban Ustila,” p. 241.

VIN'KOVTSY

Pre-1941: Vin'kovtsy, town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Winkowzy, Rayon center, Gebiet Dunajewzy, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Vin'kovtsy, raion center, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Vin'kovtsy is located about 48 kilometers (30 miles) south-southeast of Proskurov. In 1939, the Jewish population of the town was 2,251 (52 percent of the total).

Forces of the German 17th Army occupied Vin'kovtsy in mid-July 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration governed the town, establishing a town council and an auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. In September 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Vin'kovtsy became a Rayon center within Gebiet Dunajewzy, where the Gebietskommissar was Gemeinschaftsführer Eduard Eggers.¹ There was also a German Gendarmerie post in Vin'kovtsy, which assumed control over the local detachment of Ukrainian police.

At some time in the summer or fall of 1941, the German authorities established a ghetto in Vin'kovtsy. According to the account of Sima Lerner, she returned from another village one day and was informed by a Ukrainian policeman that she would have to join all the other Jews in the ghetto. He escorted her personally to the ghetto, where she was given yellow patches to wear on her chest and back to show that she was Jewish. The Germans fenced in the ghetto, so that nobody could leave. In her apartment, three families lived together in overcrowded conditions. They were required to perform various forced labor tasks, such as building bridges and roads. In April 1942, all the children were rounded up and escorted to the main square. Here they were told that they could only walk in certain parts of the town, whereas the dogs were allowed to go wherever they wanted. Then they were all sent back to the ghetto.²

In May 1942, there was another roundup. Sima's father said to her that she should not report for the roundup, as she had not done anything wrong, so he hid her and everyone else left. Soon she heard many gunshots and immediately understood what was happening. There was a pit prepared in the forest near Vin'kovtsy, and the Jews were escorted to this pit and then shot. Sima meanwhile escaped to the house of her non-Jewish aunt, where she went into hiding. Subsequently she was moved to another house nearby. Here she stayed in the basement and never went outside. During a subsequent roundup, her uncle and grandfather were killed. Sima was not found during this roundup but then fled from Vin'kovtsy.³

Soviet and other sources indicate that there were two or three Aktions conducted against the Jews in Vin'kovtsy in the late spring and summer of 1942. These Aktions reportedly took place on April 14, May 9, and August 6. The Aktions were probably organized by a squad of Security Police and SD from the outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Kamenets-Podolskii, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. Soviet sources indicate that 1,875 Jews were killed in April and 450 in May, but these figures are probably too high. According to a German report, 703 Jews were shot in "Wonkiwzi" (probably Vin'kovtsy) and Sibkiwzi on August 6, 1942. These last Jews to be shot were probably the remaining skilled craftsmen and their families. It is likely that around 1,875 Jews were shot in Vin'kovtsy in 1942.⁴

Another Jewish survivor, Iosif Shalita, has given a brief description of the ghetto in Vin'kovtsy. He states that it consisted of about five or six houses grouped together, which contained about 300 people. Around the yards of the houses there was barbed wire and beyond that a gate. The food the Jews had available to them was horrible and limited, as there were so many people. Living conditions were deplorable due to the overcrowding; people slept very little, lying down wherever they could find space on the floor. The Jews worked at a nearby kolkhoz. The work was absolutely terrible, but people thought they were safer if they made themselves useful. In the ghetto there was order; people would go to each other for help. Somehow people learned that the police were planning another Aktion two days in advance. Shalita knew he had to escape and managed to crawl through the barbed wire and left Vin'kovtsy. His testimony, however, is problematic, as he dates his escape from the ghetto in September 1943, having been there for only one month. It is possible that he was mistaken by just over one year and is describing the ghetto in the period leading up to its liquidation in early August 1942; or perhaps he is describing a subsequent forced labor camp or remnant ghetto for Jews in Vin'kovtsy in 1943.⁵

SOURCES The main sources for this entry are two VHF testimonies (# 6955 and 32327), which mention a ghetto in the town. Additional documentation can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-64-795); and IPN.

Martin Dean
trans. Gina Caruso

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. VHF, # 6955, testimony of Sima Lerner.
3. Ibid.
4. IPN, GKŚZpNP, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, p. 2, Sipo-Aussenstelle Kamenez-Podolsk to KdS Dr. Pütz in Rowno, August 6, 1942; GARF, 7021-64-95, pp. 208–209.
5. VHF, # 32327, testimony of Iosif Shalita.

VOLOCHISK

Pre-1941: Volochisk, town and raion center, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Wolotschisk, Rayon center, Gebiet Proskurow, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Volochysk, raion center, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Volochisk is located 126 kilometers (78 miles) south of Równe. In 1926, 2,068 Jews lived in Volochisk. According to the 1939 census, there were 753 Jews living there. The same census recorded 2,926 Jews living in the entire Volochisk raion, including those in Volochisk itself. About half of the Jews in the villages of the raion lived in Fridrikhovka, where there were 521 Jews, and in Kupel'.

Volochisk was occupied by units of the German 6th Army in early July 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the town. The Ortskommandantur appointed a mayor and recruited a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Volochisk became a Rayon center in Gebiet Proskurow, within Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. Hundertschaftsführer Schmerbeck was appointed as the Gebietskommissar.¹ In Volochisk itself, a German Gendarmerie post was established, to which the Ukrainian auxiliary police unit was subordinated.

The Aktions targeting the Jewish population of Gebiet Proskurow, which included Volochisk, were carried out in 1942 by the Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) in Starokonstantinov. This outpost was headed by SS-Hauptscharführer Karl Graf. The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian auxiliary police played an active role in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

1490 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures was implemented in Volochisk. Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing markings, initially armbands bearing the Star of David and later yellow patches. The German authorities established a ghetto in Volochisk. According to the child survivor Frima Laub, shortly after the arrival of the Germans, they “fenced in about 20 blocks or so—and all the Jewish people had to move out of their homes and go to live in that area.”² Jews were taken every day for forced labor at work sites outside the ghetto. Otherwise, they were not permitted to leave the ghetto, which was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by the Ukrainian police.

In Volochisk, German security forces conducted at least two large-scale Aktions against the Jews. Laub describes one Aktion when many of the Jews were driven out of the ghetto and collected together in an empty factory building, where they were forced to undress and surrender all their valuables. From there the Jews were marched in a column to a site outside the town to be shot. Frima, together with her sister and her mother, managed to avoid being shot by claiming to be non-Jews who were taken there by mistake; but they were kept in prison under investigation for several weeks afterwards until they managed to escape and returned to the ghetto. Shortly before the ghetto’s liquidation in September 1942, Laub escaped through the barbed wire of the ghetto and was put into hiding by her mother, initially with a non-Jewish woman in return for payment but separated from the rest of her family. However, because of German threats of the death penalty for anyone caught hiding Jews, the woman became very scared and turned Laub out on the street, and she had to find refuge elsewhere for several months. To avoid endangering another family that helped to keep her alive, Frima slept for some time under a house with a dog for warmth, until she managed to rejoin her family in the spring of 1943.³

In August 1942, Jews from neighboring villages—including from Kupel’, Fridrikhovka, and Voitovtsy—were resettled into the ghetto. On September 11, 1942, German security forces liquidated the ghetto, shooting all the remaining Jews. The number of Jews killed was probably around 3,000 people, although Soviet sources give numbers that are somewhat higher.⁴ The mass shootings were carried out by a detachment of the Sipo outpost in Starokonstantinov, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police. In the fall of 1942, Ukrainian policemen arrested and shot several hundred additional Jews who were found in hiding.

In July 1944, nine men who served in the local police in Volochisk during the German occupation were tried by the Soviet authorities. All of them were found guilty, and six of them were sentenced to death and hanged in Volochisk, while the other three received terms of hard labor. According to evidence presented during the trial, some 4,000 Jews had been murdered in Volochisk in the summer of 1942.⁵

SOURCES The ghetto in Volochisk is mentioned in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2000), 4:277–278.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Volochisk can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-795); USHMM (RG-50.030*0123); and YVA (M-33/173).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. USHMM, RG-50.030*0123, interview with Frima Laub, May 7, 1990.

3. Ibid.

4. The documents of the ChGK indicate that more than 8,000 Jews were shot in one day. In our view, this number of victims is significantly too high. See GARF, 7021-64-795, pp. 94–96, 139.

5. YVA, M-33/173, as cited by Yitzhak Arad, The Holocaust in the Soviet Union (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2009), p. 584.

WARKOWICZE

Pre-1939: Warkowicze, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Varkovichi, Dubno raion, Rovno oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Warkowitschi, Rayon Dubno, Gebiet Dubno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Varkovychi, Rivne oblast’, Ukraine

Warkowicze is located 26 kilometers (16 miles) southwest of Równe. In 1921, there were 886 Jews living in Warkowicze (80.6 percent of the total population).

In September 1939, the Red Army occupied Warkowicze, and the area was soon annexed by the Soviet Union. At this time a Jewish kolkhoz was established near the town. On the eve of the German invasion in June 1941, including Jewish refugees that had arrived from central and western Poland in 1939, there were probably more than 1,200 Jews living in Warkowicze.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Warkowicze on June 27, 1941. On July 8, German security forces conducted an Aktion against members of the Jewish intelligentsia in which they shot at least three men and two women.¹ In July and August 1941, the town was under the control of a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur). The German military authorities ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and demanded the surrender of valuable gold and silver items, which were forwarded to Berlin.²

In September 1941, authority was transferred to a civil administration. Warkowicze was incorporated into Rayon Dubno within Gebiet Dubno. The Gebietskommissar was Nachwuchsführer Brocks, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer from the spring of 1942 was Leutnant Eberhardt.³

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German administration introduced a number of anti-Jewish measures in Warkowicze. Jews were required to wear distinguishing armbands bearing the Star of David and, later, a yellow patch on their chests and backs.⁴ Jews were forbidden to leave the limits of the town or to trade with non-Jews and were obliged to perform forced labor.

In April or May 1942, the Germans ordered the Jews to live in a certain part of the town, which became known as the ghetto.⁵ The ghetto was enclosed by a fence reinforced with barbed wire, but it was not always strictly guarded.⁶ About 20 families of Jewish artisans lived outside the ghetto. The Jews were required to perform the dirtiest jobs and were frequently beaten by the German and Ukrainian police. The two most notorious German policemen in the region were Papken and Hammerstein, who also participated in the liquidation of the Warkowicze ghetto.⁷

Shortly before the ghetto's liquidation, the Jews of Warkowicze began to learn from various sources, including the German press, about other towns in the region that had been rendered "cleansed of Jews" (judenrein). Then a group of Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) were instructed to prepare ditches at a sandpit about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside of town. Some Jews, especially the refugees from central and western Poland, understood these signs and fled the ghetto or went into hiding.⁸

One day in early October 1942,⁹ German and Ukrainian police forces surrounded the ghetto in the early morning hours and proceeded to round up the Jews. The Jews were then escorted to the ditches on foot, with the elderly and infirm transported on trucks. On their arrival, the Germans and their collaborators shot them into the mass graves. Because many Jews went into hiding or tried to escape, the Aktion lasted two or three days, as repeated searches were made for Jews in the ghetto and the surrounding area.¹⁰

According to Soviet sources, around 1,500 Jews from Warkowicze were shot together with up to 1,000 Jews from the neighboring village of Ozeriany.¹¹ Of the many Jews who were able to escape on the eve of the Aktion, most were recaptured with the aid of Ukrainian collaborators and other local inhabitants and subsequently were shot. About 25 escaped Jews, including several from Warkowicze, found shelter with sympathetic Czechs and Poles in the nearby village of Kurdyban. During 1943, this village came under frequent assault from Ukrainian nationalist partisans (Banderowcy) who attacked the Polish and Czech peasants. The Jews took up arms and fought with the peasants to resist these Ukrainian attacks.¹² The Red Army drove the Germans out of Warkowicze in early 1944. According to one estimate, about 200 Jews from Warkowicze managed to survive the German occupation.

SOURCES Brief articles on the Jewish community of Warkowicze can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 75–77; Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:207; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1425. The Warkowicze ghetto is mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 137.

Documentation on the persecution and extermination of the Jewish population of Warkowicze during the German occupation can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/2896); BA-L (B 162/5211); DARO (R436-1-4 and R534-1-4); GARF (7021-71-48); VHF (# 9590); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. DARO, R436-1-4, p. 78, Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, December 4, 1944.
2. BA-BL, R 2104/21, pp. 341–462.
3. Ibid., BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
4. VHF, # 9590, testimony of Anna Goldenberg-Schwarzcz.
5. DARO, R436-1-4, p. 78.
6. Boris Zabarko, ed., "Nur wir haben überlebt": Holocaust in Ukraine—Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004), pp. 335–336, testimony of Jefim Sacharow-Saidenberg; VHF, # 9590.
7. BA-L, B 162/5211, pp. 1–2, Esther Krik, New York, May 27, 1959.
8. AŽIH, 301/2896, testimony of F. Tabacznik.
9. Sources disagree on the precise date. DARO, R534-1-4, p. 81, dates the Aktion on October 7, 1942; another gives October 3, 1942.
10. BA-L, B 162/5211, pp. 1–2, Esther Krik, May 27, 1959.
11. GARF, 7021-71-48, pp. 52 and verso. According to Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, only 400 Jews were shot, while 1,600 escaped. In 1921, there were 796 Jews living in Ozeriany; see Blackbook of Localities Whose Jewish Population Was Exterminated by the Nazis (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1965), p. 221.
12. AŽIH, 301/2896; and Isaiah Trunk, Jewish Responses to Nazi Persecution: Collective and Individual Behavior in Extremis (New York: Stein and Day, 1979), pp. 250–252.

WERBA

Pre-1939: Werba, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Verba, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Werba, Rayon center, Gebiet Dubno, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Verba, Dubno raion, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Werba is located about 18 kilometers (11.2 miles) southwest of Dubno. According to the 1921 census, there were 228 Jews living in Werba (57 percent of the total population). By the middle of 1941, allowing for a natural increase of 9 to 10 persons per thousand per year, there would have been around 270 Jews living there.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Werba on June 24, 1941. In July and August 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the village. In September 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Werba was incorporated into Gebiet Dubno. Nachwuchsführer Brocks became the Gebietskommissar, and Gendarmerie-Leutnant Eberhardt was appointed as the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in 1942.¹ A Gendarmerie post and a Ukrainian police unit were established in Werba.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of antisemitic measures in Werba. The Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing markings, initially armbands bearing the Star of David, later, two yellow patches, to be worn one on their chest and one on the back of their clothing. The Jews had to perform forced labor, and they were not permitted to leave the limits of the village. The German authorities also ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was responsible for assigning Jews to forced labor tasks. Sometimes those sent out to perform forced labor did not return. Forced labor tasks included chopping wood for the Germans and agricultural work. No schools were permitted by the German authorities, but Jewish children still went clandestinely to Hebrew school in the teacher's house.²

On May 20, 1942, the German authorities established a ghetto in the town on two streets. Jews from neighboring villages also were resettled there. In total, there were 367 Jews in the ghetto.³ Accounts of survivors differ on whether there was a fence surrounding the ghetto. The ghetto inmates suffered from severe overcrowding, with around 10 people sharing a single room and others crammed into attics and sleeping on floors. There was no running water in the ghetto houses, and all water had to be collected from the well. No ration cards were issued to the Jews, but some Jews were able to sneak out and obtain food, such as bread, potatoes, and butter, from Czech colonists living nearby. The craftsmen and their families lived in a separate section of the ghetto apart from the rest of the Jews. The ghetto was guarded by the Ukrainian police who imposed a strict curfew and were tougher on the Jews than the few Germans based in the village.⁴

On May 30, 1942, the Germans conducted an Aktion against the Jews in the ghetto, resulting in around 285 Jews being shot near the village of Granovka.⁵ The mass shooting was carried out by an SD detachment from Równe, with the assistance of a platoon from the 1st Company of the 33rd Reserve Police Battalion.⁶

The craftsmen and their families in the separate section of the ghetto were not shot at the end of May. After the Aktion, the German authorities promised not to kill those who had survived, and the few Jews who had hidden themselves successfully joined the craftsmen in the remnant ghetto. However, in August 1942, the German and Ukrainian police conducted a second Aktion, shooting the remaining Jews. Including those discovered and shot in searches just after the Aktion, around 80 more Jews were arrested and shot.⁷

Some Jews managed to escape from the ghetto in time, most of them hiding and working with local peasants. However, some of these Jews were betrayed and subsequently killed; only a few survived until the return of the Red Army in March 1944.

SOURCES Articles about the Jewish population of Werba can be found in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), p. 86; and in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:230.

Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Werba can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/3057); DARO; GARF (7021-71-43); TsDAVO (3676-4-317); VHF (# 27031, 33586); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. VHF, # 33586, testimony of Nathan Alterman; and # 27031, testimony of Fred Manus.
3. Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, 4:230.
4. VHF, # 33586 and # 27031.
5. GARF, 7021-71-43, p. 2, gives the figure of 350 Jews killed. The actual number was probably slightly less; see Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, 4:230.
6. See the report of the HSSPF in Ukraine for the period June 1–30, 1942, TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 29.
7. VHF, # 27031.

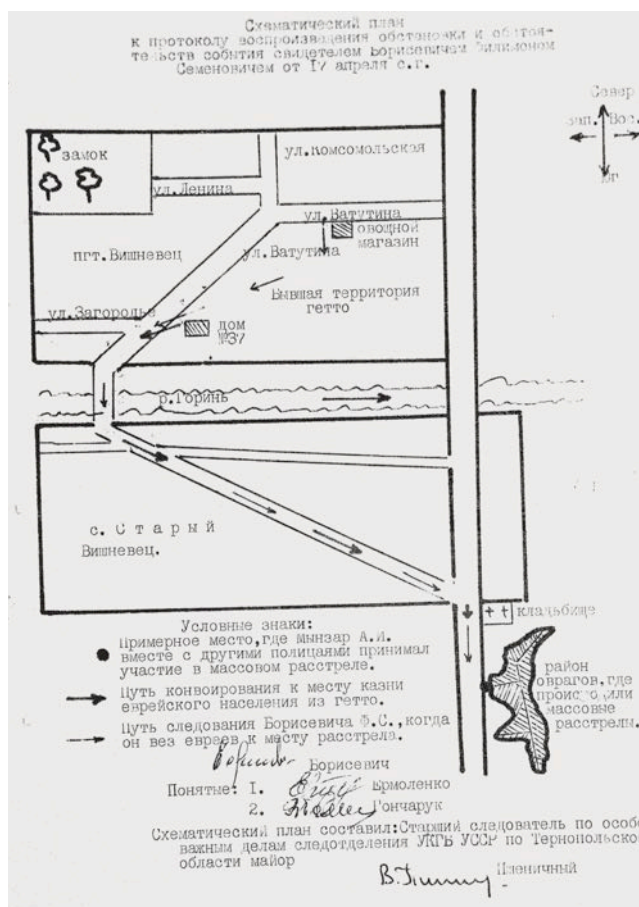

WIŚNIEWIEC

Pre-1939: Wiśniowiec (Yiddish: Vishnivits), town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Vishnevits, Ternopol' oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Wischnewez, Rayon center, Gebiet Kremenez, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Vysnivets', raion center, Ternopil' oblast', Ukraine

Wiśniowiec is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) north of Tarnopol. In 1937 there were 3,000 Jews in Wiśniowiec, and at the time of the German invasion there were probably about 4,000 Jews living in the town, including some refugees from central and western Poland.

German forces captured Wiśniowiec on July 2, 1941. Almost immediately, local Ukrainian police and other collaborators, with support from the Germans, began a reign of terror: plundering, abusing, torturing, and murdering Jews.

In September 1941, power was transferred to a civil administration. Wiśniowiec was a Rayon center in Gebiet Kremenez. The senior German official in the town was the German agricultural leader Steiger, who also exercised authority over the ghetto in Wiśniowiec. Steiger received his instructions from the Gebietskommissar in Krzemieniec, Regierungsrat Müller. The Ukrainian chief of the Rayon was Borisenko, and the head of the police was Bukovsky. The Ukrainian police was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie.¹

Sketch map of the Wiśniowiec ghetto, produced for a Soviet war-crimes investigation in 1984. The ghetto is located in the southeast quadrant of town, north of the Hoyrn River. The route taken to the killing site is marked by arrows, and the ravines where the shootings took place are indicated by hatching.

USHMMA/RG-31.018M

On March 16, 1942, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Wiśniowiec within only three days.² Several hundred Jews from the surrounding villages, including Świniuchy, Wyżgródek (Jewish population of 944 in 1921), and Oleśkincy, were relocated to Wiśniowiec around this time. Once the Jews had constructed the ghetto, more than 4,000 Jews were forced inside, and a Jewish Council (Judenrat) took charge of its internal affairs.³

In Wiśniowiec the Jews were ordered to choose their officials from among their own ranks; however, initially nobody agreed to serve. In the end, a few Jews drew up a list of candidates, and when the candidates did not consent, the Jews entreated them to accept the positions, lest the Germans punish the town's Jews for not choosing representatives.

Among the members of the Judenrat were Shlomo Ayzenberg (the treasurer in charge of collecting the fines imposed on the Jews), Hershl Margoliot (who was in charge of the conscription of workers to meet the Germans' demands), and Yaakov Markbayn (who ran the bakery). The chairman of the Judenrat was Koylnbrener, a refugee from Łódź who spoke German. According to the view of another Judenrat member, he was reportedly warmhearted and acted in the best interests of the community, which in turn offered him loyalty.⁴

The ghetto consisted of a narrow area of the town and extended along the length of one street—from the house of Alter Leyter to the house of the Mazurs. A high fence surrounded it, and any windows along the perimeter were blocked off. Every day the Judenrat had to send between 50 and 70 Jews for forced labor. At times the Jews were subjected to brutal and arbitrary beatings from the Ukrainian police.

The houses in the ghetto were always dark and very overcrowded. Tens of people lived in one room. Cleanliness was impossible to maintain, and everyone became infested with lice. Hunger was great, and there were few possibilities of getting food from any other sources. Initially, the Jews received 140 grams (4.9 ounces) of bread per day, some salt, and water. However, the rations were progressively reduced to 100 grams (3.5 ounces), then 60 grams (2.1 ounces). The children became swollen from prolonged hunger, and the women in particular got abscesses on their skin, which bled incessantly. Every day, there were four or five funerals—all for victims of hunger and disease.

The funerals were connected with mortal danger. The Ukrainian guards also came along to the Jewish cemetery, which was outside the ghetto, to further oppress and torture the few Jews who buried the dead, making sure that nobody escaped. The pallbearers also had barely enough strength left to carry the swollen corpses, but they still carried out this solemn obligation with great care. It was also necessary to bury the bodies to prevent the spread of epidemics.⁵

Jews working outside the ghetto were able to smuggle some food in, but they had to run the gauntlet of the Ukrainian guards, who took special pleasure in breaking any eggs they found and beating up the offender. Some Ukrainian guards also exploited the hunger of the Jews and made a vast profit by selling small amounts of food or accepting bribes.

On August 11, 1942, 10 SS men arrived from Krzemieniec and brought with them scores of armed Ukrainian policemen from the entire Gebiet. According to Zev Sobol's account, one of the SS men, who stood close to Herr Steiger, the scourge of the Jews of Wiśniowiec, gave a brief speech: "Today, we are putting an end to all the Jews in the ghetto. Go and bang on every window and door, and say, 'Get out, Jews, communists, traitors! Out of your houses!' Beat with clubs and whip the Jews who do not want to come out. But pay attention not to kill them in the ghetto. Take them outside of the town, to the assigned place, and annihilate them there."⁶

The Jews were beaten severely as they were gathered together and then marched out of the town under close escort.

As they went along, a truck circled around them, and the elderly, infirm, and children were brutally loaded onto it, thereby separating children from their parents. The Jews were taken to the valley beneath the old city, in the direction of Zbaraż. The Germans used the valley as a grave—prepared carefully for this purpose. The Jews were led to the pit in groups. Two policemen ordered them to strip down to their underpants. The clothes were placed together in a pile on the side. The victims were made to lie facedown in the pit, where Ukrainian police fired on them with automatic weapons, shooting them in the head. At the end the police also checked to make sure everybody was dead. The Ukrainians carried out their work with dispatch and were rewarded with some of the clothes of the people who were shot.⁷

According to a German report prepared by SS-Untersturmführer Selm for the Commander of the Security Police and SD in Równe, during this first Aktion against the Wiśniowiec ghetto on August 11–12, 1942, the Germans and their Ukrainian collaborators shot 2,669 people (600 men, 1,160 women, and 909 children).⁸

Some Jews managed to hide in bunkers during the initial ghetto clearance, while Steiger selected a few others at the grave as useful craftsmen. However, according to the testimony of Ukrainian policemen, there were several follow-up Aktions over the ensuing weeks, in which the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police murdered several hundred Jews in the same manner. By November 1942 the ghetto itself was almost completely destroyed, and no more Jews were living in the town.⁹

Only a handful of Jews managed to escape the systematic murder campaign of the Germans and their Ukrainian collaborators. Sobol managed to escape twice: first by falling from the bridge into the river as the column of victims was being marched to the grave site. A non-Jew subsequently denounced him to the Ukrainian police after initially hiding him, but Sobol then also managed to escape from the synagogue where he was being held. After that he hid mostly on farms, taking food from the animals. He did not make contact with the Soviet partisans until shortly before the town was liberated. Unfortunately, his brother was tracked down by a German police dog and murdered just before the arrival of the Red Army.¹⁰

A number of local policemen from Wiśniowiec were tried after the liberation. Among those tried were Yakov Ostrovsky and the Poslovsky brothers, who were captured and handed over to the Soviet authorities by some of the few remaining Jewish survivors. Other Ukrainian policemen sentenced by the Soviets included Aleksandr Khomits'kii and Kyrylo Filyk. Most were sentenced to 25 years of hard labor but were then released during the 1950s.¹¹

SOURCES The yizkor book for Wiśniowiec, edited by Chaim Rabin, Vishnivits: Sefer zikaron li-kedoshe Vishnivits she-nispu be-sho'at ha-natsim (Tel Aviv: Irgun 'ole Vishnivits, 1979), contains several survivor accounts relevant to the period of the Holocaust.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: GARF; USHMM (RG-31.018M and RG-22.002M); and YVA.

Martin Dean and Andrew Koss

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; USHMM, RG-31.018.M (KGB Archives Ternopol' oblast'), D-7719, case against Kyrylo F. Filyk, statement of Yakov Y. Ostrovsky (frame 8602).

2. "The Nazi Horrors in Wisniowiec," by a survivor, in Rabin, Vishnivits, pp. 311–325.

3. The figure of at least 4,000 is given both by the Jewish survivor Zev Sobol and the Ukrainian policeman Yakov Ostrovsky. According to the ChGK report, the ghetto initially held about 4,000 Jews but then expanded to up to 6,000, as Jews arrived from the surrounding villages; see GARF, 7021-75-3, pp. 28–32. The anonymous survivor, who appears to have been linked to the Judenrat, also estimates more than 4,000 Jews in the ghetto, including some 1,000 from Wyżgródek; see "The Nazi Horrors in Wisniowiec."

4. "The Nazi Horrors in Wisniowiec."

5. Ibid.

6. Zev Sobol, "The Ghetto in Wisniowiec," in Rabin, Vishnivits, pp. 298–310.

7. Ibid.

8. IPN, GKŚZpNP, Zbiór zespołów szczątkowych jednostek SS i policji, sygn. 77, pp. 2–3, transcription of a Security Police report dated Rowno, August 15, 1942, on the "special treatment" of Jews in the Krzemieniec district.

9. USHMM, RG-31.018.M (KGB Archives Ternopol' oblast'), D-7719, case against Kyrylo F. Filyk, statement of Yakov Y. Ostrovsky (frame 8602); D-27414, case against Aleksandr V. Khomits'kii, ChGK report from 1944 (frame 9417); and reel 24, Arch. no. 33533, D-91, case against Aleksandr Ivanovich M'inzar (1984).

10. Sobol, "The Ghetto in Wisniowiec."

11. Ibid.; USHMM, RG-31.018.M (KGB Archives Ternopol' oblast'), D-27414, case against Aleksandr V. Khomits'kii; D-7719, case against Kyrylo F. Filyk.

WŁODZIMIERZEC

Pre-1939: Włodzimierzec, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Vladimirets, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Wladimierz, Rayon center, Gebiet Sarny, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Volodymyrets', raion center, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Włodzimierzec is located 34 kilometers (21 miles) west-northwest of Sarny. In 1921, the Jewish population was 1,262 (43 percent of the total population). Allowing for a natural increase of approximately 9 or 10 people per 1,000 each year, by the middle of 1941 there would have been approximately 1,500 Jews in Włodzimierzec. They were joined by a number of refugees from Brześć and other towns following the German occupation of central and western Poland.

Four days after the German invasion on June 22, 1941, about 500 young men, Jews and non-Jews, were mobilized in Włodzimierzec. They were sent to Sarny and organized into a battalion. As the Red Army withdrew, German forces captured the battalion. The Jews were then separated out and murdered.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Włodzimierzec on July 17, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German local military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the village. By September 1941, the German civil administration had taken over and incorporated the town in Gebiet Sarny as a Rayon center. Kameradschaftsführer Huala became the Gebietskommissar, and from the spring of 1942, Leutnant der Schutzpolizei Albert Schumacher was the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.¹ In the town, a German Gendarmerie post was established, with several Gendarmes, who also supervised the activities of the local Ukrainian police.

Following the retreat of the Red Army, a period of anarchy ensued, during which a mob of local Ukrainians started a pogrom, tormenting and robbing Jews and killing two who attempted to resist. The looting continued until the entry of German forces. A small delegation of Jews led by Yakov Eisenberg asked the priest, Sokhazhanit, to intervene. He promised to protect Jewish lives but not their property.²

The summer and fall of 1941 saw the implementation of a series of anti-Jewish measures in the town. First, the German authorities registered the Jews. They ordered them to wear distinctive markings: initially, armbands bearing the Star of David and, later, a yellow patch on their chest and back. Jews also had to mark their homes with a blue Star of David. They were prohibited from going beyond the limits of the town. They were not permitted to buy food from non-Jews, and as a result, they lived in a state of near starvation. The Ukrainian police subjected Jews to systematic requisitions, lootings, and beatings.

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established in the village, with Eisenberg as its head.³ The Judenrat served as the channel of communications between the German occupation authorities and the Jewish population, transmitting their regulations and demands. A Jewish police force for maintaining security, consisting of a few Jews, was set up under the authority of the Jewish Council.

The German authorities levied a "fine" of 4 grams (0.14 ounce) of gold for every Jew, which the Judenrat fulfilled with the aid of community members who had the means to assist. All livestock belonging to Jews was confiscated. The Jews were required to report each morning for forced labor, such as street cleaning, road repair, and work at the sawmill. Workers received payment in the form of a daily ration of 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread. Some Jews planted vegetable gardens as a source of additional food. In December 1941, Jews were ordered to turn in their fur garments and pay another fine in the form of fabric for clothing, jewelry, winter coats, and 5 grams (0.18 ounce) of gold and 100 rubles per head. Lacking the means to meet this demand, the Judenrat received some aid from the local Polish priest, Dominik Walcinowicz, who also asked his parishioners to help the Jews. The head of the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police, Andrei Mokha, was a friend of Eisenberg and placed some restraints on the behavior of the men under his command.⁴

In late April 1942, right after Passover, the German authorities established an "open ghetto" in Włodzimierzec. Jews from the surrounding smaller communities were also taken from their homes and forced into the ghetto. An estimated 3,000 Jews were concentrated in the ghetto area.⁵ The ghetto in Włodzimierzec existed for scarcely more than four months. As their impending fate became increasingly clear from news of massacres in the other communities of the region, the Jews of the town prayed and wept behind closed doors, reciting from Torah scrolls that had been kept hidden. In mid-August, a local Ukrainian brought word that pits were being dug on the road to Żółkinie. Eisenberg asked the German police for an explanation but was assured that this report was a false rumor. As the workweek began on Sunday, August 23, the number of Ukrainian police guarding the forced labor groups increased. They told the Jews of a plan to remove all those who were unfit for productive labor. Confronted with this threat, the Judenrat considered setting the ghetto on fire in the event of an Aktion, hoping to create enough confusion for people to flee. But after careful consideration, this idea was rejected.⁶

On August 27, 1942, all the Jews were ordered to gather on the market square, which was cordoned off by the police. The Jews were held there for a day and a night. At about 10:00 or 11:00 A.M. on August 28, some Jews tried to escape following an accidental shot, but the police opened fire, killing many Jews on the town's streets as they fled in all directions. Local policemen also finished off any Jews they found in hiding, including the nine-month-old baby of a Jewish woman named Burko, which she had entrusted to the Christian resident Anna Yerofeyevna Guzey as she fled.⁷

The Germans divided the remaining Jews into separate groups: one for the Judenrat and their families, one for specialist workers, and a third for "worthless Jews." Suddenly a Ukrainian policeman called out, "Whoever has hidden gold, silver, or other valuables can come with us and remove them from the hiding places. Those who do this will be allowed to remain alive." Some Jews also tried to move discreetly from the group of "worthless Jews" to that of specialist workers.⁸

However, the hopes that some might be preserved were soon dashed. Later that day the remaining Jews, starting with the Judenrat members and their families, were escorted by the German and Ukrainian police in the direction of the village of Żółkinie. The Ukrainian police chief had offered his friend Eisenberg a place to hide, but Eisenberg declined, saying that "the fate of my people shall be my fate as well."⁹ The Jews were led to the Smoliarna Forest 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside the town, where three mass graves had been prepared. Here the men and women were separated and made to undress; then a German shot them in the trench in groups of 5 with a machine gun. Local peasants also collected the bodies of those killed in the town, taking them to be buried in the same mass graves. In total, some 2,000 Jews were murdered during the “ghetto liquidation.”¹⁰

Apparently the shooting was directed by a squad of Security Police and SD from the office in Równe and was carried out with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. Only a few dozen Jews were able to evade the Aktion and the relentless searches that followed. Amazingly Mordechai Weissman survived by simply running as fast as he could just moments before he was due to be shot.¹¹

Ukrainian Baptists and Polish peasants aided some of the escapees. Others joined various partisan units: Soviet, Soviet-Polish, and Jewish. Soviet partisan forces liberated the town on January 12, 1944. One survivor who returned, Eliahu Kutz, assisted the People’s Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) in identifying collaborators and murderers. A Soviet court in Rovno tried those who were caught, sentencing them to hard labor in Siberia.¹²

SOURCES A number of personal testimonies can be found in the yizkor book edited by A. Meyerowitz, Sefer Vladimerets, galei lezekher iranu (Tel Aviv: Former Residents of Vladimirets in Israel, 1963). There is also an article on the history of the town with some information about the annihilation of the Jewish population in Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 84–86.

Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews of the town can be found in the following archives: ANA; AŽIH; BA-BL; DARO; GARF (7021-71-44); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Samuel Fishman
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942. Schumacher (born January 29, 1891) apparently died on April 8, 1945; see BA-L, ZStL, 204 AR-Z 113/67 (II 204 AR 1088/64), Sachstandsvermerk, June 7, 1967 (Gebietskommissariat Sarny), p. 7.

2. Meyerowitz, Sefer Vladimerets, pp. 312, 356.

3. Ibid., p. 313. Other Judenrat members were Natan and Yaakov Cherniak (brothers) and Ben Zion Tchuk.

4. Ibid., pp. 314, 339.

5. Spector, Pinkas ha-kehillot, 5:86. The figure of 3,000 ghetto inhabitants is probably too high.

6. Meyerowitz, Sefer Vladimerets, pp. 316–317.

7. ANA, Special Investigations Unit, PU104/O, statements of Pavel Grigoryevich Kozoriz, Alexey Vasilyevich Khutky, and Olga Fyodorovna Dulyanitskaya, taken by the Soviet authorities in Vladimirets in January 1988.

8. Mordechai Weissman, “My Escape from the Ditches of Slaughter,” in Meyerowitz, Sefer Vladimerets.

9. Meyerowitz, Sefer Vladimerets, p. 317.

10. Testimony of K.O. Koshmak in M. Gon, ed., Holokost na Rivnenshchyni (Dokumenty i materialy) (Dnipropetrovsk: Tsentr “Tkuma”; Zaporizhzhia: Prem’er, 2004), pp. 57–58. According to the materials of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the Germans massacred about 2,000 Jews; see GARF, 7021-71-44, p. 4.

11. Weissman, “My Escape from the Ditches of Slaughter.” An English translation of this account is also available in Jack Kugelmass and Jonathan Boyarin, eds., From a Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998), pp. 208–212.

12. Meyerowitz, Sefer Vladimerets, p. 359.

WŁODZIMIERZ WOŁYŃSKI

Pre-1939: Włodzimierz Wołyński, town, Włodzimierz powiat, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941 and 1944–1990: Vladimir-Volynskii, raion center, Volyn oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Wladimir-Wolynsk, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Volodymyr-Volyns’kyi, Volyn oblast’, Ukraine

Włodzimierz Wołyński is located about 77 kilometers (48 miles) west of Łuck. In 1937, more than 11,500 Jews lived in Włodzimierz, comprising 39 percent of the total population; Poles accounted for 43 percent; Ukrainians, 14 percent; and there were also a few Czechs, Germans, and Russians.

On June 23, 1941, the 298th Infantry Division captured Włodzimierz, receiving a warm welcome from the town’s Ukrainian population. Very few of Włodzimierz’s Jews could flee or be mobilized for military service beforehand.

For the next 10 months, first under military administration and then (after September 1, 1941) under civil administration, the Jews of Włodzimierz suffered systematic persecution, forced labor, and murder. Between 1,600 and 2,000 Jews were killed in this period by Wehrmacht troops, Sipo-SD murder squads, and Ukrainian Auxiliary Police (many of whom were members of the Andrii Mel’nyk faction of the extremist Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists, or OUN). The victims included most members of the first Judenrat, which the Germans had installed on or about July 7.

The establishment of a ghetto in Włodzimierz is dated to April 13, 1942. A 2-meter-high (6.6-foot-high) barbed-wire fence surrounded it. The external guards were Ukrainians; Jewish Police patrolled inside. Judenrat members and doctors were allowed to live outside the ghetto, but some of their female relatives found that the ghetto gave them more protection against harassment. The overcrowded ghetto was soon racked by hunger and a typhus epidemic, which was exacerbated by a shortage of medicine. Anybody caught trying to smuggle food into the ghetto was punished. The Germans assumed a ghetto population of at least 15,000 Jews in mid-1942; members of the Judenrat estimated about 18,000 Jews living there.¹

At the end of May, the ghetto was divided into two sections. These were known to Jews as the “living ghetto” for skilled workers (set off by the right side of Katedralna Street, as well as Wodopójcza, Pawłowskiego, Browarna, and Gorka Streets) and the “dead ghetto” for unskilled workers (defined by the left side of Katedralna Street, as well as Strzelecka, Kolejowa, and Farna Streets). The gates between the ghettos were guarded by the Jewish Police. Passage between the ghettos was limited to specific hours.²

Only Jews holding work permits could exit the ghetto, leaving and returning daily in groups. Forced labor assignments included such tasks as cleaning for the German police, working in a marmalade factory, delivering mineral water, and agricultural work. In August 1942, some Jews were assigned to dig sections of a ditch for a secret cable from Berlin to Kiev, which cost most of them their lives.³

In the last week of August 1942, hundreds of Jews were ordered to Piatydnie, several kilometers west of Włodzimierz, where they had to dig three large pits. The Jews were told that they were for a fuel depot. When the workers returned, Jews in the ghetto began to panic and to prepare hideouts. The Judenrat met with the Gebietskommissar (Wilhelm Westerheide, a 33-year-old former salesman) daily in late August. In an effort to delay the Aktion, council member Symcha Bergman gave Westerheide the best diamonds he could find. In the meantime, Jews working in agriculture were brought back to Włodzimierz, as were Jews from villages where no ghetto had been set up, such as Błażenik.⁴

In the early hours of September 1, 1942, the Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto. At 6:00 A.M., the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police stormed the ghetto for unskilled workers. The Jews were forced out of their houses, rounded up at one of the gates, loaded onto trucks, and driven off to Piatydnie. The forced laborers in the ghetto for skilled workers were not allowed to go to work. As the day wore on, trucks full of clothing began to return to Włodzimierz. That afternoon, the Germans and Ukrainian police entered the ghetto for skilled workers as well.⁵

At Piatydnie, the Jews were forced to undress and were shot into the pits. According to survivors, one Jew refused to undress. When confronted by a German, the Jew struck his tormentor, but he was promptly beheaded by Ukrainian policemen. Zipporah Veinshtok was one of only two Jews who escaped from the pits. Both were slightly wounded and got away under cover of darkness. They recount that members of the German administration had set up a table at the killing site so they could eat and drink during the shooting.⁶

The operation in Włodzimierz and its vicinity lasted two weeks. It is estimated that by September 15, 1942, 14,000 Jews had been murdered at Piatydnie, most from the Włodzimierz ghetto. Another 4,000 Jews were murdered in the Włodzimierz prison. As word spread that the Aktion was over, Jews emerged from their hiding places and returned from the countryside. The Jews were assured that the survivors would be left alive, and gradually the number of Jews swelled to several thousand. Many were put to work cleaning up the ghetto and sorting the belongings of the murdered Jews. Clothes and furniture were given away or sold at low prices to the local population. In November, the ghetto was divided into two, one half for skilled workers and the other half for unskilled workers. New work papers were issued to 865 people.⁷

On November 13, 1942, the ghetto for unskilled workers was liquidated in a surprise operation, resulting in the murder of about 4,000 Jews. The Germans repeatedly combed the ghetto until the end of the year. In January 1943, there were around 800 Jews officially living in the ghetto; the actual number was over 1,000. In Włodzimierz, the Germans counted 8,628 people compared to 29,600 in 1937. Soviet and especially Nazi policies had reduced the population by 70 percent.⁸

The Włodzimierz ghetto, the only ghetto remaining in Reichskommissariat Ukraine, now consisted of 17 buildings. It was no longer enclosed, and the Jews could even dispense with their outer markings. The skilled laborers worked as shoemakers, haberdashers, tailors, carpenters, masons, and photographers. There was a bakery, a small distillery, a laundry, a small production site for brushes, a sign shop, and a suitcase-maker's workshop. Conditions in the ghetto were impossibly overcrowded and filthy, and the inhabitants suffered from hunger and disease. This situation continued for a year. In October 1943, Sonderkommando 4b was transferred to Włodzimierz. By November, the Red Army was crossing the Dniepr River in Kiev. Rather than move the remaining Jews west, the Germans decided to kill them. On December 13, 1943, Sonderkommando 4b and its auxiliaries, an ethnically mixed unit, stormed the ghetto. The Jews were taken to the local prison, forced to undress, then loaded onto trucks, driven to a small wooded area near Falemicze, east of Włodzimierz, and shot. The corpses were subsequently burned on a pyre. It is believed that up to 1,200 Jews were murdered in this Aktion.⁹

Jewish resistance in the ghetto is linked to both the local prisoner-of-war (POW) camp for officers, Oflag XI (later Stalag 365), which formally transferred to Włodzimierz on September 9, 1941, and to the various partisan movements in and around the town. In the summer of 1942, a group of about 30 men, contrary to the wishes of the Judenrat, sought to make contact with nearby partisans. It was at this time that the Sipo-SD regional office for Wolhynien und Podolien reported to Berlin that an unknown partisan group, together with "Bolshevik agents" and "the ghetto," had planned to stage an uprising and liberate the POWs, mostly officers. In crushing these plans, the Sipo exposed and liquidated "36 Communist officials and 76 Jewish-Bolshevik officers."¹⁰

Available sources suggest there was little Jewish resistance activity in the Włodzimierz ghetto. Two young Jews with revolvers were shot during the November 1942 Aktion. Another Jew was found to have a revolver, but such isolated instances did not threaten the Nazis. There existed a small Jewish-led unit in the Włodzimierz area under Dora Zil'bert, but little is known about it. Boris Iakovlevich Bazykin led a unit affiliated with Soviet partisans under the command of A.A. Brinskii; Bazykin and his men were wiped out by the right-wing extremist Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA) in the autumn of 1943.¹¹ A few Jews from the Włodzimierz ghetto may have joined the Zil'bert or Bazykin units, but making contact with the partisans was difficult.

Soviet partisan units were the least dangerous for Jews, but the area was dominated by Ukrainian and Polish groups. The mother and son team of Mariia and Stepan Veremchuk escorted Jews from the Włodzimierz ghetto to the Soviet partisans under Nikolai “Kruk” Konishchuk, based near Kowel. Despite much mutual hostility and suspicion, individual activists of the Polish Home Army (AK) took in a number of Jews.¹² Jews in the ghetto made contact with the UPA but soon decided that the Ukrainian partisans were “no better than the Nazis.” Indeed, by November 1943, the Germans and the UPA in Włodzimierz reached an agreement to fight the Soviet and Polish partisans together. Those Jews found among the UPA ranks tended to be pressed into service and were often murdered once the Germans withdrew.¹³

In the spring of 1943, the UPA launched a full-blown uprising against the Germans. Confined almost exclusively to Volhynia, this uprising was linked to a campaign of mass murder to drive the Poles from the region. As a result, Jews in hiding found their hideouts or cover jeopardized. Many Polish rescuers had to flee to Włodzimierz or to the west. Some Jews were murdered in the Ukrainian-Polish conflict. Despite the hazards of ghetto life, Jews in the countryside faced increased pressure to return to Włodzimierz.¹⁴

In addition, the partisan war spoiled German plans to move the Jewish workforce in Włodzimierz to Lublin. These considerations may at least have delayed the murder of the remaining Jews of Włodzimierz for several weeks, after the arrival of Sipo-SD forces. When the Włodzimierz ghetto was liquidated, its status as an open ghetto, close to prepared hideouts, may have given the Jews slightly better chances of survival than would have been possible in the Lublin labor camps.

Within Włodzimierz, the ratio of righteous gentiles among Poles and Ukrainians appears to reflect the demographics of the town. Among the Ukrainians, the Miaskovs’kyi family took in Paulina Cohen after her parents and brothers were killed in the November 1942 massacre. During the mass killing operation in September 1942, the Vavrysevych family provided temporary refuge for at least 13 Jews, some of whom then returned to the ghetto. Those who remained under their protection survived. Among the Poles, Helena Żebrowska and her husband, both clerks in the local German administration, saved Dosia Goldgreber and her husband. After the liquidation of the ghetto, the Żebrowskas saw to it that the Goldgrebers were hidden outside the town. A Czech family helped Sara (Yukelis) Lichtmann.¹⁵ Oleksii Mel’nichuk of Tumin, some 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) east of Włodzimierz, saved 11 Włodzimierz Jews. Mel’nichuk even joined the UPA at the urging of the Jews, using his position to warn them of UPA sweeps. He was arrested for UPA membership when the Red Army returned, but his former charges secured his release.¹⁶

The Red Army forced the Germans out of Włodzimierz on July 20, 1944. Around 140 Jews who lived in Włodzimierz during the Holocaust survived the war, less than 1 percent of the ghetto population at its peak. Some of those who survived were subsequently conscripted into the Red Army. At least seven Jews from Włodzimierz were killed in the last six months of the war.¹⁷ Westerheide was tried in Germany for his activities in Włodzimierz, but he was acquitted in 1982 due to insufficient evidence.¹⁸

Undated portrait of rescuer, Galina Filatova-Miaskovskoiya (second left) and her family. Filatova helped to hide Paulina Kon [Cohen], an escapee from the Włodzimierz Wołyński ghetto.

USHMM WS # 57649, COURTESY OF JFR

SOURCES Publications concerning the Włodzimierz ghetto and partisan warfare in the region include the following: Pinkas Ludmir (Tel Aviv: Irgun Yotzei Ludmir, Israel, 1962); Janusz Bardach and Kathleen Gleeson, Man Is Wolf to Man: Surviving the Gulag (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998); Elżbieta Isakiewicz, Harmonica: Jews Relate How Poles Saved Them from the Holocaust (Warsaw: Polska Agencja Informacyjna, 2000); and Władysław Filar, Michał Klimecki, and Mychajło Szwahulak, “Chronologia wydarzeń na Wołyniu i w Galicji Wschodniej w latach 1939–1945 [project],” in Polska-Ukraina: Trudne Pytania, vol. 6 (Warsaw: KARTA, 1999).

There are numerous sources available on the Włodzimierz ghetto, first and foremost the statements by survivors housed at AŻIH (301). Two of these have been published in Michał Grynberg, ed., Życie i zagłada Żydów polskich: 1939–1945. Relacje świadków (Warsaw: Oficyna Naukowa, 2003), but all of them are also available at USHMM (RG-15.084). Testimonies by survivors and perpetrators can be found in the criminal investigations into Wilhelm Westerheide (ZSSSta-D, 45 Js 24/62). The records at YVA, especially those concerning the Righteous Among the Nations (M.31), deserve mention. Relevant documentation can also be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; DAVO; GARF; IPN; NARA; and VHF.

Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. Pinkas Ludmir, p. 85; AŻIH, 301/2014, p. 4; Bardach and Gleeson, Man Is Wolf to Man, p. 380; BA-BL, R 58/222, Meldungen aus den besetzten Ostgebieten no. 12, July 17, 1942 (15,000); also, DP 3/2148, statement by E.M.H., July 3, 1979, p. 4 (18,000—H., as secretary to the Włodzimierz Landwirtschaftsführer received her information from Judenrat members in 1942).

2. Pinkas Ludmir, p. 440; AŻIH, 301/2014, p. 4; 301/694, p. 2.
3. Pinkas Ludmir, pp. 85–86; AŻIH, 301/2014, p. 4; 301/694, pp. 2–3; Isakiewicz, Harmonica, p. 110.
4. Pinkas Ludmir, pp. 86, 444; AŻIH, 301/694, p. 3; 301/2014, p. 5; 301/2298.
5. Pinkas Ludmir, pp. 444–445.
6. AŻIH, 301/4987, Herbst, p. 2; 301/2014, p. 7; 301/2794; Nathaniel Deutsch, The Maiden of Ludmir (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003), p. 236.
7. Pinkas Ludmir, pp. 86–87, 480, 610; AŻIH, 301/2014, p. 8.
8. Pinkas Ludmir, pp. 87, 611; AŻIH, 301/2014, p. 10; Zentralblatt des Reichskommissars für die Ukraine, January 9, 1943, p. 11.
9. Pinkas Ludmir, pp. 87, 611; ZSSSta-D, 45 Js 24/62, Bd. XVIII, pp. 61–72, statement by Wilhelm Braune; Bd. XL, pp. 305–306, letter from defense attorneys, May 31, 1970.
10. Pinkas Ludmir, p. 85; BA-BL, R 58/222, Meldungen aus den besetzten Ostgebieten no. 12, July 17, 1942.
11. Pinkas Ludmir, p. 87; Ster Elisavetskii, Polveka zabvenii evrei v dvizhenii soprotivleniia i partizanskoi bor'be v Ukraine 1941–1945 (Kiev, 1998), p. 89; Józef Sobiesiak and Ryszard Jegorow, Burzany (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Ministerstwa Obrony Narodowej, 1962), pp. 187–195.
12. YVA, M.31/6594; ZSSSta-D, 45 Js 24/62, Bd. XXXII, p. 21, statement by Josef Strassberger; Encyclopedia of the Righteous among the Nations, Rescuers of Jews during the Holocaust, Poland (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2004), 1:191–192, 2:800; Józef Czerwiński, Z wołyńskich lasów na berliński trakt (Warsaw: Wydawnictwo Ministerstwa Obrony Narodowej, 1985), pp. 69–70.
13. ZSSSta-D, 45 Js 24/62, Bd. XXXII, p. 139, statement by Peter Korduner. Dr. Hirszt Bubes was murdered in Włodzimierz by a Ukrainian nurse after the German retreat—see Louis Falstein, ed., The Martyrdom of Jewish Physicians in Poland (New York: Exposition Press, 1963), p. 324.
14. Encyclopedia of the Righteous, Poland, 1:228, 2:758.
15. YVA, M.31/3916; M.31/2507; Encyclopedia of the Righteous, Poland, 2:934; Isakiewicz, Harmonica, pp. 109–122; ZSSSta-D, 45 Js 24/62, Bd. XXXII, statement by Sara (Yukelis) Lichtmann, p. 159.
16. YVA, M.31/5926.
17. Knyha Pam'iaty Ukrainy, vol. 1, Volyn'ska oblast' (L'viv: Kameniar, 1995), pp. 44–56.
18. New York Times, December 21, 1982.

WOŁCZYN

Pre-1939: Wołczyn (Yiddish: Voltchin), town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1941–1944: Wołtschin, Rayon Motykali, Gebiet Brest-Litowsk (Land), Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Vouchyn, Beras'tse voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Wołczyn is located 34 kilometers (21 miles) northwest of Brześć. Former Wołczyners estimate that on the eve of World War II about 500 Jews lived there (about 70 families). A German census from early 1942 indicates that 784 Jews were still alive in Rayon Motykali. Thus there were probably about 350 Jews from Czerniawczyce and other villages, in addition to those from Wołczyn, as there was no significant Jewish population in Motykali, and the same source states that most Jews had already been ghettoized.¹

On the morning of June 22, 1941, the Germans conducted a heavy bombardment of the area around Wołczyn, destroying some Jewish homes and businesses. Soon after, they occupied the town. A few days later, Krause, a German about 50 years old, arrived with a few civilians who spoke Russian and German and began to organize a local administration. He appointed a Pole, Korszniewski, as mayor, and an ex-prisoner, Rose, also a Catholic, as head of the police. Three or four men from neighboring villages, including opponents of the Soviet government and former criminals, formed the police force.²

The area around Wołczyn was initially part of Dystrykt Białystok (attached to East Prussia), but on January 1, 1942, it was transferred to Gebiet Brest-Litowsk (Land), in Reichskommissariat Ukraine, forming the new Rayon of Motykali. The Gebietskommissar in Brześć (city) was Curt Rolle; he was replaced in October 1942 by Franz Burat, who retained the responsibility he had exercised previously for the surrounding Rayons. In October 1942 (just after the ghetto liquidation), the strength of the local police (Schutzmannschaft) in Rayon Motykali was 62, but most were probably based at the two police stations in Łyszczycze and Czerniawczyce.³

The Germans soon created a Jewish Council (Judenrat), summoning a few prominent Jews and forcing them to accept positions. They included Shlomko Zufrik, Avrum Kupersmidt, and Berenson from the mill of Kotera. The Judenrat had to collect valuables and hand over people for forced labor.

From early in the occupation, Jews were assigned to back-breaking work duties, sent to labor camps, tortured, and shot according to the Germans' moods. Some residents left for other towns such as Wysokie, which was larger and offered more places to hide.

After a few months of the occupation, a ghetto was created. The Jews could only take essential items with them to their new quarters, which were terribly crowded. The sick and children lived in the synagogue; some people lived in storehouses, barns, and even cowsheds. In Mordeku's grain barn, they put those who arrived from the town of Czerniawczyce. Across from the barn, the home of Isar Midler was taken over by officials: the chief of police, the head of the village, and the Judenrat met there.⁴

Former Wołczyn resident Shmuel Englender, who escaped his family's fate by joining the Red Army, has reconstructed the ghetto boundaries. Extending its northern and eastern borders to the Pulva River (a tributary of the Bug), the ghetto was bordered on the south by the Christian homes of Old Wołczyn and on the west by the main road, marked by a wooden fence. Englender also identified four entrances to the ghetto: only one of these was intended for ghetto inmates departing on work details, the remainder being reserved for the guards and members of the Judenrat. One exit, near the post office, was used for removing the bodies of Jews who died from hunger and disease. In the Jewish cemetery, outside the ghetto, a pit would be dug, its size determined by the number of bodies brought over that night. No markers were left on these graves.

1500 VOLHYNIA AND PODOLIA REGION

Around the Wołczyn ghetto, the occupiers erected a fence about 2 meters (6.6 feet) high and patrolled by guards. Near the church, the fence was wooden; by the river, it was wire. According to the villager Vera Vladimirovna Shpagina: “After they put up the fence, it was impossible to get out of the ghetto without permission.”⁵

Policemen were the first, and then the rest of the villagers confiscated goods from the Jewish homes. Some Jews hid things in their yards and had villagers dig out their treasures, which the Jews traded for a little food. Life in the ghetto was very harsh. There was great hunger. Jews were given only 150 to 200 grams (5.3 to 7 ounces) of bread per day. Half of it was sawdust. From time to time, there was some milk for the children. Many died from hunger and disease.⁶

Eyewitness testimony from villagers record that two or three days before the massacre, strangers arrived in Wołczyn. The guards around the ghetto were reinforced, especially near the river, where the fence was made only of wire.

On the morning of September 22, 1942, local people assisted in completing a pit just outside of town. Meanwhile in the ghetto, Krause, Rose, Korszniewski, and the Judenrat walked from one Jewish house to another and ordered everyone to congregate at the synagogue. There, the German Krause ordered that within an hour everyone should collect their belongings, dress in their best clothing, and report to be moved to a larger ghetto in nearby Wysokie. Before the end of the hour, the Judenrat and the police checked the houses again to make sure no one was there.

The sick and disabled were put on carts, as were the Jews’ belongings. The rest of the Jews were ordered to walk to the edge of the village in the direction of Wysokie. They stopped at a former sand quarry, 200 meters (656 feet) from the end of Wołczyn. There they were immediately surrounded by policemen and Germans. After a while, they were told to turn right towards a “pit,” about 60 meters wide by 30 meters long (197 by 98 feet). The Germans and their Belorussian and Polish helpers ordered the Jews to undress. Poltrok said, “All at once, everybody began to scream and cry. Only then did they probably understand what was going to happen.”⁷

Available sources indicate that the massacre was conducted by about nine Germans and about 20 local policemen from Wołczyn and other nearby stations. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) reported that 497 people were shot on that day. It is estimated that 395 were from Wołczyn, and 102 were from Czerniawczyce.⁸ The report gives some chilling details:

The killings, by shooting, were conducted in groups of three to five people. They were led to the edge of the pit, were shot, and thrown into the pit. People were shouting, crying, and begging for mercy—nothing helped. The fascists ignored all and continued with the shootings. Those who refused to go to the pit were shot on the spot, and, sometimes when they were still alive, dragged into the pit. Some of the babies were lifted from the ground into the air, shot, and thrown into the pit.⁹

According to a German report, a few Jewish craftsmen were kept alive in Wołczyn at the time of the massacre and were presumably murdered a few weeks later.¹⁰ Those sent previously to work on road construction projects either shared the fate of the Brześć Jews, most of whom were transported by train to Bronna Góra in mid-October 1942 and were murdered there, or were killed around Brześć as the remaining labor camps were liquidated. One local inhabitant recalled that some 500 Jews were killed in Motykali shortly after the Wołczyn massacre; these were reportedly escapees from the Brześć ghetto, who were recaptured by the Germans and local helpers.¹¹

According to eyewitness Pavel Ivanovich Vivituk, after the massacre, some of the Jews’ clothes were brought to a storage area behind the German headquarters; the best items were divided among the Germans and their helpers. After a day or two, people came in the evening to the Jewish homes and searched for hidden valuables. Many homes were later occupied by Germans.

The Soviets suspected anyone who had cooperated with the Germans. Many people were arrested, and the majority of them were sent to Brześć. Some were convicted and returned after a few years in prison. For example, the Soviet government arrested the head of the village, Korszniewski, who was tried not for the massacre but for cooperating with the Germans. Witnesses recall that his sentence was surprisingly light: only about six months in prison.

No Jews are known to have survived the massacre in Wołczyn. After the war, none of the Jews returned to live in the town. In Israel today, there are about 25 people with ties to Wołczyn, and a few others are living scattered throughout the United States.

SOURCES The most detailed account in English of the fate of Wołczyn’s Jewish community can be found in the author’s own work: Andrea Simon, Basbert: A Granddaughter’s Holocaust Quest (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2002), which is the main source for this entry. Also of interest is the yizkor book edited by Samuel Levine and Morris Gevirtz, Entertainment and Ball Given by the United Wisoko-Litowsker and Woltchiner Relief [in Yiddish] (New York: United Wisoko-Litowsker and Woltchiner Relief, 1948).

The main sources consulted were the ChGK report and associated witness statements from September 1944. The originals are located in GABO and GARF. Copies of these documents are also located in YVA and USHMM, together with the “testimony” of the local police commandant, Vasily Timofeyevich Semenyuk, relating to crimes in and around Motykali, dated November 13, 1945. Additional documentation can be found in BA-BL (R 94/6 and 7).

Andrea Simon

NOTES

1. BA-BL, R 94/7, report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, March 24, 1942.
2. Oral testimony of local non-Jewish inhabitants of Wołczyn, Vera Vladimirovna Shpagina, Ivan Pavlovich Poltrok, Pavel Ivanovich Vivituk, and Genady Mikhaelovich Kutshuk, recorded by Shmuel Englender in 1997 and made available to the author in translation; for summaries, see Simon, Bashert, pp. 123–145.
3. BA-BL, R 94/7, report of Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer Brest-Litowsk, October 6, 1942.
4. Oral testimony of Shpagina and Vivituk, summarized in Simon, Bashert, pp. 126–128.
5. Testimony of Shpagina and others, summarized in ibid., p. 128.
6. Oral testimony of Shpagina, Poltrok, Vivituk, and Kutshuk, summarized in ibid., pp. 128–129.
7. Oral testimony of Poltrok and others, summarized in ibid., pp. 132–138.
8. YVA, ChGK report for the Wołczyn area, September 29, 1944; the original documents are in GABO (file 514-1-60) and GARF, 7021-83.
9. Ibid.
10. BA-BL, R 94/7, report of Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer Brest-Litowsk, October 6, 1942.
11. Testimony of Vivituk, in Simon, Bashert, p. 128.

WYSOCK

Pre-1939: Wysock, town, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Vysotsk, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Wysozk, Rayon center, Gebiet Stolin, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Vysots'k, raion center, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Wysock is located 133 kilometers (83 miles) north of Równe. In 1921, there were 893 Jews residing in Wysock, comprising 30 percent of the total population.¹

A few days after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, the Soviet officials packed their things and left, assuring the Jews that they would soon be back. Only a few Jews, mainly youths and Communists, went with them. For several days there was no authority in the town, but no attacks on Jews took place during this uncertain period. Jews took the opportunity to burn Hebrew or Russian books to destroy anything that might link them to the Soviets in the eyes of the Germans. A small German patrol arrived in Wysock in early July 1941, to be greeted by the non-Jews with bread and salt. Most Jews remained in their houses out of fear.

Soon the German military administration appointed a local administration made up of non-Jews, including a police force recruited from local volunteers. All Jews were registered, and the new authorities issued a series of decrees concerning the Jews. Jewish property was confiscated, and Jews were not permitted to move from one place to another or to buy and sell things. Jews were forbidden to eat meat, use the sidewalks, or assemble in groups. Jews had to wear distinguishing armbands, and a Star of David was to be placed on all Jewish houses. The synagogue and the Bet Midrash were converted into grain storage barns, and Jews dared to pray only in secret.²

In the summer of 1941, a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, which acted as an intermediary between the German authorities and the Jews. It also controlled a small Jewish police force that wore special armbands and assisted with the enforcement of German orders. Jews were subjected to forced labor; families had to devote half of their working time to public works. Work consisted of moving earth and rocks, while some craftsmen, such as blacksmiths and carpenters, worked directly for the German army in workshops. Jews had to surrender valuables and money to meet German demands for “contributions” and were also robbed and blackmailed by the local police.³

During August 1941, about 170 Jewish women and children arrived in Wysock from nearby Dawidgródek. They had been driven out of that town following the mass shooting of the men there by an SS cavalry unit. The Jews of Wysock took them into their houses and shared their food with them.⁴ From the end of August, authority in Wysock was transferred to a German civil administration. Wysock became a Rayon center within Gebiet Stolin. SA-Standartenführer Dziembowski was named the Gebietskommissar, and his deputy was a man named Stark.⁵ Under the civil administration, the armbands for Jews were exchanged for yellow patches to be worn on the chest and back.

At some time before the summer of 1942, about 150 Jews from the surrounding villages were moved into Wysock. As with the refugees from Dawidgródek, they were distributed among the houses of the local Jews, and a public kitchen was established to provide them some nourishment. The Germans established a ghetto in Wysock at the end of July 1942.⁶ A number of buildings in the center of the village were fenced in with barbed wire. More than 1,500 people were imprisoned in the ghetto. Isak Kaftan, a survivor of the Wysock ghetto, recalled that “living conditions were very difficult. We were forbidden to leave the ghetto. We were also not allowed to communicate with the villagers. Various diseases raged in the ghetto. The people suffered from hunger. There was a lack of water. The men capable of work were escorted out to work by the Germans and the local police.”⁷ The yizkor book records, however, that the ghetto was not closely guarded, and Jews were able to climb through the wire to trade possessions for food.⁸

At the end of August 1942, the Jews in Wysock received news of the destruction of the Jews in the neighboring town of Dąbrowica, which increased the level of fear in the ghetto. Soon afterwards the Germans ordered that Jews were no longer permitted to leave the ghetto, and the Jewish Police even applied pressure to ensure the return of some Jews who had hidden in the surrounding villages. On the eve of the Aktion, no Jews were requested for forced labor. During the night, police forces surrounded the ghetto, and anyone attempting to leave was shot.

The German police liquidated the Wysock ghetto on September 9, 1942. It is estimated that approximately 1,600 to 1,800 people were killed.⁹ The mass shooting was carried out under the supervision of the Security Police (Sipo) detachment from Pińsk, which arrived early in the morning in four or five trucks. First, the local police and Security Police forces surrounded the ghetto.¹⁰ The Jews were gathered together and then escorted on foot to the pits outside Wysock. They were escorted to the pits in three groups, each using a different route. The local name for the mass killing site was “Ljado.”¹¹

There were two pits, about 2.5 kilometers (1.5 miles) outside the town, that had been dug shortly before the Aktion by local villagers, who were told that the pits would be used to store fuel. The pits were about 100 meters long and 10 meters wide (328 by 33 feet). The Jews knew of the excavation and suspected that the pits would not be used for the purpose alleged by the Germans.¹²

On arrival at the killing site, the Jews were told to lie down in the pits, where they were shot. The Gendarmerie and local police forces from Stolin, Wysock, and probably Dawidgródek participated in the Aktion. It took about two hours to complete the mass shooting. The perpetrators took no steps to ensure that all the victims were dead.¹³ The graves were filled in by local villagers.

In Wysock, a few Jews survived initially in hiding places. The Germans and their collaborators systematically searched the ghetto, shooting any Jews they found on the spot. As one of the columns was being escorted to the killing site, a group of about 100 Jews tried to escape towards the Horyn River. The Germans shot at them as they ran away. The police forces pursued them in boats, but a number successfully escaped into the nearby forest. Some were recaptured and taken to the pits to be shot.¹⁴ The corpses of those shot trying to escape were collected by local villagers and taken to the pits for burial.¹⁵

The remaining Jewish houses in Wysock were taken over by local non-Jews. Only a few of the Jews who escaped from the ghetto managed to survive until the Red Army drove the Germans from the area in 1944. Most fled to Poland at the end of the war and emigrated from there to Israel and other countries in the West.

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Wysock and its fate during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Aryeh Fyalkov, ed., Ayaratenu Visotsk: Sefer zikaron (Rehovot: Irgun yots’e Visotsk be-Yisrael, 1963); and Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 78–81.

Documentation regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of Wysock can be found in the following archives: AŽIH (301/954, 2906, and 5494); BA-L (B 162/4949-71 and 14495); DARO (R534-1-4); GARF (7021-71-45); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 13); VHF (# 39321 and 44397); and YVA. Stephen Pallavicini and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Part of the information for this entry is taken from Stephen Pallavicini’s doctoral thesis, “The Liquidation of the Jews of Polesie” (Ph.D. diss., Sydney University, 2003).

2. “In Farnichtung un Pein,” in Fyalkov, Ayaratenu Visotsk, pp. 131–132.

3. Ibid., pp. 132–133.

4. Ibid., p. 133; AŽIH, 301/2906.

5. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

6. “In Farnichtung un Pein,” p. 133, states that the ghetto was formed in the month of Av (July 15–August 13 in 1942), six weeks before it was liquidated (September 10, 1942). DARO, R534-1-4, pp. 243–245, also dates the ghetto from July 1942. BA-L, B 162/4949 (II 204 AR-Z 393/59, Ghetto Liquidations in the Pinsk area, vol. 1), p. 145, statement of Isak Kaftan, February 5, 1972, however, dates its establishment in the spring of 1942.

7. BA-L, B 162/4949, p. 145, statement of Isak Kaftan, February 5, 1972.

8. “In Farnichtung un Pein,” pp. 133–134.

9. BA-L, B 162/4950 (204 AR-Z 393/59, vol. 2), p. 180, testimony of the accused Wilhelm Rasp, gives the figure of 1,600 to 1,700 victims in Wysock. DARO, R534-1-4, pp. 243–245, gives 1,800 on September 9, 1942. BA-L, B 162/14495, Urteil LG-Frank, 4 Ks 1/71, gegen Johann Kuhr u.a., February 6, 1973, p. 100, dates the Aktion on September 9, 1942. Also see AŽIH, 301/954.

10. BA-L, B 162/4958 (II 204 AR-Z 393/59, vol. 10), p. 2540, statement of Josef Niederer, December 6, 1962.

11. Ibid., B 162/4949, p. 145, statement of Isak Kaftan, February 5, 1972.

12. Ibid.; “In Farnichtung un Pein,” p. 135.

13. BA-L, B 162/II (204 AR-Z 393/59), statement of Mitschke.

14. Ibid., B 162/II (204 AR-Z 393/59), p. 5376, statement of Josef Niederer, December 6, 1962; AŽIH, 301/2906; “In Farnichtung un Pein,” p. 136.

15. BA-L, B 162/4949, p. 145, statement of Isak Kaftan, February 5, 1972.

ŻABINKA

Pre-1939: Żabinka, village, województwo poleskie, Poland; 1939–1941 and 1944–1990: Zhabinka, raion center, Brest oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Shabinka, Rayon center, Gebiet Brest-Litowsk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Zhabinka, Bera’s’se voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Żabinka is located about 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) east-northeast of Brześć. According to the 1921 population census, 445 Jews were living in Żabinka (73 percent of the total population). In the middle of 1941, allowing for an annual growth rate of around 0.9 percent per year, there were probably just over 500 Jews in Żabinka.

German forces occupied Żabinka on June 23, 1941. Shortly after their arrival, according to witnesses, a German tank destroyed the synagogue.¹

In the period from late June until August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the village. In September 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Rayon Shabinka was initially incorporated into Gebiet Kobryn; then as of December 1, 1941, it became a Rayon center within Gebiet Brest-Litowsk, in Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Żabinka. Jews were ordered to mark their clothes with the Star of David and later with yellow circles. They were forced to perform forced labor, forbidden to leave the limits of the village, and subjected to systematic robbery and beatings by the local police.

No eyewitness accounts by Jewish survivors from Żabinka are available, but according to the book Pamiętniki genotsida evreev Belarusi by Marat Botvinnik, a ghetto was established in Żabinka before the end of 1941. The local history work Pamiętniki. Żabinkauskay raen indicates that the enclosure of the ghetto "only with gates" meant that the Jews were able to exchange their possessions for food with local inhabitants across the boundary of the ghetto. The German administration also forced the Jews to pay heavy "contributions" in the form of gold and jewels, promising them in exchange that they would be able to live.²

In March 1942, the occupying authorities conducted a census in Gebiet Brest-Litowsk. According to the results, reported by the Gebietskommissar in Brześć, there were 26,465 people living in Rayon Shabinka, including 676 Jews. The same report noted that in the Gebiet, Jews had been collected into ghettos and that the Jews from the villages had been resettled into the larger places.³

Responsible for security in Żabinka was a Gendarmerie post consisting of four Gendarmes, subordinated to the Gendarmerie Gebietsführer in Brześć, Bezirks-Leutnant der Gendarmerie Ernst Deuerlein. The Gendarmerie in turn was in charge of a local police unit (Schutzmannschaft), which in September 1942 consisted of 56 men.⁴

Conflicting accounts are available on the fate of the Jews of Żabinka. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the ghetto was liquidated in July 1942, when 339 Jews were transported to Małoryta and killed there together with the Jews of the Małoryta ghetto.⁵ The book by Marat Botvinnik, however, indicates that on September 27, 1942, the Germans and local police rounded up several hundred Jews from the ghetto in Żabinka, mostly women, children, and the elderly. The Jews were escorted to a ditch at the Jewish cemetery, where they had to remove their clothing and shoes, and then were shot. In total, about 360 people were killed on that day. According to Pinkas ha-kehillot, on the other hand, the Jews of Żabinka were conveyed by rail to the Nazi mass killing site at Bronna Góra, where the Jews from Brześć and several other towns in the region were murdered in the fall of 1942 (Żabinka lies directly on the rail line from Brześć to Bronna Góra).

Following the liquidation of the ghetto, a Jewish labor camp containing about 100 Jews was set up in Żabinka. It was liquidated on October 21, 1942, when German police of the 10th Company of Police Regiment 15 shot all the remaining Jews.⁶

Some of the Jews were saved owing to the help of local residents. A Polish woman named Floria Budishevskaja hid a 12-year-old boy named Roma Levin and his friend Sonia Fefer in her own home. In June 1944, the local police arrested and killed Fefer. Levin was able to escape. Budishevskaja herself was arrested and shot in Brześć for hiding Jews.⁷

SOURCES Sparse information on the fate of the Jewish community of Żabinka during World War II can be found in the following publications: Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 250–251; Marat Botvinnik, Pamiętniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaia Navuka, 2000), pp. 114, 125; Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:435; Pamiętniki. Żabinkauskay raen (Minsk, 1999), p. 238.

Documents about the persecution and murder of the Jews in Żabinka can be found in the following archives: AUKG-BRBBO; BA-BL (R 94/7); GARF (7021-83-15); NARA; NARB; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Pamiętniki. Żabinkauskay raen, p. 238.
2. Ibid.
3. BA-BL, R 94/7, report of Gebietskommissar Brest-Litowsk, March 24, 1942; also available at NARA, RG-242, T-454, reel 102.
4. BA-BL, R 94/7, report of Gendarmerie Gebietsführer Brest-Litowsk, September 5, 1942.
5. GARF, 7021-83-15, p. 6.
6. Ibid., 7021-148-2, report of the 10th Company of Police Regiment 15, October 26, 1942. The company shot 461 Jews on that day at the Organisation Todt (OT) camp on the Brześć-Kobryń road, on the "state properties" of Zaderz and Petrowicze, and also in Żabinka. The OT camp apparently was located in the village of Chodosy (on the Brześć-Kobryń road to the southeast of Żabinka). In this camp, 196 Jews were killed. In October 2004, a monument was placed at the grave site.
7. I. Al'tman, Zhertvy nenavisti: Kholokost SSSR 1941–1945 gg. (Moscow, 2002), p. 443.

ZDOŁBUNÓW

Pre-1939: Zdobunów, town, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Zdobunov, raion center, Rovno oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Sdolbunow, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Zdobuniv, raion center, Rivne oblast', Ukraine

Zdobunów is located 19 kilometers (12 miles) south of Równe. According to the 1921 census, 1,262 Jews resided in Zdobunów (17.3 percent of the total population). Assuming a population growth of 0.9 percent per year, the Jewish population of the town would have been approximately 1,500 in mid-1941.

Forces of the German 6th Army occupied Zdobunów on June 30, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. It established a local Ukrainian administration and an auxiliary police force made up of local citizens. In September 1941, authority was handed over to a German civil administration. Zdobunów became the administrative center of Gebiet Sdolbunow, which included Rayons Misotsch and Ostrog, as well as Rayon Sdolbunow. Hundertschaftsführer Georg Marschall became the Gebietskommissar.¹ From June 1942 to January 1943, his deputy was Otto Köller.

In the fall of 1941, a German Gendarmerie post was set up in the town (six to eight Gendarmes). It assumed control of the Ukrainian auxiliary police (Schutzmannschaft), initially of about 30 men. From June 5, 1942, to January 31, 1943, Wilhelm Wacker was head of the Zdobunów Gendarmerie post. All the police forces of the Gebiet were subordinated to the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer. Leutnant der Gendarmerie Joseph Paur held this position in Zdobunów from May 1942 until the end of the year.²

In the summer and fall of 1941, a number of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Zdobunów. After four weeks the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). Jews were required to wear distinguishing marks on their clothing, initially armbands bearing the Star of David and, later, yellow patches. In the first days, Jews were simply seized off the street for forced labor, but subsequently the Judenrat had to supply a specific quota every day. Jews were forbidden to leave the town limits or to use the sidewalks. The German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police also subjected the Jews to frequent looting, beatings, and systematic terror.³

On August 7, 1941, the first anti-Jewish Aktion took place in Zdobunów. On this day, several hundred Jews were selected on the basis of lists prepared by local Ukrainians, arrested, and shot.⁴ The Aktion was organized by a detachment of the Security Police and SD unit (from Einsatzgruppe C) based in Równe. As most members of the first Judenrat were killed in this Aktion, a second Judenrat was formed under the leadership of Symcha Szleifstein, who undertook considerable efforts to protect the interests of the community.

At some time in the spring or early summer of 1942, the Gebietskommissar ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Zdobunów. Several hundred Jews from local villages together with the remaining Jews of the town (about 1,000 people) were moved into the ghetto. In total, some 1,500 Jews were confined there.⁵ Esther Barishman, a survivor of the ghetto, recalls that the ghetto was surrounded by a fence and guarded by the Ukrainian police. There was overcrowding in the ghetto, with about 5 people sharing each small room. Food rations were limited to a small amount of bread and sugar; many Jews risked sneaking out illegally to barter remaining possessions with Ukrainian farmers in the surrounding villages. There was no schooling in the ghetto, and no newspapers were available. However, there was one doctor available to help the sick.⁶ Following the liquidation of the ghetto in Równe in mid-July 1942, a few Jews who had managed to hide inside the ghetto and then escape made their way to Zdobunów and found temporary refuge in the ghetto there.⁷

During the approximately six months in which the ghetto existed, the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police conducted numerous small Aktions. For example, in May 1942, a Jewish carpenter was publicly hanged. The most notorious Aktion was in August 1942. At that time, two Ukrainian policemen brutally killed an 18-year-old girl, Hanka Prussak, the daughter of the former cement factory owner. She was caught sitting on a bench in front of her house in the ghetto after the curfew. A few Hungarian soldiers who were nearby at the time heard the girl screaming and ran over to her. Having seen what the policemen had done, they beat them almost to death. Subsequently, in an attempt to improve the reputation of the local Ukrainian police, the Gebietskommissar invented the story that the girl had been killed by a Jew and demanded that the Judenrat either hand over the "killer" or surrender 10 hostages. Attempts by the Judenrat to bargain their way out of this demand were unsuccessful. Since it was impossible to find the "Jewish murderer," the Judenrat had no option but to select 10 elderly male and female Jews, who were subsequently shot by the German Gendarmerie in the quarries of the cement factory. One of the Jews was able to escape.⁸

On October 13, 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. On this day, a Security Police and SD squad arrived from Równe to organize the Aktion. Shortly before, the German Gendarmerie and local Ukrainian police had received instructions to surround the ghetto and prevent any Jews from escaping. Then the Jews were brutally driven from their houses and collected at a central point to be loaded onto trucks. Those who resisted were killed on the spot; also, the German forces burned down several houses, which the Jews refused to leave. German railroad and postal workers based in the town apparently volunteered to take part in the Aktion. Many corpses were strewn on the streets of the ghetto. Those captured alive were taken on trucks to the killing site in the quarries of the cement plant in the village of Stary Mylsk. At the killing site, the victims had to remove all their clothing and lie flat in the ditch before they were shot in the back of the head.⁹ According to the survivor Jakub Mendziuk, at the killing site, about 500 young men attacked the Ukrainian guards. More than half of them were killed, but a number escaped into the forests. Mendziuk subsequently joined a Soviet partisan unit in the region in which about one third of the members were Jews.¹⁰

Altogether, more than 2,000 Jews were murdered in Zdołbunów in the years 1941 and 1942.

A group of Jews was saved owing to the efforts of Hermann Friedrich Gräbe, who from September 1941 to January 1944 was the manager and chief engineer of a branch of the German construction firm Josef Jung based in Zdołbunów. Gräbe assisted a number of Jews in obtaining Aryan papers and also tried to keep other Jews alive by employing them on various projects, including opening another branch office in Poltava. He also cooperated closely with the head of the Judenrat, Szleifstein, and interceded on the Jews' behalf to ameliorate ransom payments demanded by Gebietskommissar Marschall. Unfortunately, due to the suddenness of the liquidation of the Zdołbunów ghetto, Gräbe could do little to save the Jews on this occasion. However, he went into the ghetto shortly after the Aktion and managed to rescue one of his Jewish employees, Mrs. Glueckson, who had been hiding there for several days with little food or water.¹¹

After the war, several former officials of the German civil administration and police in Zdołbunów were put on trial in Germany. On May 27, 1963, the Landgericht in Nürnberg-Fürth sentenced Paur and Wacker to seven years and three years eight months in prison, respectively (including the term of imprisonment before the trial). Otto Köller was acquitted. Another defendant, former Gendarme Friedrich Attinger, committed suicide before the start of the trial. On May 9, 1967, Landgericht Stade sentenced Georg Marschall to five years in prison. Marschall was convicted of being an accomplice in the hanging of a Jewish carpenter. In Poland, Rudolf Ignatowicz, an ethnic German, was sentenced to death in 1947 for capturing and handing over Jews in Gebiet Sdolbunow.

SOURCES Information on the persecution and destruction of the Jewish population of Zdołbunów can be found in the following publications: Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehillot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 87–88; “Zdolbunov,” in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2000), 4:480; Douglas Huneke, The Moses of Rovno: The Stirring Story of Fritz Graebe, a German Christian Who Risked His Life to Lead Hundreds of Jews to Safety during the Holocaust (New York: Dodd Mead, 1985).

Documents on the fate of the Jewish community of Zdołbunów can be found in these archives: AŻIH (301/1490, 1523, and 1795); BA-L; DARO; GARF (7021-71-50); IPN (SOJG 107); TsDAVO (3538-1-57); VHF (e.g., # 5328, 31286); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ilya Bourtnan

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. See LG-Nürnberg verdict, May 27, 1963, published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 19 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 553.

3. AŻIH, 301/1523, testimony of Helena Sztajnberg.

4. Sources vary on the number of persons shot during this first Aktion. Shmuel Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem and the Federation of Volhynian Jews, 1990), p. 73, gives the figure of 400. GARF, 7021-71-50, pp. 37, 82, gives 450; 7021-71-50, p. 41 reverse, states that more than 700 people were killed.

5. Spector, The Holocaust of Volhynian Jews, p. 367.

6. VHF, # 5328, testimony of Esther Barishman.

7. AŻIH, 301/1490, testimony of Jontel Kabcan.

8. LG-Nürnberg verdict, May 27, 1963; VHF, # 31286, testimony of Elizabeth Jablonski.

9. LG-Nürnberg verdict, May 27, 1963; GARF, 7021-71-50, pp. 35, 38, 83; TsDAVO, 3538-1-57, pp. 28–32; Huneke, The Moses of Rovno, pp. 82–83.

10. AŻIH, 301/1795, testimony of Jakub Mendziuk.

11. Huneke, The Moses of Rovno, pp. 41, 48–49, 85.

ZEN'KOV

Pre-1941: Zen'kov, town, Kamenets-Podolskii oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Zinkow, Rayon Winkowzy, Gebiet Dunajewzy, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Zin'kiv, Khmel'nyts'kyi oblast', Ukraine

Zen'kov is located about 18 kilometers (11 miles) southeast of Iarmolinty. Just prior to the German invasion, the Jewish population of Zen'kov was approximately 2,248.

The German army occupied Zen'kov on July 12, 1941.¹ On the first day of the occupation, a Jew offered the Germans bread and salt. A German soldier shot him on his threshold.² In early August, the ghetto was set up. A few weeks later, Jews were ordered to wear yellow circles bearing Stars of David, one on the front of their clothes and one on the back.³

A Judenrat was established in the ghetto.⁴ The head of the Judenrat was a local bookkeeper.⁵ One Jewish policeman was named Avroham Vasilke.⁶ Jews were involved in various forms of forced labor, from working on the roads and the railroad to clearing snow. In May 1942, a group of men were taken to the front to deliver horses.⁷

Relatively few Germans were involved in the civil administration of the Zen'kov area. During 1942, there was only one official from the office of the Gebietskommissar, an SS man, and an agricultural commissioner. All the other officials were Ukrainian subordinates, mostly from the western Ukraine.⁸ The Ukrainian police force in Zen'kov, which was recruited locally, initially wore armbands, then later German uniforms, and carried rifles and rubber clubs with metal tips. They were not always issued with bullets, so they often used their rifles to beat people. Policemen were involved in robbing and killing Jews and sometimes raped Jewish women before they were shot. In the summer of 1942, one man bribed a policeman to let him escape, but the policeman killed him anyway.⁹

Nevertheless, control over the ghetto generally was relatively lax. Jews were able to sneak out of the ghetto at night, and some were even able to elude their guards and avoid coming home from their work details in the evenings.¹⁰ The relatively disorganized liquidation of the ghetto also reflects this laxity.

The mass killings were associated with pogroms. For the most part, they appear to have been carried out by local policemen with only minor German involvement. The first of these took place on May 9, 1942. To the music of a 100-piece band,¹¹ about 588 people were shot at a mass grave in Stanislavovka, on the outskirts of Zen'kov.¹² The next night, during a rainstorm, the bodies washed out of the grave and had to be reburied.¹³

After the May massacre, a second, smaller ghetto was created. In June 1942, more than 100 Jews were sent away to the forced labor camp at Leznevo, just to the east of Proskurov.¹⁴ Another mass killing took place on August 4, 1942. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, 1,882 Jews were killed, but this figure is probably too high.¹⁵ A non-Jewish local inhabitant later recalled that during one of the roundups, many of the Jews were killed on the spot in their own houses. Afterwards, someone went around the ghetto and wrote the word "corpses" on those houses that contained bodies. A horse and cart were then used to transport the bodies to the mass grave.¹⁶

After the second large Aktion, the ghetto had shrunk to a single house.¹⁷ A final mass killing took place on October 7, 1942, when about 150 of the Jewish craftsmen who had been spared during the summer were murdered.¹⁸ The Germans then relocated the remaining 50 or so Jews to Dunaevtsy, where they were subsequently killed. In total, more than 2,000 Jews from the Zen'kov ghetto were massacred throughout the occupation.

The local police chief was Lisuk,¹⁹ and another police chief in the area was Busse, from Vin'kovtsy. The Gebietskommissar in Dunaevtsy was Gemeinschaftsführer Eggers. The Nazi officials involved in the massacres in Zen'kov included Kulmann, Göbelmann, Kelin, Schramm, Grapp, and Kran. Gebietskommissar Eggers and another Nazi by the name of Hofer were responsible for the mass killings in Dunaevtsy.²⁰ Another Ukrainian policeman was named Grach.²¹

Some 27 Jews are known to have survived the Zen'kov ghetto.²² Sonya Kipiler, a Jew from Zen'kov, operated a partisan unit in the vicinity of Zen'kov from late 1942 until the area was liberated in 1944.²³ Vladimir Kipiler escaped to Transnistria,²⁴ as did Semyon and Minya Gluzman²⁵ and Ida Vaynblat.²⁶ Shifra Reyman was hidden by a Ukrainian family.²⁷ The Foygelman and Abramovich families survived by hiding in an abandoned phosphate mine.²⁸

The statements of several surviving Jews can also be found in the 1947 Soviet trial of a local policeman named Hutsalov.²⁹

SOURCES There is a yizkor book for Zen'kov, Pinkas Zen'kov (Tel Aviv, 1966), compiled by Yisrael Roytbard, which includes the testimony of Ida Vaynblat from letters written in 1965. A number of other accounts regarding the Zen'kov ghetto have been published in translation in David Chapin and Ben Weinstock, The Road from Letichev: The History and Culture of a Forgotten Jewish Community in Eastern Europe (iUniverse, 2000), vol. 2, chap. 16, "Holocaust." In addition, there is a useful memoir written by Ilya Abramovich, Ne Zabyt' (New York: Effect Publishing, 1991).

Documentation on the destruction of the Jews of Zen'kov can be found in the following archives: DAKhO; GARF (7021-64-795); USHMM (RG-31.018M); YIU (no. 692); and YVA.

David Chapin and Ben Weinstock

NOTES

1. Newspaper Za chest' rodiny, no. 27, March 30, 1944.
2. Yehudis Vaynblat-Laufer (Ida Vaynblat) testimony, from letters written in 1965, compiled by Roytbard, in Pinkas Zen'kov, pp. 175–193; translated in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road from Letichev, pp. 736–743.
3. Vladimir Kisilevich Kipiler, 1992 testimony, in Pinkas Agmon and Anatolia Stepachenko, eds., Vinnitskaia Oblast'. Katastrofa (Shoa) i soprotivleniie (Tel Aviv: Beit Lokhamei ha-Tettaot, 1994), pp. 74–83; translated version in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road from Letichev, pp. 727–730. Also see YIU, Témoin no. 692.
4. Kipiler testimony.
5. Semyon Gluzman testimony recorded and translated by Vadim Altskan, July 20, 1998, USHMM; reproduced in Chapin and Weinstock, The Road from Letichev, pp. 730–736.
6. Vaynblat testimony.
7. Gluzman testimony.
8. Ibid.
9. USHMM, RG-31.018M (Ukrainian War Crimes Trials), reel 4, case 57654 against Mikolai Stepanovich Hutsalov, who worked for the German police in Zen'kov.
10. Vaynblat testimony; Kipiler testimony.
11. Vaynblat testimony.
12. Gluzman claims 800 people were killed, but the official Soviet records (GARF, 7021-64-795, p. 203) and Kipiler's testimony seem to support a lower number.
13. Gluzman and Vaynblat testimonies.
14. Abramovich, Ne Zabyt'.
15. GARF, 7021-64-795, p. 204; and Gluzman testimony.
16. YIU, Témoin no. 692.
17. Gluzman testimony.
18. Kipiler testimony.
19. Ibid.
20. Ibid.
21. Gluzman testimony.
22. Abramovich, Ne Zabyt'.
23. Kipiler testimony.
24. Ibid.
25. Gluzman testimony.
26. Vaynblat testimony.
27. V. Lukin and B. Khaimovich, 100 evreiskikh mestechek Ukraini (Jerusalem, 1997), 1:108–109.
28. Vaynblat testimony, and Abramovich, Ne Zabyt'.
29. USHMM, RG-31.018M, reel 4, case 57654.

ZOFJÓWKA [AND IGNATÓWKA]

Pre-1939: Zofjówka, village, województwo wołyńskie, Poland; 1939–1941: Zof’iuvka, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Soffjewka, Rayon Zuman, Gebiet Luzk, Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien; post-1991: Zof’iuvka, Volyn’ oblast’, Ukraine

Zofjówka is located about 35 kilometers (22 miles) northeast of the city of Łuck.

It is estimated that the Jewish population of Zofjówka in 1939 was between 1,500 and 2,000. Ivan Katchanovski notes that the population “almost doubled when the Nazis brought in Jews from nearby villages and small towns and established a ghetto.”¹ Gad Rosenblatt explains the population growth after 1939 as resulting from the flight of Jews eastward following the German invasion of western Poland. He estimates that by 1941 there were 5,000 Jews in Zofjówka and 1,800 in Ignatówka, but these figures are probably too high.²

In late June 1941, Jews who had cooperated with the Communist regime fled to Russia. Members of the Ukrainian local police went from house to house, stealing and looting. Ukrainians from neighboring towns accused many of the Jews of being Communists and threatened to turn them in to the authorities. It was pure blackmail; the Jews paid them off in exchange for a promise of silence. Those who were unable to pay had to go into hiding.³

The German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The first chairman was Zechariah Antweg. Later it was headed by Yosef Weisman and Motel Tcherpek. Two German officials arrived to run the town: an Austrian named Kreiser and a German named Gruber.⁴

The Germans ordered all cattle and horses rounded up for shipment to Germany, thereby destroying the economic basis of the local Jews in agriculture. Then the Germans demanded a ransom of several hundred thousand rubles, to be collected and paid within five hours. The Judenrat imposed a levy on each family, and the funds were delivered. In response to an order to organize the Jews into groups for forced labor, the Judenrat prepared a list of eligible workers. The Judenrat also appointed Jewish policemen to enforce recruitment for forced labor. Each group was sent to work on 17-day rotations, often to places as much as a half-day’s march away. Those who returned were worn to the bone. Some never returned, having been tortured and killed by their German and Ukrainian guards. The Jews in Zofjówka, as also in the neighboring village of Ignatówka, were confined to their immediate area, thereby establishing open ghettos. A few, at great personal risk, would sneak out at night or just before dawn to barter clothing and jewelry for food, such as grain, potatoes, milk, or butter. Jews were denied use of the flour mill, so they devised crude illegal mills to grind the grain into rough, barely palatable flour.⁵

Jews who were craftsmen—blacksmiths, tailors, cobblers—were able to ply their trade and earn enough to buy food. But many Jews went hungry, subsisting on partially cooked rotten potatoes and crusts of coarse bread. Those in forced labor, in the forests and sawmills, received one loaf of bread a week.⁶

From September 1941, power in the area was transferred to a German civil administration. Zofjówka became part of Rayon Zuman in Gebiet Luzk, which in turn belonged to the Generalkommissariat Wolhynien und Podolien. The Luzk Gebietskommissar was Regierungsassessor Lindner.⁷ The Jews in the town of Zuman (probably about 300) were all murdered in late August of 1941.⁸

Those Jews in Zofjówka who were skilled leather workers received special attention because their products were highly prized by the German officials. Early in the occupation an unusual event occurred. In the fall of 1941, a German named Klinger appeared on the scene, assigned as the “district commander” in charge of the local leather industry. He reportedly had a doctoral degree from a German university and carried the papers of an ethnic German (Volksdeutsche). However, a rumor quickly spread among the Jews that he was neither German nor a Volksdeutsche but actually a Jew in disguise. He treated the Jews well, restrained the Ukrainian police from their usually harsh treatment, and made his headquarters in the home of a Jewish family. The Germans loved the leather products, which Dr. Klinger brought to their headquarters in Łuck. The leather workers were not assigned to the forced labor groups, and their families were not mistreated. Then, in December, Klinger, possibly concerned that his disguise was wearing thin, announced that he was leaving for Warsaw. The Jews begged him to stay, and he agreed to postpone his departure until the first day of March 1942. On that night the Judenrat arranged a small farewell party attended by the German officials Kreiser and Gruber. After Klinger left the gathering, he was ambushed by Ukrainian police—angry, perhaps, because of his restraints on their conduct—and murdered.⁹

In his place the Germans appointed a Ukrainian overseer, Panchenko, accompanied by his son, who was a local policeman (Schutzmann). Panchenko demanded and received weekly “payments” from the Jews. Later on, after the community had been decimated by the mass murders in July 1942, Jewish partisans captured him and sentenced him to death. However, Hershel Neiden, one of the “protected” leather workers, fearful of an even harsher replacement, persuaded the partisans to let him go.¹⁰

The plan for the mass murder of the Jews began on July 25, 1942. The Jews from the area were rounded up by the Ukrainian police and brought to Zofjówka’s main street for an “assembly.” The leather workers and their families were ordered to move to the nearby town of Szaliscze to set up their workshop as a labor battalion. The Jews from the neighboring villages of Ignatówka and Marjanowko were ordered to return home, pack up a small bundle of personal items, and return to Zofjówka within two hours. Elderly and sick Jews who were unable to move quickly enough were shot on the spot. At the sound of the shooting, many Jews ran off in every direction.¹¹

On July 26 the liquidation Aktion began. Some Jews were taken first to a field to dig two pits, each 30 meters (98 feet) long, which were to serve as mass graves. Then the remaining Jews were taken in trucks and by foot, 200 at a time, to the killing site. They were forced to undress and get into the pits, where the German forces machine-gunned them to death. An estimated 3,000 to 4,000 Jews were killed. A subsequent roundup of those Jews found in hiding led to the murder of another 1,000 on September 21, 1942. The “protected” leather workers were put to death in late December 1942. All in all, up to 6,000 Jews, including those from neighboring villages, were murdered in the Aktions in the fields near Zofjówka and Ignatówka.¹²

Some small groups and individuals escaped into the forests, many linking up with Soviet and Ukrainian partisans, including a few who joined the Kovpak division. Ivan Katchanovski provides some information on the fate of Ukrainians in the village of Klobuczyn, where some 200 survivors of the Zofjówka ghetto and a nearby village reportedly took refuge. On November 2, 1942, the Nazis, with the help of the local police, executed 137 residents (including women, elderly people, and 36 children) of Klobuczyn in reprisal for the actions of Ukrainian partisans who had helped Zofjówka Jews. These partisans took up arms against the Nazis and their collaborators, supplied weapons to a Jewish resistance group in Zofjówka, and executed a local peasant for killing Jews who escaped the Nazi massacres. The Klobuczyn partisans accepted Jewish partisans from Zofjówka into their unit and provided protection to more than 150 Jewish survivors who escaped the Nazi massacre in this village and nearby small Jewish settlements and were hiding in a forest near Klobuczyn. Many of these Jews later joined another Soviet/Ukrainian partisan unit in the region. Most were killed during combat with the Nazis.

Only about 40 Jews from Zofjówka survived until the end of the war.¹³ Among those who helped them to survive was Alojzy Ludwikowski, who helped to feed more than 30 Jews hiding in several bunkers in the forest or near his home. Unfortunately, some of the bunkers were discovered by the German Gendarmes and their collaborators, and not all of those he assisted managed to survive.¹⁴ 249–254) and Isaac Borek (pp. 379–387) are the major sources of information on the war years. Some additional information can be found in an article by Ivan Katchanovski, “Everything Is Illuminated. Not!” Prague Post, October 7, 2004 (online review at praguepost.com). “Yaromel I,” a listing on the cemetery of Zofjówka, appears at the online site of the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies (www.jewishgen.org/cemetery).

SOURCES The yizkor book edited by Y. Vainer et al., Ha-ilan ve-shoreshav; sefer korot Tal Zofjówka-Ignatówka (Givataim, Israel: Beit-Tal, 1988), mainly in Hebrew, contains a number of personal accounts. The two entries by Gad Rosenblatt (pp.

Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Zofjówka and Ignatówka can be found in the following archives: AŻIH (301/2890); DAVO; GARF (7021-55-12); and YVA.

Samuel Fishman and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Katchanovski, “Everything Is Illuminated. Not!”
2. Vainer et al., Ha-ilan ve-shoreshav; sefer korot, p. 249.
3. Ibid., pp. 250, 379.
4. Ibid., p. 380.
5. Ibid., p. 250; Shmuel Spector, ed., Pinkas ha-kehilot. Encyclopaedia of Jewish Communities: Poland, vol. 5, Volhynia and Polesie (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1990), pp. 88–91.
6. Vainer et al., Ha-ilan ve-shoreshav; sefer korot, p. 251.
7. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
8. Aleksandr Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertv fashizma,” 2000), p. 30; GARF, 7021-55-12, p. 4. About 500 people were killed altogether, including Ukrainians and Poles.
9. Vainer et al., Ha-ilan ve-shoreshav; sefer korot, pp. 252, 380.
10. Ibid., p. 252.
11. Ibid., p. 253.
12. Ibid.; see also GARF, 7021-55-12, p. 4. DAVO, R2-1-196, pp. 218–219, Report to the Generalkommissar in Luzk, notes that the Aktions against the Jews in the Kołki, Olyka, and Zuman Rayons took place between July 26 and July 29, 1942. A. Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005), p. 207, gives only the figure of more than 2,000 victims for the Zuman raion.
13. Katchanovski, “Everything Is Illuminated. Not!”
14. See Wronski Stanisław and Maria Zwolakowa, eds., Polacy-Żydzi 1939–1945 (Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza, 1971), pp. 391–393; see also YVA, Collection of the Righteous Among the Nations, M-31/2145.

ZHYTOMYR REGION

Jews are rounded up in Zhitomir and forced to watch the hanging of Mosche Kogan and Wolf Kieper on the market square, August 7, 1941.

USHMM WS #17547, COURTESY OF YIVO

ZHYTOMYR REGION (GENERALKOMMISSARIAT SHITOMIR)

Pre-1941: Zhitomir and parts of the Vinnitsa, Poles'e, and Gomel' oblasts, Ukrainian and Belorussian SSRs; 1941–1944: initially Rear Area, Army Group South, then from October 1941, Generalkommissariat Shitomir, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: parts of central Ukraine and southern Belarus

Generalkommissariat (Gk) Shitomir was a German administrative unit carved out of the pre-war Soviet Vinnitsa, Zhitomir, Poles'e, and Gomel' oblasts. The period of ghettoization in Gk Shitomir lasted from July 1941 until the spring of 1942. In total, there were some 58 ghettos established in Gk Shitomir. The last ghettos, mainly remnant ghettos that resembled forced labor camps, were liquidated in the winter of 1942–1943, although small groups of specialist workers survived in some places until later in 1943.

In 1939, the Zhitomir oblast' contained 125,007 Jews, and the Vinnitsa oblast' had 141,825 Jews, of which just over half—about 75,000 Jews—lived in the area that subsequently became part of Gk Shitomir. In the Belorussian portions of the region, more than 17,000 Jews lived in Mozyr' and over 7,000 in Rechitsa, the two largest urban centers. Therefore, allowing for an evacuation rate of up to 50 percent, it can be estimated that more than 110,000 Jews remained in the area of Gk Shitomir at the start of the German occupation.

The video and oral testimonies of Jewish survivors taken by the USC Shoah Foundation Institute (VHF) and other organizations since 1990 have added considerably to our knowledge of ghettoization. These have proved especially valuable in helping to identify a number of previously unknown ghettos in Gk Shitomir, for which little or no German documentation is available. At least 21 open ghettos have been identified in the region, including several not mentioned in the existing scholarly literature. For example, on July 15, 1941, a week after the occupation of the town, the German commandant established a "Jewish residential district" (open ghetto) in Chudnov in a part of town that had been severely damaged in the fighting. One main street and a few side streets were reserved only for the Jews, but there was no barbed wire surrounding the area.¹ Another early open ghetto was in Baranovka, created at the end of July 1941 by the German military administration in a few small houses on Zhaboritskaya Street.² The Germans conducted several Aktions in Baranovka during the summer of 1941 but did not liquidate the ghetto until January 6, 1942. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report and German Einsatzgruppen reports, the Germans established an open ghetto in Radomyshl' in August 1941. A detachment of Einsatzgruppe C used this ghetto primarily to concentrate the Jews of the surrounding area for their rapid destruction within a few weeks.³

One striking feature about Gk Shitomir is the difference between the northern part, where there were few ghettos, most of which were short-lived (such as the ghetto in Iurovichi that existed for just over one month), and the southern part, where more than a dozen ghettos, mostly remnant ghettos set up for selected laborers and their families, existed for more than six months, that is, until the second wave of mass killings in the spring and summer of 1942. The overlap between the local ghetto inmates and the labor force used for work on Durchgangsstrasse (highway) IV (DG IV) seems to have been much less in this region than in neighboring Gk Kiev or Gk Wolhynien und Podolien. Most of the Jewish labor used on DG IV appears to have been brought in from Romanian-occupied Transnistria in the summer of 1942, just after the liquidation of most remaining ghettos in Gk Shitomir.⁴

For the area around Vinnitsa, which was captured by the German 17th Army in mid-July 1941, the initial activities of the military administration are well documented. A provisional town administration was appointed on July 22, 1941. Then Rayonchefs were appointed in the surrounding area, while a labor office (Arbeitsamt), housing office (Wohnungsamt), and a food supply office (Ernährungsamt) were established in Vinnitsa.⁵ A local police force was also recruited from volunteers and made answerable to the local mayors and the military administration. The military authorities were not always satisfied with the loyalty of Ukrainian nationalist appointees, and some were subsequently dismissed. The local police guarded the Jews as they performed their forced labor, repairing war damage in the streets and performing other tasks for the German authorities. In Vinnitsa, the Jews had to wear armbands bearing the Star of David, but there was no immediate ghettoization.⁶

Unidentified men examine a field strewn with the clothing of 4,000 Jews in Vinnitsa, 1941–1942.

USHMM WS #25246, COURTESY OF YIVO

As the research of Alexander Kruglov indicates, the first wave of mass shootings was particularly devastating in the core territories of the Zhitomir oblast'. Learning from the rapid slaughter of more than 23,000 Jews organized by the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) Russland-Süd, SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln, at the end of August 1941 in Kamenets-Podolskii (area of Gk Wolhynien und Podolien), units of Einsatzgruppe C and the Order Police murdered more than 40,000 Jews in the Zhitomir oblast' (about three quarters of all those killed there) in the three months of August, September, and October.⁷ Wendy Lower demonstrates that some of the larger ghettos, such as that in Berdichev, were established with the idea of destruction clearly in mind. Here Jeckeln ordered the establishment of a ghetto on August 26 and then completed the mass murder of the bulk of the ghetto's Jews (between 10,000 and 15,000 people) within three weeks, by mid-September.⁸

In the southern part of Gk Shitomir (the northern part of Vinnitsa oblast'), however, this first wave was not quite so lethal. Kruglov's estimates indicate that roughly half of the remaining Jews were killed here in 1941, with the second wave in 1942 accounting for most of the rest. In Vinnitsa, more than 5,000 of the 18,000 Jews that came under German occupation were still alive in January 1942. Some nearby towns, such as Brailov and Khmel'nik, escaped with only minor losses in the summer and fall of 1941, and both military and civil authorities pursued a more concerted policy of establishing ghettos in this area.

On October 20, 1941, the German military was replaced by a civil administration in Gk Shitomir. The Generalkommissar in Shitomir was Polizeipräsident Kurt Klemm. In Gk Shitomir, low-level administrative posts were filled mainly with reliable Ukrainians, a few Russians, and some ethnic Germans. The office of Reichskommissar Erich Koch issued orders only to establish "Jewish residential districts" (ghettos) in localities with more than 200 Jews. The inmates of the ghettos were to be prohibited from leaving the premises without special authorization.⁹

In practice, the local Gebietskommissars played a key role in establishing, overseeing, and liquidating the ghettos, alongside the offices of the Security Police and the Order Police. In Olevska, in the northern part of Gk Shitomir, for example, on the establishment of the German civil administration, the assistant Gebietskommissar, Neukirchner, issued an order for the Jews to be ghettoized. The Polis'ka Sich (Ukrainian nationalist activists) and the local Ukrainian police then forced the entire Jewish population to move into a ghetto established on three streets. This ghetto was then liquidated within a few weeks, with the active participation of the Ukrainian police and some members of the Sich.¹⁰

Yet the existence of ghettos for much longer periods in places such as Ruzhin, Lipovets, Teplik, Ternovka, and Zhorishche reflects the intention of some German administrators to exploit skilled Jewish labor, where possible, at least for a few more months. Many of the ghettos were remnant ghettos, established in the wake of mass killing Aktions. This was the case, for example, in Litin. On December 19, 1941, a squad of German Security Police from Vinnitsa organized the shooting of some 2,000 Jews in the town. The German authorities selected about 200 craftsmen and their families, who were placed into a ghetto comprising a few houses on two narrow streets.¹¹ The Germans also subsequently permitted those Jews who had hidden during the mass shooting to enter the ghetto. Around 300 Jews were concentrated there surrounded by a fence. The Jews were prohibited from leaving on pain of death. Although food was scarce and hunger severe, nobody was allowed to go to the market to obtain food.¹²

In Ruzhin, after a mass shooting Aktion in September, a remnant ghetto consisting of a "barrack camp surrounded by barbed wire" was established for selected specialists and surviving Jews brought in from the surrounding villages. The Ukrainian village elder ordered the Jews to renovate about 200 former Jewish houses for the use of the Germans and the Ukrainian police, who guarded the ghetto. The Germans appointed a Jewish elder by the name of Yankel, who organized several craft workshops.¹³

Living conditions in most ghettos were harsh, depending especially on access to additional food supplies. Trading with non-Jews was possible for many ghetto inhabitants, but other than craftsmen, most had little to trade, and the Ukrainian population, especially in the cities, was itself short of food. Anna Grinboim, a survivor from Pogrebishche, recalled: "There was no water to drink or to wash with, no food, terrible hunger. Occasionally kind Ukrainians came and brought food they had already prepared. Every morning all the young people and all the men were taken to work." Her own work consisted mainly of cleaning—streets, bathrooms, and stores. Anna's grandmother died of hunger, as did many others. No holidays were celebrated in the Pogrebishche ghetto, and there were very few children, since most of them had been killed in the first Aktion. The most terrible thing, she recalled, was the knowledge that sooner or later there would be another Aktion to end it all.¹⁴

Apart from the craftsmen, who mainly produced clothing and tools for the Wehrmacht, German officials, and also (sometimes clandestinely) for the Ukrainian population, the Jews in the ghettos of Gk Shitomir were engaged in a variety of forced labor tasks. These included work in agriculture, cleaning the streets and clearing them of snow in winter, construction work, and for Jewish women, cleaning the quarters of German officials. Those who worked were more likely to receive some meager rations. Many survivors stress the deadly role of the Ukrainian police. Michael Tokar, for example, reported that "anyone who refused to work was killed on the spot. The Ukrainian police drank all the time and would beat the Jews just for fun in their drunken stupor."¹⁵

The attitudes of the local population towards the ghettos varied from direct participation in German anti-Jewish policies to providing assistance and shelter. The local Ukrainian police hunted down Jews who escaped from ghettoization, and they participated in mass shootings. Ukrainian guards also harassed and brutalized Jewish labor details. In some places

Ukrainian policemen moved into vacated Jewish apartments. On the other hand, many of the few Jewish survivors state that they managed to escape death because of the bravery and kindness of individual Ukrainians. In Gk Shitomir some Jews escaped from the ghettos and joined the Soviet partisans, while others passed as non-Jews, hid in the countryside, or escaped to the Romanian-occupied zone (Transnistria), where conditions were much less lethal by the end of 1942. A handful were even deported to Germany as forced laborers, while passing as non-Jews.

Although the killings never completely ceased in the winter of 1941–1942, as explosives were used to prepare mass graves, for example, in Strizhavka, despite the frost, the second wave in Gk Shitomir effectively began in the spring of 1942. Following the murder of most of the remaining Jews in Vinnitsa on April 15, 1942, an intensified wave of mass shooting Aktions was organized by the Security Police and SD, assisted by the Gendarmerie and the local Ukrainian police. These Aktions swept away most of the remaining ghettos in May and June of 1942.

In Samgorodok, a ghetto was established for the 500 Jews living there only in mid-May 1942, shortly before its liquidation on June 4. The local police chief selected out 10 or 15 specialist workers, who were sent to Kazatin and subsequently shot by the SD in September. Gebietskommissar Wolfgang Steudel carefully supervised the mass shooting in person.¹⁶ Other mass shootings were carried out at this time against the ghettos in Pliskov, Monastyryshche, Lipovets, and Vcheraishche. In the small town of Gnivan, near Vinnitsa, where no ghetto was established, about 100 Jews were killed in the early part of the summer of 1942, most of whom were women and children.¹⁷

In early June 1942, the Generalkommissar in Shitomir reported that: “the Jewish question has for the most part been settled in my region. That valuable labor was often eliminated is well known. 434 Jews were resettled in Gebiet Illinzi, 606 Jews in Ruzhin.”¹⁸ This report reflects the intensive steps taken to reduce the remaining Jewish population of the region at this time and at least on paper to declare the region cleansed of Jews (judenrein). In practice, however, many hundreds of Jews remained in Gk Shitomir after this date, mostly in small remnant ghettos for craftsmen but also in some forced labor camps, including those used for road construction along the DG IV, which contained mainly Jews who were being brought in from Transnistria.

Confirmation of the active role played by the Ukrainian local police in the ghetto liquidation Aktions can be found in a German report recommending the Ukrainian Schutzmann, Wasyl Palamartschuk, in Samgorodok, for a decoration in 1943, as he had “especially distinguished himself during the resettlement of the Jews in June 1942 and in the subsequent apprehension of individual Jews who variously concealed themselves.”¹⁹

The Vinnitsa Gendarmerie Captain issued an order in June 1942 that Jews were no longer to be employed by the Gendarmerie.²⁰ Most of the remaining specialist workers did not survive the summer sweep for long. At the beginning of August 1942, members of the Security Police outpost in Berdichev shot more than 300 Jewish workers. In Ruzhin, 44 Jews were shot by members of the SD on October 1, 1942.²¹

Some Jews managed to survive the roundups during the second wave by hiding in cellars and other places of concealment. They later sought refuge in the surrounding countryside. However, the Gendarmerie in the region threatened severe reprisals against entire villages if they failed to report any Jews hiding in the vicinity.²² Over the ensuing nine months from July 1942, most of the Jews in hiding were captured by the Gendarmerie and local police (Schutzmannschaft). For example, on March 1, 1943, a patrol from the Gendarmerie post in Samgorodok found two female Jews, Busa and Sulka Chernus, hiding in a hayrick, and they were then “shot trying to escape.”²³

The Khmel'nik ghetto was probably the last to be liquidated in Gk Shitomir, on March 3, 1943. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, more than 1,000 people were shot on that day.²⁴ The 135 artisans who survived the massacre (127 men and 8 women) were put into a school building that was turned into a labor camp. The craftsmen had to train Ukrainians as their replacements; 67 people managed to escape from this camp before the remainder were killed in turn.²⁵ Some Jewish skilled laborers held in a Security Police prison in Berdichev were shot on January 3, 1944, just as the Germans were being forced out of the region by the Red Army.²⁶

SOURCES There are only a few secondary works dealing specifically with the fate of the Jews and particularly with German ghettoization policies in Gk Shitomir. Among these are: Martin Dean, “The German Gendarmerie, the Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft and the ‘Second Wave’ of Jewish Killings in Occupied Ukraine: German Policing at the Local Level in the Zhitomir Region, 1941–44,” German History, 14: 2 (1996): 168–192; Wendy Lower, Nazi Empire-Building and the Holocaust in Ukraine (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2005); A. Kruglov, Unichtozhenie evreiskogo naseleniia v Vinnitskoi oblasti v 1941–1944 gg. (Mogilev-Podil's'kyi, 1997); and I.S. Finkel'shtein, “Massovoe unichtozhenie evreev Podolii natsistskimi palachami v 1941–1944 gg.,” in Katastrofa i soprotivlenie ukrainskogo evreistva (1941–1944) (Kiev, 1999), pp. 51–87.

Of the many books and articles on the Holocaust in Ukraine, the following include key information on this specific region: Dieter Pohl, “The Murder of Ukraine's Jews under German Military Administration and in the Reich Commissariat Ukraine,” in Ray Brandon and Wendy Lower, eds., The Shoah in Ukraine: History, Testimony, Memorialization (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2008); Wendy Lower, “Facilitating Genocide: Nazi Ghettoization Practices in Occupied Ukraine, 1941–1942,” in Eric J. Sterling, ed., Life in the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2005), pp. 120–144; A. Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005); Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001); Il'ja Al'tmann, Opfer des Hasses: Der Holocaust in der UdSSR 1941–1945 (Zurich: Gleichen, 2008); and Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000).

Relevant collections of testimonies and other primary sources include the following: Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007); Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002); Pinchas Agmon and Iosif Maliar, eds., V ogne katastrofy (Shoa) na Ukraine: Svidetel'stva evreev-uznikov kontslagerei i getto, uchastnikov partizanskogo dvizheniia (Kiryat-Heim, Israel: Izdatel'stvo "Beit lokhamei kha-gettaot," 1998); Samuil Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit: O katastrofe i geroizme evreev v gorodakh i mestechkakh Ukrainy (New York, 1995); A.F. Vysotsky et al., eds., Nazi Crimes in Ukraine, 1941–1944: Documents and Materials (Kiev: Naukova Dumka, 1987); and Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (London: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBGO; BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; DACHO; DAVINO; DAZO; GAGOMO; GARF; NARA; NARB; PAAKag; RGVA; TsDAHOU; TsDAVO; USHMM; VHAP; VHF; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 195–205, 268–273; TsDAHOU, 57-4-225, p. 33.
2. Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 53–57.
3. GARF, 7021-60-309, p. 21; BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR, no. 88, September 19, 1941.
4. See BA-L, ZStL, AR-Z 20/1963 (Ermittlungen wegen Verbrechen im Generalkommissariat Shitomir und an der DG IV).
5. BA-MA, RH 26/125-4, XLIX Corps order no. 48, July 20, 1941; RGVA, 1275-3-662, pp. 3–13, reports of FK 675, Abt. VII to Sich. Div. 444, August 1 and 11, 1941.
6. RGVA, 1275-3-662, reports of FK 675 Abt. VII to Sich. Div. 444, August 1, 11, 14, and 31, 1941; BA-MA, RH 22/5, Commander of Rear Army, Area South, Abt. VII, July 21, 1941.
7. A. Kruglov, "Jewish Losses in Ukraine, 1941–1944," in Brandon and Lower, The Shoah in Ukraine, p. 278.
8. Lower, Nazi Empire-Building, pp. 76–77.
9. TsDAVO, 3206-2-30, pp. 13 verso, 23 and verso.
10. GARF, 7021-149-31, pp. 19 verso, 26, 32, 178.
11. YVA, M-33/196, pp. 6–16; BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, pp. 556–557 (Abschlussbericht). This report indicates that 300 men, 500 women, and 1,186 children were murdered.
12. YVA, O-3/7372; also O-3/6401; PAAKag, interview with David Irilevich on April 5, 2005.
13. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67, vol. 1, pp. 17–18; TsGAMORF, 236-2675-134, p. 48; M. Belilovskii, Povedai synu svoemu: Da budut korni nashi zhivy (Moscow; Houston: M. Belilovskii, 1998), pp. 197–199.
14. VHF, # 20772.
15. Ibid., # 28086.
16. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 188/67, vol. 1, pp. 229–231; DAZO, 1182-1-6, p. 169, SS and Polizei Gebietsführer Kasatin, September 30, 1942.
17. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 136/67; Vysotsky et al., Nazi Crimes in Ukraine, pp. 162–163.
18. BA-BL, R 6/310, p. 17, Generalkommissar Shitomir, June 3, 1942.
19. DAZO, 1182-1-6, p. 163, Gend. Samgorodok, May 31, 1943.
20. Ibid., 1182-1-36, p. 30, Gend. Gebiet Ruzhin, June 14, 1942.
21. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen vol. 16, (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1976), Lfd. Nr. 490, pp. 346–348; DAZO, 1182-1-36, pp. 235–238, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer Ruzhin, November 5, 1942.
22. DAZO, 1182-1c-2, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer Kasatin, Behrens to Gend.-Posten in Samgorodok and Pogrebishche, July 6, 1942.
23. DAZO, 1182-1-6, pp. 157, 164–165.
24. GARF, 7021-54-1249, p. 229; the official figure of 1,300 is probably too high. See also BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, p. 571.
25. Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, pp. 65–66.
26. GARF, 7021-60-285, pp. 8, 48–49.

Borders as of 1942

ANDRUSHEVKA

Pre-1941: Andrushevka, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1943: Andruschewka, Rayon center, Gebiet Berditschew, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Andrusivka, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Andrushevka is located 35 kilometers (22 miles) southeast of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 census, there were 658 Jews living in Andrushevka (10.3 percent of its total population).

German armed forces occupied the town on July 16, 1941, almost three weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During that time, some Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for military service in the Red Army, and a small number of Jews managed to evacuate to the eastern regions of the country.

In the period from July to October 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town, and it set up a Rayon authority and an auxiliary police force, made up of local residents. In late October 1941, the military administration was replaced by a German civil administration. Until liberation on December 26, 1943, Andrushevka was part of Gebiet Berditschew in Generalkommissariat Shitomir. In the summer of 1942, the Ukrainian police (Schutzmannschaft) in Andrushevka consisted of about 30 men, which was by then subordinated to a small squad of German Gendarmerie based in the town. One of the leaders of the Ukrainian police in Andrushevka was a man named Ivan Meisko.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in Andrushevka. The Jews were required to wear armbands with a Star of David, perform various types of forced labor, remain within the confines of the town, and hand over all their valuables. Jews were forbidden to sell products in the market, while the local Ukrainian inhabitants were forbidden to associate in any way with Jews, and those who violated this order were subjected to flogging.

On August 19, 1941, the first Aktion took place in Andrushevka when 252 Jews were rounded up and shot in a forest 300 meters (0.2 mile) southeast of town. At this time the Ukrainians started to rob the Jews' houses, and a ghetto was established. Local Ukrainians assisted the Germans in identifying the Jews. Other Jews who were caught in the surrounding area were brought to the Andrushevka ghetto.²

In the ghetto, the Jews were always obliged to inform the police exactly where they were going, and all the Jews had to wear the Star of David on their chest and their back to show that they were Jewish. The Ukrainian policemen beat Jews on the street, even those they had known since before the war, simply because they were Jewish. Some local Ukrainians, however, did help out, by bringing potatoes and bread to the Jews in the ghetto, as they had nothing else to eat.³

The ghetto was always surrounded by both Ukrainian police and Germans. The Jews did not live in apartments but in a stable normally used for horses. Everyone slept on the floor. Several families lived together under very cramped conditions. The young people in the ghetto were forced to work every day from dawn to dusk. There was no doctor in the ghetto. If someone got sick, they were more or less left to die. The ghetto remained in existence for about nine months.⁴

The Germans liquidated the ghetto in May 1942 when 223 people were shot in a forest 500 meters (0.3 mile) from the town hospital.⁵ A small group of Jewish craftsmen was sent to a labor camp in Berdichev, all of whom were shot in July 1942, along with other Jews, when that camp was liquidated.

A Jewish girl from Andrushevka managed to survive, as she was outside the ghetto fetching milk at the time of the roundup. She was spotted by a German patrol but succeeded in convincing them that she was not Jewish with the help of a Ukrainian woman, who claimed she was her daughter. She survived in hiding with a Ukrainian family until the end of the occupation.⁶

SOURCES Information about the destruction of Andrushevka's Jewish population can be found in the following publications: "Andrushevka," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:46; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 44.

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Andrushevka under German occupation can be found in the following archives: DAZO (e.g., 1151-1-703); GARF (7021-60-281); USHMM (e.g., Acc.1996.A.0269 [DAZO]); VHF (# 44736); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13-14, KdG Shitomir, Hauptmannschaft Winniza, order no. 18/42, July 25, 1942.
2. GARF, 7021-60-281, p. 16. VHF, # 44736, testimony of Raisa Pinsker; one of the victims on August 19 was the witness's older sister.
3. VHF, # 44736.
4. Ibid.
5. GARF, 7021-60-281, p. 16; O. Herasymov, ed., Knyha pam'iaty Ukrainy. Zhytomyrs'ka oblast'. Tom 1 (Zhitomir: L'onok, 1993). According to the lists of names, 349 Jews were murdered in Andrushevka in the years 1941-1942.
6. VHF, # 44736.

BARANOVKA

1938-1941: Baranovka, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Baranowka, Rayon center, Gebiet Zwiabel (Nowograd-Wolynskyy) Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Baranivka, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Baranovka is located 70 kilometers (44 miles) west of Zhitomir. In the census of 1939, there were only 1,447 Jews in Baranovka (22.9 percent of the total population) and 839 additional Jews in the villages of the raion, totaling 2,286.

German forces occupied Baranovka on July 6, 1941. After the start of the invasion, a number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Eligible men were called up or enlisted voluntarily in the Red Army. Around 70 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Baranovka at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the settlement. The German military administration created a local raion authority and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force, which took part in the anti-Jewish measures.

At the end of October 1941, power was transferred to the German civil administration. Baranovka was incorporated into Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij (aka Zwiabel), and Regierungsassessor Dr. Schmidt became the Gebietskommissar. In turn, Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Shitomir in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹

Soon after the occupation of the settlement, the Ortskommandantur instructed the raion authority to register and mark the Jews. The Jews were required to wear an armband around their sleeves and to perform forced labor (repairing roads, stockpiling timber, and other tasks). At the end of July 1941, the German military administration decreed the establishment of an open ghetto ("Jewish residential district") in the center of the settlement, composed of a few small houses on Zhaboritskaia Street.² Jews were prohibited from going outside the borders of the ghetto to buy products from Ukrainians. As a result, famine quickly ensued.

On July 19, 1941, the first Aktion took place: 74 Jewish men were seized and killed in the center of the settlement.³ In all likelihood, it was a detachment of the German Security Police and SD from Sonderkommando 4a (part of Einsatzgruppe C) that carried out the shooting.⁴

About two weeks later, German security forces drove out in three cars towards the town of Poninka (south of Baranovka), where they shot 100 Jews. This massacre was probably carried out by units of the 8th SS-Motorized Infantry Regiment of the 1st SS-Motorized Infantry Brigade, which was active in the area from July 29 to 30, 1941.⁵

The third Aktion took place in Baranovka on August 24, 1941.⁶ German forces, directed by a detachment of the 45th Reserve Police Battalion, escorted 180 people to a location 7 kilometers (4 miles) west of the settlement and shot them.⁷

In November 1941, all the remaining able-bodied Jewish men were taken to the forced labor camp in Novograd-Volynskii.⁸ The women, children, and elderly remained in the ghetto until the beginning of January 1942. On January 6, 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto, and the Ukrainian police shot 594 people on the northern outskirts of the settlement. These were the Jewish residents of Baranovka and also the Jews who lived in nearby villages.⁹

More than 1,000 Jews were murdered in Baranovka between July 1941 and January 1942.

During the second half of 1941, 119 Jews in total were murdered in the villages of the Baranovka raion.¹⁰ In Dubrovka, 50 people were killed; in Pershotravensk, 40; in Seremlia, 22; in Kashperovka, 4; and in other villages, 3.

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jews of Baranovka during the Holocaust include the following: Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 87; and Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 53–57.

Documents and witness statements regarding the persecution and extermination of the Jews in the Baranovka raion can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-60-283); GAZO; USHMM; VHAP; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Testimony of Eva Gladkaia, in Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev, 1999), pp. 96–97; available also in English as Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 53–57.

3. Act of January 10, 1944, Zverstva nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatchikov: Dokumenty, vol. 13 (Voenizdat, 1945), p. 50.

4. Alfred Streim, Das Sonderkommando 4a der Einsatzgruppe C und die mit diesem Kommando eingesetzten Einheiten während des Russlandfeldzuges in der Zeit vom 22.6.1941 bis zum Sommer 1943 (Zentrale Stelle der Landesjustizverwaltungen in Ludwigsburg, 1964), p. 170.

5. See Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005), p. 228 n.17.

6. VHAP (USHMM, RG-48.004M), HSSPF-Russland Süd, Jeckeln Telegram, no. 160, August 25, 1941. Spector and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, p. 87, date this Aktion on August 19, 1941.

7. Act of January 10, 1944, Zverstva nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatchikov, vol. 13, p. 50.

8. Testimony of Eva Gladkaia.

9. Act of January 10, 1944. (See note 3) Alexander

10. GARF, 7021-60-283, pp. 162–167. These numbers only included those Jews who could be identified by name. The actual number of people killed was greater than this.

BARASHI

Pre-1941: Barashi, village and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Baraschi, Rayon center, Gebiet Emiltshino, Generalkommissariat Shitomir, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Barashi, Emil'chine raion, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Barashi is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) northwest of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 population census, 320 Jews lived in the village (10 percent of the total population). Altogether there were 549 Jews living in the Barashi raion.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, more than half the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. At that time eligible men were drafted into the Red Army or volunteered. Around 30 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

German armed forces occupied Barashi on July 12, 1941. During July and August, the German military administration created a local authority and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from among local residents. The Ukrainian police played an active role in all the anti-Jewish measures.

At the end of October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Baraschi was a Rayon center in Gebiet Emiltschino, and Kreisobmann Dau was appointed the Gebietskommissar.¹

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the German military administration issued orders for the registration and marking of the Jewish population with armbands. Jews were also required to perform heavy labor without pay.

In the summer of 1941, the German military administration ordered the establishment of a small open ghetto, or "Jewish residential quarter," in the village of Barashi. Jews were prohibited from leaving the limits of the ghetto and from buying products from the local Ukrainians. Some Jews were also brought into the ghetto from surrounding villages. Famine quickly ensued. The ghetto existed until early November 1941.² At that time, all the Jews living in the ghetto were shot. There were at least 37 victims in total and probably as many as 100. The mass shootings were conducted by three SS officers, with the help of the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police from Barashi and Nepoznanichi. They escorted the Jews to a bushy area 3 kilometers (2 miles) east of Nepoznanichi. The younger Jewish men were forced to dig a grave, and then all the victims had to undress. The three SS men then shot the Jews into the grave in groups of 7 to 10 people.³

In the fall of 1941 and spring of 1942, Jews were murdered in a number of villages within the Baraschi Rayon. There were 2 Jews killed in Simony; 3 Jews killed in Buda-Bobritsa; 10 Jews killed in Kremyanka; 15 Jews killed from Novoaleksandrovka (apparently Jews who were taken to Barashi and murdered there in October 1941); and 23 Jews from Staraia Guta (shot in March 1942). The total number of victims was 53 Jews.⁴

SOURCES Documents regarding the murder of the Jews in the Barashi raion can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/204 AR-Z 133/67); DAZO; and GARF (7021-60-284).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. GARF, 7021-60-284, p. 3.

3. BA-L, B 162/204 AR-Z 133/67, Dok. Bd., pp. 39–45, and vol. 2, pp. 302–324. According to the documents of the ChGK in Barashi, 37 Jews were murdered. It is possible, however, that these victims included only those who had known or identifiable surnames.

4. GARF, 7021-60-284, pp. 45, 82, 128, 132, 155.

BERDICHEV

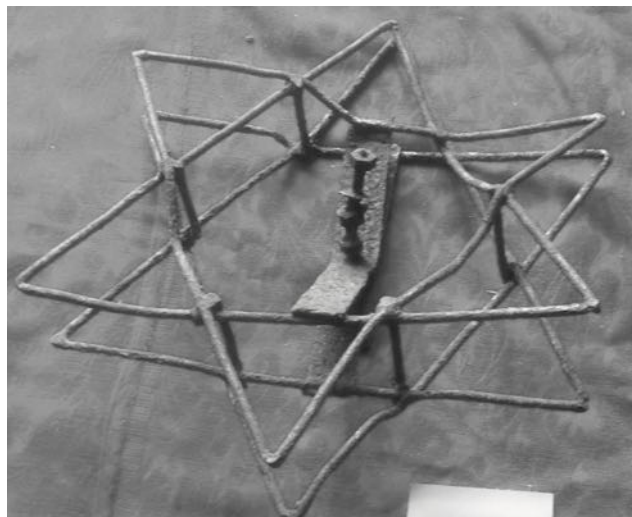

Pre-1941: Berdichev, city and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Berditschew, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shtetmir; post-1991: Berdychiv raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Berdichev is located 44 kilometers (27 miles) south of Zhitomir. In 1939, the Jewish population stood at 23,266 (37.5 percent of the total population).

On the evening of July 7, 1941, about two weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union, the city was occupied by the 11th Panzer Division of the XLVIII Motorized Corps of the 6th Army. Around 10,000 people, the majority of whom were Jews, were evacuated or managed to escape from the city. An undeterminable number of Jews also relocated to the outskirts of the city, settling in nearby small towns and villages.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office ran the affairs of the city. The German commandant established a local administration in Berdichev, headed by the ethnic German mayor Reder, who was assisted by his deputy Slipchenko and the secretary Schmidt. The Germans also established a Ukrainian auxiliary police force, recruited from among the local residents. Koroliuk was appointed as its chief. The Ukrainian police played an active role in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

At the end of October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Berdichev became the administrative center of Gebiet Berditschew. Regierungsrat Erwin Göllner became the Gebietskommissar. In November 1941, three additional appointments were made. Unterleutnant der Polizei Kölle from the police administration in Breslau became the SS- und Polizeistandortführer. Oberleutnant der Polizei

An iron Jewish star that presumably was part of the ghetto fence at Berdichev, n.d. The star, which is a fraction over 1 foot long and 1 foot wide, was found in 2006 by repairmen working on pipes beneath the site of the former ghetto.

COURTESY OF YAHAD-IN UNUM

Becker from the police administration in Bochum became the head of the Schutzpolizei. Finally, Leutnant der Gendarmerie Karl Kurzhals became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Berdichev. Gebiet Berditschew encompassed the Rayons of Ianushpol' and Andrushevka, in addition to the city and Rayon of Berdichev. The new Gebiet Berditschew was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Shitomir.¹

In early to mid-July 1941, Sonderkommando 4a was the first of a series of German punitive units to be active in the city of Berdichev. From the end of July to the end of August 1941, Einsatzkommando 5, commanded by SS-Standartenführer Schulz, was deployed in the city.

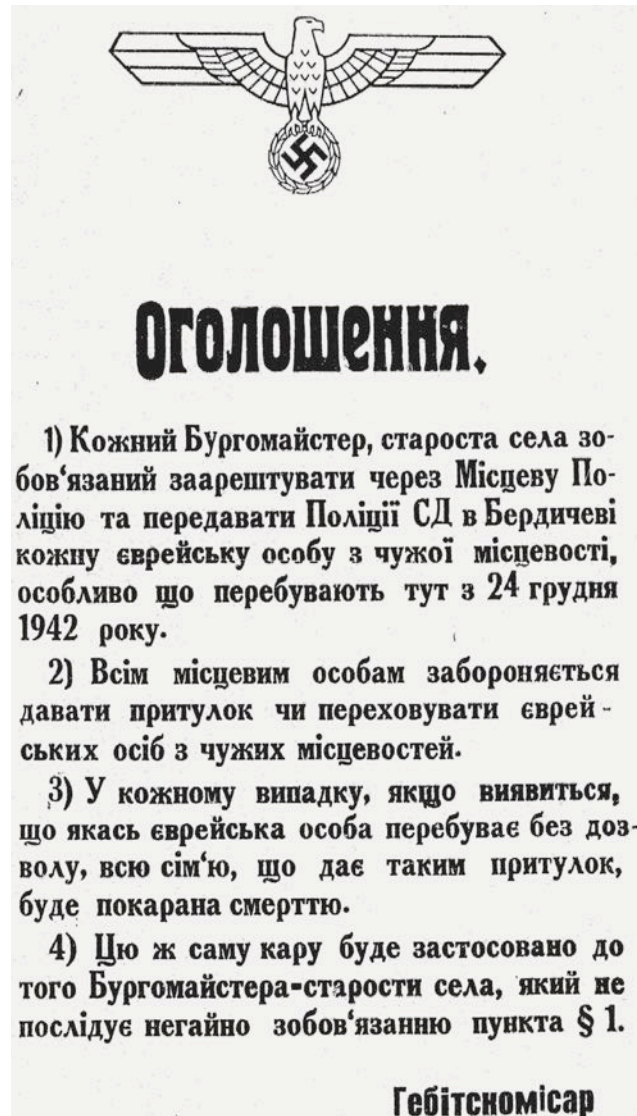

From August 26 to September 20, 1941, the military staff of the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) Russland-Süd, headed by SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln, was present in Berdichev. Also present from September 5 to 21, 1941, was the 45th Police Reserve Battalion, commanded by SS-Sturmabführer Martin Besser. Jeckeln was in charge of all large-scale coordinated police operations. His staff and the members of the 45th Battalion carried out mass killings of the Jewish population in the city in September 1941.²

At the beginning of 1942, a local office of the Security Police (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) was established in Berdichev. From February to June 1942, SS-Sturmabführer Fritz Sievert was in charge of the post. He was succeeded from June to August 1942 by SS-Hauptsturmführer Alois Hülsdünker, and from the middle of August 1942 until the end of the occupation on January 5, 1944, by SS-Hauptscharführer Fritz Knop.³

The first murders of Jews in the city of Berdichev were carried out by detachments of the German armed forces in the form of the Waffen-SS. In the course of two days, the engineers' battalion of the SS-Division "Wiking" carried out four roundup operations against the Jews. Altogether around 850 persons were arrested and shot at a site a few kilometers outside the city.⁴ Other shootings by Sonderkommando 4a, Einsatzkommando 5, and the command staff of the HSSPF Russland-Süd followed in July and August. In addition, in the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Berdichev.

On August 26, 1941, the German occupying authorities declared that a ghetto was to be established in the city and that all Jews must relocate into it over the following three days. The ghetto was located in the poorest part of the city, consisting of ancient shacks, tiny single-storied houses, and crumbling buildings in the area of the Iatki marketplace. Jews were allowed to bring in only clothes and bedding. German soldiers and local residents confiscated all their remaining property. People were forced to live five or six families to a room. Leaving the limits of the ghetto was strictly forbidden. Jews could buy goods at the marketplace only after 6:00 P.M., that is, when no goods were left. Jews inside the ghetto were frequently beaten and robbed by members of the local police.⁵

On September 4, 1941, the first "cleansing" Aktion was carried out against the Jews in the ghetto. Jeckeln ordered the arrest and shooting of 1,303 Jews, including 876 girls over the age of 12. The victims had been told that they were being sent

An undated Ukrainian sign issued by the German authorities in Berdichev, which reads:

"Announcement

1) Every Burgomaster and village elder is required to arrest through the municipal police and to transfer to the SD Police in Berdichev every Jewish person from foreign places, especially those who arrived here since 24 December 1942.

2) All local persons are forbidden to give shelter or hide Jewish persons from foreign places.

3) In all cases where a Jewish person is staying without permission, the entire family that provides such shelter will be punished by death.

4) This same penalty will apply to burgomaster-village elders who do not immediately follow the requirements of point no. 1.

District Commissar"

USHMM/RG 31.023

to do agricultural work, but they ended up digging their own graves. Men subordinated to the HSSPF Russland-Süd carried out the shooting close to the village of Khazhin.⁶

On September 15, 1941, a second large-scale Aktion was carried out in the ghetto. The ghetto was surrounded by SS troops and local police during the night, and starting at 4:00 A.M. they brutally drove some 12,000 persons out of their houses and gathered them in the market square. Many of those who could not walk were killed on the spot. On the square, Reder and Koroliuk carried out a selection of skilled workers. The bulk of the Jews were then formed into columns and escorted under close guard to the airfield, where the German forces shot them in five ditches. About 400 specialist workers and artisans were spared and allowed to return to the ghetto with their families.⁷ Members of the 45th Police Reserve Battalion were among the forces that carried out the mass killing.⁸ The staff company of the HSSPF (Jeckeln), including its guards, bodyguards, and chauffeurs, also took part in the Aktion, assisted by the local Ukrainian police. Local policemen and others immediately looted the empty houses in the ghetto.

On October 30, 1941, the third Aktion was carried out in the ghetto, completing its liquidation. From October 30 to November 1, 1941, Ukrainian policemen rounded up all the remaining Jews who lived in the ghetto and took them to the nearby Carmelite monastery, which served as a prison. On November 3, 1941, around 800 men were the first to be shot, followed by the women and children. About 150 specialist workers and artisans were released and forcibly resettled into the labor camp prison.⁹ The shootings were carried out in the village of Sokulino. The perpetrators in all likelihood were members of the Security Police and SD detachment from Zhitomir, together with the Ukrainian police.

On February 25, 1942, the Jews who remained in the city of Berdichev were resettled into the barracks in Lysaia Gora ("Bald Mountain"). The resettlement of the roughly 350 Jews was completed on March 1, 1942. From May to June 1942, an additional 700 Jews were relocated there from the liquidated ghettos in surrounding places such as Ianushpol', Andrushevka, Kazatin, and Ruzhin. On July 16, 1942, the labor prison camp was liquidated. On the grounds of a former shooting range of the 14th Cavalry Division, around 700 captured Jews and 230 local Jews were shot.¹⁰ The shootings were carried out by the Berdichev Sipo-Aussendienststelle on orders from Dr. Franz Razesberger, the commander of the Security Police and SD in Zhitomir.¹¹ Prior to the shooting, 60 artisans and specialist workers were selected out and resettled into a Security Police prison.¹² The majority of these artisans were shot on November 13, 1943, and January 3, 1944.¹³

On April 27, 1942, around 70 Jewish women and children of mixed marriages were shot. They had been registered as living in Berdichev.¹⁴ The murders were apparently carried out by members of the Security Police outpost.

The total number of Jewish victims from 1941 to 1944 can be estimated at around 17,000 persons. According to the first postwar population census in 1959, around 6,300 Jews lived in Berdichev (11.8 percent of the total population).

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Berdichev and its destruction can be found in the following publications: "Berdichev," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Rossiiskaia Akademiia Estestvennykh Nauk, Nauchnyi fond "Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia," "Epos," 2000), 4:114–115; S. Elisavetskii, Berdichevskaia tragediia: Dokumental'noe povestvovanie (Kiev, 1991); Vasilii Grossman and Il'ia Ehrenburg, eds., "Ubiistvo evreev v Berdicheve," in Chernaia kniga o zlo-deiskom povsemestnom ubiistve evreev nemetsko-fashistskimi za-khvatchikami vo vremenno okkupirovannykh raionakh Sovetskogo Soiuza i v lagerakh Pol'shi vo vremia voiny 1941–1945 gg. (Kiev, 1991), pp. 32–43; John Garrard and Carol Garrard, The Bones of Berdichev: The Life and Fate of Vasily Grossman (New York: Free Press, 1996); and Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev: Zadruga, 1999).

Documents and witness testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Berdichev can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L; DAZO; GARF (7021-560-285); RGVA; USHMM; VHAP; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942. See also the memorandum (Schnellbrief) of the chief of the Security Police from October 25, 1941, in RGVA, 1323-2-121, pp. 33–34.

2. Jeckeln was sentenced by the Soviet military tribunal and hanged in Riga on February 3, 1946. After the war, Besser was under investigation but was unable to appear before the court for reasons of health. On August 5, 1971, Engelbert Kreuzer, the former commander of the 2nd Company of the 45th Battalion, was sentenced to seven years in prison. He pleaded guilty to murdering Jews in a number of cities in Ukraine, including Berdichev; see LG-Reg, Ks 6/70.

3. On August 5, 1966, Sievert was acquitted by a court in Düsseldorf; see LG-Düss, 8I Ks 1/66. On March 9, 1960, Hülsdünker and Knop were sentenced by a court in Berlin to 3 years and 6 months in prison and 7 years in prison, respectively; see LG-Be, 3 PKs 1/57.

4. See the testimony of the former SS-Rottenführer Hans Isenmann at the court proceedings in Kiev in January 1946, in Kyiv's'kyi protses: Dokumenty ta materialy (Kiev, 1995), p. 51.

5. Grossman and Ehrenburg, "Ubiistvo evreev v Berdicheve," p. 35; see also Elisavetskii, Berdichevskaia tragediia, pp. 81–110.

6. BA-BL, R 58/217, pp. 157–186, Ereignismeldung UdSSR, no. 88, September 19, 1941; VHAP, KdO Stab RFSS, Telegram no. 289 of the HSSPF Russland-Süd, September 5, 1941; see also BA-L, B 162, 204 AR-Z 129/67, p. 998.

7. Grossman and Ehrenburg, "Ubiistvo evreev v Berdicheve," pp. 37–39.

8. See the indictment against Rosenbauer, Besser, and Kreuzer dated February 2, 1970, LG-Reg, Ks 6/70.

9. Grossman and Ehrenburg, "Ubiistvo evreev v Berdicheve," pp. 41–42.

10. GARF, 7021-60-285, p. 17 (and reverse side), testimony of the witness Mikhail Pekelis. According to another source, Grossman and Ehrenburg, "Ubiistvo evreev v Berdicheve," p. 42, there were around 500 persons altogether in the labor prison camp.

11. On July 26, 1961, Dr. Franz Razesberger was acquitted by a court in Vienna.

12. Grossman and Ehrenburg, "Ubiistvo evreev v Berdicheve," p. 42.

13. Report of the city's administrative commission from May 13, 1944, GARF, 7021-60-285, p. 8. See also the testimony of the witness Chaim Satanovskii, April 20, 1944, to be found in the same file (GARF, 7021-60-285, pp. 48–49).

14. Grossman and Ehrenburg, “Ubiistvo evreev v Berdicheve,” p. 42.

BRAILOV

Pre-1941: Brailov, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Brailow, Rayon center, Gebiet Litin, Generalkommissariat Shtetmir; post-1991: Brailiv, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Brailov is located 27 kilometers (17 miles) south of Vinnitsa. In 1931, there were about 2,400 Jews in Brailov and its environs. Comprising 96 percent of the inhabitants, they formed an overwhelming majority of the town's population.

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Brailov on July 17, 1941. A number of Jews were able to evacuate or were called up to the Red Army, but the majority remained behind. On the first day of the occupation, 15 Jews were killed. The German authorities appointed Mikhail Baranchuk as the chief of the Ukrainian police, and in this position he demonstrated extraordinary cruelty to the Jewish population. The German authorities ordered the Jews to wear a yellow six-pointed star on their backs and chests. They were explicitly forbidden to leave the settlement and to trade or have any contact with the Ukrainian population in the surrounding villages.¹

After a short time, all Jews were relocated to a ghetto. A monthly “contribution” was demanded of them in money and valuables. In July 1941, at the demand of the military commandant, Jews had to hand over 800 pieces of fabric, 120 pairs of boots, and 500 silk scarves with Nazi swastikas sewn on them, all within 24 hours. They also had to hand over 300,000 rubles in cash.

In the fall of 1941, Brailov came under the control of a German civil administration. Brailov was a Rayon center in Gebiet Litin, under the authority of Gebietskommissar Traugott Volkhammer. In Brailov there was a local post of the German Gendarmerie, commanded by Hans Graf, which assumed control over the local Ukrainian police. Probably on Graf's instructions, Jews were permitted to shop in the market for only 10 minutes every day, signaled by a policeman blowing his whistle.²

In November 1941, Jews had to hand over 10 women's gold watches, 12 gold bracelets, a grand piano for the officer's club, two cars, and three drums of gasoline. Orders for the collection of these goods were passed on via the Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was under the leadership of Iosif Kulik. On a daily basis, about 1,000 prisoners were taken out of the ghetto for various forced labor tasks, which included bricklaying and repairing the roads. The guards shot many of them for working too slowly. A few families opened a leather-making shop in the ghetto and worked there. A linen shop was also in operation. The bulk of the production created by the artisans went directly to the Germans and local policemen.

In the early morning of February 12, 1942, a squad of the Security Police and SD from Vinnitsa, reinforced by Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police from the entire Gebiet Litin and by men of the local German customs post (Zollstelle), gathered more than 1,000 prisoners from the ghetto in the market square, outside the church. After this, searches were carried out in the homes of the Jews in the ghetto. Jews who were ill or who were found in hiding places, including children, were shot immediately. However, the German and Ukrainian forces were unable to find nearly 200 ghetto inhabitants. In contravention of German orders, some Ukrainian policemen plundered Jewish property from the ghetto.³

The Germans began a process of selection, and several hundred Jews were selected out according to those professions that were deemed necessary. These Jews were allowed to take their families and return to the ghetto. Gendarmerie chief Graf demanded that the remaining 800 Jews put their gold, silver, and money into a briefcase, which he had placed beside him. Then they were lined up and driven to the killing site, 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from Brailov, not far from the Jewish cemetery, at the side of the road leading to the village of Demidovka. During the convoy, there were a few daring attempts to escape, but most of the runaways were shot on the spot. When the transport arrived at the killing site, the German forces drove groups of Jews down into a ditch that had been dug for them a few days earlier. The Germans and Ukrainians ordered the Jews to undress and lie facedown in the ditch. Then the men of the Security Police shot them with automatic weapons. The next group laid down on top of the previous one. Iosif Kulik, the aforementioned head of the Judenrat, was permitted to return to the ghetto with his wife. But he refused to do so, and they were both shot during the course of the Aktion.⁴

The territory of the ghetto was then reduced considerably. The prisoners lived in terribly overcrowded conditions. Ghetto inmates faced the death penalty for leaving the ghetto or being found in possession of butter, eggs, or meat. By a special order, Jewish families in the ghetto were threatened with death if they gave birth to any children.⁵

In March or April 1942, the Germans shot 300 more Jews after another selection. Among those murdered in these Aktionen in early 1942 were some 200 Jews from the nearby village of Mezhirov.⁶ On June 8, 1942 (according to another source, April 25, 1942), Graf gathered all the remaining Jews in the market square. On the orders of Gebietskommissar Volkhammer, all those incapable of work (around 100 Jews), mainly children under 16, were selected. They were then led down into a cellar, and the German forces shot them there. Some Brailov Jews escaped the selection and managed to find hiding places. According to new instructions, the dead were to be buried in the ghetto.

In late June or July 1942, the ghetto was liquidated and the German commandant ordered a sign to be hung at the entrance to the settlement, which read in Ukrainian and German: “Brailov, cleansed of Jews [judenrein].” At that time, the Germans shot 503 Jews, including 286 Jews who had been returned to Brailov after escaping at different times to Zhmerinka, which was in the Romanian zone of occupation. On the eve of the Aktion, a squad of German Gendarmerie headed by Hans Graf arrived in Zhmerinka from Brailov and demanded from the Romanian administration and Adolf Hirshman, the head of the Zhmerinka Judenrat, a list of all the Brailov Jews in the Zhmerinka ghetto. Then, under the pretext of required anti-typhus vaccinations, the Brailov Jews were taken back to Brailov from Zhmerinka. Meanwhile, Hirshman hid a small number of Brailov Jews in the Zhmerinka ghetto. This bold act ultimately saved their lives. After the liberation, however, the Soviet authorities tried Hirshman for his role in the fate of Brailov's Jews.⁷

In the late summer and fall of 1942, the Germans and Ukrainian police continued to shoot any Jews they found in hiding, but a number managed to escape to the Romanian-occupied zone, including about 12 Jewish families who were hidden by kolkhoz workers in Kopystirin (in the Shargorod raion). Some of the escapees later became partisans. A squad of the German Criminal Police in Vinnitsa arrived in Brailov in October or December 1943 to organize the shooting of the last Jews remaining in Brailov: 17 tailors who worked in a sewing workshop.⁸

The Red Army recaptured the town from the Germans on March 20, 1944.

SOURCES Additional information on the Brailov ghetto can be found in Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002); in the volume of documents edited by Yitzhak Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoï okkupatsii, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem, 1991), pp. 149–150; and in the volume edited by E. Wolf, Vospominaniia byvshekh uznikov Zhmerinskogo getto (Jerusalem, 2001).

Documentation and survivor testimonies relevant to the Brailov ghetto can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162, II 204a AR-Z 135/67); DAVINO; DAZO; GARF (7021-54-1268); TsDAVO; VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-33/220, 227, 2395; and O-3/3894). In addition, there is an interview conducted with Leonid Langerman in 2005, now deposited in the author's personal archive (PAAKag).

Albert Kaganovich and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Vasily Grossman and Ilya Ehrenburg, eds., Chernaia kniga (Zaporozhe: Interbuk, 1991), pp. 61–67; see also Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry.

2. BA-L, B 162, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, Abschlussbericht, January 24, 1973, pp. 31–32, identifies Graf as the Gendarmerie post commander. The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry names a man called “Kraft” as the commandant who amused himself at this spectacle. These men are probably the same person.

3. TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, pp. 67–87, report of HSSPF Ukraine for March 1942; and also DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 10–11, KdG Shitomir, Hauptmannschaft Winniza, Befehl 16/42, July 20, 1942. Several Schutz männer from Brailov were court-martialed for plundering.

4. BA-L, B 162, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, Abschlussbericht, January 24, 1973, pp. 31–32; see also GARF, 7021-54-1268, pp. 68, 79.

5. Grossman and Ehrenburg, Chernaia kniga, pp. 61–67.

6. BA-L, B 162, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, Abschlussbericht, January 24, 1973, p. 32; see also GARF 7021-54-1268.

7. Wolf, Vospominaniia byvshekh uznikov Zhmerinskogo getto, pp. 94–95, 162–168, 226.

8. BA-L, B 162, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, Abschlussbericht, January 24, 1973, pp. 34–35; Australia's Attorney-General's Department, Report of the Investigations of War Criminals in Australia (Canberra: AGPS, 1993), p. 106.

CHERNIAKHOV

Pre-1941: Cherniakhov, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Tschernjacobow, Rayon center, Gebiet Shitomir, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Cherniakhiv, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Cherniakhov is located 22 kilometers (14 miles) north of Zhitomir. In 1939, 1,482 Jews (20.7 percent of the total population) lived there. Within the villages of the Cherniakhov raion, there were an additional 228 Jews.

After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, a substantial part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of an eligible age were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Less than half of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Cherniakhov at the start of the occupation.

German armed forces occupied the town on July 13, 1941. From July through October 1941, a German military command post (Ortskommandantur) ran the town. The German military set up a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force consisting of local residents. The Ukrainian police played an active role in the anti-Jewish measures.

In November 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Cherniakhov was incorporated into Gebiet Shitomir, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir.¹

After the occupation of the town, the German administration ordered all Jews to be registered and marked with arm-bands. The Jews were then exploited for various forms of heavy labor.

In the first 10 days of August 1941, several cleansing Actions were carried out. Sonderkommando 4a shot an estimated 112 Jews and “Bolsheviks” in the first Aktion.² The second claimed 33 Jews,³ and the third claimed 13 Jews.⁴ Details of the first Aktion are found in Einsatzgruppen report no. 58 of August 20, 1941:

After the arrival of German forces in Cherniakhov, initially it was calm, such that the remaining Jews were compelled to restrain themselves. On the following day, after the combat forces had moved on, Sonderkommando 4a discovered that in the meantime the Jews (as everywhere) were in contact with the scattered Russian partisan units that were terrorizing the entire area. A detachment sent there in response to this observation arrested all the Jewish men they could find, and at the same time searched for terrorists still in hiding. Fifteen members of the (GPU) [State Political Directorate] and another 11 informants were exposed, along with the main criminal, a national judge named Kieper.⁵

1522 ZHYTOMYR REGION

On August 7–8, 1941, the 2nd Battalion of the 10th Motorized Unit of the 1st SS-Motorized Brigade carried out another Aktion. They arrested and shot 232 Jews.⁶

After the shooting of the Jewish men, the Ortskommandantur apparently resettled the remaining Jewish women and children into a freight car at some date in the fall of 1941, where they were held for a short time before they were shot. This brief incarceration could be viewed as a form of destruction ghetto.⁷

During the occupation of Cherniakhov from July 1941 to November 1943, according to the list of names, 571 persons were shot in Cherniakhov, including 568 Jews.⁸

SOURCES Documents dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews in Cherniakhov can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/215, 216); BA-L (B 162/19220); DAZO; GARF (7021-60-314); and USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 3).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Ibid., R 58/215, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 47, August 9, 1941.

3. Ibid., R 58/216, EM no. 58, August 20, 1941.

4. Ibid., EM no. 60, August 22, 1941.

5. Ibid., EM no. 58, August 20, 1941.

6. See the Report of the 1st SS-Motorized Infantry Brigade from August 10, 1941, in Fritz Baade, ed., Unsere Ehre bleibt Treue: Kriegstagebuch des Kommandostabes Reichsführer SS (Vienna: Europa, 1984), pp. 103–105.

7. Wendy Lower, Nazi Empire-Building and the Holocaust in Ukraine (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2005), p. 88. Lower, however, contrasts this treatment starkly with the formal ghettoization process known from the larger cities in the Generalgouvernement.

8. GARF, 7021-60-314, pp. 100–102 and reverse side. See also BA-L, B 162/19220, pp. 60–61, which also gives the figure of 571 people shot in Cherniakhov.

CHERVONOARMEISK

(AKA KRASNOARMEISK)

Pre-1941: Chervonoarmeisk, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Tschervonnoarmeisk, renamed Pulin, Rayon center, Gebiet Zwiabel (Nowograd-Wolynskij), Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Chervonoarmiisk, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Chervonoarmeisk is located 160 kilometers (99 miles) west of Kiev. In 1926, 1,056 Jews lived in Chervonoarmeisk. According to the 1939 population census, 523 Jews (13.2 percent of the total population) lived in the town. Additionally, 490 Jews lived in the villages of what was then the Chervonoarmeisk raion.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate. Eligible men at that time were conscripted or volunteered for the Red Army. Around 55 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the settlement at the start of the occupation.

German armed forces occupied the town in July 1941. From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of Chervonoarmeisk. The German military administration created a raion authority and established a Ukrainian police unit from among the local inhabitants. The Ukrainian policemen played an active role in the anti-Jewish measures.

At the end of October 1941, authority passed to the German civil administration. Chervonoarmeisk was incorporated into Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij, and Regierungsassessor Dr. Schmidt became the Gebietskommissar. In turn, Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij was part of Generalkommissariat Shitomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹

Shortly after the occupation of Chervonoarmeisk, the German military administration issued orders calling for a registration and marking of the Jewish population with armbands. Jews were also made to perform unpaid heavy labor, such as the repair of roads and buildings.

At some time in the summer or early fall of 1941, the German Ortskommandantur established a ghetto or "Jewish residential quarter," in Chervonoarmeisk. Jews were prohibited from leaving the limits of the ghetto and were forbidden to buy products from the local Ukrainians. Famine quickly ensued in consequence.

According to the Jewish survivor Mark Meshok, around September 1941, Jews were rounded up in the surrounding villages, including in the village of Ocheretianki, and were brought to the ghetto in Chervonoarmeisk, where hundreds of people were collected. The ghetto consisted of only five or six houses in the center of Chervonoarmeisk, surrounded with barbed wire. It was guarded by local policemen and by the Germans. However, Ukrainians still came to the ghetto and traded food for valuable items or for work, such as sewing.²

The ghetto existed until December 1941, when the Germans liquidated it and all its inhabitants were shot. Just before the Aktion, the Germans spread word that all the Jews would be sent to Palestine. Then early in the morning the local police drove the Jews out of their houses only half-dressed in the freezing cold. As the Jews were escorted to the pits, local Ukrainians started to rob them, taking their coats. The elderly who could not keep up were killed on the way. On reaching Iagodenka, just to the southwest of Chervonoarmeisk, the column turned up the hill, and the men started to pray, realizing that the end was near. The Jews were surrounded by Germans and local police and were shot into the pits. Infants were taken from their mothers' arms and thrown into the pit to be buried alive.³

The mass murders were carried out by three SS officers with the help of the Ukrainian police and by a detachment that was subordinated to SS-Obergruppenführer Jeckeln, Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer Russland-Süd. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 274 people were shot, but this source dates the Aktion in September 1941.⁴

Mark Meshok and his mother were both saved by a local ethnic German named Fritsche (or Fricher), who lived in Iagodenka and managed to extract them both from the column of Jews and take them back to his home.⁵

In the second half of 1941, Jews were executed in a number of other villages in the Chervonoarmeisk raion. There were 6 Jews murdered in October 1941 in the village of Ocheretianki (to the northwest of Chervonoarmeisk), and 11 Jews murdered in the village of Sokolov (to the east).⁶

SOURCES Information on the destruction of the Jews of Chervonoarmeisk can be found in the following publication: A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertv fashizma,” 2000), p. 56 (in this source, the settlement is referred to as Krasnoarmeisk).

Documentation regarding the destruction of the Jews of Chervonoarmeisk can be found in the following archives: DAZO; GARF (7021-60-300); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 2); and VHF (# 5812).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft and Crispin Brooks

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. VHF, # 5812, testimony of Mark Meshok.

3. Ibid.

4. GARF, 7021-60-300, pp. 144, 146.

5. VHF, # 5812.

6. GARF, 7021-60-300, pp. 91–92, 112.

CHUDNOV

Pre-1941: Chudnov, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Tschudnow, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Chudniv, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast’, Ukraine

Chudnov is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) southwest of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 population census, 2,506 Jews lived in the town (46.4 percent of the total). Additionally, there were 703 Jews in the villages of the Chudnov raion.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the settlement on July 7, 1941, less than three weeks after the start of the German invasion. In this period a few hundred Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Approximately 75 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained at the start of the German occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. The German military authorities created a local Ukrainian administration and recruited an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from among the local population.

At the end of October 1941, authority passed to the German civil administration. Chudnov became the administrative center of Gebiet Tschudnow, and Hitler Jugend (HJ)-Oberstammführer Dr. Blümel was appointed as Gebietskommissar. The Rayons Ljubar and Dsershinsk were also incorporated into Gebiet Chudnov.¹

On July 15, 1941, a week after the occupation of the town, a “Jewish residential district” (an open ghetto) was established in Chudnov in a part of town that had been severely damaged during the fighting. One main street and a few side streets were reserved only for the Jewish population, but the area was not fenced in. The Jews were prohibited from leaving the area and from buying products from local Ukrainians. They had their own separate shops, and the Ukrainians were forbidden all contact with the Jews. The Jews were ordered to wear armbands on their left arms, bearing a yellow six-pointed Star of David. Jewish men were required to perform heavy labor, were prohibited from leaving the limits of the town, and were subjected to beatings and robbery by the Germans and Ukrainian police.²

One day, probably in August 1941, Jews from Chudnov were taken to dig graves in the local park. At this time the Germans brought a number of Jews from the nearby village of Piatka into Chudnov and shot them in these graves. The grave diggers were also beaten and humiliated before they were released.³

On September 9, 1941, the Germans organized the first Aktion against Chudnov’s Jews. About 800 or 900 people were loaded onto trucks on the pretext of a labor assignment and were taken out of the town to be shot.⁴ Apparently, members of Police Battalion 303, commanded by Major der Polizei Heinrich Hannibal, carried out the shooting. The battalion was stationed in Chudnov from September 5, 1941.⁵

Conditions in the ghetto deteriorated during the fall. People were starving, it became cold, and the Jews had inadequate clothing. There was not even any water in the Jewish quarter. Those who tried to bring in water were either beaten or shot by the guards.⁶

On October 16, 1941, the Germans conducted a second Aktion in Chudnov. In a document for the “Divak settlement,” the head of the OUN (Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists) in Chudnov reported that “on October 16, 1941, all Jews regardless of age were shot by order of the German military commandant in Berdichev.” The Ukrainian police from the town of “Divak” conducted the killings. About 500 Jews were shot altogether.⁷ The German and Ukrainian police drove the Jews out of their houses in the ghetto and gathered them in the local cinema building. From there they were loaded onto trucks and transported to a park on the southern outskirts of Chudnov. In the park, the Germans had placed boards across the pits, and they shot the Jews in groups of 5 to 10 people such that they fell in.⁸

1524 ZHYTOMYR REGION

On October 22, 1941, the Ukrainian police carried out a third and final Aktion against the ghetto. They rounded up the few hundred remaining Jews, again gathering them in the local cinema building before taking them away in vehicles to the park and shooting them in the same manner.⁹

After this last Aktion, only a small group of Jewish specialized workers remained in the town. They were held in a barracks area, which was surrounded by barbed wire.¹⁰ In the middle of November 1941, these Jews were also shot and killed.¹¹ The Germans and their collaborators murdered around 2,000 Jews in Chudnov between September and November 1941.

With regard to the Chudnov raion, apart from the Jews of Piatka, between August and September 1941, an additional 111 Jews from the village of Novyi Chudnov were killed.¹²

Among the very few Jewish survivors from Chudnov, both Mariam Sandal and Polina Pekerman benefited from being able to persuade local policemen to let them go, owing to either personal friendships or their non-Jewish appearance. Pekerman also names two Ukrainian policemen who actively participated in the killings: a man named Briukhanov and an officer named Lozovoi.¹³

SOURCES Published testimonies by Jewish survivors from Chudnov can be found in these works: Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005); and Neizvestnaia chernaia kniga: Svidetel'stva ochevidtsev o Katastrofe sovetskikh evreev, 1941–1944 (Jerusalem and Moscow, 1993).

Documentation on the persecution and elimination of the Jews of Chudnov can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; DAZO (1151-1-2); GARF (7021-60-315); TsDAHOU (57-4-225); and VHAP.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. See the testimonies of Polina Pekerman and Mariam Sandal (Askes), in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 195–205, 268–273; TsDAHOU, 57-4-225, p. 33.

3. Testimony of M. Sandal (Askes), p. 269. In 1931 there were 791 Jews living in Piatka.

4. Neizvestnaia chernaia kniga, p. 158. See also the testimonies of M. Sandal (Askes), pp. 195–205, and P. Pekerman, pp. 268–273.

5. See telegram no. 305 of September 6, 1941, from the Higher SS and Police Leader Russia South, VHAP, KdO-Stab RFSS.

6. Testimony of M. Sandal (Askes), p. 269.

7. DAZO, 1151-1-2. In this document, “Divak” probably refers to Chudnov. See also testimony of M. Sandal (Askes), pp. 269–270, which dates the second Aktion in Chudnov on October 16, 1941.

8. Testimonies of P. Pekerman, pp. 199–205, and M. Sandal (Askes), pp. 268–273.

9. Testimony of M. Sandal (Askes), p. 271.

10. Verdict of LG-Kass, 3 Ks 5/57, May 24, 1957, in the case against Konrad H., published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1976), 44:138–139.

11. Neizvestnaia chernaia kniga, p. 160.

12. GARF, 7021-60-315, p. 25.

13. Testimonies of P. Pekerman, pp. 195–205, and M. Sandal (Askes), pp. 268–273.

DASHEV

Pre-1941: Dashev, town and raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Daschew, Rayon center, Gebiet Monastyrishchtsche, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Dashiv, Illintsi raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Dashev is located 76 kilometers (48 miles) southeast of Vinnytsa. Dashev consists of three parts (former villages): Staryi Dashev, Novyi Dashev, and Polevoe.

According to the 1939 census, there were 967 Jews living in Dashev (34.1 percent of the total population); in the villages of what was then the Dashev raion, there were an additional 452 Jews. Most of these Jews lived in the villages of Kitaigorod and Kal'nik.

German armed forces occupied the town on July 25, 1941, about five weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During these intervening weeks, some Jewish men volunteered for or were drafted into the Red Army, and a number of Jews managed to evacuate eastward.

In the period from July to October 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) located in Gaisin governed the town. In November 1941, a civil administration replaced the German military administration. Until its liberation in March 1944, Rayon Daschew was part of Gebiet Monastyrishchtsche, in Generalkommissariat Shitomir. The Gebietskommissar was SA-Oberführer Werder. In Dashev itself, there was a Gendarmerie post to which a squad of Ukrainian police was subordinated; the latter, together with the German Gendarmerie, took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions in the Rayon. In July 1942, the head of the Ukrainian police (Schutzmannschaft) in Dashev was a man named Charilon Sachartschuk.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, the Germans established a Jewish Council (Judenrat); Jews were required to wear armbands bearing the Star of David; they were forced to perform work on behalf of the German occupation agencies; they were forbidden to leave the town limits; and they were ordered to hand over all their valuables, including bicycles, sewing machines, and gramophones. Jews were forbidden to sell products in the market, while the local Ukrainian residents were forbidden to maintain relationships of any kind with Jews; infractions of this rule were subject to flogging. The places where the Jews lived in close proximity, both in Staryi Dashev and in Novyi Dashev, were declared to be “Jewish quarters” (open ghettos). The open ghetto in Staryi Dashev was liquidated on October 28, 1941,² when almost all the Jews were shot; in November 1941, around 200 Jews from the village of Kitaigorod were herded into Staryi Dashev and shot.³ The total number of victims was 814.⁴ The shooting was carried out by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5, assisted by other German forces and the Ukrainian police. In Novyi Dashev, 165 Jews were shot, probably on December 17, 1941, followed by 37 more on December 20, 1941.⁵ Ortskommandantur I (V) 275, based in the Vinnitsa region, reported on December 18, 1941, that it had received two postal saving books that had been confiscated by the Feldgendarmarie in Dashev on the occasion of an Aktion against the Jews there on December 17.⁶

According to the Jewish child survivor Basia Malinskaia, after these mass shootings, there were only about a dozen Jews (probably specialist workers and their families) left in Dashev. They all were moved into two houses in Staryi Dashev, at the very end of the town. One family lived in the last house, and in the other there lived a Jewish man who served as the “commandant” or elder of the Jewish settlement, together with a few other people. The Jewish commandant with his son kept watch on German orders, to ensure that nobody left the two houses. They hoped that if they obeyed orders, perhaps their lives would be spared. There was a well in the courtyard of one of the houses, where the families could get water and do their washing.

In the spring of 1942, the Germans conducted several roundups in the small remnant ghetto, but some Jews succeeded in hiding, either in the fields or concealed in a cellar within one of the houses. Those who were taken in the roundups, probably including the Jewish elder, all were shot in a ravine near Kupchintsy, about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) from Dashev.⁷ According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the remaining 13 Jewish specialists from Novyi Dashev were shot in May 1942.⁸

The murder of the Jews of Dashev is mentioned by the Jewish survivor Ida Kalnizkaia, whose grandparents were apparently shot there in the courtyard of their home.⁹ Basia Malinskaia survived after her parents passed her on to a Ukrainian family in the village of Parkhomovka for the remainder of the German occupation. The son of the Jewish elder of the remnant ghetto also somehow managed to survive and returned to live in Dashev after the war.¹⁰

SOURCES Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Dashev can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 2104/23); DAVINO; DAZO (e.g., 1151-1-703); GARF (7021-54-1266); USHMM (RG-22.002M; and Acc.1996.A.0269); VHF (# 47531); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Crispin Brooks
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13–14, KdG Shitomir, Hauptmannschaftsbefehl Nr. 18/42, July 25, 1942.
2. B. Rabiner, My rodnom iz getto. Vospominaniia byvshikh uznikov Mogilev-Podol'skogo getto (New York, 1996), p. 96.
3. A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertv fashizma,” 2000), pp. 13, 23. Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia En- tsiklopediia (Moscow: Rossiiskaia Akademiia Estestvennykh Nauk, Nauchnyi fond “Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia,” “Epos,” 2000), 5:95, gives the number of victims from Kitaigorod as 360. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 631, cites 180 Jews expelled to Dashev and shot there. It is possible that these Jews were shot in December.

4. GARF, 7021-54-1266, p. 38.

5. Ibid., p. 159. This source gives the date of the larger shooting Aktion as December 12, 1941, but German documentation reports an Aktion in Dashev on December 17, 1941.

6. BA-BL, R 2104/23, p. 1570, OK I (V) 275, Nachweisung über beschlagnahmte Geldmittel, December 18, 1941.

7. VHF, # 47531, testimony of Basia Malinskaia, born 1932.

8. GARF, 7021-54-1266, p. 159.

9. Boris Zabarko, ed., “Nur wir haben überlebt”: Holocaust in Ukraine—Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004), p. 171.

10. VHF, # 47531.

DZERZHINSK

Pre-1941: Dzerzhinsk (Romanov until 1933), town and raion center; Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Romanov (Dershinsk), Rayon center, Gebiet Tschudnow, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Dzerzhinsk, raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukraine; [post-2003: Romaniv]

The 1939 census indicated 1,720 Jews (24.2 percent of the total population) in the town of Dzerzhinsk and 1,188 Jews living in the villages of the Dzerzhinsk raion. The town is located 53 kilometers (33 miles) west-southwest of Zhitomir.

On July 7, 1941, German forces of the 6th Army occupied the town. By then a few hundred Jews had been able to evacuate to the east. Eligible men were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. About three quarters of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Dzerzhinsk at the start of the occupation. In addition, a few hundred Jewish refugees had arrived, bringing the population in the settlement to around 1,800 Jews.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the settlement. The German military authorities established a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police unit recruited from among the local residents.

At the end of October 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Dzerzhinsk became part of Gebiet Tschudnow, and Hitler Jugend (HJ)-Oberstammführer Dr. Blümel was appointed the Gebietskommissar.¹ Shortly after the occupation of Dzerzhinsk, the Ortskommandantur ordered the registration of the Jews and marking them with armbands. They were also forced to perform heavy labor, solely on account of their being Jewish.

At the end of July 1941, the Ortskommandantur declared the establishment of an open ghetto (“Jewish residential district”) in Dzerzhinsk, designating for this purpose two streets, which were guarded by the local police.² Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto area or to buy products from the Ukrainians. As a result, the Jewish population experienced shortages of food, and starvation began to set in.

On August 25, 1941, German security forces conducted the first Aktion in Dzerzhinsk. Jewish men were executed in two ditches in the forest, close to the town.³ A company of the 45th Reserve Police Battalion, commanded by Martin Besser and subordinated to the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer Russland-Süd, probably carried out the shooting. They murdered 549 people altogether.⁴

In the middle of October 1941, Ukrainian policemen carried out a second Aktion in the public park, killing more than 100 Jews.⁵

On October 23, 1941, the Dzerzhinsk ghetto was liquidated. The Ukrainian police shot some 850 elderly people, women, and children in the forest near the town.⁶ After this Aktion, only the Jewish craftsmen and their families—around 300 people—remained in the town. On December 7, 1941, the Ukrainian policemen shot 168 of them at the former military airfield near the village of Romanovka.⁷ The remaining 122 persons were shot in the public park in Dzerzhinsk on June 15, 1942.⁸

Altogether in 1941–1942, around 1,800 Jews were murdered at different sites in Dzerzhinsk.⁹

A number of Jews were also killed in the villages around Dzerzhinsk. In the villages of Miropol' and Pechanovka, 41 Jews were murdered: 16 men, 10 women, and 15 children.¹⁰ And 253 people were killed in the village of Kamenka.¹¹

SOURCES Information on the persecution and extermination of the Jewish population of Dzerzhinsk can be found in the following publication: Garri Fel'dman, Zabveniiu ne podlezhbit: Sbornik materialov o Kholokoste, perezhbitom moimi zemliakami (Zhitomir: Polissia, 2000).

Documents regarding the fate of the Jews of Dzerzhinsk during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; DAZO; GARF (7021-60-291); and VHAP.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Fel'dman, Zabveniiu ne podlezhbit, p. 51.

3. GARF, 7021-60-291, pp. 4, 60, 87–88.

4. VHAP, KdO-Stab RFSS, Telegram no. 179 from the Higher SS and Police Leader Russia South, August 26, 1941. According to the report of April 10, 1945, after the sites were uncovered, approximately 620 corpses were found in the mass grave (GARF, 7021-60-291, p. 4). The witnesses G. Shnaiderman and B. Zel'tser said that there were around 890 people murdered (pp. 87–88).

5. Inquiry results passed to the author by the Security Service Administration of Ukraine in Zhytomyr oblast' December 4, 1991. According to the testimony of V. Pekeman, this shooting probably took place on October 18, 1941; see Fel'dman, Zabveniiu ne podlezhbit, pp. 34, 135.

6. Testimony of B. Zel'tser, May 25, 1945, GARF, 7021-60-291, p. 88. According to another source, the mass shooting took place on October 25, 1941.

7. Fel'dman, Zabveniiu ne podlezhbit, p. 35.

8. Report of May 27, 1945, GARF, 7021-60-291, p. 60.

9. Only 1,499 names of Jews killed in Dzerzhinsk are known. See GARF, 7021-60-291, pp. 61–86.

10. Ibid., p. 121. The shootings took place in September 1941 and February 1942.

11. Ibid., p. 404. The shootings took place on September 28, 1941, in December 1941, and in January 1942.

DZHULINKA

Pre-1941: Dzhulinka, village and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Dshulinka, Rayon center, Gebiet Gaissin, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Dzhulynka, Bershad' raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Dzhulinka is located 125 kilometers (78 miles) southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, there were 212 Jews living in Dzhulinka, accounting for 4.68 percent of the population.

German armed forces occupied the village on July 28, 1941, five weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During that time, some of the Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for military service in the Red Army, and a small number of Jews were successfully evacuated to the eastern regions of the USSR.

In the period July through October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) located in Gaisin was in charge of the village. In November 1941, a German civil administration replaced the military authorities. Until its liberation in March 1944, Rayon Dshulinka was part of Gebiet Gaissin in Generalkommissariat Shitomir. In Dzhulinka itself, there was a Gendarmerie post, to which a squad of Ukrainian police was subordinated.

Soon after the occupation of the village, the residential area, where most Jews were concentrated, was probably declared to be a "Jewish quarter" (open ghetto). According to one Soviet source, this "open ghetto" was only in existence for a few weeks, as in August 1941, the Germans rounded up the Jews and shot them, killing 156 people in total. The shooting took place on a tract of land where pine trees grew, near the village.¹

SOURCES The available sources consulted for this article, however, give conflicting versions of the events. The Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) published in Kiev in 2000 by the State Committee of the Ukrainian Archives, p. 33, states that there was a ghetto in Dzhulinka, citing two documents from the State Archives of the Vinnytsia Oblast' (DAVINO, R-1683-1-13 and R-6022-1-27, which is cited as a list of ghetto prisoners), but it gives no further details. Other sources give different dates for the murder of the Jews of Dzhulinka. According to Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 351, the Jews were murdered outside the town on April 2, 1942. Ros-siiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:381, also dates the shooting of all the remaining Jews (156 people) in August 1941. According to the ChGK (GARF, 7021-54-1240, p. 5), 156 people (Jews and Ukrainians) were shot in December 1942 and February 1943. It has to be concluded that the existing data on the "Dzhulinka ghetto" remain unconfirmed and require further research.

Additional documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Dzhulinka can be found in the following archives: BA-L (e.g., B 162/2331, 2332, 26795); DAVINO (e.g., R 425-1-5, R 1683-1-13, and R 6022-1-27); and GARF (7021-54-1240).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTE

1. DAVINO, R-425-1-5, p. 13.

GAISIN

Pre-1941: Gaisin, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Gaissin, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Gaisyn, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Gaisin is located 82 kilometers (51 miles) southeast of Vinnitsa. In 1939, there were 4,109 Jews in Gaisin (27.7 percent of the total) and 380 Jews living in the Gaisin raion.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men were conscripted or enlisted voluntarily in the Red Army. About 2,000 Jews remained in the town when the occupation began (50 percent of the pre-war population).

The town was occupied by the Wehrmacht on July 25, 1941. In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office—Ortskommandantur I (V) 275—commanded by a Major Heinrich ran the town. A raion administration and an auxiliary police unit were formed from among the local residents. In the fall of 1941, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Gaisin became the administrative center of Gebiet Gaissin, and Kreisleiter Becher was named the Gebietskommissar.¹ Gebiet Gaissin also included the Rayons of Teplik and Dshulinka, and it became part of Generalkommissariat Shitomir.

In the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in the town. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created, and all Jews were ordered to wear distinctive armbands bearing the image of the Star of David. Jews were forced to perform heavy labor for the occupying German military forces and were prohibited from leaving the limits of the town. They also had to surrender all their items of value. Jews were not allowed to buy products on the market, and in turn the local Ukrainians were not permitted to have any contact with them. Violators of these regulations were subjected to severe punishments.

At some date in the summer or fall of 1941, Major Heinrich ordered the creation of an "open ghetto" (Jewish residential district) in Gaisin. One street (Rabochnaia Street) was cordoned off for this purpose, and Jews were expressly prohibited from living on any of the other streets.²

On September 16, 1941, an anti-Jewish Aktion was carried out in the town during which at least 1,409 local Jews were murdered, together with 29 brought in from Ladyzhin, where a similar Aktion had taken place on September 13. The shootings were carried out by men of Police Battalion 304, led by its commander, Major Karl Deckert. The battalion was stationed in Gaisin from September 6 to 19, 1941.³ On the day before the Aktion, the local Ukrainian police marked the houses in which the Jewish victims were living. At 6:00 A.M. on the next day, members of the police battalion drove the Jews out of their houses and gathered them on the market square. From here the victims were escorted to a killing site about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town. Those Jews unable to walk were carried by others. At the grave site, the Jews were made to lie facedown in the ditch in groups of up to 10 persons, and German policemen shot them from behind with machine pistols. The Aktion continued until 4:00 P.M.⁴ Local commandant Heinrich reported on September 17, 1941, that he had received several items of gold jewelry handed in by a Ukrainian policeman (Milizsoldat) as a result of the "Jewish Aktion" carried out in Gaisin.⁵

The ghetto in Gaisin was basically liquidated after this Aktion. Only about 150 Jewish artisan workers remained in the town thereafter. The majority of them were shot on May 7–10, 1943.⁶ This mass shooting apparently was conducted by members of the local Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) along with the Ukrainian police. This Security Police outpost was present in Gaisin from 1942 to 1944 and served under the commanding officer of the Security Police and SD in Zhitomir (KdS Shitomir).⁷

In the summer of 1942, a forced labor camp for Jews was created in Gaisin. Jews were resettled there from "Transnistria," the Romanian-occupied zone of Ukraine. Jewish labor was exploited to build a bridge across the Sob River, which was part of the main road to Vinnitsa. After the completion of the building project, the Jews were shot and buried under the bridge. On October 14, 1942, 230 Jews were shot. On November 6, 1942, 1,000 Jews were shot.⁸ These murders apparently were carried out by Lithuanian policemen of the 7th Lithuanian Police (Schutzmannschaft) Battalion. The military staff of the 4th Company of this battalion was present in Gaisin with one platoon from April to December 1942. The order for the shootings came from SS-Hauptsturmführer Franz Christoffel, who from March to November 1942 was the head of the Second Roadbuilding Section (from Vinnitsa to Uman') and had a residence in Gaisin.

Some names are known of Ukrainians who saved Jews from extermination: Miasnikova, Kutok, and Efrosyn'ia Semeniuk. Semeniuk saved the lives of seven Jews. The German Landwirtschaftsführer (agricultural leader) Fritz Ginzel also kept Jews in hiding. He was shot by People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) agents in 1944. The Jewish doctor Niderman was protected by his Ukrainian patients for some time, but the Germans came and arrested him in the middle of the night.⁹

A group of Jews from Gaisin participated in the partisan resistance movement. Partisan sections were based in the Shcheblianskii Forest, which was located near the town. There was a separate detachment composed of Jews, including many women, children, and elderly persons. Many Jews fought actively in the detachment, and other detachments provided the means of protection for them. In addition, at least 12 Jews in the Gaisin region were members of Soviet underground organizations.¹⁰

SOURCES Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews in Gaisin can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 2104/23); BA-L (B 162/204a AR-Z 140/67); BStU; DAVINO (R 4222-1-7); GARF (7021-54-1272); and YVA (M-33/224, M-52/432).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Acts of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) for the investigation of war crimes by the German occupants in the Gaisin raion from July 24, 1941, to March 13, 1944, are published in V. Lukin, A. Sokolova, and B. Khaimovich, eds., 100 evreiskikh mestechek Ukrainy: Istoricheskii putevoditel'—Podoliia (St. Petersburg, 2000), pp. 199–200. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 418, state that a ghetto was established immediately after the arrival of the Germans but do not give a source.

3. Diary of Otto Müller, a former member of Police Battalion 304, BStU, Archiv der Zentralstelle, MfS-HA IX/11, ZUV 78, vol. 6, p. 62. Other sources indicate that about 3,000 Jews were murdered in Gaisin at this time; see A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertv fashizma,” 2000), p. 13. The East German courts date the Aktion on September 16–17, 1941, and cite up to 4,000 victims. BA-BL, R 2104/23, p. 1564, mentions a “Judenaktion” on September 13, 1941; this was probably the Aktion in Ladyzhin, where 486 local Jews were shot; see A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravoch-nik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 182.

4. DDR-Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 1 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 1029a, pp. 737–738.

5. BA-BL, R 2104/23, p. 1577, report of OK I (V) 275, September 17, 1941, signed Major und Kommandant Heinrich. Among the Ukrainian police serving in Gaisin in 1942 were Michail Moskoluk, Anton Mulja, and Stanislaus Hautkowski; see DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13–14.

6. GARF, 7021-54-1272, pp. 396 and reverse side.

7. DAZO, 1182-1-26, p. 104.

8. M. Carp, Cartea Neagra (Bucharest, 1947), 3:286.

9. Lukin, Sokolova, and Khaimovich, 100 evreiskikh mestechek Ukrainy, p. 200.

10. Y. Maliar (Israel) and F. Vinokurova (Ukraine), eds., Vinnitsa oblast'—Katastrofa (Shoa) i soprotivlenie; Svidetel'stva evreev—uznikov kontslagerei i getto, uchastnikov partizanskogo dvizheniia i podpol'noi bor'by (Tel Aviv and Kiev, 1994), pp. 178–179.

IANOV

Pre-1941: Ianov, village, Kalinovka raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Janow, Rayon and Gebiet Kalinowka, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir, post-1991: Ivaniv, Kalynivka raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Ianov is located 30 kilometers (19 miles) north-northeast of Vinnitsa. There were probably around 1,000 Jews living in Ianov in 1941.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Ianov on July 22, 1941. In the summer and fall of 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the village. The commandant appointed a village elder and organized an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. At the end of October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. It became part of Gebiet Kalinowka, within Generalkommissariat Sbitomir. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Dr. Seelemeyer. Based in Ianov as part of the civil administration were one or two officials of the German agricultural administration (Landwirtschaftsführer).¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German occupying authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures. The Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing marks in the form of the Star of David (later, a yellow circle). They were required to perform forced labor, often without pay. They were not permitted to leave the limits of the village. Finally, Jews were subjected to systematic lootings and beatings by the Ukrainian police and local antisemites.

According to the The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, in March 1942 hundreds of Jewish families were crowded into a ghetto in Ianov.² In mid-May 1942, a group of able-bodied Jews from the Ianov ghetto was selected and sent on foot to the village of Kalinovka, where they were placed in a forced labor camp and assigned to work on the construction of an airfield.

On May 30, 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghettos in Ianov and nearby Pikov at the same time. Forces of the German Gendarmerie, the Ukrainian police, and also Hungarian soldiers, who arrived from Kalinovka, rounded up the Jews in Ianov in the morning and escorted them to a prepared pit, near the Jewish cemetery, which lay approximately halfway between Ianov and Pikov (Pikov is about 10 kilometers [6 miles] to the north of Ianov). There the Jews had to wait for about two hours until additional Germans (probably an SD detachment from KdS Winniza) arrived in the afternoon to carry out the mass shooting. Some of the Jewish children were simply beaten to death or were buried alive in the mass grave. It is estimated that more than 800 Jews from Ianov were killed on this day.³

In the initial days of June 1942, the Germans and the Ukrainian police searched Ianov repeatedly for Jews in hiding. According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), by June 12, 1942, they had shot an additional 194 Jews, so the total number of victims in Ianov exceeded 1,000.⁴

The Red Army drove the German occupiers from Ianov in March 1944.

SOURCES Publications concerning the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Ianov include the following: "Ianov," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:494; and "Janov," in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 559–560. The ghetto in Ianov is also mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 35.

Documentation regarding the destruction of the Ianov Jews can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/7364); DAVINO (R5022-1-176); GARF (7021-54-1274); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 4); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. DAVINO, R5022-1-176, dates it in early 1942.

3. BA-L, B 162/7364 (204a AR-Z 134/67), pp. 190–191, 353. GARF, 7021-54-1274, p. 252, gives a total of 814 Jews from Ianov killed on May 30, 1942.

4. GARF, 7021-54-1274, p. 252. BA-L, B 162/7364 (204a AR-Z 134/67), pp. 190–191, 353, gives slightly different figures for Ianov in early June, but these appear to be the numbers for Novyi Pikov from the ChGK records.

IANUSHPOL'

Pre-1941: Ianushpol', town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Januschpol, Rayon center, Gebiet Berditschew, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Ivanopil', Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Ianushpol' is located 55 kilometers (34 miles) southwest of Zhitomir. In 1939, 721 Jews lived in Ianushpol'. (In the entire Ianushpol' raion, there were only 963 Jews.)

German troops occupied the town on July 3, 1941. During July, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 carried out the first anti-Jewish Aktion. Mention of this Aktion can be found in Einsatzgruppen Report no. 58 of August 20, 1941:

In recent days, in the town of Ianushpol', where the Jewish population comprised about 25 percent of the inhabitants, the Jewish women behaved with especial insolence and impudence in response to the social restrictions imposed upon them. They became so incensed that they ripped off their own and their children's clothes. As a provisional punishment measure and to calm down the situation in general, members of the Einsatzkommando shot 15 Jewish men. Further punitive measures will follow.¹

It is probable that a "Jewish residential quarter" or "open ghetto" was created in the town of Ianushpol' as early as July 1941. The Jews were ordered to mark their identity by wearing a piece of fabric in the shape of a yellow star on their clothing. Furthermore, they were forced to carry out physically demanding work. During the winter of 1941–1942, the Jewish inmates of the ghetto suffered from hunger and cold. The ghetto was liquidated on May 29, 1942. A unit of the German Security Police and SD, probably from the outpost in Berdichev,² in collaboration with members of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian auxiliary police, shot several hundred Jews (according to one source, 680).³ From among the victims, about 80 Jews who were capable of work were selected and sent to the labor camp in Berdichev. According to other sources, in the town of Ianushpol' the German forces shot 520 local Jews⁴ and approximately 400 Jews from other neighboring areas, together with 60 Roma (Gypsies).⁵ Of the few Jews who escaped, some joined the Soviet partisans.

The other Jews of Rayon Januschpol' resided mostly in the villages of Raigorodok, Krasnopol', and Stetkovtsy. In the village of Raigorodok, 157 Jews were killed between 1941 and 1942. Among the victims were Jews from Ianushpol' and other towns.⁶ Two mass killings of Jews took place: one on September 10, 1941, and another in July 1942. During the second Aktion the last so-called specialist workers and their families were killed. In the village of Krasnopol', German security forces shot 35 Jews.⁷ In Stetkovtsy, 12 Jews were killed.⁸ Finally, in the village of Lemesi, 5 Jews who had escaped from the ghetto in Ianushpol' were shot.⁹

SOURCES A brief article on Ianushpol' can be found in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1474. This article specifically mentions the existence of a ghetto but does not reveal its sources.

Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews in Ianushpol' and the surrounding villages can be found in GARF (7021-64-812 and 7021-60-317).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), p. 51; see also Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 160.

2. The Sipo/SD outpost in Berdichev was commanded from June 1942 by Alois Hülsdünker; see Justiz und NS-Verbrechen,

1530 ZHYTOMYR REGION

vol. 16 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 490; LG-Be, 3 PKs 1/57 (Strafsache gegen Knop u.a.), p. 346.

3. GARF, 7021-64-812, pp. 172–173.

4. Ibid., 7021-60-317, pp. 68–75 (list of local Jews who were killed).

5. Ibid., p. 67.

6. Ibid., pp. 33–35 and reverse.

7. Ibid., pp. 8 and reverse.

8. Ibid., pp. 52 and reverse.

9. Ibid., p. 41.

IARUN'

Pre-1941: Iarun', village, Novograd-Volynskii raion, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Jarun, Gebiet Zwiabel (Nowograd-Wolynskij), Generalkommissariat Shtomir; post-1991: Iarun', raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Iarun' is located about 95 kilometers (59 miles) north-northwest of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 census, 386 Jews lived in Iarun' (19.7 percent of the total population). An additional 270 Jews lived in the villages of what was then the Iarun' raion, bringing the total to 656 Jews.

German armed forces occupied the village on July 6, 1941, two weeks after the initial German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. Part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. About 80 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Iarun' at the start of the occupation.

From July until October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the settlement. The German military authorities appointed a village elder and established an auxiliary Ukrainian police squad from among the local residents. The Ukrainian police played an active role in all the Aktions against the Jewish population. According to witness testimony, there were several brutal killings of individual Jews by local policemen, which probably took place during the first months of the occupation.¹

At the end of October 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Iarun' was incorporated into Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij. Regierungsassessor Dr. Schmidt was appointed to the post of Gebietskommissar. Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij was part of Generalkommissariat Shtomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the Ortskommandantur ordered the registration and marking of the Jewish population. They were required to wear armbands bearing the Star of David and also to perform various forms of heavy labor. Jews were forbidden to trade with the local Ukrainian population.

At some time during the summer or fall, and certainly by November 1941, a ghetto was created in the village. Jews were resettled there from the surrounding villages. For example, on November 27, 1941, seven Jews were brought to Iarun' from the village of Zakrinich'e.³ At that same time, able-bodied men were taken to a labor camp in Novograd-Volynskii.

According to the diary of survivor Klara Garmel, "[T]he ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire. We were all driven inside it. We were made to starve and ate only what people would bring and throw through the wire."⁴

Some Jews hid with Ukrainian families outside the ghetto. In the case of those Jews who hid with the family of Maria Svidelya, they were betrayed by other local inhabitants and sent into the ghetto.⁵ Other Jews hid successfully, including some such as Klara Garmel, who escaped at the time of the ghetto's liquidation. Of those in hiding, some subsequently left the village to join the Soviet partisans, while others remained hidden, aided by local inhabitants, until the area was recaptured by the Red Army.

The ghetto was finally liquidated on May 5, 1942. German Gendarmes and local police surrounded the ghetto and began to forcibly remove its inhabitants during the night. On that day, according to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, 580 Jews were shot in a large mass grave, but the actual number was probably somewhat less than this.⁶

SOURCES Documents of the ChGK, and the testimonies of witnesses and survivors regarding the annihilation of the Iarun' Jews, can be found in the following archives: DAZO (R2636-1-19, pp. 134–135); GARF (7021-60-318); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Tatiana Petko, "Forgive Us, Jews," Jewish Ukraine 24/43, December 2002 (5763 Tevet).

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. GARF, 7021-60-318, p. 43.

4. Diary of Klara Garmel, cited by Petko, "Forgive Us, Jews."

5. For further examples of Jews who were saved, see Petko, "Forgive Us Jews."

6. GARF, 7021-60-318, p. 6.

IL'INTSY

Pre-1941: Il'intsy, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Illinzi, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shtomir; post-1991: Illintsi, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Il'intsy is located 53 kilometers (33 miles) east-southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, there were 2,217 Jews living in the town. At the time of the German invasion, some Jews joined the Red Army, evacuated with the Soviet authorities, or managed to flee before the Germans arrived. However, a number of refugees from western Ukraine, who were fleeing before the German advance, became trapped in Il'intsy when the Germans arrived. It is possible that as many as 2,000 Jews were in the town at the start of the German occupation.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the town on July 23, 1941. The initial German military administration appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat) and exacted a tribute in gold and silver from the community. In late August the Jews were concentrated into a ghetto.

In the fall of 1941, at least one Aktion was conducted against local Jews accused of supporting the Communists. More than 40 Jewish men were arrested, beaten, and then shot in the nearby Il'inty Forest by German security forces, assisted by the local Ukrainian police.¹

The Gebietskommissar in Il'inty was Kreisleiter Heinrich Scholdra, who usually wore a monocle. The mayor was a local ethnic German physician, Dr. Heine. The transition from a military to a civil administration in the Vinnitsa region occurred on October 20, 1941. The establishment of Gendarmerie posts, including the post in Il'inty, followed during the winter of 1941–1942. The Gendarmerie, commanded by Meister Andreas Wagner, then took over responsibility for the Ukrainian local police (militia), which was renamed the Schutzmannschaft.

A second Aktion was conducted in late April or mid-May of 1942. The ghetto was surrounded by German and Ukrainian police units, including some brought in from outside. Then, early in the morning, those Jews who were hiding within the ghetto in previously prepared bunkers heard shots in the distance. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, during this Aktion approximately 1,000 Jews were shot into graves some 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town.²

In late May 1942, the Germans and local police herded the survivors into the synagogue and held them there for a few days before shooting most of them. This Aktion was coordinated by officials from the Security Police post in Vinnitsa, assisted by the Gendarmerie and the local police. Estimates of the number of Jews murdered on this occasion vary between 434 and 800. Among those shot in Il'inty at this time were also Jews brought in from the nearby rural ghetto in Zhorishche. According to the report of the Generalkommissar in Shitomir dated June 3, 1942, during the month of May, 434 Jews were “resettled” (murdered) in Gebiet Illinzi.³ In mid-July 1942, the Gebietskommissar in Il'inty requested that former Jewish property be made available for use by the police.⁴

In December 1942, the remaining Jews were forced to clear snow from a main road. Once again the Jews were registered. Some craftsmen were exempted from this task, as they were required to train Ukrainian youths to become their replacements. On December 23, 1942, German police forces and their Ukrainian collaborators again surrounded the ghetto. On this occasion the Germans and the Ukrainian police completely tore down the ghetto, setting fire to a factory building where Jews were hiding and shooting them as they tried to escape. Only 17 specialist craftsmen and a seamstress were temporarily spared from this Aktion.⁵

Among those who survived was Eva Dub, who hid with her mother and sisters during the May 25 Aktion, but then, unfortunately, they returned to the ghetto prematurely, believing the operation was completed. They then made their house appear derelict to deceive the policemen searching the ghetto and subsequently lived there until December. In December Eva escaped and survived with the help of local Ukrainians before fleeing to the forests.⁶ A number of Jews originally from Il'inty formed the nucleus of a Jewish partisan company, the 2nd Stalin Brigade; 39 of its 124 members were Jews from the town.

SOURCES A brief article on the fate of the Jews of Il'inty can be found in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 545.

Information on the murder of the Jews of Il'inty can be found in these archives: BA-L (ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 138/67); DAVINO (R4463-1-15); DAZO; GARF (7021-54-1243); NARA; and USHMM.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, vol. 1, pp. 62–63, statement of Eva Dub on June 26, 1967. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report states that 43 people were killed on November 5, 1941 (GARF, 7021-54-1243).

2. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, vol. 1, pp. 62–63, 313–316.

3. Ibid., appendix to vol. 1, trans. of Soviet material, Bild nos. 294–295, ChGK report for the town of Il'inty, April 15, 1945 (see also GARF, 7021-54-1243); NARA, T-454, reel 22, fr. 432.

4. DAZO, R-1182-1-1, Gebietskommissar Illinzi report, July 16, 1942.

5. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, vol. 1, pp. 62–63, and appendix to vol. 1, Bild nos. 294–295. The ChGK report gives a total of 1,200 victims of this Aktion (see GARF, 7021-54-1243). DAVINO, R4463-1-15, p. 13, however, states that only 100 Jewish craftsmen were killed on December 15, 1942.

6. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, vol. 1, pp. 62–63.

IUROVICH (AKA IUREVICH)

Pre-1941: Iurovichi, village, Kalinkovichi raion, Poles'e oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Jurowitschi, Rayon Kalinkowitschi, Gebiet Mosyr, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Iuravichy, Kalinkavichy raen, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Iurovichi is located 23 kilometers (14 miles) southeast of Mozyr'. By 1926, there were 1,139 Jews residing in Iurovichi, comprising 45.6 percent of the total population.

A week after the start of the war, refugees from the western districts of Belorussia arrived in Iurovichi. They were terribly frightened and spoke of the powerful German forces that were advancing eastward. Local defense units were organized, and men of eligible age joined the Red Army. But many residents of the village, especially the younger ones, could not comprehend what the arrival of the Germans might mean. As the front line approached, only a small number of residents managed to flee from Iurovichi. There were three main means of escape:

by railway from the Kalinkovichi station in the direction of Gomel', on boats and barges on the Pripiat' and Dnieper Rivers through Mozyr', and on horse-drawn carts along the highway.

On August 22, 1941, German forces arrived in Iurovichi. Until October 1941, the Jews remained in their own homes but were subjected to a series of anti-Jewish regulations, including the requirement to perform forced labor. The military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) in Kalinkovichi organized a local police force in Iurovichi, which was responsible for watching over the Jews.

In mid-October 1941, the Germans established a ghetto at the end of Podgornaia Street. The Jews had to wear yellow stars on their clothing. The relations between Jews and Belorussians changed. Vasilii Prishchepa, who was married to a Jewish woman, joined the local police. During the mass shooting of the Jews, he did nothing to save his family. Boris Samuilovich Katsenov was married to a Belorussian woman. At the beginning of the war, he fled to the forests and organized a partisan detachment. His wife and three children remained in Iurovichi, where they hid and somehow managed to survive.¹

The first mass shooting Aktion took place on November 19, 1941. In the early morning, a German punitive detachment of 30 to 40 men arrived in Iurovichi from Kalinkovichi. With the help of the local police, the German forces rounded up about 250 people, including women, children, and the elderly. As they escorted the Jews towards the Pripiat' River, the people screamed and wept. The Germans and local policemen stopped at the riverbank and shot the Jews with machine guns and rifles. The corpses of the dead were left lying next to the river.² Some of the people begged to be spared or jumped into the river, but they were also pursued and shot. About to be shot, Chaim Kofman took off his sheepskin jacket and threw it at a policeman's feet; he also handed over his watch. As the officer was examining the loot, Kofman jumped into the water and swam across the river, successfully avoiding the shots directed at him. He hid for several days but was later captured and killed.³

The second mass shooting took place just over one week later, on November 27, 1941. A punitive unit from Kalinkovichi rounded up the remaining 200 Jews and escorted them to a ravine on the outskirts of Iurovichi. The people were lined up on the edge of a large ditch. When the Germans and policemen began shooting, the women and children let out terrible screams. According to the testimony of Stepan Kos'ian, many of the Belorussians from Iurovichi wept as they observed the shooting. When it was over, the policemen dragged the corpses into the ditch. Over the next few days, the police searched for any Jews still hiding in Iurovichi. Those whom they found were taken to the ditch and shot. Ratner, the teacher of mathematics who had escaped from the Aktion in the village, realized that his entire family had perished. He went to the site of the mass shooting, where the Germans captured and shot him.⁴

After the second mass shooting, Sergei Lutzkevich went to the site of the execution and saw a school classmate who was badly wounded. He fetched his parents, who came and took the classmate home. Two Jewish families, the Kofmans and the Karchevs, took shelter in the village of Kryshichi, even though there was a police garrison just a few kilometers away. Yulia Borisenko, the mother of five children, gave refuge to a young Jewish boy, Boris Kofman.⁵

Although the sources are contradictory, it is estimated that the Germans and their collaborators murdered more than 450 Jews altogether in Iurovichi.⁶ Soviet forces liberated the village on January 16, 1944.

SOURCES Publications containing information on the persecution and annihilation of the Jews of Iurovichi include the following: Pamiat': Istoriko-dokumental'naia khronika gorodov i raionov Belorussii: Kalinkovichskii raion (Minsk, 1999); U.F. Isaenka, Iuravichy nad Prypiatstsiu (Minsk, 2000); Mikhail Nordshtein, "Pravednik iz Kalinkovichei," Sovietskaia Belarussia, October 5, 1995; and Elena Kogalovskaia, "Mestechko Iurovichi," Berega 11 (2000): 4.

Documents on the fate of the Jews of Iurovichi can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBGO; BA-L; GARF (7021-91-15); NARB (861-1-12); and YVA (M-33/1139).

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Kogalovskaia, "Mestechko Iurovichi," p. 4.
2. AUKGBRBGO, case 234, vol. 4, pp. 51–53, witness statement of Grigorii Vladimirovich Panglish, January 19, 1968 (available also in BA-L, ZStL, 204a AR-Z 119/67, Bd. II, p. 390).
3. YVA, M-33/1139.
4. AUKGBRBGO, case 234, vol. 4, pp. 54–56, witness statement of Stepan Grigor'evich Kos'ian, January 19, 1968.
5. Nordshtein, "Pravednik iz Kalinkovichei," p. 4.
6. BA-L, ZStL, 204a AR-Z 119/67, Bd. II, p. 390; see also the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report (GARF, 7021-91-15, p. 136; and NARB, 861-1-12, p. 40), which gives the figure of 540 victims.

KALINOVKA

Pre-1941: Kalinovka, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kalinowka, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir, post-1991: Kalynivka, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Kalinovka is located about 26 kilometers (16 miles) north of Vinnitsa. The census of 1939 reported 979 Jews living in Kalinovka, or one fifth of the total population, and 2,214 Jews residing in what was then the Kalinovka raion. Thanks to the railway line that ran through the area, some Jews successfully evacuated from the town soon after the German invasion of the Soviet Union.

German forces occupied Kalinovka after some skirmishes on July 22, 1941. The German occupying forces ordered Jewish men to perform heavy manual labor. A ghetto was formed on those streets where the Jewish population predominated. Jews from other streets were resettled into this confined area, and non-Jews were resettled into vacated Jewish homes. For example, Lena Konopska recalls that she and her mother had to move into the ghetto once they were recognized as Jews, but her father, who was Polish, was permitted to live outside the ghetto area.¹ The Jews had to wear white armbands bearing yellow six-pointed stars. The authorities appointed Jewish elders to watch over the Jews. Ukrainian police guarded the ghetto. With their means of support exhausted, the prisoners of the ghetto suffered from hunger and disease.

At the end of October 1941, authority passed into the hands of a German civil administration. Kalinovka became both a Rayon center and the center of Gebiet Kalinovka, responsible also for the neighboring Rayons of Ulanov and Komsomol'skoe. Regierungsrat Dr. Seelemeyer was appointed the Gebietskommissar. In turn, Gebiet Kalinovka was part of Generalkommissariat Shitomir.² In November or December 1941, a squad of several Gendarmes arrived in Kalinovka from Germany and established a post initially under the command of Meister der Gendarmerie Max Lohbrunner. The Gendarmerie also assumed control over the local Ukrainian police, now renamed Schutzmannschaft-Einzeldienst, which included about 40 men and was under the command of Zugführer (platoon leader) Roman Holdetzki. The SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer appointed in 1942 in Kalinovka was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Konrad Lange.³

In mid-May 1942, about 100 young men and women were taken from the ghetto and ordered to work on the construction of an airfield on the outskirts of Kalinovka, a project that had been started by the Soviet authorities. Jews from Kalinovka and also from the nearby settlements of Pikov, Ivanov, Ulanov, and Sal'nitsa were sent there to work. Altogether, 400 to 500 people were resettled into sheds and barracks located in the area of the airfield, surrounded by a wire fence. Some of the Jews brought here from outside Kalinovka also refer to this labor camp as the Kalinovka ghetto. However, it appears that only Jews capable of labor were placed in the camp, as those women accompanied by infants or small children were shot either during the march to Kalinovka or on arrival together with other Jews unfit for labor from the Kalinovka ghetto.⁴ The prisoners of the camp were fed pea soup. The Jewish construction laborers had to work until totally exhausted, and occasionally those who lapsed were shot. Cases of suicide by hanging were not unusual. At the aerodrome the Jewish laborers also worked alongside Soviet prisoners of war (POWs), but these prisoners were accommodated in a separate barracks. This forced labor camp for Jews existed until the middle of 1943, when the last of the prisoners were shot. When the airfield was finished, the 100 prisoners who remained were removed to a stable in the village of Kordelevka, 5 kilometers (3 miles) from Kalinovka. The Jews were burned alive there in compliance with higher orders. A few prisoners managed to escape from the aerodrome camp, mostly women who could pass as non-Jews and who received help from other local inhabitants.

At the start of 1942, a small resistance group formed in the Kalinovka ghetto, under the leadership of Efim Kamenetskii. They collected firearms and were even able to make contact with Soviet partisan units. They did not succeed in making any further preparations, however, or manage to establish a stronger resistance organization.

In late spring or summer of 1942, probably on May or June 30, the ghetto was encircled by the German and Ukrainian police forces early in the morning.⁵ The approximately 500 Jews were gathered and led out into a stable located next to a kolkhoz in Kalinovka. An additional 200 Jews from the nearby villages of Novyi and Staryi Pikov were also transported there. Some 33 Jewish craftsmen were selected out by Gebietsführer Lange, but all the others were murdered in a pit not far from the Jewish cemetery. A small number of Jews was able to hide or escape during the roundup. The majority of them found refuge with Ukrainian acquaintances. But the commandant's office offered a reward of 100 rubles for the capture of each Jew, and a number of Jewish families were turned in to the authorities. They were placed along with the craftsmen in a few residences on the outskirts of Kalinovka. The residences were surrounded with barbed wire. A few Jews succeeded in escaping from there, but those remaining were murdered in mid-August 1942.⁶

Kalinovka was liberated by the Red Army in March 1944.

SOURCES In the personal archive of Albert Kaganovich (PAAKag), there are records of interviews conducted with Berta Naidorf on March 31, 2005, and Leonid Langerman on April 4, 2005, as well as a letter received from Alexander Melamud on February 8, 2004, all Jewish survivors of the Holocaust in Kalinovka.

Additional information can be found in the following publications: Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Black Book: The Ruthless Murder of Jews by German-Fascist Invaders Throughout the Temporarily-Occupied Regions of the Soviet Union and in the Death Camps of Poland during the War of 1941–1945 (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981), p. 135; Istoriia mist i sil URSR: Vinnits'ka oblast' (Kiev, 1972), pp. 271, 275; and Samuil Gil', ed., Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit (New York, 1995), p. 28.

Documentation on the fate of the Jews of Kalinovka can be found in the following archives: AHJP (HM2/7771, HM2/8969, HM2/9039); BA-L (B 162/7364); DAVINO (R425-1-261, pp. 13-16); DAZO (e.g., 1151-1-703); GARF (7021-54-1274); NARB (861-1-28); USHMM (e.g., RG-22.002M, reel 4 and RG-53.002M, reel 10); VHF (# 29072 and 29097); and YVA (M-37/1035; M-33/226; O-3/7201).

Albert Kaganovich and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, p. 28, recollections of Lena Konopska, prisoner of the Kalinovka ghetto. Nyunya Doktorovich, a young girl quoted in Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 135, dates the establishment of the ghetto in 1942.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; DAZO, R1151-1-51, Map of the Generalkommissariat Shitomir, 1941–1942.

3. BA-L, B 162/7364 (204a AR-Z 134/67), pp. 135–138, statement of E. Heinisch on July 19, 1977; DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13–14, KdG Schitomir, Vinnitsa Captaincy, Order 18/42, July 25, 1942.

1534 ZHYTOMYR REGION

4. VHF, # 29072, testimony of Aleksandra Shapiro; and # 29097, testimony of Elizaveta Gelfond—both transferred to the Kalinovka aerodrome camp from Ulanov in late May or June 1942, together with 300 others.

5. In Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, p. 28, Lena Konopska notes that the survivors commemorate the first pogrom as having taken place on May 30. BA-L, B 162/7364 (204a AR-Z 134/67), p. 354, dates the Aktion on June 30, 1942. NARB, 861-1-28, gives the date of July 30, 1942.

6. BA-L, B 162/7364 (204a AR-Z 134/67), p. 195.

KAZATIN

Pre-1941: Kazatin, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Kasatin, Gebiet and Rayon center, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Koziatyn, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Kazatin is located 60 kilometers (37 miles) north-northeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, 2,648 Jews were living in Kazatin (15.8 percent of the total population). There were another 1,026 Jews living in the Kazatin raion, mostly in the village of Belopol'e. After the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, some Jews were able to evacuate, while others were called into the Red Army. Around 1,800 Jews remained in Kazatin at the start of the German occupation.

Hungarian armed forces occupied the town on July 14, 1941. From mid-July until October 1941, a military administration ran the town. The German military, which soon took over from the Hungarians, created a local administration and an auxiliary police force from among the local residents. On October 20, 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Kazatin became the administrative center of Gebiet Kasatin. Hundertschaftsführer Stendel was named Gebietskommissar.¹ The Samgorodok and Pogrebischtsche Rayons were also incorporated into the new Gebiet Kasatin, which in turn became part of Generalkommissariat Sbitomir. The Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Kazatin appointed in 1942 was Leutnant Behrens. The head of the Ukrainian police in Kazatin was Zugführer Ivan Yakovenko.²

In the summer and fall of 1941, a number of antisemitic measures were introduced in Kazatin. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created. The Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing markings in the form of the Star of David and later in the shape of a yellow circle. They had to perform forced labor in the service of the German military and occupying forces. Jews were not permitted to leave the limits of the village. They were required to hand over all valuables, and they were not allowed to buy goods at the market. In addition, local Ukrainians were forbidden to have any relations with the Jews.

In September 1941, the first Aktion was carried out against the Jews. A detachment from German Police Regiment "South" apparently directed the operation. Starting on September 5, 1941, the staff and officers of the regiment were stationed in the village of Komsomol'skoe, close to Kazatin.³ The detachment shot 1,255 Jews on September 11, 1941, and the victims were most probably Jews from Kazatin.⁴

Those Jews who remained in Kazatin after the September operation were resettled into a ghetto.⁵ Evidence regarding the work done by Jews in the ghetto comes from the survivor Nina Glozman, who recalls that after the first wave of killings she and her family hid in the village of Belopol'e in Rayon Kasatin until a local policeman recognized them. He took the family to Kazatin, where they were placed in the ghetto, performing work such as chopping wood or cleaning toilets. When the ghetto was liquidated, they were able to escape to Berdichev, where they hid with another Jewish family.⁶

In the village of Belopol'e in Rayon Kasatin about 70 Jews were murdered at the local cemetery in May 1942.⁷ The Kazatin ghetto, or camp where Jewish craftsmen were held, was liquidated on June 3, 1942. More than 300 Jews and 16 Gypsies were shot near the village of Tylimonovka, about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town. The Jews were rounded up and escorted by the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian local police. A detachment of the SD from Berdichev carried out the shooting. About 10 Jewish craftsmen were selected out and kept alive at this time. They were soon joined by a similar number brought from Samgorodok after a selection during the Aktion there on June 4.⁸

In the months after the liquidation of the ghetto, Ukrainian police under the orders of the German Gendarmerie continued to search for Jews in hiding. On July 6, 1942, Behrens wrote to the Gendarmerie posts in the nearby Rayon towns of Pogrebischtsche and Samgorodok that he was aware of Jews hiding in the villages and forests. He ordered that all villages must report the presence of Jews. If German Gendarmes or Ukrainian policemen still found Jews, the entire village would be punished.⁹

As a result of these efforts, a number of Jews who had escaped from the Aktions in Kazatin and the surrounding towns were captured. Most of these Jews were gathered in the Kazatin ghetto or camp, and in August 1942 two SS men flew in to organize the murder of these Jews. About 200 Jews were escorted by the Gendarmerie and local police to another ditch alongside the first one, where the SS men shot them.¹⁰

The remaining 21 Jewish artisans were killed in the fall of 1942 at the same site; on September 28, 1942, according to a report by Leutnant Behrens, the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Kazatin, 18 male and 3 female Jews were shot by an SD detachment.¹¹ Other Jews were shot in the fields when they were encountered by joint patrols of the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.¹² For example, on January 26, 1943, the Gendarmerie post in Kazatin reported that 3 Jewish "partisans" had been "shot while trying to escape" in the village of Sestrenovka, in Rayon Kasatin.¹³

The Germans subsequently utilized the area of the "ghetto" in Kazatin, which had been used to keep Jews separate from the rest of the population, as a so-called workers' education camp (Arbeitserziehungslager).¹⁴ Movable Jewish property, including furniture, was officially confiscated by the civil administration in accordance with an order issued by the Generalkommissar in Zhitomir, Kurt Klemm, on December 12, 1941. Much of the property, however, was taken by members of the Ukrainian police.¹⁵

SOURCES Documentation regarding the destruction of the Jews of Kazatin can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, 204a AR-Z 137/67); DAVINO (R5022-1-176); DAZO (1182-1-6); GARF (7021-54-1247); USHMM (RG-31, 1996.A.0269); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13–14, KdG Shitomir, Hauptmannschaftsbefehl Winniza, Nr. 18/42, July 25, 1942.

3. Telegram No. 305 from the Higher SS and Police Leader Russia South, September 6, 1941, published in A. Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 gg. (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), pp. 252–253.

4. Telegram No. 85, September 12, 1941, published in Kruglov, Sbornik dokumentov, pp. 254–255.

5. DAVINO, R5022-1-176.

6. Interview with Nina Borisovna Glozman, quoted in Wendy Lower, Nazi Empire-Building and the Holocaust in Ukraine (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2005), p. 92.

7. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheski spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 29; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 104.

8. BA-L, ZStL, 204a AR-Z 137/67, vol. 2, pp. 214–250, Abschlussbericht, here p. 226. This report notes that 292 bodies were subsequently counted in the mass grave. GARF, 7021-54-1247, p. 158, gives the figure of 508 Jews killed, but this probably reflects the total for the two Aktionen in June and August 1942.

9. DAZO, 1182-1c-2, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer Behrens, Kasatin, July 6, 1942.

10. BA-L, ZStL, 204a AR-Z 137/67, vol. 2, pp. 214–250, Abschlussbericht, here p. 227. The bodies of 216 persons were found in this grave.

11. Ibid., pp. 229–230; DAZO, 1182-1-6, p. 169, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer Behrens, Kasatin, to Gebietskommissar, September 30, 1942.

12. BA-L, ZStL, 204a AR-Z 137/67, vol. 2, pp. 214–250, Abschlussbericht, here p. 229; for example, a patrol of four Gendarmes and 15 Schutzmänner on their way to Korolevka found eight Jews hiding in a field and shot them on the spot.

13. DAZO, 1182-1-6, p. 158.

14. Ibid., pp. 244–245.

15. Ibid., p. 170, an den Gendarmerie-Posten Kasatin, n.d.

KHMEL'NIK

Pre-1941: Khmel'nik, town and raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Chmelnik, Rayon center, Gebiet Litin, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Khmil'nyk, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Khmel'nik is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) northwest of Vinnytsa. According to the 1939 population census, there were 4,793 Jewish residents in Khmel'nik (63.8 percent of the total population). Another 906 Jews were living in the surrounding villages of the Khmel'nik raion.

After the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, some Jewish men were drafted into or voluntarily joined the Red Army, and several hundred Jews managed to evacuate eastward, but more than 4,000 remained in Khmel'nik at the start of the occupation. According to German statistics, in August 1941, out of 7,000 residents of Khmel'nik, 4,000 were Jews.¹

Following an artillery bombardment in which some Jews were killed, units of the German 17th Army occupied Khmel'nik on July 17, 1941. In July and August 1941, the town was governed by a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), which recruited local residents to serve in the auxiliary police and the local administration. Some Jews recall that their former teachers became ardent Ukrainian nationalists and took an active part in the persecution of the Jews.

The first anti-Jewish Aktion took place on August 12, 1941.² On that day a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5, commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Wadel, shot 229 Jews in Khmel'nik. They were buried outside the town near the road to Ulanov. The German Security Police reported that the Aktion was intended as a reprisal for acts of sabotage along the road (blocking the passage of cars). The detachment also hanged a leading local official.³

In late October 1941, the military authorities were replaced by a German civil administration. Khmel'nik became a Rayon center within Gebiet Litin. The Gebietskommissar in Litin was SA-Standartenführer Traugott Volkhammer.⁴ By August 1941, the local Ukrainian police squad numbered 30 members and was headed by a certain Tarnavsky (his deputy was Shchur).⁵ In the fall of 1941, the Ukrainian police was subordinated to the German Gendarmerie post in Khmel'nik, which was commanded by a man named Jochinke.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities established a Judenrat and introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures, including markings, confiscations, curfews, and forced labor.⁶

On December 25, 1941, the Germans ordered Jews to hand over immediately all their warm clothing, especially furs, for the use of German soldiers at the front. To ensure compliance with the order, 11 Jews were taken hostage. On January 2, 1942, Gebietskommissar Volkhammer demanded a large monetary “contribution” from the Jews and ordered them to resettle into a ghetto in the Old Town, in the area of the old militia building (where the German police was based) on Shevchenko and Sholom-Aleichem Streets. Volkhammer's order also instructed Russians and Ukrainians to mark their houses with a cross and warned that anyone who allowed a Jew into his home would be severely punished.⁷ It is estimated that the total number of Jews who moved into the ghetto was around 4,500.

On January 9 and January 16, 1942, units of Einsatzkommando 5, which had now established an office of the Security Police (KdS Aussendienststelle) in Vinnitsa, the German Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian police raided the ghetto, killing most of the Jews (probably around 3,000). The several hundred Jews who survived these two Aktionen, the so-called specialists—skilled professionals and their families—were then settled into a smaller ghetto together with a number of Jews who had survived in hiding. After the Aktion, the Germans organized the clearing of furniture and any remaining food from the empty houses in the ghetto.⁸

The German terror continued after these two Aktionen. On January 25, 1942, an official of the Gestapo dragged Rabbi Shapiro out into the street and murdered him. His body was left lying there for several days, as the German authorities forbade its removal and burial. A group of women sent for forced labor by the Judenrat were made to dance and then lie in the snow before being brutally kicked and beaten by local policemen.⁹ The Germans registered the surviving Jews and continued to exploit their labor.

Anatoly Shvidkoy, a Jewish survivor, has described the conditions in the Khmel'nik ghetto as hell on earth. . . . We lived with several other families in a small room without heat or light. We were always hungry. We managed to get food from local peasants in exchange for our belongings. We made friends with one peasant woman who frequently came to the ghetto boundary. Our family was caught in a roundup on three occasions, but we were released each time because my father was a craftsman.¹⁰

Several survivors mention the existence of contacts between the surviving remnant of the ghetto and the Soviet partisan forces. According to one account, a group of Jewish youths obtained arms and hid them in the synagogue with the aim of using them during their escape. Unfortunately the cache was uncovered, and the police arrested and shot the youths.¹¹ Other Jews successfully escaped from the ghetto and subsequently joined the Soviet partisans. Among the former residents of Khmel'nik who served in the partisans were a man named Weissman, Izya Reznik, and Leva Kneloiz.

On June 12, 1942, the Germans carried out another Aktion in the ghetto during which the German and Ukrainian policemen, aided by a squad of the Hungarian army, captured and shot 360 children and old people.¹²

The Khmel'nik ghetto was liquidated on March 3, 1943. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, some 1,300 people were shot on that day (but this figure is probably too high).¹³ The 135 artisans who survived the massacre (127 men and 8 women) were put into a school building that was turned into a labor camp. The craftsmen had to train Ukrainians as their replacements. Some 67 people managed to escape from this camp.¹⁴ On June 26, 1943, the remaining Jews were divided into two groups: 14 people were selected to be kept alive, and the German forces took the other 54 Jews to the forest to be shot. After being brought to the killing site, 13 Jews attempted to flee, but only 4 managed to get away; the rest (50) were shot. It is estimated that the Germans and their collaborators murdered more than 5,000 Jews in Khmel'nik between 1941 and 1943.

Several dozen Jews who survived the massacres of 1941–1943 lived to see the liberation of the town by the Red Army in March 1944. A number survived by hiding, most with the help of sympathetic local Ukrainians. Others managed to escape across the border into the Romanian-occupied area (Transnistria), where by late 1942 the chances of survival as a Jew were considerably greater than under German occupation.

SOURCES Information about the Jewish community of Khmel'nik and its destruction can be found in the following publications: “In the Town of Chmelnik (Vinnitsa District),” reported by A.I. Bekker, prepared for publication by R. Kovnator, in Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002), pp. 22–27; there are several personal testimonies by Khmel'nik ghetto survivors in Samuil Gil', ed., Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit (New York, 1995); one further testimony can be found in Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 361–362.

Documents and testimonies regarding the fate of the Jews of Khmel'nik during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L (ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 135/67); DAVINO; GARF (7021-54-1249); RGVA (1275-3-662); USHMM (e.g., RG-50.120*0252; Acc.1995.A.566); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 24, Feldkommandantur 675 (Abt. VII), Winniza, an Sicherungsdivision 444 (Abt. VII), August 25, 1941.

2. GARF, 7021-54-1249, p. 229.

3. See the verdict of LG-Düs, 8 I Ks 1/66, August 5, 1966, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998), Lfd. Nr. 636a, pp. 489–584, here p. 520; BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 60, August 22, 1941; RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 24.

4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

5. RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 24.

6. USHMM, RG-50.120*0252, oral history interview with Israel Guler, February 15, 1995; also Acc.1995.A.566, memoir of Emily Kessler, March 5, 1993.

7. Ehrenburg and Grossman, Complete Black Book, pp. 23–24; Zinoviy Schtivelman, “The Last Pogrom,” in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 361–362.

8. Ehrenburg and Grossman, Complete Black Book, pp. 24–25; GARF, 7021-54-1249, p. 229.

9. Ehrenburg and Grossman, Complete Black Book, p. 25.
10. Testimony of Anatoly Shvidkoy, published in Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, pp. 61–63.
11. Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, pp. 176–181.
12. Ehrenburg and Grossman, Complete Black Book, p. 26; GARF, 7021-54-1249, p. 229.
13. GARF, 7021-54-1249, p. 229; this figure seems similarly inflated. See also BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, p. 571.
14. Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit, pp. 65–66.

KHODORKOV

Pre-1941: Khodorkov, village, Kornin raion, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Chodorkow, Rayon Kornin, Gebiet Korostyschew, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Khodorkiv, Popil'nia raion, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Khodorkov is located 48 kilometers (30 miles) east-southeast of Zhitomir. The population census of 1926 indicated that Khodorkov had a Jewish community of 453. In the 1930s, the size of the village's Jewish population declined by more than half.

German armed forces occupied the town on July 12, three weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During that period, some of the Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for military service in the Red Army, and a small number of Jews managed to evacuate to the eastern regions of the country.

During the months of July through October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the village. In late October 1941, a civil administration replaced the German military administration. Until liberation in November 1943, Khodorkov was part of Gebiet Korostyschew in Generalkommissariat Shitomir.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the same anti-Jewish measures implemented in other German-occupied towns and villages of the Ukraine were introduced in Khodorkov. The Jews were required to wear distinguishing marks in the form of an armband with a Star of David; they were used for various kinds of forced labor; they were forbidden to leave the village; and they were instructed to hand over all their valuables. Jews were forbidden to buy food in the market, and the local residents were forbidden to associate with Jews in any way; those who violated this order were flogged.

The first Aktion in Khodorkov took place on August 10, 1941, when 19 Jewish males were arrested and shot. On September 10, 1941, the women, children, and old people were herded into a ghetto, which was established at the nearby Vozrozhdenie ("Rebirth") kolkhoz. They remained in the ghetto until October 15, 1941, when the ghetto was liquidated, and all 149 Jews were shot.¹

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Khodorkov can be found in "Khodorkov," in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 619.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Khodorkov can be found in the following archives: DAZO; and GARF (7021-60-296).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTE

1. GARF, 7021-60-296, pp. 116–120.

KOROSTEN'

Pre-1941: Korosten', city and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Korosten, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Korosten', raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Korosten' is located 77 kilometers (48 miles) north of Zhitomir, on the Uzh River. According to the 1939 census, there were 10,991 Jews living in Korosten' (35.7 percent of the total population).

German armed forces occupied the city on August 6, 1941. Between the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, and the seizure of Korosten', the majority of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of an eligible age were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Jews from places south of Korosten', including Volodarsk-Volynskii (aka Goroshki), were also evacuated from Korosten' by rail before the arrival of the Germans.¹ Approximately 12 to 13 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Korosten' at the start of the occupation.

From July to August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the city. The German military administration created a city administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from local residents. The Ukrainian policemen played an active part in the anti-Jewish measures.

At the end of October 1941, authority was passed to a German civil administration. Korosten' became the administrative center of Gebiet Korosten, and Regierungsassessor Helsing was appointed Gebietskommissar. In turn, the Gebiet was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Shitomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

Immediately after the occupation of Korosten', the Ortskommandantur introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in the town. The Jews were forbidden to engage in any relations with the Ukrainians, including any commercial transactions. The Jews were also ordered to wear armbands with a yellow Star of David on their left arms. Jewish men were forced into heavy physical labor and were subjected to harassment and beatings by the Ukrainian police. It is possible also that a form of "open ghetto" was established. According to one testimony, all the Jews were brought to Petrovs'ka Street; however, this report remains uncorroborated.³

During the first three weeks after the occupation began, a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a arrived in Korosten' and carried out three mass cleansing Aktions. In the first one, 53 Jews were murdered; in the second, 238 Jews; and in the third, 160 Jews—bringing the total to 451 persons.⁴ In preparation for the last Aktion, the Jews were imprisoned in School No. 5, which may have served briefly as a form of “destruction ghetto.” The Ukrainian police set fire to it, and the Jews were taken out to be shot at a site located 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from the city.⁵

In the first half of September 1941, Sonderkommando 4a liquidated the remaining Jews in the town, around 1,000 people. The shootings were directed by SS-Standartenführer Paul Blobel, who commanded the unit. Also taking part in the executions was the head of Einsatzgruppe C, SS-Brigadeführer Dr. Otto Rasch.⁶ According to a report by Feldkommandantur 197, dated September 20, 1941, by this date there were scarcely any Jews remaining in the area under its control. Apart from 5,000 Jews assembled in a ghetto in Zhitomir, the setting up of other ghettos in the region was no longer considered necessary since most of the Jews in Korosten’ had recently been shot by the SD.⁷

In the Korosten’ area in 1943, a number of Hungarian Jews were also murdered in the vicinity. In 1942, forces of the 2nd Hungarian Army, which used them for labor purposes, had moved the Jews into Ukrainian territory. The Hungarian Jews probably had been in the Zhitomir oblast’ since early 1943, when the rear services of the Hungarian army were deployed here, as well as subunits tasked with fighting against the partisans. Many workers who had already been subjected to horrible working conditions, sparse rations, and other cruel treatment died of exhaustion, starvation, and disease.

A hospital for Jews who had fallen ill was established in the village of Kupishche, 9 kilometers (5.6 miles) from Korosten’. It occupied a few rooms in a brick building. The majority of the sick, however, lay in open barns. The grounds were surrounded by a fence and barbed wire. On a daily basis, many died of typhus. The corpses were stacked like firewood by the wall of a nearby horse stable. On April 29, 1943, the occupying forces decided to take drastic measures to deal with this source of infection. One of the barns, which held 600 persons, was burned to the ground. Those who tried to escape were shot with submachine guns. A small group of Jews did manage to escape and would later recount what happened. When this became known to the minister of defense in Hungary, V. Nagy, he ordered a special commission to investigate the matter and find the perpetrators. But the commission came to the conclusion that “the fire was started accidentally by Jews who were smoking.”⁸

SOURCES The existence of a ghetto in Korosten’ is mentioned in these publications: Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 77; and Jacob G. Frumkin et al., Russian Jewry, 1917–67 (T. Yoseloff, 1966), 2:115. Information on the destruction of the Jewish population in Korosten’ can be found also in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2004), 5:160–161; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 659–660.

Documents about the persecution and elimination of the Jews of Korosten’ can be found in the following archives: DAZO; GARF (7021-60-297); and TsDAVO (8-2-156, p. 28).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Boris Zabarko, ed., “Nur wir haben überlebt”: Holocaust in Ukraine—Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004), p. 159.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. GARF, 7021-60-297, pp. 6, 10, testimony of S.I. Gnedov’skyi on May 26, 1945.

4. BA-BL, R 58/216-17, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 59, August 21, 1941; EM no. 80, September 11, 1941; EM no. 86, September 17, 1941.

5. GARF, 7021-60-297, p. 297.

6. Paul Blobel, affidavit, June 6, 1947 (N-Doc. NO 3842).

7. TsDAVO, 8-2-156, p. 28, report of FK 197, September 20, 1941, as cited in V.M. Nemiatiyi, ed., History Teaches a Lesson: Captured War Documents Expose the Atrocities of the German-Fascist Invaders and Their Henchmen in Ukraine’s Temporarily-Occupied Territory during the Great Patriotic War (1941–1945) (Kiev: Politvidav Ukraini, 1986), p. 38.

8. Randolph L. Braham, The Hungarian Labor Service System 1939–1945 (Boulder, CO: East European Quarterly, 1977), p. 39. See also P. Iskorostenskii, “Tragediia sela Kupishche,” Evreiskie vesti (September 1993), in which he writes that 800 Jews perished in the fire. According to a telegram from the Reichskommissar of Ukraine on April 29, 1943, “a barn burned down on a kolkhoz farm in Kubischche, within Gebiet Korosten, and 300 Hungarian Jews were burned to death.” See NARA, RG-242, microcopy T-454, reel 23, fr. 402.

KOROSTYSHEV

Pre-1941: Korostyshev, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast’, Ukraine; 1941–1943: Korostyschew, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Korostyshev, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast’, Ukraine

Korostyshev is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) east-northeast of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 census, there were 2,170 Jews living in Korostyshev (19.4 percent of the population). Another 83 Jews lived in the villages of the Korostyshev raion.

The town was occupied by German armed forces on July 12, 1941. In the interim between the German invasion on June 22 and the occupation of the town, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men of an eligible age were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. About two thirds of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town. The Ortskommandantur established a town administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police unit recruited from local residents. The Ukrainian police played an active role in the measures taken against the Jewish population.

At the end of October 1941, authority passed to a German civilian administration. Korostyshev became the administrative center of Gebiet Korostyschew, and Gauhauptstellenleiter Dankbar was appointed as Gebietskommissar. In turn, Gebiet Korostyschew became part of Generalkommissariat Shitomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹

Shortly after the occupation of Korostyshev, a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a commanded by Paul Blobel (subordinated to Einsatzgruppe C) arrived in the town and shot 40 Jews "for sabotage, espionage, and larceny."²

After these first shootings, the military commandant ordered one street to be cordoned off and an open ghetto (Jewish residential area) established for the Jews.³ The Jewish population was not allowed to leave the ghetto without permission or to buy goods from local Ukrainians. The Ukrainians, in turn, were prohibited from having any contact with the Jews. The Jews were required to wear an armband bearing the Star of David on their left arms. Jewish men were forced to perform various kinds of heavy labor and were subjected to harsh beatings by the Ukrainian policemen.

It is likely that in August 1941 some of the Jewish men who were performing forced labor were shot. In September 1941, Sonderkommando 4a liquidated the ghetto and shot all the Jews.⁴ The mass shooting was carried out in a meadow to the south of the town (now marked by a monument). Many Jews from outlying villages—for example, 20 people from the village of Studenitsa—were shot along with the Jews from Korostyshev.

Another report, prepared by Feldkommandantur 197, dated September 20, 1941, stated that "it was also discovered that Jews in Korostyshev and Zhitomir maintained relations with the partisans. In retaliation, 60 Jews were shot in Korostyshev."⁵

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), there was another mass shooting in Korostyshev, probably in May 1942, reflecting the attempt to cleanse the Generalkommissariat Shitomir of all remaining Jews at this time. The Security Police from Zhitomir, assisted by the Gendarmerie, shot up to 1,000 Jews, including about 100 children; many of these people were brought to Korostyshev from surrounding locations.⁶

SOURCES A brief article on the Jewish community of Korostyshev can be found in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2007), 6:161–162.

Documents regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews of the town can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL/204a AR-Z 127/67, vol. 2, p. 604); DAZO; and GARF (7021-60-299).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. BA-BL, R 58/215, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 47, August 9, 1941.

3. GARF, 7021-60-299, pp. 13, 15, 25.

4. According to the testimonies of witnesses, around 700 people initially were shot en masse after the liquidation of the ghetto, followed by the mass murder of about 1,000 people; see GARF, 7021-60-299, pp. 25 and reverse side. According to the documents of the ChGK, in Korostyshev in August 1941 around 2,000 people were shot in all, including 198 children. This figure for the number of victims was subsequently increased to 2,486. In May 1942, 1,000 people, including 102 children, were killed, and in May 1943 [sic], 1,200 people, including 126 children, were shot, bringing the total to 4,200 persons. This figure was later adjusted again to read 4,686 victims. The author believes that this total is too high. See GARF, 7021-60-299, pp. 1, 3–4.

5. TsDAVO, 8-2-156, p. 28, report of FK 197, September 20, 1941, as cited in V.M. Nemiatiy, ed., History Teaches a Lesson: Captured War Documents Expose the Atrocities of the German-Fascist Invaders and Their Henchmen in Ukraine's Temporarily-Occupied Territory During the Great Patriotic War (1941–1945) (Kiev: Politvidav Ukraini, 1986), p. 38.

6. GARF, 7021-60-299, p. 110.

LEL'CHITSY

Pre-1941: Lel'chitsy, town and raion center, Poles'e oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Lel'schizy, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-2001: Lel'chitsy, raon center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Lel'chitsy is located 70 kilometers (44 miles) west-southwest of Mozyr'. In 1939, there were 746 Jews in Lel'chitsy (29.2 percent).

Soon after the inception of hostilities on June 22, 1941, large numbers of refugees appeared in Lel'chitsy, primarily from Turov. There was no organized evacuation of the population. Men eligible for the draft were mobilized for military service in the Red Army. The remaining women, old people, and children were unable to leave Lel'chitsy in time. The only way to leave Lel'chitsy was to take the road towards Mozyr' or to get to the railway station in El'sk, but many people had no means of transportation. Older people thought they would not be bothered if they stayed behind to look after their property. The Jews remembered the Germans from 1918 and thought they would leave the civilian population untouched. Less than one third of the Jews of Lel'chitsy managed to evacuate.

Lel'chitsy was occupied by German troops on August 23, 1941. The front line quickly moved eastward. In the town, a mayor was appointed, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was established, and a police force was recruited from among Belorussians and Russians. The police headquarters was located in the raion Communist Party executive committee (raispolkom) offices on Zelenyi Lane. The police helped the Germans to uncover former Soviet activists and party workers and conducted a registration of the Jewish population.¹

In Lel'chitsy, the Jews initially continued to live in their own homes until early September 1941, fearing for their lives. Relations between the Belorussians and the Jews became guarded, and the first instances of rape and theft on the part of the peasants were noted.

The first Aktion was the work of a German punitive detachment that arrived in Lel'chitsy from the direction of Ovruch on September 5 (or September 7), 1941. The soldiers wore helmets and green uniforms. They immediately began to round up the Jews and herd them into the courtyard of the former People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) building in the town center, on the Mozyr' highway. The majority of Lel'chitsy's Jews managed to run away and hide. The Germans caught mainly Jewish refugees from Turov. In the afternoon, the Germans made the Jews line up in a column (about 300 people) and drove them to the northeast, along the Mozyr' highway to the "Zael'e" settlement. There, 500 meters (547 yards) from the last houses of the settlement was a large crater from an aerial bomb. Many men, women, elderly, and children had belongings with them—holdalls on their shoulders or bags in their hands. Mothers carried the smallest children. Armed German escorts urged them forward. Along the way, the Jews sobbed loudly and begged to be let go. The victims were not undressed before they were killed. At the site of the Aktion, there were approximately 20 German soldiers, and more patrolled the perimeter to prevent escapes. People were led to the edge of the pit in groups. Then the perpetrators opened fire, and the dead fell into the pit. The corpses remained unburied for a long time.²

Fedora Lipitskaia recalled that in September 1941 she heard shots and people's cries. From the window she saw a crowd of Jews being escorted by Germans. Lipitskaia recognized Jewish acquaintances with whom she had worked in a sewing artel. Her friend Etkia cried out, "Fedora, farewell!" The column disappeared behind the hill, and soon shots rang out. An elderly Jew ran into her yard, begging her to hide him. He said that "some German superior," before the murder, gave a speech in which he said that the Jews were being shot on Hitler's orders. Three days later, this elderly man left Lipitskaia's house.³

The second Aktion took place in late September 1941 when the punitive detachment returned. The German soldiers, helped by the police, hunted for Jews all day. The 400 Jews they caught, mainly women and children, were herded into several Jewish houses in the center of Lel'chitsy, near the Ortskommandantur. The Nazis selected about 15 skilled workers (tailors and cobblers) with their families (more than 60 people) and let them stay in the houses. The other Jews were herded to the Zagor'e area, and those unable to walk were transported in carts. At Zagor'e, a pit had been prepared. According to Andrei Zhurovich, the pogrom lasted two days; 15 Jews were spared to bury the dead. After the job was done, they were killed.⁴

The third Aktion was carried out in the early spring of 1942. According to Oberwachtmeister der Gendarmerie Max Lessner, on the orders of the head of the Lel'chitsy Gendarmerie, a small detachment of Gendarmes arrived to round up all the Jews. They arrested about 70 Jews and locked them in one of the houses, where they were kept for two weeks.⁵

The Jews under arrest, together with their families, were locked in the Girsh home on the corner of Zelenaiia Street. There were so many people in the house that there was nowhere to lie down. Elizaveta Kolesnik, who lived nearby, was asked by the prisoners to bring swaddling clothes, as a young Jewish woman was giving birth. For four days, no one was given any food. The younger Jews were forced to go to Zagor'e to dig a new pit with little steps cut into it. They complained that the ground was frozen, and it was hard to work.

When the excavations were completed, the police brought four carts, each drawn by two horses. A new selection was undertaken. Out of 70 people, the Germans set aside 12 tailors and cobblers, and the remaining Jews were put in the carts. Four policemen and eight Gendarmes beat and shouted at their victims as they set off. The women and children sobbed and held their heads in their hands, as they all understood where they were being taken. Among the police escorts were two local residents: Efim Dashkevich (shot by the Germans) and Nikolai Kholiava (escaped with the Germans). They shot the victims in the back of the head, using pistols and submachine guns, with single shots. The pit was not filled in until springtime, when the police requisitioned local residents for the task.⁶

The fourth Aktion took place in the summer of 1942. In July, an SD detachment came to Lel'chitsy from Zhitomir and shot more than 40 Soviet citizens, including the last Jews, "for ties with partisans."⁷

The Germans and police searched incessantly for surviving Jews, killing them wherever they found them. In July 1943, in the village of Buinovich, the Nazis found the five children of a man named Finster, who was married to a Belorussian. They shot three of them, and they grabbed the seven-month-old twins Ania and Fedia by their feet and smashed their heads against a tree. The Germans did not allow the children to be buried, and their corpses were pulled apart by dogs.⁸

Some of the residents of Lel'chitsy, despite the threat of death, gave aid to the Jews. Riva Lel'chuk was saved by the Belotskii family: Mariia, her mother Agaf'ia, and her stepfather Ivan. The Belotskiis hid these Jews from the end of 1941 until November 1942, when they left to join the Soviet partisans.⁹

Soviet troops liberated Lel'chitsy on January 21, 1944. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) established that during the occupation in Lel'chitsy and the Lel'chitsy raion, 2,148 people died at the hands of the Nazis, including around 750 Jews, some of whom were refugees from Turov.¹⁰

In September 1970, in connection with an inquiry by the organs of justice of the Polish People's Republic, a commission came to Lel'chitsy on the instructions of the Office of the Public Prosecutor of the USSR. With the participation of witnesses, the commission inspected the site where in 1941–1942 mass shootings of Soviet Jewish citizens had occurred.¹¹

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jews of Lel'chitsy can be found in the following publication: Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 717.

Documentation regarding the murder of the Jews of Lel'chitsy can be found in the following archives: AUKG-BRBGO (file 234: vol. 4, pp. 186–187, 214; vol. 6, pp. 66, 73, 77); GAOOGO (69-1-685); NARB (845-1-8, p. 42); and YVA (M-33/1127).

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. YVA, M-33/1127.
2. AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 6, p. 77, from the transcript of questioning of witness Ivan Vasil'evich Davidiuk, born 1914, on September 16, 1970, Lel'chitsy.
3. Ibid., file 234, vol. 4, pp. 185–187, excerpt from the transcript of questioning of witness Fedora Aleksandrovna Lipitskaia, born 1904, on January 10, 1968, Lel'chitsy.
4. Ibid., file 234, vol. 6, p. 66, from the transcript of questioning of witness Andrei Grigor'evich Zhurovich, born 1908, on January 10, 1968, Lel'chitsy.
5. Ibid., file 234, vol. 4, p. 214, from the transcript of questioning of defendant Max Robert Lessner, born 1897, Oberwachtmeister der Gendarmerie, on March 31, 1947.
6. Of the Gendarmes, Kolesnik remembered one nicknamed "the Cook," another named Max, and a third whose surname was Schwarz. Ibid., file 234, vol. 6, p. 66, from the transcript of the questioning of the witness Elizaveta Vasil'evna Kolesnik, born 1903, on September 15, 1970, Lel'chitsy.
7. Ibid., file 234, vol. 4, p. 216.
8. NARB, 845-1-8, p. 42, from the report of the Poles'e oblast' commission of the ChGK of the USSR on the crimes in Lel'chitsy, December 25, 1944.
9. In 1994, Ivan and Agaf'ia Belotskii and Mariia Zhoglo (Belotskaia) were awarded the title of Righteous Among the Nations; see Pravedniki narodov mira Belarusi (Minsk, 2004), pp. 25–26.
10. AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 6, p. 106, from the report on Nazi war crimes in the Gomel' oblast.
11. Ibid., file 234, vol. 6, pp. 81–82, transcript of the examination of the mass burial at "Gorka" (the Hill) in Lel'chitsy.

LIPOVETS

Pre-1941: Lipovets, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Lipowez, Rayon center, Gebiet Illinzi, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Lypovets', raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Lipovets is located 41 kilometers (25.5 miles) east of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, 1,353 Jews (52.6 percent of the total population) were living in the town. An additional 993 Jews were residing in the villages of the Lipovets raion. Between June 22 and July 23, 1941, on which date German forces occupied the settlement, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Some Jewish men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 1,000 Jews remained in Lipovets at the start of the German occupation.

Initially a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran Lipovets. In October 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Rayon Lipowez was incorporated into Gebiet Illinzi, which, in turn, was part of Generalkommissariat Shitomir. Kreisleiter Heinrich Scholdra was the Gebietskommissar, and Meister Andreas Wagner was the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.¹ In Lipovets itself, a Gendarmerie post was established, commanded (according to Soviet sources) by an officer named Häsl or Heese, assisted by his deputy Otto Koinder.² The Gendarmerie assumed authority over the local Ukrainian police. Both the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police played an active role in the Aktions carried out against the Jewish population in the area.

Shortly after the occupation of the settlement, the Ortskommandantur organized the registration and marking of the Jews. The Jews were ordered to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David and to perform various forms of heavy labor for little or no pay.

In September 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in the town. Some 200 people were rounded up, including 17 Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) accused of being Soviet activists and Communists.³ German forces shot them near the village of Berezovka. Among those executed were a number of Jews.

Sometime in the fall of 1941, the Germans established an "open ghetto" for the Jewish population in the settlement.⁴ According to Leontii Usharenko, a Jewish survivor, the German soldiers and Ukrainian police beat Jews they caught not wearing a Star of David on their chests. The Ukrainian police helped the Germans to identify the Jews and were more stringent than the Germans. At this point no one was allowed to leave the open ghetto, except for work details. However, Jewish girls still went to the market to barter items for bread, as there was not much else to eat. Labor tasks included cleaning toilets for the Germans until late into the night. Usharenko's sister worked in a factory that made vegetable oil.⁵

In late April or early May 1942, the ghetto in Lipovets was liquidated. More than 700 Jews were shot near the village of Vikentievka, to the northeast of Lipovets.⁶ Around 20 local villagers were requisitioned to prepare ditches for the mass shooting and became witnesses to the murder. The Aktion was organized by an SD detachment from Vinnitsa, commanded by SS-Obersturmführer Theodor Salmanzig, assisted by the German Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police. At the site of the mass shooting, a number of Jews were selected out with the aid of a translator as specialist workers (artisans). Only the Jewish artisan workers and their families remained after that, confined to a small remnant ghetto in Lipovets. They were shot on June 3, 1942. There were 167 victims.⁷

On June 3 (or possibly May 3), 1942, the SD detachment from Vinnitsa, with the help of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police, also shot several hundred Jews from the village of Vakhnovka. The Jews were confined first within the church, while the mass grave was being prepared by 20 of the Jews about 2.5 kilometers (1.6 miles) outside the village. The victims included 150 women, 100 children, and more than 20 men. Some of the infants were thrown into the grave and buried alive.⁸ There was also a report of a shooting of Jews in the nearby village of Zozov.

1542 ZHYTOMYR REGION

Leontii Usharenko managed to escape from the remnant ghetto in Lipovets shortly before the final liquidation with the aid of a forged identity document that enabled him to pass as a non-Jew.⁹

SOURCES Documents describing the destruction of the Jews in Lipovets and the surrounding area can be found in the following archives: BA-L (II 204a AR-Z 138/67); DAVINO; GARF (7021-54-1254); VHF (# 29972); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel and Gina Caruso

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. BA-L, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, p. 315.

3. GARF, 7021-54-1254, p. 3.

4. DAVINO, R4422-1-36.

5. VHF, # 29972, testimony of Leontii Usharenko.

6. Ibid., # 29972, dates the Aktion on May 3, 1942—most other sources in April. BA-L, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, Soviet material, Bild 313–316. According to the materials of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 2,000 Jews from Lipovets were killed in April 1942. There were 800 people killed near the village of Berezovka, and 700 people, followed by another incident with 500 people, killed near the village of Vitsentovka; see GARF, 7021-54-1254, pp. 3 and reverse side. The documents list the number of Jews in Lipovets before the war as 1,353, and some of them went into the army and others evacuated the area. Therefore, this figure is probably too high. It is likely that at the end of April 1942 more than 700 Jews from Lipovets were executed near the village of Vikentievka. According to one source (see below), the Jews who were arrested in the villages of Rayon Lipowez were shot near the village of Berezovka. See I.S. Finkel'stein, "Massovoe unichtozhenie evreev Podolii natsistskimi palachami v 1941–1944gg.," in Katastrofa i opor ukrains'koho evreistva (1941–1944): Narysy z istorii Holokostu i Oporu v Ukraini (Kiev, 1999), p. 75.

7. VHF, # 29972; GARF, 7021-54-1254, p. 3. In the report dated January 9, 1944, compiled by the local residents and the local army section, 60 to 70 people (of indeterminate nationality) living in the town were killed in October 1942; in November 1942, 80 persons were killed; and in June 1942, 60 people were killed. See Zverstva nemetskofashistskikh zakhvatnikov: Dokumenty, Vypusk 13 (Voenizdat, 1945), p. 20.

8. GARF, 7021-54-1254, pp. 3 and reverse side. See also BA-L, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, Soviet material, Bild 313–316.

9. VHF, # 29972.

LITIN

Pre-1941: Litin, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommisariat Shtetomir; post-1991: Lityn, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Litin is located 32 kilometers (20 miles) west-northwest of Vinnitsa. In 1939, the Jewish population of Litin was 1,410, comprising 28 percent of the total.

The Germans occupied Litin on July 17, 1941. Only a small number of Jews, perhaps 20 or 30 people, were able to evacuate via the railroad. Around 200 Jews of military age (those born between 1903 and 1924) were conscripted into the Red Army before the Germans arrived.¹

Immediately after the occupation, German and Hungarian troops began to bully the Jewish population. In this region, the Jews suffered in particular at the hands of Ukrainian policemen who raped women and tore the beards from elderly Jewish men. According to German orders, Jews had to wear a Star of David on their outer clothing, front and back, and had to mark their homes as well. Artisans were ordered to work, often without pay. The remaining able-bodied Jews were escorted to a quarry (for stonemasonry), which was located 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) from Litin. They were also ordered to perform agricultural work. By the fall of 1941, many Jewish families were starving. Jews were taxed heavily and forced to pay onerous "contributions" to the occupying forces. The Germans threatened to kill the Jews if payments were not made in exchange for their security.² On August 18, 1941, German Security Police from Einsatzkommando 5 arrested more than 100 Jews over the age of 15, and after selecting some for a specific labor task, they shot the remaining 57 young men, apparently because they did not possess "useful" skills.³

In the fall of 1941, the area around Litin was transferred from the military to a German civil administration. Litin became the center of its own district (Gebiet Litin), consisting of the surrounding Rayons of Litin, Brailow, and Chmelnik. SA-Standartenführer Traugott Volkhammer was appointed as Gebietskommissar in Litin.

In the early morning of December 19, a squad of German Security Police from Vinnitsa arrived in Litin. Reinforced by local Gendarmerie forces and the Ukrainian police, they surrounded the streets where the Jewish population lived. The police drove the Jews out of their homes and onto the streets. A few dozen Jews were murdered during this process. The Jews were then taken to the Red Army base located in the town. Jews from the surrounding area were also brought there, including about 100 Jews from Diakovtsev. Then the German authorities carried out a selection. About 200 specialized craftsmen and their families were removed from the group, and the remaining 2,000 or so people were escorted towards the ditches, prepared 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from the military base. The German punitive detachment and Ukrainian policemen shot the Jews into the ditches. Gebietskommissar Volkhammer directly supervised the mass shooting.⁴

The remaining Jews were transferred into the ghetto over the next two hours. The ghetto consisted of a few houses on two narrow streets. The Germans also resettled into the ghetto those Jews who had hidden during the mass shooting and emerged thereafter. Around 300 Jews were concentrated inside the ghetto, which was surrounded by a fence. The prisoners were prohibited from leaving and threatened with shooting if they tried. Although food was scarce and hunger severe, nobody was allowed to go to the peasant market to obtain food. Among many humiliating restrictions, the Jews of the ghetto were not allowed to walk on the sidewalk.⁵

After several subsequent Aktions, the ghetto was reduced in size until it consisted only of one side of a single street. A Polish Jew, Nuta Gekht, who knew German well, was appointed as the elder (starosta) of the ghetto. The German commandant demanded that Gekht compile lists of those able to perform forced labor. A witness, Maria Zavodiuk-Fainshtein, was among the girls assigned to work at the German military garrison, where she had to clean the rooms, bring water from the well, chop wood, and perform other tasks. Later on, the girls were sent to the stone quarries, where they had to shovel stones into a special grinding machine: backbreaking work that left them exhausted at the end of every day.⁶

Refugees arrived in Litin from many places, as they were trying to get to Transnistria (the Romanian zone of occupation), where by 1942 conditions were somewhat better for Jews. Some of the fugitives were allowed into the ghetto and given work permits; others hid illegally within the ghetto.⁷ Insofar as it was possible, the Jews of Litin directed the refugees towards the Bug River, supplying them with food, clothing, and sometimes money to assist their escape. A few hundred of these runaways were nevertheless captured and shot by local policemen. The Jews of Litin secretly gathered the clothing and other possessions, which they had retained when they were resettled into the ghetto, and collected them in their old homes and the homes of Jews who had already been shot. Often the Jews of Litin went into neighboring villages, where they exchanged the clothing and other items for food. As far as possible, the prisoners of the ghetto continued to observe Jewish traditions and holidays. They celebrated Passover (eating matzot) and Purim and fasted on Yom Kippur.⁸

Mass shootings continued on a regular basis. On December 29, 1941, about one week after the establishment of the ghetto, the Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police shot approximately 100 more Jews in the ditches, mainly elderly people, women, and children: probably Jews who were found in hiding after the recent Aktion.⁹

On June 11, 1942, the next Aktion was carried out. Hungarian soldiers and Ukrainian policemen shot 167 people on the grounds of the military base. Among these victims were women, children, and the elderly, who had been seized because they were unable to work. The survivors and prisoners who remained alive in the ghetto called this the “children’s pogrom.” The German punitive forces used dogs to catch children who were in hiding. The authorities shot 150 Roma (Gypsies) along with the Jews. This Aktion was organized by the new Gebiets-kommissar named Nikesch.¹⁰ In September and October 1942, there was another series of Aktions: on September 18, 1942, 86 prisoners from the ghetto were shot. On October 10, 1942, 260 people were shot. In the course of this Aktion, about 10 prisoners escaped to the Romanian zone of occupation. On October 25, 1942, 96 people were shot. Some of these victims were Jews found hiding in and around Litin who were brought to the ghetto to be murdered in groups.¹¹

A labor prison camp was organized on the grounds of the military base in Litin, into which the Nazis resettled Romanian Jews, mostly from Bukovina. The purpose of the camp was to provide labor for the construction in 1942 of Transit Highway (Durchgangsstrasse) IV from Poland to the North Caucasus. Able-bodied men and women, including young people, were moved into the prison labor camp. The majority of the prisoners, around 1,000 men, worked on building the road. The remaining 250 women prisoners worked in the quarry, where they cut stone needed for the road-building efforts. The German state-run Organisation Todt (OT) was responsible for the project. In September 1942, the Germans liquidated the labor prison camp. On September 12, 580 people were shot, and on September 20 and 26 (by varying accounts), the remaining 520 people were killed.

Litin was liberated on March 20, 1944. Only a few dozen Jews from Litin who had escaped to various places during the occupation (some of them joining the partisans) were able to return to their homes. A number of Jews returned to Litin after having been evacuated to the east and also from the Red Army. Some of them then left permanently for other places, including Vinnitsa.¹²

SOURCES A personal testimony regarding the ghetto in Litin can be found in the following publication: Semen Zolotarev, Liudi i sud’by: Veteranam Vtoroi mirovoi voyny, truzhenikam tyla, uznikam fashistskikh kontslagerei i getto, zhyvym i pavshim posviaschaetsia (Baltimore, MD: Vestnik Information Agency, 1997), pp. 309–310.

Documentation on the Litin ghetto can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 135/67); BLH (687, Solomon Boim; 686, Fira Eklis; 695, Haia Litinski; and 862, Alexander Vaiman); DAVINO (R1683-1-13); GARF; USHMM (e.g., RG-50.226*0017); YVA (M-33/196, pp. 6–16; O-3/7372; O-3/6401). There is also the record of an interview with David Irilevich in the personal archive of the author (PAAKag).

Albert Kaganovich
trans. Steven Seegel and Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. PAAKag, interview with David Irilevich, April 5, 2005.
2. Ibid.; YVA, O-3/7372; O-3/6401.
3. YVA, M-33/196, pp. 6–16; DAVINO, R1683-1-13, p. 86.
4. YVA, M-33/196, pp. 6–16; BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, pp. 556–557 (Abschlussbericht). This report indicates that 300 men, 500 women, and 1,186 children were murdered.
5. YVA, O-3/7372; O-3/6401; PAAKag, interview with David Irilevich, April 5, 2005.
6. Zolotarev, Liudi i sud’by, pp. 309–310.

7. USHMM, RG-50.226*0017, interview with Yevgenia Lerner.

8. YVA, O-3/7372; O-3/6401; PAAKag, interview with David Irilevich, April 5, 2005.

9. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 135/67, pp. 557–558 (Abschlussbericht).

10. After the war, he was tried in the Soviet Union.

11. YVA, M-33/196, pp. 6–16; A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravoch-nik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 187.

12. YVA, O-3/6401; PAAKag, interview with David Irilevich, April 5, 2005.

LIUBAR

Pre-1941: Liubar, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ljubar, Rayon center, Gebiet Tschudnow, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Liubar, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Liubar is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) southwest of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 population census, there were 1,857 Jews residing in the town of Liubar (70.26 percent of the population) and 542 additional Jews living in the outlying settlements of the Liubar raion.

On July 7, 1941, German parachute brigades landed in Liubar, where they faced Soviet infantrymen, but with the aid of supporting land forces of the German XLVIII Corps they soon secured the town.¹ In the two weeks prior to the occupation, a few hundred Jews were able to evacuate to the east, but most were unable to get access to the transportation, money, and official permission from their place of work that were necessary. Approximately 75 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed Liubar. The temporary German military authorities established a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from local residents. The local mayor was the former teacher Kudimov, and the police was headed by F.U. Kiian.²

At the end of October 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. The occupying forces incorporated Liubar into Gebiet Tschudnow, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. Dr. Blümel was appointed as the Gebietskommissar.³

Just after the occupation of the town, the Jewish family of Hirsh Halperine, consisting of four individuals, was accused of sabotage and shot. Shortly afterwards, the Germans shot four more Jews, whom they accused of being Soviet activists.⁴

On the orders of the Ortskommandantur, the Rayon authority organized the registration of the Jews. Jews were also required to wear a distinguishing armband on their sleeves and were forced to perform heavy labor, in groups divided according to sex.

In July 1941, the German military commandant established an open ghetto (Jewish residential district) in Liubar, designating several streets in the center of the town where the Jews had to live. Jews were prohibited from going outside the borders of the ghetto to buy products from Ukrainians. As a result, famine developed inside the ghetto.⁵

On August 9, 1941, German security forces conducted the first Aktion in the town. They arrested 300 Jewish men on the pretext of forced labor and then shot them to the northeast of Liubar, near the village of Iurovka.⁶ In all likelihood, the shooting was carried out by members of Police Regiment “South,” part of which was stationed in Liubar at that time. This Aktion was accompanied by looting and beatings carried out by the Ukrainian police, which lasted for several days.⁷

On September 13, 1941, men of the 45th Reserve Police Battalion conducted a second Aktion in Liubar.⁸ The aim of this Aktion was to liquidate the ghetto and annihilate the entire Jewish population of the town. More than 1,000 Jews were shot in a sand quarry, about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) northwest of Liubar.⁹

Ukrainian policemen subsequently hunted down inside the ghetto those Jews who had managed to hide during these Aktions. The remaining Jewish craftsmen (including tailors, shoemakers, and cap makers) were at first moved into the school building, then relocated into the building of the former children's home, which was guarded by members of the Ukrainian police. They went to work in the building of the former military commissariat, where they made clothing and boots for the police. At the end of October 1941, all of these Jews (about 250) were also shot in the sand quarry.¹⁰

In the fall of 1941, a total of 1,536 people were murdered in the sand quarry near the town: 1,199 Jewish residents of Liubar, 190 Jewish refugees (60 from Polonnoe, 30 from Gritsev, 27 from Slavuta, and 73 from Ostropol'), and 147 Soviet prisoners of war (POWs).¹¹

In the fall of 1941, the Ukrainian police also killed the Jews who were living in the villages of the Liubar raion. In the village of Malenkaia Derevichka, 4 Jews were killed; in Novyi Liubar, 46 Jews (including 34 in September 1941); in Staryi Liubar, 19 Jews; from Velikaia Volitsa, 12 Jews (killed in Liubar); from Strizhevka, 24 Jews (killed in Liubar); in Staraia Chertoriia, 12 Jews; in Novaia Chertoriia, 207 Jews (on November 27, 1941); and in Pedyinka, 4 Jews.¹²

SOURCES There is a survivor account in the volume of survivor testimonies edited by Boris Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev: Zadruga, 1999), pp. 160–164.

Documentation concerning the persecution and extermination of the Jews in the town of Liubar and the surrounding raion can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L (ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 131/67); DAZO (1151-1-703); GARF (7021-60-302); NARA; USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. See intelligence report of the 60th Inf. Div. (Mot.) to the headquarters of XLVIIIth A.K., July 13, 1941; NARA, RG-242, T-314, reel 1146, fr. 425.
2. E. Zakharov-Zaidenberg, "Tak bylo unichtozheno vse evreiskoe naselenie Liubara," in Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, p. 160. Among the Ukrainian police serving in Liubar in 1942 was Stanislaus Kulschitzki; see DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13–14.
3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
4. Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, p. 160.
5. Ibid., pp. 160–61. On the ghetto, Perl Kantor commented: "There was no real ghetto in Liubar. So why was one created in a matter of days? And who gave the order to shut in the Jews if even the Russians in Liubar had forgotten they were Russians?" See Perl Kantor, "After All," published in the newspaper Vesty, April 27, 1995.
6. Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, p. 161. In the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), this Aktion is not mentioned; see GARF, 7021-60-302.
7. Summary of German Police Decodes 275–323, August 21, 1941, p. 5, in NA, HW 16/6, pt. 1.
8. Telegram no. 444, from HSSPF Russland-Süd, September 15 and 17, 1941, VHAP, KdO Stab RFSS. The telegram states that "the 45th Reserve Police Battalion completed the 'cleansing Aktion' in Liubar."
9. GARF, 7021-60-302, pp. 4, 7.
10. Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, pp. 162–164. In the documents of the ChGK, this Aktion is not mentioned; see GARF, 7021-60-302.
11. GARF, 7021-60-302, pp. 4, 7.
12. Ibid., 7021-60-302, pp. 27, 62, 140–141, 171, 199, 201, 268, 391, 363, 405.

MIROPOL'

Pre-1941: Miropol', town, Dzerzhinsk raion, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Miropol, Rayon Romanow (Dzherzhinsk), Gebiet Tschudnow, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Myropil', Romaniv raion, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Miropol' is located 71 kilometers (44 miles) west-southwest of Zhitomir. According to the census of December 16, 1926, there were 1,143 Jews living in Miropol'. In mid-1941, approximately 600 Jews lived in the town.

German forces occupied Miropol' on July 6, 1941 two weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. A number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east during this intervening period. Men of eligible age were called up or enlisted voluntarily in the Red Army. It is estimated that roughly 70 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the settlement at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered Miropol'. The German military administration created a local authority and recruited an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from among local residents. The local police played an active part in the repressive measures taken against the Jews.

At the end of October 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Miropol' became a Rayon center in Gebiet Tschudnow, and Oberstammführer Dr. Blümel became the Gebietskommissar.¹

Shortly after the occupation of the settlement, by order of the Ortskommandantur, the local authority organized the registration and marking of the Jews, who were required to wear distinguishing armbands. Jews were also forced to perform heavy labor tasks (such as repairing roads) under the guard of the Ukrainian police, solely because of their ethnicity.

At the end of July 1941, the Ortskommandantur announced the establishment of a ghetto (Jewish residential district) in the center of the settlement.² Jews were prohibited from going beyond the limits of the ghetto and from buying products or even conversing with Ukrainians. As a result, famine quickly ensued.

At the end of July 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in Miropol'. Einsatzkommando 5 of Einsatzgruppe C shot 24 Jews for refusing to work.³ At the end of September or the beginning of October 1941, a further Aktion took place in the settlement. The Ukrainian police shot 157 Jews in the park: 29 men, 66 women, and 62 children. Two days later, the Ukrainian police arrested and shot a Jewish family of four.⁴

During the first half of October 1941, another Aktion was carried out in Miropol': 94 people—14 men, 31 women, and 49 children—were shot in the park.⁵ After this Aktion, only the Jewish craftsmen and their families remained in the settlement. These 100 people were shot by the Ukrainian police on February 16, 1942.⁶

Also in December 1941, the Ukrainian police brought into Miropol' nine Jews (eight women and one child) who had been hiding in the village of Kolodiazhoe. They were then shot in the public park.⁷ In 1941 and 1942, the Germans and their collaborators murdered some 400 Jews in Miropol' in total.⁸

On January 5, 1987, a criminal court in the Zhitomir oblast' sentenced to death two of the former Miropol' policemen, Les'ko and Gnatiuk. In addition, one other policeman was sentenced to 15 years in prison.

SOURCES Some information regarding the Miropol' ghetto has been published in Garri Fel'dman, ed., Zabveniu ne podlezhit: Sbornik materialov o Kholokoste, perezhitom moimi zemliakami (Shitomir, 2000).

Documents dealing with the persecution and elimination of the Jews in Miropol' can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; DAZO; GARF (7021-60-291); PAAKru.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Testimony of Liudmila Blekhman, in Fel'dman, Zabve-niiu ne podlezbii, p. 39.

3. BA-BL, R 58/215, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 47, August 9, 1941; see also Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 139.

4. Information obtained by the author from the State Security Service of Ukraine (SBU) in the Zhitomir oblast', December 4, 1991, and February 4, 1992 (PAAKru).

5. Ibid. The executions probably took place on October 13, 1941; see GARF, 7021-60-291, p. 5.

6. PAAKru, letter from the SBU in Zhitomir oblast', February 4, 1992. See also GARF, 7021-60-291, p. 5.

7. PAAKru, letter from the SBU in Zhitomir oblast', February 4, 1992.

8. According to the materials of the Dzerzhinsk raion commission for the investigation of crimes committed by the occupants and their collaborators in the Dzerzhinsk raion, 960 Jews were killed in Miropol'. GARF, 7021-60-291, p. 5. As this figure is not supported by the materials in the files, it is probably too high.

MONASTYRISHCHE

Pre-1941: Monastyrishche, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Monastyrishchtsche, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Monastyrishche, raion center, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Monastyrishche is located 101 kilometers (63 miles) east-southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 population census, 1,398 Jews (74.4 percent of the total population) were living in Monastyrishche. In the villages of the Monastyrishche raion, including the former Tsibulev raion, there were an additional 1,449, bringing the total to 2,847 Jews. Besides the town of Monastyrishche, there were four other small Jewish communities in the Monastyrishche raion: Sarny, Tsibulev, Terlitsa, and Lukashovka.

German armed forces occupied Monastyrishche on July 22, 1941, one month after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. The Luftwaffe bombarded Monastyrishche from the air, and due to the rapid German advance, only a minority of the Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Jewish men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. About 70 percent of the pre-war Jewish population, or around 1,000 people, remained in Monastyrishche at the start of the occupation.

In July through October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled Monastyrishche. The German military set up a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. The Ukrainian police played an active part in implementing the anti-Jewish measures and robbing the Jews. The head of the Ukrainian police was a man named Ivan Mel'nikov (or Melnik).¹ Other policemen known for their exceptional cruelty were Chichikoza, Koretskii, Koval', Tabik, Shchipets, Khmelevskii, Mel'nik, and Liuliava. After the war, some of these men escaped to Canada.

At the end of October 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Monastyrishche became the administrative center of Gebiet Monastyrishsche. The Gebietskommissar was SA-Oberführer Werder. The Gebiet, in turn, was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Shitomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

Soon after the occupation of the town, the Ortskommandantur ordered the local administration to organize the registration and marking of the Jews. The Jews were required to wear armbands with the Star of David and to perform heavy physical labor of various kinds, usually for little or no pay. A Jewish Council, or Judenrat, was also established, headed by a man named Khaskel'. It served as an intermediary body between the occupation authorities and the Jewish population, issuing work assignments to the Jews. Among the work tasks was the cleaning of latrines that were reserved only for the Germans.

In August 1941, the Germans organized a first Aktion in the course of which at least 10 members of the Jewish intelligentsia were arrested and shot.³ Probably within about one month of the occupation, the remaining Jews were moved into an open ghetto, located on a few streets designated for this purpose. There was considerable overcrowding, with about 10 people sharing each small room. The houses were not fenced off and guarded, but the Ukrainian police harassed the inmates and made it very hard for anyone to escape from the ghetto. No rations were issued, and there was severe hunger in the ghetto, leading to a number of deaths. The Jews exchanged anything they could with local Ukrainians for some food, such as potatoes and beets. However, they were beaten and could be shot if caught outside the ghetto illegally. Those who worked outside the ghetto also received some bread from the Ukrainians.⁴

Despite the difficult conditions, the Jews still made considerable efforts to observe Jewish holidays. Aware of the massacres that had taken place in other towns, many families prepared hiding places behind false walls inside the ghetto, which might provide at least a temporary refuge when the Germans conducted another Aktion. According to the account of Natalia Ulitskaia, both the Ukrainian police and the Germans forced Jewish girls to go with them at which time they raped them.⁵

The Germans organized the liquidation of the ghetto on May 29, 1942, when all the Jews were rounded up by the Ukrainian police and brought to the market square on the pretext of a work assignment. After a few dozen skilled workers were selected from the group, the rest were taken out and shot in a ditch about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside the town. On that day, Jews from Sarny, Tsibulev, Terlitsa, and Lukashovka were also shot.⁶ A total of 1,600 Jews were killed, including around 1,000 from Monastyrishche. A number of Jews evaded the roundup in their hiding places; some of these people then fled the ghetto into the countryside, while others emerged subsequently and joined the remaining Jews.

Around 120 to 140 craftsmen from Monastyrishche and other neighboring Jewish communities were then resettled into a special remnant ghetto for skilled laborers together with their families (about 400 people altogether). Five houses on one street were designated as a ghetto space, now closely guarded by the Ukrainian police. However, children would still sneak out of the ghetto to try to barter items for food at the market.⁷ In August or September 1942, Jews declared unfit for labor were taken behind the mill and shot. In November 1942, another group of Jews was shot in retribution for the escape of several Jews from the ghetto. The remaining 70 Jews were shot directly in one of the houses on the eve of the Germans' retreat from Monastyrishche (March 10, 1944). Their corpses were burned together with the house.

The few surviving Jews mention the existence of some antisemitism in Monastyrishche, even before the war, and especially the brutality of the Ukrainian police. However, most of those who survived were helped by Ukrainian acquaintances. Sofia Zaitseva stressed that her father was popular with many Ukrainians, who were willing to hide her and her brother despite the risks involved, after their father had been killed.⁸

SOURCES Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Monastyrishche can be found in the following archives: DAZO; and VHF (# 5095, 15564, 29577, 36257, 39908).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel and Gina Caruso

NOTES

1. DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13-14, KdG Schitomir, Vinnitsa Captaincy, Order 18/42, July 25, 1942.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. Zoria: Hromad'sko-politychne vydannia Monastyrishchens'koho raionu, no. 42 (May 29, 1999); testimony of Nikolai Zadernovskii, www.iremember.ru/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=563&Itemid=24; and Report of the Monastyrishche Settlement Council of People's Deputies, no. 77, April 29, 1999. VHF, # 29577, testimony of Fania Kogan, however, gives the figure of 30 members of the intelligentsia being arrested.

4. VHF, # 29577; # 36257, testimony of Natalia Ulitskaia; # 39908, testimony of Aron Spektor; # 5095, testimony of Eda Zadernovskaia; # 15564, testimony of Sofia Zaitseva.

5. Ibid., # 29577, # 36257, # 39908.

6. Ibid., # 29577, # 36257, # 5095.

7. Ibid., # 29577.

8. Ibid., # 39908, # 36257, # 15564.

MOZYR'

Pre-1941: Mozyr', city and raion center, Poles'e oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Mosyr, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Mazyr, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Mozyr' is located 133 kilometers (82.6 miles) southwest of Gomel'. In 1939, 6,307 (36 percent) of the city's 17,477 inhabitants were Jewish.

German armed forces first entered Mozyr' on August 22, 1941. A wave of killings and abuse began immediately. In early September 1941, forces of the 2nd SS-Cavalry Regiment shot more than 150 people as "looters." Most of the victims were Jews.

The city administration established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) of 12 members under Eisha Izrailevich Koifman and his deputy Iosif Iankelevich Berdichevskii. On October 20, 1941, Mozyr' became the seat of Gebiet Mosyr, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir, with Wolfgang Przyrembel as Gebietskommissar. In January 1942, Leutnant der Gendarmerie Wilhelm Kellermann became Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Mozyr'.¹ Ivan Podbereznii was the chief of the local police, assisted by Titov, Kholodnyi, Tokarskii, Suprun, Telepun, Krupskii, and others, in all about 35 men. Podbereznii had previously been a Communist Party member and chief of the Soviet secret police (NKVD) in the El'sk raion.²

At some time in the fall of 1941, the German authorities established a ghetto in Mozyr' on Romashov Rov Street, where there were primarily one-story wooden buildings.³ The Germans placed 15 to 20 Jews in each of the run-down houses, without sufficient food or medicine. A number of Jews died from disease or malnutrition during the ghetto's short existence.

The Jewish Council was assigned the tasks of accommodating the ghetto inmates, maintaining internal order, and interacting with the German authorities. The council members were in fact hostages of the Nazis, however, because the majority of the ghetto inmates were not fit for work, and the ghetto in Mozyr' had very little economic significance.

By decree of the town authority, Berdichevskii drew up a list of ghetto inhabitants, which included 273 names. The majority of them were women, elderly people, and children, ranging in age from a few months to 90 years old.⁴

Jews from Skrigalov, Kopatkevichi, Prudok, and Glinishche were resettled into the Mozyr' ghetto. A little later, 38 more Jews arrived from the Kamen' sel'sovet. Another 111 Jews came from El'sk, Petrikov, Narovlia, Sloboda, Meleshkovichi, Mikhalok, Iur'evichi, Ogorodniki, Zapol'e, Prudok, and Red'ki. With all the new arrivals, there were 433 Jews living in the Mozyr' ghetto as of January 1, 1942, according to Berdichevskii's list.⁵

At the end of 1941, a group of Jewish carpenters and their families decided to take their own lives. According to R.A. Sherman, they gathered at 19 Pushkin Street, next to where they had lived before the war. They cast lots, and it fell to Khaia Gofshtein to set the fire. Around 40 people perished in the blaze.⁶

The Germans liquidated the ghetto in January 1942. On January 6, the ghetto inhabitants were transferred to the Mozyr' prison. They were allowed to take only a small supply of food and personal items. Their remaining property was to be left at home, and the doors were to be left unlocked. On the morning of January 7, the women, old people, and children were separated from the men and taken about 1 kilometer

(0.6 mile) from Mozyr' towards the village of Bobr, to a hill beneath which lay a large gully. They were escorted by German Gendarmes, soldiers of a Czechoslovak battalion, and Belorussian policemen. The infirm, sick, and exhausted were carried on four carts. In the meantime, about 200 men were shot in the prison yard. They were led out in groups, placed against the wall, and shot by policemen under the command of the Germans. Then the Jewish cobblers from the prison workshop were ordered to transport the men's corpses on sleds to a ditch on the edge of town.

The women, children, and elderly taken to the hill were ordered to undress, lay their clothes and things in piles, and then climb to the top in groups of three or four. Those who were too weak to climb on their own were dragged by the arm or prodded with bayonets. The people guessed that their execution was imminent; a horrible cry arose; and the women cried and begged for mercy. At the top of the hill, the victims were lined up in a row and shot. The bodies rolled down into the gully. The Aktion lasted two hours. Then the Germans and the local police went down and finished off the wounded. The bodies were piled in a stack, and the side of the hill facing the gully was blown up so that the earth rolled down to cover the mass grave. The layer of soil turned out not to be very thick, however, and dogs were able to dig up and carry off human remains. The indigenous police collected the Jews' belongings. Two or three days later, the police once again sent the shoemakers from the prison to the ditch and made them take all the bodies (about 300 corpses in total) to a single site and bury them.⁷

A second group of Jews was taken to the Pripiat' River, where, according to the witness testimony of Aleksandra Kozlovskaiia, they made holes in the ice. The Germans then drove the doomed Jews towards the holes and forced them to jump beneath the ice. Those who resisted were shoved into the holes with rifle butts.⁸ In total, around 700 Jews were drowned in Mozyr' during the occupation.

During the Aktion of January 9–10, 1942, the teacher Liza Lozinskaia succeeded in hiding. The next day she was discovered, brought to the market square, and tied to a telegraph pole. The Nazis hung a sign around her neck that read: "I sabotaged the implementation of German laws and orders." Then the Germans proceeded to practice throwing knives and daggers at her.⁹

After the liquidation of the ghetto, a small group of craftsmen remained in the prison; they were shot by the German Gendarmerie in May or June 1942.¹⁰ The shooting was supervised by Rosenberg, the head of the town's SD section; Oberleutnant Tizze and Oberwachtmeister Ulrich, both of the Order Police; and the chief of the indigenous police, Podbeznyi, who assigned 10 local policemen to assist the German Gendarmerie.

In the winter of 1943, the newspaper Mozyrskie novosti, which was published with the Nazis' permission, wrote that the town had been living without Jews for two years and could rightfully consider itself an example for the solving of the Jewish question in Belorussia.¹¹

Following the liberation of the city in January 1944, the Soviet authorities uncovered at least five mass grave sites in and around Mozyr':

1. The Jewish cemetery in the Mozyr' city limits has 18 graves of equal size lacking mounds, tablets, or any other markings indicating a burial site. There are 50 to 55 bodies of elderly people, women, and children in each grave, a total of 960 to 1,000 people.
2. The territory of the former Sipo-SD prison on Pushkin Street has five graves with 55 bodies in each, altogether 275 people.
3. The gully at the end of Romashov Rov Street contains four graves, three of which were approximately of similar size, with 95 to 100 bodies in each. The fourth grave, 400 square meters [478 square yards] in size, held 850 bodies. The total body count was 1,230 to 1,250.
4. The gully on the Mozyr'-Bobr road is the site of two graves containing the remains of more than 1,000 people.
5. At the end of Svidovka Street are two graves. More than 600 people were buried in the first; in the second, a grave of smaller dimensions, are seven bodies: an elderly man, four women, and two children.

In the course of the exhumations, it was ascertained that some of the people were buried alive, while others had their hands tied behind their backs with barbed wire. Several bodies bore marks of violence and torture.¹²

Mozyr' was liberated on January 14, 1944. During the occupation, 4,700 of the city's inhabitants perished, including more than 1,500 Jews.¹³ Kondrat Bogdanik turned over to the Soviet 61st Army's counterintelligence section, SMERSH, partial lists of ghetto inhabitants (237 names) stolen by him in March 1942 from the Mozyr' town authority. These documents provided the basis for investigation of Nazi crimes in Mozyr'. They were then given to the archive of the KGB in the Republic of Belorussia, where they were kept until after 2000.

SOURCES Information concerning the fate of the Jews of Mozyr' can be found in the following publications: Pamiat': Istoriko-dokumental'naia khronika mozyrskogo raiona (Minsk, 1997); Leonid Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii (Tel Aviv, 2000), pp. 213–214; Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007); Prestupleniia nemetsko-fashistskikh okkupantov v Belorussii, 1941–44 (Minsk, 1963); "Mozyrskie strannitsy Kholokosta," Berega (March–April 2002); "Mosada na belorusskoi zemle," Berega (September 2000); Iakov Gutman, "Pliaski i pamiat': Mozyr'," Den', September 29, 2001; Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaia Navuka, 2000); and Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Black Book: The Ruthless Murder of Jews by German-Fascist Invaders Throughout the Temporarily-Occupied Regions of the Soviet Union and in the Death Camps of Poland during the War of 1941–1945 (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981).

Documentation regarding the murder of the Jewish population of Mozyr' can be found in these archives: AUKG-BRBGO (see especially criminal case no. 10454 against Ivan Podbereznyi); GARF (7021-91-20 and 273); NARA; NARB (845-1-12, 861-1-12); YVA; and ZGAMO (310-1-15).

Leonid Smilovitsky and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. NARA, T-454, reel 100, fr. 1029, RFSS, Schnellbrief of January 31, 1942.
2. AUKGBRBGO, case against I.P. Podbereznyi, January 21, 1944.
3. NARB, 861-1-12, pp. 2, 8–9, 845-1-12, p. 32; GARF, 7021-91-20, p. 4.
4. AUKGBRBGO, Podbereznyi case, pp. 141–146, 197.
5. Ibid., pp. 148, 151.
6. Pamiat', pp. 201, 209.
7. NARB, 861-1-12, p. 2; 845-1-12, p. 32; ZGAMO, 310-1-15, pp. 4, 12, 14.
8. GARF, 7021-91-273, pp. 6–8.
9. Rubenstein and Altman, The Unknown Black Book, p. 274.
10. Sta. Dortmund, 45 Js 1/78, Verfügung vom 19.1.1978, p. 19.
11. Mozyrskie novosti, December 20, 1943.
12. "Mozyrskie strannitsy Kholokosta."
13. GARF, 7021-91-20, p. 4.

NARODICHI

Pre-1941: Narodichi, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Naroditschi, Rayon center, Gebiet Korosten, Generalkommissariat Shtetomir; post-1991: Narodychy, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Narodichi is located about 110 kilometers (69 miles) north-northeast of Zhitomir. In 1939, the Jewish population of Narodichi was 1,233, comprising less than half of the total population.

German forces occupied Narodichi on August 22, 1941. In the two months from the start of the German invasion, the Jewish population in town changed dramatically. Many Jews from Narodichi managed to evacuate to the eastern regions of the Soviet Union, while Jewish refugees from the cities arrived in this remote town seeking shelter. In 1941 the Jewish population in Narodichi was wiped out rather quickly in two (or possibly three) massacres. One occurred on September 9, 1941, and another "on a cold rainy day" in mid-November. Einsatzgruppe C reported on September 11, 1941, that "in Narodichi, 208 terrorists, and, in a nearby barn, 60 terrorists were arrested and shot in the course of a large-scale Aktion."¹

A Ukrainian peasant, Mykola Stepanchik, recalled what he had witnessed in 1941 when he was 11 years old. His home was located on the road leading to the mass shooting site. On the morning of the killing Aktion, a member of Sonderkommando 4a had shooed him away, threatening him if he did not leave the field near his house, where pits were being prepared and guards were cordoning off the area. A German Gestapo man told him in Ukrainian: leave now or you will be killed. He was tending his cow in that field. He was curious and hid in the crops where he could still see what was happening. First a truck appeared with the Germans and a group of Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). The POWs dug a large pit. The Germans took a lunch break and then returned at about 3:00 p.m. The truck arrived several times, carrying groups of about 40 or 50 Jews on each occasion. The adult Jews, including mothers with infants, were separated from the children. The Jews had to crouch down in rows of 10 near the swamp. They were on their knees next to the pit. The Germans had rifles and automatic weapons and stood only about 5 meters (16 feet) from the Jews. There were six Ukrainian policemen, but they did not shoot. One Ukrainian policeman placed straw on top of the bodies in the pit. Then the rain came. There were no passersby during the Aktion. Everyone in town heard the gunfire.²

The Sonderkommando unit, however, soon moved on and left behind the now mostly orphaned Jewish children, who had been brought by the local Ukrainian police to the local cinema/club building, the former synagogue, as an unusual form of open remnant ghetto. The local militia was led by a Ukrainian chief named Khrenovsky (a photographer) and his deputy Artem Orel. It appears that the children were left there, more or less abandoned for about two months, with only two elderly women, who were supposed to care for them. They were given no food rations or water and had to depend on the local inhabitants to survive. Stepanchik recalls that some of the children wandered the streets, looking for food. According to evidence collected by Symon Gorevsky (and deposited at Yad Vashem, file # 9314) and Arkady Fedorovsky (who had joined the Red Army in 1941, lost 24 of his family members in the massacres, and returned to Narodichi in 1944), the former orthodox priest in the town went door to door, confronting locals, demanding that they donate food, and proclaiming that if they did not help these poor children, they would be punished by God. Some shared their food, but most avoided the club/cinema and spread rumors that the priest had gone mad.

In November 1941, the 72 children were shot by three German Gendarmes, assisted by local Ukrainian policemen, including Khrenovsky and Orel. They were forced to run naked in the Jewish cemetery, while being shot by one Gendarme who had mounted a machine gun on a tripod and two others who held semiautomatic pistols. The children's bodies were hastily buried in the cemetery; the ground was hard.

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, 370 Jews were shot in Narodichi in November 1941.³ It is not clear if this figure also includes the Jews who were shot in September or not, but it appears to conflict with the smaller number of child victims cited by witnesses. Given that Narodichi was also a Rayon center, where German and Ukrainian police were stationed, additional Jews may have been brought there from surrounding villages. It is possible that there was a third Aktion in November, at which time Jewish inhabitants from the villages were shot. In 1944, Fedorovsky and other local inhabitants erected a monument to the “823 Soviet Jews Shot in Narodichi.” The local Ukrainian police chief Khrenovsky was judged by a Soviet military tribunal and shot. The names and fates of the German perpetrators remain unknown.

1550 ZHYTOMYR REGION

SOURCES Published sources include: Knyga Pam'yati Ukrainiiny: Zhytomyrska Oblast' (Zhytomyr, 1994), 12:18. The testimonies of Arkady Fedorovsky and Symon Gorevsky, edited by Leonid Skolnik, have been published in Israel as an article titled “The Dead Kept Silent, What about the Living?” [in Russian] in the journal Kamerton. The story of the children was told to Fedorovsky by Luba Friedman, the only child to have survived the massacre and the war. She crawled out of the pit and joined the partisans.

Documentation about the murder of the Jews of Narodichi can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/217); GARF (7021-60-297); and YVA (# 9314). The interview with Mykola Stepanchik is located in the personal archive of the author (PAWL).

Wendy Lower

NOTES

1. BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 80, September 11, 1941.

2. Interview with Mykola Stepanchik in Narodichi, conducted by Wendy Lower, Boris Kogan, and Felix Starovoirov, September 29, 2009.

3. GARF, 7021-60-304, p. 8, as cited by A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiati zhertv fashizma,” 2000), pp. 57, 63.

NEMIROV

Pre-1941: Nemirov, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nemirow, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shtomir; post-1991: Nemyriv, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Nemirov is located 40 kilometers (25 miles) southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, 3,001 Jews were living in Nemirov (36.7 percent of the population), while another 161 Jews were living in the villages of the Nemirov raion.

After the German attack on the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a number of Jewish men from Nemirov were drafted into or volunteered for the Red Army. Some Jews were also able to evacuate to the east. According to German data, the town had a population of 8,000, including 3,000 Jews, in August 1941.¹ However, some additional Jews from the surrounding villages were probably brought into the town at the time of the establishment of the ghetto.²

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Nemirov on July 22, 1941. In July and August, the town was run by a local military commandant (Ortskommandantur), which set up a local administration and an auxiliary police force employing local non-Jewish inhabitants. On October 20, control of the town was turned over to a German civil administration. Nemirov became the administrative center of Gebiet Nemirow, which included the Rayons of Woronowiza and Sitkowzy. The Gebietskommissar was Kameradschaftsführer Herbert Sittig, a long-standing member of the Nazi Party.³ In the autumn, the German Gendarmerie, the Reich's rural police force, established a post in Nemirov, which also took over the Ukrainian auxiliary police force (Schutzmannschaft).⁴ A certain Gerchanivskii was appointed chief of the Ukrainian police at the end of July 1941. In August 1941, he had 32 indigenous policemen under his command.⁵

During the summer and autumn of 1941, a series of measures were introduced in Nemirov including the formation of a Jewish Council (Judenrat); Jews were required to wear distinguishing markings and to work at forced labor and were plundered, beaten, and humiliated.

By September, perhaps even late in August 1941, the German authorities in Nemirov set up a ghetto consisting of three narrow streets surrounded by barbed wire with a guard at the gate. Five or six families were made to share a residence in the ghetto. No communication was permitted with non-Jews, who were not even allowed to come close to the ghetto fence. Not all of the Jews were relocated to the ghetto; some of them continued to live outside its confines. Able-bodied men and also some women capable of performing hard labor were selected from the ghetto every day. They were put to work constructing the road from Nemirov to Gaisin, a segment on the key supply line, Durchgangsstrasse (highway) IV, and were also used to load and unload heavy construction materials. Such work enabled these Jews to procure foodstuffs from the local population and bring them back into the ghetto. As a result, there was not widespread starvation within the ghetto.⁶

The first killing operation in Nemirov was carried out on November 24, 1941. Assisted by the men of a construction company of the Luftwaffe, the Gendarmerie, and the local police, about 20 men of the Security Police and SD organized the roundup of the Jews from the ghetto and their concentration in the local Palace of Culture. Here a selection took place: craftsmen and their families were sent back to the ghetto, and the remaining Jews were escorted partly on foot and partly by truck to pits that had been dug in advance behind the Polish cemetery, where men of the Security Police squad shot them.⁷ In all, some 2,680 Jews were killed that day.⁸ It appears that a squad of Einsatzkommando 5 under the direction of SS-Oberleutnant Theodor Salmanzig, stationed in Vinnitsa, carried out the shooting.⁹

Some Jews survived the first Aktion in hiding. After the slaughter, the Germans reduced the area of the ghetto by half.

Those adults who remained alive were escorted daily to the road construction site. No fuel was available for heating, and the death rate from cold and hunger rose. The ghetto guards became more severe, and those who became ill were taken out and shot.¹⁰

On June 26, 1942, the ghetto in Nemirov was liquidated. The Jews were driven into the synagogue, where 200 to 300 young and strong men and women were selected and sent to a labor camp. The rest, perhaps as many as 500, were shot behind the Polish cemetery in pits that had been dug in advance.¹¹

The Red Army liberated Nemirov in the spring of 1944. On their return, their former neighbors welcomed back the Jewish family of Rozengaft, and they were able to reclaim their apartment and even some clothes. Grigory Rozengaft was immediately mobilized to the front.¹²

SOURCES The testimonies of survivors of the Nemirov ghetto can be found in the following publications: testimony of S. Bronshvag in Yitshak Arad, ed., Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoi okkupatsii (1941–1944). Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1991), p. 229; and testimony of A. Rozengaft in Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 1999), p. 381.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Nemirov can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L; DAVINO; DAZO; GARF (7021-54-1250); RGVA (1275-3-662); USHMM (RG-50.226*0002); and YVA (file M-33).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 24, Feldkommandantur 675 (Abt. VII), Winniza, an Sicherungsdivision 444 (Abt. VII), August 25, 1941.

2. Vinnychchyna v roky Velykoi Vitchyznianoï viiny 1941–1945 rr. Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (Odessa: Majak, 1971), p. 72. In its report of September 18, 1944, the ChGK commission in the Nemirov raion noted that in September 1941, 3,460 Jews were shot in the town of Nemirov. In reality, the first mass shooting of Jews came at the end of November 1941. The figure of 3,460 probably refers to the number of Jews enclosed in the ghetto, not the number of those shot.

3. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

4. In September 1942, the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Nemirov was Oberleutnant Karl-Gustav Heinze; see DAZO, 1159-1-9, p. 37, KdG Shitomir, Kommandobefehl 30/42, September 3, 1942.

5. RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 24, Feldkommandantur 675, an Sicherungsdivision 444, August 25, 1941.

6. Witness testimony of S. Bronshvag, p. 229; witness testimony of A. Rozengaft, p. 381; USHMM, RG-50.226*0002, oral history interview with Riva Isakovna Braiter.

7. Witness testimonies of S. Bronshvag and A. Rozengaft; BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 141/67, concluding report (Abschlussbericht), May 29, 1974, pp. 16–18.

8. GARF, 7021-54-1250, p. 12. It is possible that the figure is too high.

9. Salmanzig died in September 1943.

10. Witness testimony of A. Rozengaft.

11. Witness testimonies of S. Bronshvag and A. Rozengaft.

12. Witness testimony of A. Rozengaft.

NOVAIA PRILUKA

Pre-1941: Novaia Priluka, village, Turbov raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nowaja Priluka, Rayon Turbow, Gebiet Winniza, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Nova Pryluka, Turbov raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Novaia Priluka is located about 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) to the northeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 population census, 1,247 Jews lived in the Turbov raion, which included Turbov itself. The majority of these Jews lived in the village of Novaia Priluka.

From the end of June until July 20, 1941, the date on which German armed forces occupied the village, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. In addition, some Jewish men were conscripted into or enlisted voluntarily for the Red Army. Probably around 500 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military administration controlled the village. The Germans appointed a village elder and recruited an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. In late October 1941, authority was passed to a German civil administration. From that time until the eventual liberation in March 1944, Novaia Priluka was located in Rayon Turbow, Gebiet Winniza, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. Gemeinschaftsführer Halle became the Gebietskommissar, and Leutnant Baumgärtner was appointed in 1942 as Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer.¹ By the summer of 1942, the local police force (Schutzmannschaft) in Turbow had reached the strength of 30 men.²

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the German military administration ordered the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were required to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David and to perform various forms of heavy labor.

On July 31, 1941, German security forces carried out the first Aktion in Novaia Priluka, during which around 70 Jewish men were shot.³ In a second Aktion, another 110 Jews were shot.⁴ The Jewish women, children, and elderly people who remained alive were resettled into a ghetto. When the ghetto was liquidated on July 24–25, 1942, around 300 Jews were executed.⁵ It is likely that the shooting was carried out by the SD detachment from Vinnitsa, with the help of the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police.

SOURCES A brief entry on the Jewish community of Novaia Priluka can be found in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 901.

Documents regarding the persecution and annihilation of the Jews of Novaia Priluka can be found in the following archives: DAVINO; DAZO; GARF (7021-54-1257); and USHMM.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 8–9, KdG Shitomir, Hauptmannschaft Winniza, order no. 15/42, July 11, 1942.

3. DAVINO, R4422-1-18, p. 38.

4. Ibid.

5. Ibid. According to the materials of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 2,500 Jews were shot in Novaia Priluka in 1941. The author believes this figure is much too high. See also GARF, 7021-54-1257, p. 64.

NOVOGRAD-VOLYNSKII (AKA ZVIAGEL')

Pre-1941: Novograd-Volynskii, city and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Nowograd-Wolynskij (renamed Zwiagel), Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Novograd-Volyn's'kyi, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Novograd-Volynskii is located 84 kilometers (52 miles) northwest of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 census, there were 6,839 Jews living in the city (28.8 percent of the total population).

German armed forces occupied the city on July 6, 1941, two weeks after the initial German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. During those weeks, part of the Jewish community was able to evacuate to the east. Men of an eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around two thirds of the pre-war Jewish population remained at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the city. The military authorities established a local administration and set up an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from among local residents. The Ukrainian police played an active part in the measures taken against the Jewish population.

At the end of October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The city of Novograd-Volynskii became the administrative center of Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij. Regierungsassessor Dr. Schmidt became the Gebietskommissar. Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij in turn was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Shitomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹

Shortly after the occupation of the city, the Ortskommandantur ordered the registration and marking of the Jews. They were required to wear armbands with a six-pointed star. Jews were also required to perform various kinds of heavy labor. According to the The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, the Jews were moved to an "open ghetto" in the city in August 1941 by order of the military administration. The Jews were not permitted to leave its borders or to buy products from the local Ukrainians. As a result, hunger and famine quickly ensued.

At the end of July 1941, the first mass murders of the Jewish population were carried out. The first victims were those accused of acts of sabotage. At that time, 800 Jews were shot in a bomb crater, in the area of the Machine-Tractor Station (MTS). In the backyard of a house for invalids, where another bomb crater was located, 200 more Jews were shot. In the area of the MTS, the victims were led out in groups of 100 to 200, and in the backyard of the house for invalids, there were four groups of 40 to 50. In addition, more than 100 were shot in the yard of a bakery, in a former ditch for grain.² It is likely that at least some of these murders were carried out by the 8th SS-Motorized Brigade, which was commanded by SS-Standartenführer Sacks. The military staff and a detachment of this unit were stationed in the city on July 27–28, 1941.³ Also present in the city at that time was a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a, which "in cooperation with the Wehrmacht and Ukrainians" arrested and shot "34 political commissars, agents, and others" in a prisoner-of-war (POW) camp.⁴

Around the middle of August 1941, Sonderkommando 4a carried out another cleansing Aktion. The Wehrmacht "handed over [to Sonderkommando 4a] 230 civilian prisoners who had been captured. Of these, 161 persons were executed. They were accused of being Jews, Communists, looters, and saboteurs."⁵

At the end of August 1941, another mass execution was carried out in a grove near the former Red Army Building (Dom Krasnoi Armii). Altogether there were more than 700 victims, including women and children.⁶ It is possible that this shooting was carried out by the Police Brigade "South," which at the time was active in the region.

In September 1941, the open ghetto in Novograd-Volynskii was finally liquidated. At an old military firing range, around 3,200 Jews were shot, including those from outlying villages.⁷ It is likely that the executions were carried out by the staff company of the Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer Russland-Süd, commanded by SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln.

The last mass execution of the Jews was carried out by the 1st SS-Motorized Brigade, which received orders on September 8, 1941, from the Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS. On September 12, 1941, the brigade arrived in the city. SS-Untersturmführer Max Täubner, the commander, found out from the city's mayor that there were still 319 Jews in prison, whom the Wehrmacht had confined there for labor purposes. Täubner ordered these Jews to be shot in a ditch outside the city that had been dug in advance by the Ukrainian police.⁸

From November 1941 to November 1942, a labor camp existed in the city. Able-bodied Jewish men were resettled to work there from Baranovka, Rogachov, Iarunia, and other towns and villages. The prisoners of the camp were used to build railway lines. In November 1942, with the help of the partisan movement, some of the prisoners attempted a mass escape but were arrested and shot.⁹

SOURCES The ghetto in Novograd-Volynskii is mentioned in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 905. The Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 77, only registers a camp for civilians and a prison in the city. Other relevant publications include: E. Klee, W. Dressen, and V. Riess, eds., “Schöne Zeiten”: Judenmord aus der Sicht der Täter und Gaffer (Frankfurt am Main, 1988); Y. Büchler, “‘Unworthy Behavior’: The Case of SS Officer Max Täubner,” Holocaust and Genocide Studies 17:3 (Winter 2003): 409–429; and Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymy ostalis’ tol’ko my: Svidetel’sтва i dokumenty (Kiev: Biblioteka Institut iudaiki, 1999), pp. 98–101.

Documents pertaining to the persecution and elimination of the Jews in Novograd-Volynskii can be found in the following archives: BA-L (e.g., B 162/5575); DAZO; GARF (7021-60-300 and 305); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. GARF, 7021-60-305, pp. 3 and reverse side.

3. BA-L, B 162/5575 (202 AR-Z 1212/60, Bd. XXX), p. 7090, as cited in Martin Cüppers, Wegbereiter der Shoah: Die Waffen-SS, der Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS und die Judenvernichtung 1939–1945 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2005), pp. 166–167.

4. BA-BL, R 58/214, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 38, July 30, 1941.

5. Ibid., R 58/216, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 60, August 22, 1941. The documents refer to a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5; however, it is more likely that this was a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a, as Einsatzkommando 5 was operating further south.

6. GARF, 7021-60-305, p. 5.

7. Ibid., pp. 9, 67, 163, 182–183. Among those murdered were Jews from the outlying villages of Tesnovka (17 people), Barvinovka (13 people), Staraia Romanovka (10 people), and Sloboda Chernetskaia (14 people).

8. See Klee, Dressen, and Riess, “Schöne Zeiten,” pp. 184 ff.

9. Witness testimony of Eva Gladkaia, in Zabarko, Zhivymy ostalis’ tol’ko my, pp. 98, 101.

OLEVSK

Pre-1941: Olevsk, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Olevsk, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shtitomir; post-1991: Olevs’k, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast’, Ukraine

Olevsk is located 130 kilometers (81 miles) north-northwest of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 census, 2,858 Jews lived in Olevsk, comprising 42.2 percent of the total population.

An additional 866 Jews resided in the villages of the Olevsk raion.

The bulk of the Jewish population evacuated east with the Red Army as the Wehrmacht advanced into central Ukraine in early July 1941, leaving only about 20 percent of the pre-war Jewish population behind.

By late July, German troops still had not appeared in the town. One resident recalled hearing rumors that the Germans were not coming to Olevsk at all.¹ From July to October 1941, a German military administration was nominally responsible for the region around Olevsk; in practice, Ukrainian forces of the “Polis’ka Sich,” answerable to the pragmatic nationalist leader Taras Bul’ba-Borovets’, seized control of the town in late July. By August, Bul’ba-Borovets’ had appointed Petro Smorods’kyi as commander of the Sich garrison in Olevsk; he had under his command between 300 and 600 militiamen there.²

Bul’ba-Borovets’ and the Sich soon set up their own local government in Olevsk. Boris Simonovich, a local resident and Sich member, was appointed as leader of the raion council.³ He began appointing other local officials in late July.⁴ Most important, the Sich took over all police responsibilities in Olevsk.

From August through October, the Jewish population lived in a perpetual “state of anarchy” under Sich rule, as they were Photograph of the Chief of Police in Sarny, Taras Bul’ba-Borovets’, and other members of the Ukrainian paramilitary unit, Polis’ka Sich, published in the occupation newspaper, Volyn’.

COURTESY OF JARED MCBRIDE

frequently subjected to “robbery, brutality, and killings.” In addition to organizing pogroms, the Polis’ka Sich assigned Jews to various forced labor tasks, mainly aimed at torturing and humiliating them. Whether they were forced to build a bridge over the Ubort’ River or clean lavatories in town, these jobs were accompanied by “whippings, cursing, and mockery at every step.”⁵

The Sich regularly terrorized the Jews in their own homes. They broke into Jewish apartments on Komsomol’skaia and Oktiabr’skaia Streets to steal food and clothes. Sometimes these incursions turned deadly. One afternoon Zeriuk and three other members of the Polis’ka Sich broke into the apartment of Munia Shapiro, looking for goods. In Shapiro’s room, Zeriuk beat Shapiro with his rifle butt and then shot him three times, as well as another Jew who was there. The bodies of the two young men lay for almost a week in the apartment, where they began to rot.⁶

In addition to physical abuse, economic burdens were also imposed on the Jews. After a census, the head of the raion council, Simonovich, levied a collective tax of 100,000 rubles on the Jewish population.⁷ Living conditions under the “Olevsk Republic” are characterized by the Jewish survivor Iakov Keselev Shklover: “the livestock were treated better than us.” The Sich initiated anti-Jewish measures and killed people with total impunity in Olevsk, even before there was any discernible German presence in the town.⁸

In early November 1941, personnel of the German civil administration arrived in Olevsk and established their authority.⁹ Olevsk became the administrative center of Gebiet Olewsk, which also included the Rayons of Slowetschno and Luginy, as well as Rayon Olewsk. Gebiet Olewsk now formed part of Generalkommissariat Shitomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹⁰ In Olevsk, the Gebietskommissar was a man named Fischer, who was accompanied by an entourage of assistants.¹¹

On the establishment of the German civil administration, the assistant Gebietskommissar in Olevsk, Neukirchner, issued an order for the Jews to be ghettoized. The Polis’ka Sich and the local Ukrainian police forced the entire Jewish population to move onto three main streets—Komsomol’skaia, Oktiabr’skaia, and Stalina—while the Russian and Ukrainian populations were removed from these streets to create a purely Jewish ghetto. The Jewish population was ordered to wear the Star of David at all times, and a Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, chaired by Elik Kats, the son of a local fireman.¹² The Jews of Olevsk had to endure terrible overcrowding in the ghetto, as many families were forced to share a single apartment. The Jewish population was still not free of terror from members of the Sich, who routinely vandalized and broke into apartments.¹³

In mid-November 1941, a new group of Germans, possibly an SS detachment from Einsatzkommando 5, arrived in Olevsk and made preparations for the liquidation of the ghetto. According to internal Sich documentation, on November 18, SS-Captain Hitschke requisitioned members of the Sich for the forthcoming Aktion, and about 50 Sich soldiers and two Sich commanders agreed to participate.¹⁴ In Varvarovka, a village located about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from Olevsk, local Ukrainians were ordered to dig two large pits near the Ubort’ River.¹⁵

At nightfall on November 19, German forces, members of the Polis’ka Sich, and local Ukrainian police cordoned off the Jewish ghetto. The Jews were ordered to gather with their belongings at a collection point for registration. The German-led forces then scoured the ghetto area, beating and dragging out anyone found hiding. The old and sick were simply shot on the spot. Around 15 elderly people were killed on the streets.¹⁶ A few Jews, including Ovsei Srulovich Reiblat and Tevel’ Gershkov Trosman, miraculously managed to evade the roundup. The bulk of the Jews from the ghetto were herded into sheds and stables near the train tracks, where they spent the night huddled together like animals, awaiting their slaughter.

On the morning of November 20, 1941, the Jews were driven to the village of Varvarovka in trucks. Upon arrival, all the Jews had to remove their clothes, which were subsequently taken back to Olevsk in the trucks. The waiting Jews were then taken in groups of 15 to 20 people under heavy guard to the two pits located about 400 meters (1,312 feet) behind the village. The shooters, who were mostly Sich members and local policemen, lined up about 5 meters (16 feet) behind their respective victims and took aim.¹⁷ When they fired, the victims’ bodies fell into the pits. The sound of gunfire and screams could be heard in Varvarovka throughout the day. In total, they shot 535 Jews on that day.¹⁸

Local inhabitants looted Jewish property from the empty ghetto. Over the ensuing weeks, members of the Polis’ka Sich and the local police also hunted for the few Jews who had managed to escape, conducting thorough sweeps of the forests. Local inhabitants were threatened with severe penalties for hiding or assisting Jews. These searches uncovered at least 15 more Jews, who were then shot near the same pits at the Ubort’ River.¹⁹

Only a handful of Jews from the ghetto managed to survive until the end of World War II.

SOURCES The main source on the Olevsk ghetto is Jared McBride’s unpublished essay “Eyewitness to an Occupation: The Holocaust in Olevsk, Zhytomyr, Ukraine,” which was first presented at the conference in 2008 in Paris titled “The Holocaust in Ukraine: New Sources and Perspectives,” co-sponsored by the Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, Yahad-In Unum, the CDJC, and the Sorbonne. Other published sources, mainly related to the little-known history of the Polis’ka Sich, are listed in the notes.

The main documentary source on the fate of the Jews of Olevsk during World War II consists of the postwar Soviet investigations to be found in an extensive file in GARF (7021-149-31). Additional relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/7317-18); DARO (R30-2-112);

DAZO; GARF (7021-60-307); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 2); VHF (# 43260); and YVA.

Jared McBride and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-149-31, p. 83.
2. Ibid., pp. 67 (verso side), 75 verso, 106 verso; Taras Bul'ba-Borovets', Armiiia bez derzhavy: Slava i trahediia ukrains'koho povstans'koho rukhu: Spobady (Winnipeg, Canada: Nakladom t-va "Volyn'," 1981), p. 158. Iakiv Iosypovych Brechko, a member of the Sich stationed in Olevsk, reported seeing 600 soldiers at the garrison; see Iosyp Patsula and Ievhen Shmorhun, eds., Povstans'kyi rukh otamana Tarasa Bul'by-Borovetsia: Doslidzhennia, spobady, dokumenty (Rivne: Azaliia, 1998), p. 115.
3. Portions of the records of the raion council are located in DAZO, 1445-1, files 1-8.
4. GARF, 7021-149-31, pp. 67 and verso.
5. Ibid., pp. 32, 107 verso.
6. Ibid., pp. 13, 83 verso, 106 verso-107 verso.
7. Ibid., pp. 106 verso, 178; it is difficult to discern when this tax was levied and whether the German administration played any role in the affair. We can be sure that it was Simonovich, though, who organized the tax.
8. Ibid., p. 107 verso; it is noteworthy that Ukrainian residents complained of Sich members stealing from them as well. See pp. 67 verso, 75 verso, and 84 verso.
9. Bul'ba-Borovets' notes that the Gebietskommissar arrived on November 5. He then informed Sigolenko that the Polis'ka Sich would now fall under German command; see Bul'ba-Borovets', Armiiia bez derzhavy, p. 166. Father Artemiy Selepyna also gives a vivid account of the arrival of the Germans; see Roman Petrenko, Slidamy armii bez derzhavy (Kiev: Ukraïns'ka vydavnychy spilka; Toronto: Doslidnyi instytut "Studium," 2004), pp. 137-139.
10. BA-BL, BDC, SSOH 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
11. For the most extensive list of Germans who governed the Olevsk raion, see GARF, 7021-60-307, pp. 1-1 verso. Spisok nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatchikov, sovershavshikh zlodeianniia vo vremenno okupirovannom Olevskom raione Zhitomirskoi oblasti.
12. GARF, 7021-149-31, pp. 19 verso, 26, 32, 178.
13. Ibid., pp. 85-86.
14. DARO, R30-2-112, pp. 9-10. The Sich report of this incident records that Sich leader Kirill Sigolenko told Hitschke that the Sich had already been demobilized and that they were not to be used against women and children. Nevertheless, the participation of a number of Sich members in the Aktion is well documented. See also T. Gladkov and B. Stekliar, "Vse ravno konets budet!" in So sbchitom i mechom: Ocherki i stat'i (Lvov: Kameniar, 1988), p. 177.
15. GARF, 7021-149-31, pp. 26, 110.
16. Ibid., pp. 12, 25-26, 83-84, 178.
17. Ibid., pp. 3, 13, 19 verso, 26, 69 verso, and 179; Pavel Kharchenko, one of the drivers who was present at the Aktion, told acquaintances that only two Germans reportedly took part in the shootings, but it was mostly conducted by Sich members and local Ukrainian police.

18. According to the materials of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 585 Jews were killed in total in Olevsk; see GARF, 7021-60-307, p. 161.

19. Ibid., 7021-149-31, pp. 4, 13, 95 verso.

ORATOV

Pre-1941: Oratov, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Oratow, Rayon center, Gebiet Monastyrishchtsche, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Orativ, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Oratov is located about 75 kilometers (47 miles) east of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, 114 Jews lived in Oratov (4.7 percent of the total population). An additional 385 Jews lived in the villages of the raion.

Between June 30 and July 27, 1941, the date when the German armed forces occupied Oratov, part of the Jewish community was able to evacuate to the east. Some Jewish men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 70 to 80 Jews remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

In July and August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of Oratov. In late October 1941, authority was passed to a German civil administration. Until its liberation in March 1944, Rayon Oratow was part of Gebiet Monastyrishchtsche, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. SA-Oberführer Werder became the Gebietskommissar.¹ In Oratov itself, a German Gendarmerie post was created under whose command a Ukrainian police force served. Both played an active role in the measures taken against the Jewish population in the Rayon.

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the Ortskommandantur created a local administration and organized the registration and marking of the Jews. All Jews were obligated to wear white armbands with the Star of David. They were also ordered to do various kinds of heavy labor.

Sometime in the fall of 1941, an open Jewish ghetto was established in the town.² Apparently Jews were resettled there from outlying villages as well. On October 15, 1942, when the ghetto was liquidated, 74 Jews were shot.³

In 1942, Jews living in the villages of the Rayon Oratow were also killed. In May 1942, 18 Jews were shot in the village of Staryi Zhivotov, 3 Jews were shot in the village of Chagov, and 38 Jews were shot in the village of Balabanovka.⁴

SOURCES The Oratov ghetto is mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghetto auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941-1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 45. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 942, dates the mass shooting of the Jews of Oratov on October 15, 1941 [sic].

1556 ZHYTOMYR REGION

Documents relating to the elimination of the Jews of Oratov can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-54-1238); and DAVINO (R1683-1-10 and 13).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. DAVINO, R1683-1-10 and 13.
3. GARF, 7021-54-1238, p. 127.
4. Ibid., pp. 15, 21, 119.

PAVLOVICH

Pre-1941: Pavlovichi, village, Ovruch raion, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Pawlowitschi, Rayon and Gebiet Owrutsch, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Pavlovychi, Ovruch raen, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Pavlovichi is located about 170 kilometers (106 miles) north-northwest of Zhitomir. A few Jews lived in the village on the eve of the German invasion in June 1941.

German armed forces occupied Pavlovichi in the first half of August 1941. Evgeniia Gural'nik (born 1928), who was fleeing from Novograd-Volynskii, along with other Jews, became trapped in Pavlovichi by the rapid German advance. According to Gural'nik, shortly after the start of the occupation, the commandant of the area, probably based in Pokalev, announced that Pavlovichi would become “a Jewish colony” and that Jews were being brought there from the surrounding area.¹

One day during the first weeks of the occupation, all the Jews were rounded up and held naked in a warehouse for hours until a German official appeared. He then announced that they were being given a present of their lives and that they would live and work there. The Jews performed forced labor in agriculture and only received about 1 liter (4 cups) of skimmed milk per person for food. The Jews survived by bartering their possessions with local inhabitants.

In Pavlovichi the Jews lived in overcrowded conditions, with about 10 people sharing a room. All Jews had to wear armbands, and their place of residence was heavily guarded by the local police. Gural'nik recalls a particularly cruel policeman, Ivan Harpina, who regularly robbed the Jews with the help of his colleagues. Teenage Jews were beaten heavily, and on one occasion a Jewish man was tied to a horse and dragged for several kilometers behind it. Some young Jews were shot after being denounced as former Komsomol members.

The “Jewish colony” or ghetto in Pavlovichi existed until December 25, 1941, when two cars carrying a German detachment arrived at 4:00 p.m. and rounded up all the remaining Jews. They were escorted to the Polish cemetery, where a pit had already been prepared by some of the Jews, who had been told it was for storing turnips. The Jews were ordered to lie facedown in the pit and were shot in the back. Then the next group had to lie down on top of the corpses. As the shooting was not completed that day, the Germans carried on the next day. Gural'nik managed to survive pressed up against the wall of the pit and then escaping at night. She witnessed the shooting the following morning from under a pile of straw. She was helped by a forester and his wife, who gave her some clothing, and also subsequently by other local peasants.²

SOURCES Information about the persecution and elimination of the Jews in Pavlovichi can be found in the testimony of Evgeniia Gural'nik located at VHF (# 33101).

Martin Dean
trans. Tatyana Feith

NOTES

1. VHF, # 33101, testimony of Evgeniia Gural'nik.
2. Ibid.

PETRIKOV

Pre-1941: Petrikov, town and raion center, Poles'e oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Petrikow, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Petrykau, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Petrikov is located 53 kilometers (33 miles) west of Mozyr'. In 1939, the Jewish population of Petrikov was 1,074 Jews (18.6 percent of the total).

Petrikov was occupied by the Germans on July 29, 1941, and then again, after a brief Soviet reoccupation, on August 19.

Petrikov became the center of a Gebiet comprising the Petrikow and Shitkowitschi Rayons; it was attached to Generalkommissariat Shitomir in Reichskommissariat Ukraine. There was a garrison of up to 1,000 soldiers and policemen in Petrikov. The Gendarmes were housed on the premises of the former Petrikov raion committee of the Belorussian Communist Party; the SD, on Volodarskii Street; and Sonderstab R, in a former pharmacy. A sapper unit and six armored cutters for patrolling the river were stationed on the banks of the Pripiat'. A system of controlling the movement of the local population was also instituted.¹

Separate killings of Jews, members of the Communist youth organization (Komsomol), and Soviet activists began in the summer of 1941. Aron Fainshtein (born 1871), who ran the pharmacy, was tied by his legs to a horse and dragged through the streets of Petrikov until he died. Fania Kustanovich (born 1936) was thrown into a fire because her mother Klara refused to reveal the hiding places of Red Army soldiers who had been caught behind German lines. Afterwards, Klara herself was shot.²

The Nazis also persecuted and shot Jews in the surrounding villages. According to the testimony of Yevgenii Dus', starting in the first days of August 1941, the Germans made a list of all the Jews in the Koptsevichi sel'sovet and demanded they report every day to the police station. Jews were forced to perform senseless work such as dragging a cart loaded with water, bricks and stones, scrap, and garbage from one place to another while the Germans laughed, insulted, or mocked them.³ On September 15, 1941, an SS execution squad arrested the chairman of the kolkhoz, P.K. Gramovich, and a worker, L. Pasovskii, who were then led into the woods and brutally tortured. In August 1941, 4 people were shot in the village of Sekerichi.⁴ At the end of September 1941, 25 Jews from Koptsevichi were placed in a vehicle under the pretext of being dispatched to Petrikov for interrogation and transported to the edge of Zheleznitsa, where they were shot.⁵

Until the end of September 1941, Jews lived in their own houses in Petrikov. They were obliged to wear distinguishing markings and had to unquestioningly carry out German orders. They were watched by a police force selected from local inhabitants. After the first mass execution, in September 1941, a ghetto was set up. To that end, the Germans allotted three buildings on Volodarskii Street. Many of these buildings lacked doors and windows. The ghetto was fenced off by barbed wire and placed under guard. The inhabitants themselves had to see to feeding themselves, providing their own heating, and coping with other problems of survival. The Jews were only able to leave the ghetto at night. Teacher Faina Raskina, Zaivel' Peshanskii, and another person named Branets were killed for violating the internal regulations of the ghetto as established by the Nazis. The Nazis also refused to let them be buried in the Jewish cemetery. Every day at 6:00 A.M., those who were physically able were taken out to work, either logging or clearing snow from the roads. The ghetto existed until April 1942.⁶

The first Aktion was conducted on September 14, 1941 (or September 22, according to other sources), when a punitive squad of around 100 men, probably from the 1st SS-Cavalry Brigade, arrived on motorboats along the Pripiat'. They ordered the Belorussians and Russians to mark their homes with the sign of the cross. At the time, the Jewish community was observing the Jewish New Year in the synagogue. At Bliuma Gertsulina's house, the executioners demanded she say where her valuables were hidden and then shot her. They killed a tenth-grader, Borukh Gertsulin, on Karl-Liebknecht Street. They chased the Jews—adults and children alike—in groups of 30 to 40 into the river. At the inlet Bychok, they forced them to lie facedown in the mud and then shot above their heads so that nobody would get up. Then they gathered around 400 people and told them all to undress and get in the water. The Germans opened fire with machine guns from the cutters. The dead and wounded floated in the water. Afterwards, the Germans finished off the wounded.

The next day, the Nazis sought out the surviving Jews within the town and killed them on the spot where they found them. A group of Jews were driven to a cattle yard at the kolkhoz "Chervonnyi ogorodnik" (Golden-red Gardener) and shot there. The executioners burned down 35 houses on Third International Street and 17 houses near the pier. In several of the houses, they burned adults and children alive.⁷

A second Aktion followed on February 15, 1942, when a punitive squad consisting of Germans and Hungarians passed through Petrikov and conducted a cleansing Aktion—a search for Jews who were still alive—in Rayons Kopatkewitschi, Petrikow, and Oktjabr. The squad burned some of the Jews seized, while others were stripped and chased in the frost towards the village of Belki, some 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from Petrikov, where they were then shot. In all, there were around 200 victims.⁸

The third Aktion took place in the last days of April 1942. The German Gendarmerie roused the remaining Jews at 4:00 A.M. and led them to a slaughterhouse about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) northeast of Petrikov. The Jews were locked up in a barn, and each was undressed separately and then led out to be shot. The local inhabitants were forbidden not only to bury them but also even to go near the bodies. They were allowed to do so only after two weeks.

In the following months, the Nazis and their accomplices hunted down surviving Jews who had hidden in the countryside with the assistance of Belorussian acquaintances. In March 1942, 23 Jews were killed in Kopatkevichi (Petrikov Rayon); in July 1942, 22 Jews in the village of Smetanichi; and on November 7, 1942, 20 Jews from the village of Babunichi. In February 1943, a police detachment of 15 men under the command of the chief of the indigenous police post in Koptsevichi, Igor' Tseslik, unexpectedly appeared in the village of Brinev. They arrested the family of Boris Komissarchik (four people), led them out to a kolkhoz barn, stood them up against the wall, and shot them with machine guns.⁹

Several Petrikov Jews survived the war. Among them was Ginda Gutman, whom the executioners had thought to be dead. She hid in the village of Belanovich and then made her way to the village of Makarovka in the Kiev oblast', where she pretended to be a Pole under the name of Stepanida Beniak. Together with a group of Ukrainian women, "Stepanida" was sent to work in Germany.¹⁰

Petrikov was liberated on June 29, 1944. During the years of occupation, 770 Petrikov Jews perished at the hands of the Nazis and their accomplices. Of these, it was possible to determine the names of only 132 families, including 66 women (50 percent) and 48 children aged 15 and younger (36.4 percent).¹¹

SOURCES Relevant information on the destruction of Petrikov's Jews can be found in the following publications: Pamiats'. Petrykauski raen (Minsk, 1995); Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarusaia Navuka, 2000); and Kholokost v Belorussii, 1941–1944 gg. Dokumenty i materialy (Minsk, 2002).

Documents on the fate of the Jews of Petrikov can be found in the following archives: BA-L; NARB (845-1-12); and YVA (M-41 JM/11219, and M-33/429).

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. YVA, M-41 JM 11219.
2. Klara Kustanovich was posthumously awarded the medal "For Wartime Services." See Pamiats', p. 275.
3. Kholokost v Belorussii, p. 215.
4. Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, pp. 224–225.

5. Kholokost v Belorussii, pp. 215–216.
6. NARB, 845-1-12, pp. 47 and verso.
7. YVA, M-33/429; see also BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 117/67 (Nazi crimes in the Petrikov region), vol. 3, Closing Report dated September 3, 1973, which gives the date of September 21–22, 1941, for these first killing Aktions. And see GARF, 7021-91-22, Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, December 19, 1944.
8. Pamiats', pp. 275–276.
9. Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, pp. 224–225.
10. Pamiats', p. 278.
11. Estimated by the author using ibid., pp. 326–329.

PIATKA

Pre-1941: Piatka, village, Chudnov raion, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Pjatk, Rayon and Gebiet Tschudnow, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: P'iatka, Chudniv raion, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Piatka is located 34 kilometers (21 miles) southwest of Zhitomir. According to the 1926 census, there were 870 Jews living in Piatka (24 percent of the total population). In the second half of the 1920s and in the 1930s, the number of Jews in the village declined substantially.

German armed forces occupied the village on July 7, 1941, almost two weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During that time, some Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for military duty in the Red Army, and a small number of Jews managed to evacuate eastward. About 250 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

In the period July through October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the village, and it appointed a village elder and an auxiliary police force manned by local residents. In November 1941, a civil administration took the place of the German military administration. Until its liberation in late December 1943, Piatka was part of Gebiet Tschudnow in Generalkommissariat Shitomir.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the same anti-Jewish measures implemented in other German-occupied Ukrainian towns and villages were introduced in Piatka: Jews were required to wear distinguishing marks in the form of armbands with the Star of David, made to do forced labor, and forbidden to leave the village. They had to hand over all their valuables. They were forbidden to sell products in the market, and the local Ukrainian inhabitants were not allowed to have any contact with Jews. Those who violated this order were flogged.

In August 1941, the first Aktion took place in the village. In its course, a group of Jewish men were arrested and shot in a park in Chudnov.¹ The remaining Jews were herded into a ghetto, which was set up in the synagogue building. Every day the Jews were led out to work on harvesting sugar beets. The ghetto was liquidated on October 24, 1941, when more than 200 people were shot on the northern edge of the village near a dilapidated mill (in 1950, a monument was erected at the site of the shooting).² The shooting apparently was the work of a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5, with active participation by Ukrainian police. After the liquidation of the ghetto, the Ukrainian policemen hunted down Jews who were in hiding and shot them. Thus 7 captured Jews were shot a few days later.

Later in the occupation, a Jewish fugitive from the Chudnov ghetto, Mariam Sandal (Askes), found refuge in the nearby village of Maloselka (about 5 kilometers [3 miles]) from Piatka, as her grandfather was from Piatka and enjoyed a good reputation with many of the local peasants, who knew him as the cooper from Berdichev. According to Sandal (Askes), there were no Jewish survivors from the village of Piatka.³

SOURCES Information about the destruction of the Jews of Piatka can be found in these publications: “Piatka,” in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 6 (Moscow: Rossiiskaia Akademiia Estestvennykh Nauk, Nauchnyi fond “Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia,” “Epos,” 2008); “Piatka,” in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 985–986; and I.O. Herasymov, ed., Knyha pam'iaty Ukrainy. Zhytomyrs'ka oblast', vol. 11 (Zhytomyr: L'onok, 1996).

Documentation regarding the fate of the Jews of Piatka can be found in the following archives: DAZO; GARF (7021-60-315); VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Testimony of M. Sandal (Askes), in Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my. Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 1999), p. 389.
2. Archives of the Nauchno-prosvetitel'nyi tsentr “Kholokost” (Holocaust Research and Educational Center), Moscow; “Piatka,” in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 6; Herasymov, Knyha pam'iaty Ukrainy.
3. Testimony of M. Sandal (Askes), in Boris Zabarko, ed., “Nur wir haben überlebt”: Holocaust in Ukraine—Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004), pp. 343–344.

PIKOV

Pre-1941: Pikov, village, Kalinovka raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Pikow, Rayon and Gebiet Kalinovka, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Pikiw, Kalynivka raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Pikov is located 40 kilometers (25 miles) north-northeast of Vinnytsia. In June 1941, there were probably around 1,200 Jews living in Pikov.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Pikov around July 22, 1941. In the summer and fall of 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the village. The German commandant appointed village elders and organized an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. At the end of October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. It became part of Gebiet Kalinovka, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Dr. Seelemeyer. The SS- und Polizeigebietsführer in Kalinovka appointed in early 1942 was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Konrad Lange.

At the end of July 1941, the Germans established an open ghetto in the village, and Jews from neighboring settlements were also brought to the ghetto. According to survivor Leonid Langerman, a certain Bronitzky, who had been appointed as the village elder in Uladovka, issued a decree ordering the expulsion of the Jews from there, such that his family moved to Pikov. On arrival there, all the Jews were forced to move to the center of the village in Novyi Pikov; if anyone tried to escape, they were immediately killed. The Ukrainian police was very active. The Jews had to wear badges and armbands, and there was also a Jewish Council (Judenrat) to help enforce the German restrictions on the Jews. Everyone was forced to work on the kolkhoz—including women and children; they harvested potatoes, beets, and other vegetables. A group of men were forced to build a road through the town to the neighboring town of Ivanov and did not receive any pay.¹

Another survivor, Eudokiya Manko, recalled that all the Jews were forced to perform hard labor and wear badges on the left side of their chests and bands on their left arms. With these markings, they were not allowed to go outside, to the market, or to the houses of other Ukrainians. Nevertheless, she hid her badge in order to go out to find food. All she was able to find was a little bit of bread and a few potatoes.²

In mid-May 1942, a group of able-bodied Jews from the Pikov ghetto were selected and escorted on foot to the village of Kalinovka, where they were placed in a forced labor camp for about 500 Jews and assigned to work on the construction of an airfield. The barracks for Jews were fenced off with barbed wire, and anyone who attempted to leave the site of the airfield was shot. The prisoners were given food once a day—150 grams (5.3 ounces) of bread and an unsalted pea soup.³

The Jews in the Pikov ghetto lived in great fear, since they knew it was just a matter of time until there would be a pogrom; the Germans could enter Jewish houses at any time, and the Jews had to do whatever they would demand. At night, the family of Eudokiya Manko all stayed together in one bedroom without a light, as they had so little kerosene. They never talked about the future (it was taboo) but reminisced about the past. Eudokiya saw a pit being prepared for what was to be the mass shooting, and after her mother and sister had been killed, she managed to escape into the forests.⁴

The Germans liquidated the Pikov ghetto on May 30, 1942. A force of about 30 German policemen that arrived in Pikov was enthusiastically assisted by the Ukrainian police, who abused and tortured the victims before they were killed. Jewish survivor Galina Lisitsyna, who had recently arrived in Pikov, recalled that in May or June the Germans arrived and organized a roundup of the Jews. She observed the Jews being led away into vehicles, and fortunately she was able to make her escape. As she escaped through the forest, she also saw how the Germans shot the Jews. The Jews were led through a corridor of guards supervised by a senior German and were then lined up 5 people at a time to be shot into a pit. The mass shooting took place near the Jewish cemetery that was located about halfway between Pikov and Ivanov (located about 10 kilometers [6 miles] to the south). According to Soviet sources, 960 Jews from Pikov were shot.⁵

In the first two weeks of June 1942, the Germans, assisted by the Ukrainian police, conducted two more Aktions, rounding up any Jews they found in hiding and shooting them. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), in these Aktions first 76 and then 44 Jews were shot.⁶

The few Jews that survived from the Pikov ghetto managed to escape at the time of the mass shootings or from the Kalinovka labor camp and survived with the help of non-Jews in the region until the Red Army drove out the German occupiers in March 1944.

SOURCES Publications mentioning the Pikov ghetto include the following: Boris Rabiner, My rodom iz getto: Vospominaniia byvshikh uznikov Mogilev-Podol'skogo getto (New York, 1996), pp. 83–85; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 988.

Documentation regarding the destruction of the Pikov Jews can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/7364); DAVINO; GARF (7021-54-1274); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 4); VHF (# 115, 18247, and 23337); and YVA.

Martin Dean
trans. Gina Caruso

NOTES

1. VHF, # 18247, testimony of Leonid Langerman; and also the published testimony by Langerman in Rabiner, My rodom iz getto, pp. 83–85.
2. VHF, # 115, testimony of Eudokiya Manko.
3. Testimony of Langerman, pp. 83–85.
4. VHF, # 115.
5. Vinnichchina v period Velykoi vitchyznianoï viiny 1941–1945 rr. (Khronika Podii), p. 29, as cited by Aleksandr Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), pp. 14, 24; and BA-L, B 162/7364, pp. 190–191—this source, however, gives the total of only 800 to 900 Jews from Ivanov and Pikov murdered altogether but is probably based mainly on the reports of the ChGK.
6. GARF, 7021-54-1274.

PLISKOV

Pre-1941: Pliskov, village and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Pliskow, Rayon center, Gebiet Illinzy, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Plyskiv, Pohrebysheche raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Pliskov is located 59 kilometers (37 miles) east-northeast of Vinnitsa. The census of 1939 recorded 793 Jewish residents in Pliskov (24.4 percent of the total).

German armed forces occupied the village on July 22, 1941, one month after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this time, some of the Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for military service in the Red Army, and a small number of Jews succeeded in evacuating to the eastern regions of the country. Some of those who had tried to flee, however, were forced to return. As they traveled back to Pliskov, they were robbed by Ukrainian policemen on the roads. On their return, they found that their houses had been ransacked, and almost no possessions remained.¹

In the period from July through October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the village. The German military administration appointed a mayor (named Ivanko) and formed an auxiliary police force headed by Mileli Chirskii (after the war, he moved to Australia).²

In late October 1941, a German civil administration took over from the Wehrmacht. Until liberation in January 1944, Rayon Pliskov was part of Gebiet Illinzy in Generalkommissariat Shitomir. In Pliskov itself, from the fall of 1941, there was a Gendarmerie post, which was in charge of a squad of about 30 Ukrainian policemen.

In the summer and fall of 1941, various anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Pliskov. According to Jewish survivor Tsilia Rabinovich, Jews were required to wear badges and were not allowed outside without them. They also were taken for forced labor. They had to farm potatoes and beets, but they were not allowed to take anything home with them.³ Another survivor, Mikhail Rossinskii, notes that the Germans came to the Jewish houses and said, "Give us anything of value that you have!" Then they entered the houses and took what they wanted.⁴

In Pliskov, the Jews initially remained in their own houses, but since the Jews all lived on one side of the village and the non-Jews on the other, a kind of "open ghetto" already existed. According to Rossinskii, in the summer of 1941, the Germans took away about 30 of the few remaining men and said that they were being sent on a work assignment; subsequently it was discovered that the men had been shot. Other sources indicate that 23 Soviet activists were shot in a nearby forest in September 1941. Rossinskii's father was not arrested at this time, as he worked making leather items for the German soldiers. However, for safety his father sent Mikhail to work on the nearby Kolkhoz Raskopana, inhabited mostly by non-Jews, as he feared an upcoming Aktion.⁵

The German Security Police organized a major Aktion against the Jews of Pliskov and the surrounding area in late October 1941, during which 513 Jews were shot. A detachment of Einsatzkommando 5, actively assisted by the Ukrainian police, carried out the mass shooting.⁶ Mikhail Rossinskii, who had returned to Pliskov to get a winter coat, was captured by a local policeman who recognized that he was Jewish. Mikhail was taken to the site of the mass shooting. Just in time, he managed to flee into the forest. Despite being wounded in the foot, he made good his escape.⁷

According to Tsilia Rabinovich, a formal ghetto (or remnant ghetto) was established in Pliskov after the October Aktion for the more than 250 Jews who remained. These prisoners probably consisted of specialist workers and their families who had been selected out and other Jews who emerged from hiding. Conditions in the ghetto were overcrowded, and Tsilia had to sleep on the floor. Her father constantly urged her to escape, as she did not look Jewish. He obtained false papers for her with her actual date of birth.

On May 23, 1942, German and Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto. On the following morning they rounded up the Jews and loaded them onto trucks. In total, about 250 people were transported away to be shot in a pit not far away, together with Jews from other ghettos in the area.⁸ According to local policeman A.T. Natiagolovo, interrogated by the Soviet authorities in 1944, the Aktion took place in July 1942 under the direction of the head of the Gendarmerie, Schuster. The local police and the "Gestapo" (about 30 men) transported around 200 Jews into the Fruzinkovskyi Forest and shot them. According to Natiagolovo, the role of the local police consisted of guarding the victims during the shooting and filling in the grave afterwards.⁹

Tsilia Rabinovich managed to evade the roundup by hiding behind a false wall. She heard, however, how Germans discovered and took away another family from the attic of the same house. After she had fled from Pliskov at night, she heard gunshots from the killing site.¹⁰

SOURCES Publications regarding the fate of the Jewish population of Pliskov during the German occupation include the following: Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1000; A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheski spravochnik (Kharkov: "Karavella," 2001), p. 256; and Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 45.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Pliskov can be found in the following archives: BA-L (II 204a AR-Z 138/67, Bd. I u. Anhang); DAVINO (R5022-1-176 and R6022-1-40); DAZO (e.g., 1151-1-703); GARF (7021-54-1269); USHMM (e.g., RG-31, 1996.A.0269); VHF (# 32533, 34943); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft and Gina Caruso

NOTES

1. VHF, # 34943, testimony of Mikhail Rossinskii; # 32533, testimony of Tsilia Rabinovich.
2. DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13–14, KdG Schitomir, Vinitsa Captancy, Order 18/42, July 25, 1942.
3. VHF, # 32533.
4. Ibid., # 34943.
5. Ibid.
6. GARF, 7021-54-1269, p. 6; testimony of Yakov Dekhtyar (Baltimore, MD), February 25, 1998 (www.plisk over.com/PliskovHistory.htm); BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 135, November 19, 1941. VHF, # 32533, dates the Aktion on October 25, 1941; other sources give October 22.

7. VHF, # 34943.

8. Ibid., # 32533.

9. BA-L, II 204a AR-Z 138/67, Anhang zu Bd. I (Soviet materials), Bild Nr. 250.

10. VHF, # 32533.

POGREBISHCHE

Pre-1941: Pogrebishche, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Pogrebischtsche, Rayon center, Gebiet Kasatin, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Pobrebyshe, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Pogrebishche is located 64 kilometers (40 miles) east-northeast of Vinnitsa. In 1939, the Jewish population of the settlement was 1,445 (15.2 percent of the total). In addition, there were another 259 Jews residing in the villages of the Pogrebishche raion. Jews in Pogrebishche were aware of the Germans' persecution of the Jews in Poland from radio and press reports, but some people dismissed this merely as Soviet propaganda. Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a number of Jews tried to flee before the advancing German forces, but the majority stayed behind and awaited their arrival.

The German army initially occupied the town on July 22, 1941. They immediately established a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. Jews were obliged to wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David, and a curfew was also imposed on them after 9:00 P.M. Germans and the Ukrainian police would enter Jewish houses and rob their possessions. One Jewish survivor reported that his mother was raped by a German.¹

In August 1941, German officials in black cars arrived in Pogrebishche and took away 20 Jews ostensibly for a work assignment, but instead these people were shot. This incident was repeated again two weeks later. These were Aktions conducted by the Security Police, directed initially against alleged Communists and Soviet activists. Sensing the danger, some Jews prepared to hide or flee on the next occasion when the Germans returned.²

As the Jews and non-Jews mostly lived in separate parts of the town, a form of open ghetto already existed. The Germans prohibited the Jews from buying food at the market or having other contacts with non-Jews. However, some Ukrainians continued to supply Jews with eggs and other food items. All Jews over the age of 13 were required to perform forced labor. Only those who worked were entitled to receive any food.³

In September (or October) 1941, the German and Ukrainian police, probably under the direction of Einsatzkommando 5 of Einsatzgruppe C, conducted a mass shooting of the Jews in Pogrebishche, which was directed particularly against children, the elderly, and others incapable of work.

Before the Aktion there were probably more than 1,000 Jews living in the settlement. According to Anna Grinboim, after the Aktion only about 200 remained.⁴ One Soviet source gives the figure of 1,360 Jews killed and dates the Aktion at the end of October, but Jewish survivors date it earlier.⁵ After the Aktion a small ghetto was formally established for the remaining Jews, who were moved to just one or two streets. The other Jewish houses were looted and locked up. Jewish survivors do not specifically mention a fence, but they note that Jews could not leave because the Ukrainian police patrolled the ghetto's perimeter all the time.⁶

The transition from a military to a civil administration in this area occurred on October 20, 1941. Rayon Pogrebischtsche was located in Gebiet Kasatin of Generalkommissariat Shitomir. The German Gebietskommissar was Hundertschaftsführer Steudel.⁷ The head of the German Gendarmerie post in Pogrebishche was Meister der Gendarmerie Bruno Mayrhofer.

Overcrowding in the ghetto was terrible, as about five families had to share each house. The Jews were always hungry. Now under the civil administration, instead of an armband, the Jews had to wear yellow stars on their chest and back. Although they had been robbed repeatedly, Jews were still able to buy some food from the Ukrainians with the few valuable possessions that they had managed to preserve.⁸

Grinboim recalled of the ghetto: "There was no water to drink or to wash with, no food, terrible hunger. Occasionally kind Ukrainians came and brought food they had already prepared. Every morning all the young people and all the men were taken to work." Her own work consisted mainly of cleaning—streets, bathrooms, and stores. Anna's grandmother died of hunger, as did many others. No holidays were celebrated in the ghetto. There were very few children, since most of them had been killed in the pogrom. The most terrible thing, she recalled, was the knowledge that sooner or later there would be another Aktion to end it all.⁹

Michael Tokar stated that "anyone who refused to work was killed on the spot. The Ukrainian police drank all the time and would beat the Jews just for fun in their drunken stupor." Tokar was in the Pogrebishche ghetto until the beginning of February 1942. At that time a group of prisoners was transferred to Vinnitsa for labor, and he was among them.¹⁰

By early summer 1942, the German Gendarmerie had established a training school for noncommissioned officers (NCOs) in the Ukrainian police (now renamed Schutzmannschaft) in Pogrebishche, commanded by a man named Robowski. Stationed in the same barracks was also a Gendarme, Max Roth, who supervised the so-called railway protection police in the region, which was also composed of Ukrainian auxiliaries stationed along the railway.¹¹ In May or June 1942, the Jews in the ghetto learned from a translator who worked for the Germans about an impending Aktion, and a number of Jews went into hiding or fled the ghetto.¹²

In June 1942, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer Heinrich Behrens ordered the execution of the remaining Jews of

1562 ZHYTOMYR REGION

Gebiet Kasatin, who were being temporarily held in a barracks in Pogrebishche. As a result, those Jews who were rounded up were taken to a pit, where the Ukrainian auxiliaries translated the German orders to the Jews. The Jews were forced to undress, then line up for an SD squad from Berdichev, and were shot. In August 1942, after intense searches by the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmes, 200 more Jews were gathered in the barracks. Behrens telephoned the SD post in Berdichev and agreed to assist the SD in the killing Aktion by providing about 40 Ukrainian police and some German soldiers who were stationed nearby. When the SD squad arrived at the local airfield, Behrens was there to greet them and then drove the killing squad to the Talymynivka ravine, which was the execution site near the barracks.¹³ The Gendarme Max Roth also recalled the arrival of about four SD men in Pogrebishche during the summer of 1942, in connection with the murder of Jews being temporarily housed in the barracks of the Schutzmannschaft School while it was empty between training courses.¹⁴

Some of the Jews who fled were taken in by Ukrainians, but the danger of being discovered remained great. For example, Anna Grinboim decided to leave her initial protector after a policeman discovered her hiding on top of the stove. Her protector, an acquaintance of her father's, quickly improvised, saying that she was her niece. But she feared the police might soon return and arrest her.¹⁵

German Gendarmes, assisted by the Ukrainian police, continued to hunt for Jews in hiding for many months after the liquidation of the ghetto. In May 1943, Mayrhofer reported:

On May 7, 1943, at 9:00 P.M., following a confidential report, eight Jews, that is, three men, two women, and three children, were flushed out of a well-camouflaged hole in the ground in an open field not far from the post here, and all of them were shot while trying to escape. This case had to do with Jews from Pogrebishche who had lived in this hole in the ground for almost a year. The Jews had nothing else in their possession except their tattered clothing. The few items of food they possessed, which lay strewn about the camp, were given to the village poor, as was the still somewhat-usable clothing. The burial was carried out immediately, on the spot.¹⁶

SOURCES Documentation regarding the destruction of the Jews of Pogrebishche can be found in the following archives: BA-L (204a AR-Z 137/67); DAVINO; DAZO; GARF; USHMM; and VHF (# 20772, 27058, 28086, 28092, 29156).

Martin Dean
trans. Gina Caruso

NOTES

1. VHF, # 20772, testimony of Anna Grinboim; # 27058, testimony of Grigorii Sirota; # 28092, testimony of Ida Miretskaia; # 28086, testimony of Michael Tokar.
2. Ibid., # 20772; # 27058; # 28086; # 28092.

3. Ibid., # 20772; # 27058; # 28086.

4. Ibid., # 20772.

5. Vinnichbina v period Velykoi vitchyznianoï viiny 1941–1945 rr. (Khronika Podii), p. 23, as cited by A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), pp. 13, 22–23.

6. VHF, # 20772; # 27058; # 29156, testimony of Dvoira Khanis.

7. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

8. VHF, # 20772; # 27058; # 29156.

9. Ibid., # 20772.

10. Ibid., # 28086.

11. DAZO, 1182-1-35, p. 2, 1182-1-17, p. 150; BA-L, AR-Z 204 137/67, pp. 388–394, statement of Max Roth, January 21, 1966.

12. VHF, # 20772.

13. BA-L, AR-Z 204 137/67, vol. 2, Abschlussbericht, pp. 227–228.

14. Ibid., AR-Z 204 137/67, pp. 388–394, statement of Max Roth, January 21, 1966.

15. VHF, # 20772.

16. DAZO, 1182-1-6, p. 163, report of Meister d. Gend. u. Postenführer Mayrhofer to Kasatin SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer, May 13, 1943.

RADOMYSHL'

Pre-1941: Radomyshl', town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Radomyshl, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Radomyshl', raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Radomyshl' is located 48 kilometers (30 miles) northeast of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 census, there were 2,348 Jews living in the town (20.1 percent of the total population). Additionally, 129 Jews resided in the villages of the raion.

German armed forces occupied the town in mid-July 1941, approximately three weeks after the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. During this period, a few hundred Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and eligible men were drafted into or enrolled voluntarily for the Red Army. Slightly less than 75 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military administration ran the town, appointing a mayor to administer its affairs. The Germans also created a Rayon administration and recruited a Ukrainian police force from among the local residents. The Ukrainian police played an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions in Radomyshl'.

At the end of October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Radomyshl' became the administrative center of Gebiet Radomyshl, and Gauhauptstellenleiter Drechsler was named as Gebietskommissar. The Gebiet also encompassed the Rayons of Potievka and Malin.¹

A few weeks after the occupation of the town, in August 1941, the German military administration in Radomyshl' established an open ghetto for the Jews. All the Jews were moved onto Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht Streets (as they were known under the Soviet regime).² Jews were prohibited from going beyond the ghetto's borders. They were not allowed to buy products from the Ukrainians, and the Ukrainians in turn could not have any relations with the Jews. The Jews were ordered to wear armbands on their left arms, marked by yellow six-pointed stars. Jewish men were called on to perform heavy labor and were subjected to systematic robberies and assaults by the Ukrainian police.

In the first half of August 1941, two Aktionen were carried out in the town. On August 5, 1941, a request was issued for Sonderkommando 4a (Sk 4a) to come to Radomyshl' and enforce security there. Sk 4a, which was a mobile squad of the Security Police subordinated to Einsatzgruppe C, arrived in the town shortly thereafter, and its members then arrested and shot the local mayor and his deputies as "Bolsheviks." They also shot one resident who had participated in the Soviet expulsion of Ukrainians and ethnic Germans (Völk-deutsche). A number of Jews were also arrested and shot, apparently for violating the regulations issued by the occupying authorities. In total, Sk 4a murdered 113 persons during this Aktion.³ One day later the same detachment carried out a second Aktion. In total during the two operations, Sk 4a shot "276 Jewish communist functionaries, saboteurs, Komsomol members, and communist agitators."⁴

At the end of August 1941, a part of Sk 4a was based temporarily in Radomyshl'. Among the reasons for choosing Radomyshl' as a base were the available food supplies and functioning infrastructure in the town, including a large dairy, a slaughterhouse, and a brewery.⁵ Conditions significantly worsened in the ghetto at the end of August 1941. Jews were resettled into the ghetto from the surrounding villages, and the Jewish houses became terribly overcrowded. On average, 15 people had to live in a single room. Sanitary conditions therefore became extremely poor. Jewish corpses were carried out of the houses on a daily basis. It became impossible to provide sufficient rations for the Jews, especially for the Jewish children. The danger of an epidemic was constantly present.⁶

On September 6, 1941, Sk 4a, under the command of SS-Standartenführer Paul Blobel, liquidated the ghetto in Radomyshl'. The Security Police forces gathered the Jews together and loaded them onto trucks with the assistance of the Ukrainian police. The Jews were then driven to a clearing in the forest several kilometers outside the town. The staff of Sk 4a shot the 1,107 adult Jews, and the Ukrainian police shot the 561 children, bringing the total number of those murdered during this Aktion to 1,668.⁷

SOURCES Relevant publications include the following: Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 31 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 694a; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1048; and Wendy Lower, Nazi Empire-Building and the Holocaust in Ukraine (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2005).

Documents and witness testimonies regarding the persecution and extermination of the Jews of Radomyshl' can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/216 to 217); BA-L (e.g., ZStL, AR-Z 269/60, investigation of Kuno Callsen); DAZO; and GARF (7021-60-309).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. GARF, 7021-60-309, p. 21 (testimony of S.K. Boguslavs'kii, May 26, 1945).
3. BA-BL, R 58/216, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 58, August 20, 1941.
4. Ibid., EM no. 59, August 21, 1941.
5. JuNS-V, vol. 31, p. 143; see also Lower, Nazi Empire-Building, p. 45.
6. BA-BL, R 58/217, EM no. 88, September 19, 1941; according to Lower, Nazi Empire-Building, p. 87, the Jews brought in from the surrounding areas by the SD were crammed into an old school, where they began to die of hunger and disease.
7. BA-BL, R 58/217, EM no. 88, September 19, 1941. For further details on the circumstances of the mass shooting, see LG-Darm, Ks 1/67 (Gsta), verdict against Kuno Callsen and others, November 29, 1968, in JuNS-V, vol. 31, Lfd. Nr. 694a.

RECHITSA

Pre-1941: Rechitsa, town and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Retschiza, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Rechitsa, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Rechitsa is located 60 kilometers (37 miles) west-southwest of Gomel'. In 1939, the Jewish population of Rechitsa was 7,237 (27.3 percent of the total).

In July and August 1941, at least 4,000 Jews were evacuated from Rechitsa by rail and road, and in barges on the Dniepr River, before the Germans arrived.¹

German military forces occupied the city on August 23, 1941. Initially Rechitsa was administered by a local military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). In October 1941, the town became the center of Gebiet Retschiza in Generalkommissariat Shitomir. Among the German units based in Rechitsa were detachments of the Sicherheitspolizei (initially Sonderkommando 7b), Geheime Feldpolizei, Feldgendarmarie, and Schutzpolizei. A detachment of Waffen-SS was also based there for a time.² The Germans established a local police station on Vokzal'naia Street, appointing Korzhevskii chief of police. A man named Chalovskii became assistant mayor.³

For the first two months of the occupation, the Jews were allowed to live in their own houses. The former melamed (religious teacher) Malenkovich was ordered to compile a list of the remaining Jews in Rechitsa.⁴ Soon the Germans began taking people away for “work,” and they were never seen again. In September 1941, Sonderkommando 7b reported shooting 216 Jewish men in Rechitsa.⁵ Several individual killings of Jews also occurred during these first weeks.⁶

In November 1941, a new commandant arrived in Rechitsa and declared that he would not take over the town while “kikes and Communists remain alive.”⁷ Shortly after November 20, 1941, the Jews, obeying an order posted throughout the town, gathered at the cultural center, and from there they were sent to two two-story buildings on the grounds of a former prison in the factory area, on the corner of Frunze and Sovetskaia Streets. The Germans set up a prison-style ghetto there. The ghetto territory was surrounded with barbed wire about 2 meters (6.5 feet) high. There was a gate for entering and leaving the area. The prisoners were kept in unusually crowded quarters, with 40 people in each room; this meant that they were forced to stand. In the daytime, when the able-bodied were taken off to work, there was a bit more space available. The ghetto was closely guarded by police.⁸ Also placed in this ghetto were undesirable prisoners of war (POWs), Communists, and Soviet activists, including some non-Jews.⁹ Around 300 prisoners from the “ghetto” were taken away on trucks and shot on November 25.

Some details of this Aktion are known. The policemen told the Jews that they were being taken to pick cabbages and carrots at the kolkhoz. The trucks stopped at the edge of town in the area of the wine distillery, near an antitank ditch dug during the first weeks of the war. Three German officers were in charge of the operation. The Jews realized that they would be shot, and a few tried to run away but were killed by rifle fire. The guards stole whatever they could from the Jews, including earrings, rings, and bracelets. Boris Smilovitskii, before he died, shouted, “Bandits, fascists, you spill our blood now, but remember, the Red Army will win and avenge us!” According to eyewitnesses, the perpetrators were in “a drunken state.”¹⁰

Those Jews who did not appear in response to the order were rounded up by the Germans and the police and placed in the ghetto by December 12. At the same time, Jews from the surrounding villages were brought to Rechitsa. According to Iakov Gutarov, his grandparents were brought to Rechitsa along with other Jews from a nearby settlement and later shot there.¹¹

The details of subsequent mass shootings are unclear, but it appears that the Germans took out groups of Jews from the ghetto prison to be shot on several other occasions in December 1941.

According to the testimony of Il’ia Kolotsei, the occupying authorities ordered the Jews to sew white and yellow patches on their clothing and sent them out to work. Kolotsei saw how 10 Jews were mocked as they were used in place of draft animals to haul a wagon with a barrel of water out of the ghetto. A German soldier sat on the barrel and drove them forward with a stick. Around the same time, under police guard, Jews spent two weeks digging a large pit on the grounds of the ghetto, near the toilet.¹²

The last group of prisoners was not taken to the ditch on the edge of town but was lined up next to the pit dug in the ghetto area. The majority were women, children, and old people. Many of the mothers had infants in their arms. Then two Germans described as Gendarmes, with a metal chain on their chests (probably members of the Feldgendarmarie subordinated to the Wehrmacht), took the first person out of the line. One of the Feldgendarmes bludgeoned the man on the head, and the local policemen standing next to him threw the body into the ditch. This scene was repeated until all the Jews were killed. Then the policemen covered the corpses with dirt and dispersed.¹³

Accused of organizing and carrying out the murders of the Jews of Rechitsa and Rechitsa raion were Oberleutnant Fischer, the head of the Rechitsa Gendarmerie; Gebietskommissar Blüming; a colonel named Orlitschek; and others.¹⁴ According to one estimate, some 1,300 to 1,400 Jews died in Rechitsa at the hands of the Nazis during the occupation (around 18 percent of the pre-war population).¹⁵

During the years of Rechitsa’s occupation, only a few Jews escaped with their lives. On the eve of the Aktion on November 25, Larisa Borodich (born 1930) was brought to the assembly place with her mother Khaia and other members of her family.¹⁶ At night Khaia helped Larisa climb over the barbed wire and told her to go to Lidia Nazarova’s home. For a few months, she was hidden by the Bogdanov, Gorshkov, Ferentsov, Kozorev, and Stankevich families. On May 1, 1943, she joined the Soviet partisans.¹⁷

Ol’ga Anishchenko, a teacher at the Rechitsa Teacher Training Institute, managed to save Masha Raikhlina, a kindergarten teacher who had been one of her students. When neighbors found out that Ol’ga was sheltering a Jewish woman, she found Masha a new place to hide, then sent her to the Frunze partisan detachment of the Voroshilov partisan brigade. In 1997, Anishchenko was awarded the title “Righteous Among the Nations” by Yad Vashem.¹⁸ Girsh Slavin was protected by the entire village of Zhmurovka, in the Rechitsa raion. During the pogrom in the Rechitsa synagogue, a man named Atamanchuk managed to rescue the Torah scroll, and after the war he helped the victims’ relatives find and rebury the remains of their loved ones.¹⁹

SOURCES Information on the fate of the Jewish community of Rechitsa during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Albert Kaganovich, Rechitsa: Istoriia evreiskogo mestechka Iugo-Vostochnoi Belorussii (Jerusalem, 2007); Boris Umetskii, Rechitsa. Kratkii istoriko-ekonomicheskii ocherk (Minsk, 1963); Pamiat’. Rechitsa. Istoriiko-dokumental’naia khronika gorodov i raionov Belorussii, vol. 1 (Minsk, 1998); Leonid Smilovitskii, “Rechitsa,” in Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii 1941–1944 gg. (Tel Aviv: Biblioteka Matveia Chernogo, 2000), pp. 259–277; Leonid Smilovitsky, “My Rechitsa” [in Hebrew], Yalkut Moresbet, no. 60 (1995): 125–132; A. Kaganovich, “Evrei Rechitsy v gody nemetskoi okkupatsii, 1941–1943 gg.,” in Uroki Kholokosta: Istoriia i sovremennost’ (Minsk, 2008), pp. 6–11; Prestupleniia nemetsko-fashistskikh okkupantov v Belorussii, 1941–1944: Dokumenty i materialy (Minsk: Belarus’, 1963), pp. 268–272, 295; and Raisa Chernoglazova, ed., Tragediia evreev Belorussii v 1941–1944 gg. Sbornik materialov i dokumentov (Minsk: Izd. E.S. Gal’perin, 1997).

Documentation regarding the ghetto in Rechitsa and the extermination of the Jews there can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBGO (Case file 234, vol. 4); GAG-OMO (1345-1-1); GARF (7021-85-217; 7021-85-413); NARB (861-1-6); RTKIDNI, formerly RGASPI (69-1-818); and YVA (M-33/476; M-33/481). Some additional material is located in the personal archive of author Leonid Smilovitsky (PALS).

Leonid Smilovitsky and Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel and Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii, 1941–1944 gg., p. 264.
2. GARF, 7021-85-217, p. 14.
3. PALS, letter of Mikhail Balte and Sara Ber from Rechitsa, January 12, 2000.
4. One source indicates that more than 400 Jewish families were registered, AUKGBRBGO, 1-234, vol. 4, pp. 4–7, 14–17.
5. BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 90, September 21, 1941.
6. YVA, M-33/476, p. 19.
7. PALS, letter from the Rechitsa Local Museum, March 29, 2002.
8. A. Dvornik, “Poslednii svidetel,” Aviv, no. 7 (1998): 2; letter from Avraam Dovzhik dated September 28, 2001; testimony of Tamara Kuz’mich on August 7, 2005—all as cited by Kaganovich, Rechitsa: Istoriia evreiskogo mestechka Iugo-Vostochnoi Belorussii, p. 300.
9. YVA, JM/20006, pp. 1–2, 74–75 verso.
10. Prestupleniia nemetsko-fashistskikh okkupantov v Belorussii, pp. 270–271. Testimony of Dar’ia Ignat’evna Seleverstova, February 8, 1968, AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 4, pp. 11–13, gives further details of this Aktion and estimates 500 people were killed.
11. YVA, page of testimony of Iakov Gutarov, June 15, 2001. Gutarov himself managed to run away and hide.
12. Testimony of Il’ia Vasil’evich Kolotsei, February 8, 1968, AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 4, p. 8.
13. Ibid., p. 9.
14. AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 6, pp. 11–13.
15. Ibid., file 234, vol. 4, p. 4.
16. Chernoglazova, Tragediia evreev Belorussii v 1941–1944 gg., p. 116.
17. PALS, letter from the Rechitsa Local Museum, March 29, 2002.
18. See Pravedniki narodov mira Belarusi (Minsk, 2004), p. 74.
19. PALS, letter of Maria Rubinchik, May 25, 2002.

ROGACHOV

Pre-1941: Rogachov, village, Baranovka raion, Zhitomir oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rogatschow, Rayon Baranowka, Gebiet Zwiabel (Nowograd-Wolynskij), Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Robachiv, Baranivka raion, Zhytomyr oblast’, Ukraine

Rogachov is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) west-northwest of Zhitomir. In June 1941, there were about 300 Jews living in the village.

German forces occupied Rogachov on July 6, 1941, two weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. During those weeks, a number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Men of military age were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. About 70 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Rogachov at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) administered the village. The German military administration appointed a village elder (starosta) and recruited an auxiliary Ukrainian police force made up of local residents. The local police played an active role in the anti-Jewish measures.

At the end of October 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Rogachov was incorporated into Gebiet Nowograd-Wolynskij, where Regierungsassessor Dr. Schmidt became the Gebietskommissar.¹

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the Ortskommandantur ordered the village elder and Ukrainian policemen to organize the registration and marking of the Jews. They were forced to wear armbands bearing a six-pointed star and to perform heavy labor solely on account of their race. At the end of July 1941, on the instructions of the German military administration, an open ghetto (Jewish residential district) was formed in the center of the village. The German regulations prohibited Jews from leaving the ghetto without permission or from buying products from the Ukrainians. As a result, food was in very short supply for the ghetto inhabitants. Jews caught violating the rules and going beyond the borders of the ghetto without permission were shot by the Ukrainian police. The German authorities and local police also forced the Jews to hand over all their valuables and good articles of clothing.²

In August 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in the village. A number of Jews were escorted into the forest and shot. On October 1, 1941, the day of Yom Kippur, the ghetto was liquidated. On that day, the German security forces and their collaborators assembled the Jews in the local assembly hall (klub). They separated the families of the craftsmen (reading out 20 or 25 names) from the rest, then placed all those remaining into trucks, drove them into the forest 4 or 5 kilometers (about 2.5 to 3 miles) to the east of the village, and shot them. The small children stayed behind in the assembly hall. Two days later, the Ukrainian policemen also transported the children on carts into the forest and shot them there. In November 1941, after having been confined within three houses in the interim period, the craftsmen and their families were relocated to the “ghetto” in Novograd-Volynskii.³

SOURCES A relevant survivor testimony has been published in Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 41–44.

Documents dealing with the persecution and extermination of the Jews in Rogachov can be found in the following archives: DAZO; and GARF (7021-60-283).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES:

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Testimony of Grigorii Vainerman, in Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymy ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev, 1999), p. 79; an English translation is available in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 41–44.

3. Zabarko, Zhivymy ostalis' tol'ko my, pp. 79–80.

RUZHIN

Pre-1941: Ruzhin, town and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rushin, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Ruzhyn, raion center, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Ruzhin is located 72 kilometers (45 miles) southeast of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 census, 1,108 Jews lived in Ruzhin, about one quarter of the total population. There were also 633 Jews residing in the nearby village of Belilovka and 2,056 Jews in all living in the Ruzhin raion (4.22 percent of the total). Only a small number of Jews were able to evacuate from the area with the retreating Red Army.

German forces occupied Ruzhin on July 17, 1941, and almost immediately began robbing and humiliating the town's Jews; they even captured one incident on film.¹ Shootings began as early as September 10, when 750 Jews in Ruzhin were shot.

The official transition from a military to a civil administration in the Shitomir region occurred on October 20, 1941. Ruzhin, as a Gebiet center in Generalkommissariat Shitomir, was responsible also for the Rayons of Popilnia and Wtscheraj-sche. The German Gebietskommissar in Ruzhin was Regierungsassessor Ganglhoff. The commander of the Gendarmerie post in Ruzhin and also SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer there was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Gustav Dutkowski.² Among the senior local policemen in Ruzhin were Josef Rudenko, Artur Reglin, and Dmitri Wosnjak, who were responsible for a squad of about 40 Ukrainian policemen in the Ruzhin Rayon and about 100 in the entire Gebiet.³

After the September Aktion, the remaining Jews were placed on one bank of the river in a ghetto consisting of a dozen houses enclosed by a wire fence. The Germans also brought into the ghetto Jews found in the surrounding villages, including from Veselovka and Belilovka, where similar Aktionen had been conducted. In forming the ghetto, the local Ukrainian elder in Ruzhin, Kachanovski, ordered the Jews to vacate some 200 homes and rebuild them for the use of the Germans and the local Ukrainian police, who guarded the ghetto. The Germans appointed a Jewish elder by the name of Yankel. He organized several craft guilds, including guilds for cobblers and tailors.⁴

The craftsmen worked mainly to fulfill the orders of the police. In exchange for food, they also performed work for members of the local population who came to the ghetto fence with their requests. The craftsmen shared their food with the other Jews in the ghetto, as the captives received no rations. Young Jews were sent to work on construction sites and perform other forced labor tasks, and the local police sometimes gave them the leftovers from their own meals. Once a week Jews were brought before the local German commandant for a roll call. In December 1941 and January 1942, onerous financial “contributions” were levied on the Jews.

On April 30, 1942, the local police rounded up 90 Jewish men from the ghetto, saying that they would be escorting horses to the front lines. One managed to run away, but the rest were never heard from again. At the same time, local policemen entered the ghetto and took away everything that had been produced by the craftsmen, including their unfinished products. This caused great anxiety among the ghetto inhabitants, and some of them started to prepare hiding places. However, very few could finish these bunkers, as on the next day, May 1, 1942, the Germans, together with local Ukrainian police under the command of police chief Josef Rudenko, entered the ghetto and selected 250 to 300 people. This group of Jews was escorted in a single column (the children were put onto several horse-drawn carts) to the grain storage facility and locked inside. Afterwards, in groups of 25 or 30, they were taken to a specially prepared ditch at the site of the Novyi Mir kolkhoz, made to lie on the ground or on top of the corpses of previous victims, and shot in the back of the head by the German Security Police, assisted by the Gendarmerie and local police.⁵ Several Germans photographed the mass shooting. In his report dated June 3, 1942, the Generalkommissar, Kurt Klemm, reported that for the most part the “Jewish question” had been settled in Generalkommissariat Shitomir, as 606 Jews had been “resettled” in Ruzhin.⁶ On June 14, 1942, in accordance with orders from the captain of the Gendarmerie in Vinnitsa, the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Ruzhin reported that no more Jews were being employed at the Gendarmerie posts in his district.⁷

On the orders of the Germans, a number of Jewish workers and their families had been excluded from the Aktion. Some of these people were transferred to other forced labor camps in the region, such as to the camp at Nadonesi.⁸ About 200 Jews were retained to work in and around Ruzhin, sorting the possessions of those who had been shot and also as specialist craftsmen.⁹ On the orders of the Germans, the Jewish craftsmen taught the basics of their craft to a group of local Ukrainians. According to the postwar evidence of police chief Rudenko, in the summer of 1942 the police conducted another raid on the interned Jews and set aside about 100 specialist workers. The local police then escorted the other approximately 100 Jews to a killing site, where German police forces shot them. The remaining specialists were interned within a separate residential area (probably in the nearby village of Balamutovka) and had to report daily to the Gendarmerie.¹⁰

A number of Jews had successfully managed to hide at the time of the roundups and had escaped into the surrounding countryside. Some of them subsequently returned to the camp in Balamutovka. In September and October 1942, the local police in Ruzhin were ordered to capture and kill all the Jews remaining in the area and reported that they had shot several.¹¹ At the end of September, more than 60 Jews were collected at the office of the Gendarmerie in Balamutovka, later to be shot at the grave site in Ruzhin. Realizing that they were about to be killed, the Jews started to flee across the orchards towards the forest in the direction of Ruzhin. A number of these prisoners were shot while fleeing, and 20 more were recaptured and shot subsequently. The SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer in Ruzhin reported that the SD from Berdichev shot 44 Jews in Ruzhin on October 1, 1942.¹² Around 10 Jews managed to escape and hide in the woods.

The last Jews in Ruzhin were probably shot in 1943. On March 1, 1943, the SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer in Ruzhin wrote to the Gendarmerie post in Ruzhin, requesting that the remaining Jews be registered by name, together with their occupations, and asking at the same time whether the “ditch” was ready.¹³

The Red Army liberated Ruzhin on December 28, 1943.

SOURCES Among the available published sources are: M. Belilovskii, Povedai synu svoemu: Da budut korni nashi zbivay (Moscow: M. Belilovskii, 1998); Iu.M. Liakhovitskii, Evreiskii genotsid na Ukraine v period okkupatsii v nemetskoi dokumentalistike 1941–1944 (Kharkov and Jerusalem, 1995), p. 138; Nemetsko-fashistskii okkupatsionnyi rezhim na Ukraine: Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Kiev, 1963), p. 389; and Martin Dean, “The German Gendarmerie, the Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft and the ‘Second Wave’ of Jewish Killings in Occupied Ukraine: German Policing at the Local Level in the Zhitomir Region, 1941–44,” German History 14:2 (1996): 168–192.

Relevant documents, including survivor testimonies on the fate of the Jews of Ruzhin during the Holocaust, can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 6/310); BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67); DAZO (1182-1-36, 1452-1-2); GARF (7021-60-310); TsGAMORF (236-2675-134); VHF (# 20509, 25047, and 40731); and YVA (E-1149; M-33/126; M-37/316; M-52/438; M-52/444; O-3/7260).

Albert Kaganovich and Martin Dean
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. TsGAMORF, 236-2675-134, p. 48, Military report on crimes committed by the Nazi German occupying forces in Ruzhin.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942. See also DAZO, 1151-1-9, pp. 37–39, KdG Shitomir KdO Befehl 30/42, September 3, 1942; see also 1182-1-15, which contains a list of local policemen (Schutzmannen) in Ruzhin dated September 27, 1942. Copies of material from DAZO can also be found at the USHMM (RG-31, Acc. 1996.A.0269).

3. DAZO, 1182-1-36, p. 170, recommendation for an award for bravery regarding Josef Rudenko (born October 7, 1914); 1151-1-703, pp. 8–9, 13–14, KdG Shitomir, Vinnitsa Captaincy, Orders 14/42 and 18/42, July 11 and 25, 1942. See also BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67 (Ruzhin and Vcheraishe), vol. 1, pp. 141–142, statement of I.D. Rudenko on July 12, 1946.

4. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67, vol. 1, pp. 17–18, statement of Fania Feiga (Zipora) Esterowicz (née Duchowna), July 1, 1957. Esterowicz describes the ghetto as a “barrack camp surrounded by barbed wire.” Also see TsGAMORF, 236-2675-134, p. 48; Belilovskii, Povedai synu svoemu, pp. 197–199.

5. TsGAMORF, 236-2675-134, p. 48; and BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67, vol. 1, pp. 141–142, statement of I.D. Rudenko on July 12, 1946.

6. BA-BL, R 6/310, p. 17, report of Generalkommissar Shitomir for the month of May, dated June 3, 1942. This figure probably includes those murdered in Vcheraishe on May 1, 1942 (200–300), as well.

7. DAZO, 1182-1-36, p. 30, Gend. District in Ruzhin to Gendarmerie Captaincy in Vinnitsa, June 14, 1942.

8. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67, vol. 1, pp. 17–18, statement of Fania Feiga (Zipora) Esterowicz (née Duchowna), July 1, 1957.

9. TsGAMORF, 236-2675-134, p. 48.

10. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67, vol. 1, pp. 141–142, statement of I.D. Rudenko on July 12, 1946, and pp. 143–144.

11. DAZO, 1182-1-36, pp. 214, 275–278, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer in Ruzhin, monthly reports for September and October 1942.

12. DAZO, 1182-1-36, pp. 275–278, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer, monthly report for October, November 5, 1942; BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67, vol. 1, pp. 141–142, statement of I.D. Rudenko on July 12, 1946. Rudenko also describes the incident in the fall of 1942 when about 40 Jews were shot following an attempted escape.

13. DAZO, 1452-1-2, p. 144, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer in Ruzhin to Gendarmerie post in Ruzhin, March 1, 1943.

SAMGORODOK

Pre-1941: Samgorodok, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rayon center, Gebiet Kasatin, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Samborodok, Koziatyn raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Samgorodok is located 41 kilometers (26 miles) northeast of Vinnitsa. In 1926, the Jewish population in the town was 1,243.

VOLUME II: PART B

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Samgorodok on July 20, 1941. Soon after their arrival, the German authorities registered the Jews. According to the records of Feldkommandantur 675, based in Vinnitsa, in August 1941 there were 3,000 people residing in Samgorodok, of whom 700 were Jews.¹

Initially the military authorities ordered Jews to wear a white armband with a Star of David. Subsequently they had to wear a Star of David patch on their clothing. A large contribution was collected from the Jewish population, and over time virtually all Jewish property was confiscated. The Jews were also forced to perform physical labor. On one occasion they were forced to clean the area around the church and then run around it. Those who failed to carry out such orders were severely beaten. It was also forbidden for the Jews to buy or barter food items, and even their access to water from the well was restricted.²

According to the Jewish survivor Semen Beger, who was only 11 in 1941, shortly after their arrival the Germans rounded up all the Jews and forced them to live concentrated together in the center of the town, forming an open ghetto. On Sundays there was a market in Samgorodok that the Jews were able to visit, which was also attended by peasants from the surrounding villages. On one occasion the Jews who had attended the market were brutally beaten by the Ukrainians.³

The transition from a military to a civil administration in the Vinnitsa region occurred on October 20, 1941. Rayon Samgorodok was located in Gebiet Kasatin of Generalkommissariat Shitomir. The German Gebietskommissar in Kazatin was Hundertschaftsführer Steudel. The chief of the local police in Samgorodok was Anton Nikolaevich Vashchenko, who was tried by the Soviet authorities after the war. The commander of the Gendarmerie post in Samgorodok from February 1, 1942, was Oberwachtmeister Josef Richter. He was killed by Soviet partisans on August 20, 1943.⁴

On May 16, 1942, the German authorities, assisted by local Rayonchef Shvabskii, forcibly resettled the Jewish population into a separate part of town on the other side of the river. The Jews did not take much of their personal property with them as they suspected that an Aktion would soon be conducted against them, and in any case, there was little room in this second ghetto. The overcrowding was such that between three and five families occupied each house.⁵

Then on June 4, 1942, German police forces, men of the Hungarian army, and the local Ukrainian police surrounded the ghetto at 3:00 A.M. Under the command of police chief Vashchenko, the local policemen collected the Jews from their houses and drove them into the middle-school building. Those who tried to escape, refused to go, or were too infirm to walk were shot on the spot. On that morning 24 local peasants were ordered by the police to dig a grave 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town on the road to Germanovka. The grave was approximately 10 meters long by 8 meters wide and 3 meters deep (33 by 26 by 10 feet).

At about 10:00 A.M., the German forces, Hungarians, and local police escorted the column of Jews to the grave site. Two carts carried the elderly and unfit. At the grave the Jews were forced to remove their clothes and were led down into the ditch, where two or more SD men who had arrived from the Security Police outpost in Vinnitsa shot them.⁶ Gebietskommissar Steudel, who oversaw the Aktion, ordered the peasants to move away and lie facedown on the ground until the shooting was completed. Then they returned to help the local policemen fill in the grave.⁷

During the Aktion, 492 Jews were shot (including about 240 children), together with 15 Soviet prisoners of war (POWs).⁸ The local police chief in Samgorodok, Vashchenko, later “confessed” that he “selected the specialist workers, who were to be employed on various tasks by the Germans, and under my direction the Samgorodok police kept the Jews under strict guard during the shooting.”⁹ About 10 or 15 Jews were selected and sent to Kazatin as specialist workers; they were subsequently shot there by the SD in September.¹⁰

Some Jews, such as Moshe Berger, managed to survive the roundup by hiding in cellars and other places of concealment.¹¹ They later sought refuge in the surrounding countryside. However, in early July the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer in Kazatin, Behrens, sent a memorandum to the Gendarmerie post commander in Samgorodok, Richter, writing that he was aware of Jews hiding in the villages and forests and instructing that all villages must report the presence of Jews. He warned that if Gendarmes or Ukrainian policemen found Jews, “the entire village was to be punished.”¹² Over the following months, most of the Jews in hiding were captured by local police patrols. For example, on March 1, 1943, a patrol from the Gendarmerie post in Samgorodok found two female Jews, Busa and Sulka Chernus, hiding in a hayrick, and they were then “shot trying to escape” (a euphemism used by the Germans to report their summary execution). On March 19, three more Jews were captured by the Gendarmerie in Samgorodok, and the SD was informed.¹³ A Ukrainian Schutzmann, Wasyl Palamarchuk, based in Samgorodok, was recommended for a decoration in the summer of 1943, as he had “especially distinguished himself during the resettlement of the Jews in June 1942 and in the subsequent apprehension of individual Jews who variously concealed themselves.”¹⁴

The Red Army liberated Samgorodok on January 1, 1944. Among the Jewish survivors from Samgorodok were Elisabeth Lifshitz and Mark Bresman.

SOURCES Several references to events in Samgorodok can be found in the author’s article, “The German Gendarmerie, the Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft and the ‘Second Wave’ of Jewish Killings in Occupied Ukraine: German Policing at the Local Level in the Zhitomir Region, 1941–44,” German History 14:2 (1996): 168–192.

Information on the murder of the Jews of Samgorodok can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL/II 204a AR-Z 188/67); DAVINO (R5022-1-176); DAZO (e.g., 1182-1-6); GARF (7021-54-1261); RGVA (1275-3-662, 1323-2-228); USHMM; VHF (# 23382); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-662, report of Feldkommandantur 675 in Vinnitsa, August 25, 1941.
2. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 188/67, vol. 1, pp. 252–255, statement of Elisabeth Akimovna Lifshitz, September 23, 1944; and vol. 1, pp. 221–224, Soviet Extraordinary State Commission report for Samgorodok, October 26, 1944.
3. VHF, # 23382, testimony of Semen Beger.
4. DAZO contains detailed records of the Gendarmerie and local police in Gebiet Kasatin in fond 1182-1; for those serving at the Samgorodok post, see especially files 1182-1-18, 22, and 32. Copies of material from DAZO can also be found at the USHMM (RG-31, Acc.1996.A.0269).
5. VHF, # 23382.
6. BA-L, ZStL, 204a AR-Z 137/67, vol. 2, pp. 214–250, closing report on the Kazatin investigation.
7. Ibid., ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 188/67, vol. 1, pp. 232–237, 242–245, statements of Feodosy Fyodorovich Repetazkiy on August 27, 1953, Grigorij Stepanovich Rapatzkiy on November 8, 1944, and Abraham Likandrovich Palamarchuk on February 27, 1970.
8. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 252–255, statement of E.A. Lifshitz, September 23, 1944. A list of the heads of 102 Jewish families in Samgorodok and the size of each family can be found in vol. 1, pp. 225–228.
9. Ibid., vol. 1, pp. 229–231, statement, of A.N. Vashchenko, June 2, 1953.
10. DAZO, 1182-1-6, p. 169, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer Kasatin, Behrens to Gebietskommissar, September 30, 1942.
11. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 188/67, vol. 1, pp. 238–241, statement of Moshe Naumovich Berger, February 27, 1970.
12. DAZO, 1182-1c-2, SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer Kasatin, Behrens to Gend.-Posten in Samgorodok and Pogrebishche, July 6, 1942.
13. Ibid., 1182-1-6, pp. 157, 164–165.
14. Ibid., 1182-1-6, p. 163, report of Gendarmerie in Samgorodok, May 31, 1943.

SOBOLEVKA

Pre-1941: Sobolevka, village, Teplik raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Sobolevka, Rayon Teplik, Gebiet Gaissin, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Sobolivka, Teplik raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Sobolevka is located 103 kilometers (64 miles) southeast of Vinnitsa. In 1926, 1,168 Jews lived in the village, while 23 more Jews lived in the three surrounding villages of Brodok, Orlovka, and Velikaia Mochulka.¹ According to the available sources, only 434 Jews were still residing in Sobolevka in 1939 (7 percent of the total population).

The village of Sobolevka was occupied by German troops on July 28, 1941, five weeks after the start of their invasion of the Soviet Union. By this time a number of Jews had managed to escape to the east. When German troops arrived in Sobolevka, about 400 Jews were still residing in the village. The German occupiers named an administrative head (starosta) for the village and created a local police force. Between October 1941 and the liberation in 1944, the village was in Gebiet Gaissin, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. The Gebietskommissar was Kreisleiter Becher, and Leutnant Pösselt commanded the Gendarmerie forces in Gebiet Gaissin.²

At the beginning of September 1941, a ghetto was established in Sobolevka. However, it was not strictly guarded. The head of the Jewish Council (Judenrat) in the ghetto was Ioyna Zhornitzkii. In April 1942, about 100 young Jews were selected and sent to a labor camp. The German forces, assisted by their collaborators, shot the rest of the ghetto inmates, about 300 people, on May 27, 1942. The shooting Aktion took place in a forest about 1.5 kilometers (0.9 mile) from the village. Jews had dug the pits over the course of two months, thereby digging their own graves. Among those murdered were Rabbi Srul' Chechelnitzkii and his family.³

Due to the help of some of the local Ukrainian inhabitants, a number of Jews survived the Aktion. Among those who helped to hide Jews were the Moiko family, Anatoly Magera (who saved four individuals), and the Liakhovski family (which saved three people).⁴

SOURCES Information about the killing of the Jews of Sobolevka can be found in an article by L. Trachtenberg, "Sobolevka. Istoriia proshlogo bez budushchego (XVII–XX veka)," in Istoki: vestnik Narodnogo universiteta evreiskoi kul'tury v vostochnoi Ukraine, Khar'kov (Kharkov, 1999), no. 4, pp. 124–135.

The files of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) investigations into the crimes committed by the German forces and their collaborators can be found in DAVINO (R6022-1-43) and in GARF (7021-54-1237).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Trachtenberg, "Sobolevka," pp. 124–126.
2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
3. Trachtenberg, "Sobolevka," pp. 132–133. According to the ChGK report (GARF, 7021-54-1237, p. 50), 382 Jews (90 men, 150 women, and 142 children) were shot on May 27, 1942. In reality, this figure probably represents all the Jews who were killed or died during the German occupation.
4. Trachtenberg, "Sobolevka," p. 134.

STRIZHAVKA

Pre-1941: Strizhavka, village, Vinnitsa raion and oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Strishawka, Rayon Winniza-Land, Gebiet Winniza, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Stryzhavka, Vinnytsia raion and oblast', Ukraine

Strizhavka lies 10 kilometers (6 miles) north of Vinnitsa and was the location of a People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD) prison. Before the war, more than 300 Jews lived in the village.

1570 ZHYTOMYR REGION

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Strizhavka on July 19, 1941, four weeks after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22. In the interim, a small number of Jews had managed to evacuate eastward, and men were drafted or volunteered for service in the Red Army. About 230 Jews remained at the start of the occupation.

In July through October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of the village. It appointed a village elder, Vladimir Chaikun, and set up a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. In late October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Strizhavka became part of Gebiet Winniza (Gebietskommissar: Gemeinschaftsführer Halle), which belonged in turn to the Generalkommissariat Shitomir.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the same anti-Jewish measures employed in other German-occupied villages of Ukraine were introduced in Strizhavka: Jews were required to wear distinguishing marks in the form of the Star of David (later, a yellow circle); they were used for forced labor; they were prohibited from leaving the village; and they were systematically robbed and beaten by the Ukrainian police.

In the latter half of December 1941, 9 kilometers (5.6 miles) north of Vinnitsa, construction of Hitler's field headquarters, his Werwolf bunker, began. Security in the construction area was in the hands of the Reichssicherheitsdienst (RSD), Gruppe der Geheimen Feldpolizei, Sicherungsgruppe Ost, headed by SS-Sturmbannführer Friedrich Schmidt (deputy: SS-Untersturmführer Karl Danner). They began their activities by checking the nearby villages for the presence of Jews and Communists, who allegedly could present a threat to the building project.

In particular, while questioning the village elder of Strizhavka, they learned that the Jews of the village (221 people) had been resettled into a ghetto and were working on a kolchoz, though their work performance was inadequate. Schmidt and Danner stated that "as all the Jews are supporters of the Communist regime and represent a threat to the security of the German Army," they must be removed immediately from the construction area.¹ The "removal" of the Jews was carried out on January 10, 1942. Members of Organisation Todt (OT) and military servicemen created a mass grave by means of an explosion and filled it in after the Aktion. The participants in the Aktion were four officials of the Security Police from Vinnitsa (subordinated to the Sipo/SD chief there, Theodor Salzmanzig), who did the actual shooting of the Jews, 20 officials of the Feldgendarmarie and Schutzpolizei, and all the members of Schmidt's group, who drove the Jews from their houses, brought them to the grave, and formed a protective cordon around the execution site.² On January 11, 1942, Ukrainian policemen arrested 12 more Jews in Strizhavka and moved them to the prisoner-of-war (POW) camp at Vinnitsa, where they were shot on January 12. Finally, on January 13, the village elder of Strizhavka handed over to Schmidt's group 3 more Jews, and SS-Untersturmführer Ernst Bunde passed them on to the SD in Vinnitsa.³

SOURCES Documents about the extermination of the Jews in Strizhavka can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/8466: Verfahren 204a AR-Z 122/68 gegen Friedrich Schmidt und Karl Danner); DAVINO (R6023-5-3, 4); and RGVA (1323-2-230).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. RSD, Gruppe der Geheimen Feldpolizei, Sicherungsgruppe Ost, Unterkunft, December 24, 1941, in DAVINO, R-6023-5-3, pp. 64, 83, and R6023-5-4, pp. 99–103.

2. RSD, Gruppe der Geheimen Feldpolizei, Sicherungsgruppe Ost, Unterkunft, January 12, 1942, in RGVA, 1323-2-230, pp. 6–7; BA-L, B 162/8466, Verfahren 204a AR-Z 122/68 gegen Friedrich Schmidt und Karl Danner, Bd. II, pp. 299–318, Einstellungsverfügung (closing remarks), Munich, October 11, 1972.

3. BA-L, B 162/8466, Verfahren 204a AR-Z 122/68 gegen Friedrich Schmidt und Karl Danner, Bd. II, p. 304.

TEPLIK

Pre-1939: Teplik, town and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Gebiet Gaissin, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Teplyk, raion center, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Teplik is located 111 kilometers (69 miles) southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, a total of 1,233 Jews (or 23.5 percent of the total population) lived in Teplik. Between the end of June and July 26, 1941, when German forces arrived in the town, about 200 Jews managed to flee to the east. Several dozen Jewish men were drafted into the Red Army or voluntarily joined the military forces to defend the town. When German forces occupied Teplik, there were probably some 1,000 Jews still residing there.¹

After the town was occupied, a German military administration assumed authority in August 1941. In the fall of 1941, the temporary military authorities gradually handed over authority to a German civil administration. Until the liberation of the area in March 1944, Teplik and the Teplik Rayon belonged to Gebiet Gaissin in Generalkommissariat Shitomir. The Gebietskommissar was Kreisleiter Becher.² The Gebietskommissar in Gaisin was responsible for the Rayons of Gaisin and Dshulinka, as well as Teplik. Once the civil administration was firmly established, the Ukrainian auxiliary police was subordinated to the local Gendarmerie post in Teplik. The Ukrainian police played an active role in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

A short time after the occupation of the town, the German authorities introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures in the area. The Jews had to wear white armbands with the Star of David on them in order to show in public that they were Jewish. They were also forced to carry out various kinds of physically demanding work. In December 1941, all the Jewish families were forced to move to two streets behind the main street, bordered on one side by the local river.³ This area was called the ghetto, but it remained unfenced as an “open ghetto.” In total, about 1,000 people were concentrated in the ghetto, including Jews brought in from some of the neighboring villages, although there remained a separate ghetto in Sobolevka, within the Teplik Rayon.⁴ The local Ukrainian police guarded the ghetto.

During the winter of 1941–1942, Jews aged between 13 and 45 who were able to work had to clear snow from the streets of Teplik under the close supervision of the Ukrainian police. The Ukrainian policemen abused their position of power to beat the Jews and steal from them.⁵

At some time in the first few months of 1942, the Germans also established a Jewish forced labor camp (ZAL) in Teplik on the site of the former local club, which held 200 to 300 Romanian Jews from Bukovina, including women and children. Local policemen also guarded this camp, which was under the command of German Polizeimeister Otto Brettin in the summer of 1942.⁶

The food rations in both the ghetto and the labor camp were very poor, and many Jews died of disease and starvation. The local population was forbidden to give them food.⁷ Jews from the ghetto and the labor camp were made to work on the Durchgangsstrasse (highway) IV construction project, building the road from Vinnitsa to Uman'. Some Jews from the ghetto had to perform agricultural work, while others worked as bakers or tailors or performed various cleaning tasks for the Germans.

In April 1942, approximately 250 Jews between the ages of 13 and 45 who were capable of work were transferred from Teplik to a labor camp in Raigorod, at that time under Romanian occupation.⁸ On May 26, 1942, most of the remaining Jews in the ghetto were shot by a detachment of the Security Police, with the assistance of the German Gendarmerie, the local Ukrainian police, and Lithuanian auxiliaries. Filipp Biberman recalls being woken at 4:00 A.M. and being brutally driven by men in uniform out of the ghetto to a site near a park about 1.5 kilometers (0.9 mile) out of town. The elderly, the sick, and children were transported on carts. At the killing site, the Jews were forced to undress, and German SS men shot them with machine guns.⁹ According to one local witness, the forensic examination of the bodies conducted by the Soviet authorities after liberation revealed that many of the women and children had been buried alive in the mass grave.¹⁰

Biberman managed to escape on the way to the park and hid behind some bushes. Then he went to the house of some school friends, the Kazachinsky family, who gave him food and clothes but were too scared to hide him. He then hid in the cemetery but was spotted by some local inhabitants the next day and taken to the commandant's office. His mother, sisters, and blind grandfather were among those shot on May 26. From Teplik, he was sent to the forced labor camp in Raigorod and managed to survive the war.¹¹

After the Aktion on May 26, 1942, about 40 Jews, mostly carpenters, tailors, and shoemakers, remained in the ghetto.

Their families also survived the liquidation Aktion.¹² Most of these people were murdered in 1943. The inmates of the Jewish forced labor camp either were murdered together with those from the ghetto or were transferred to other labor camps.

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, the number of Jews murdered in Teplik was 769: 279 men, 330 women, and 160 children. Among these victims were apparently also 530 Jews (175 men, 280 women, and 75 children) who had been deported to Teplik from the Bukovina area. It is not clear whether the Jewish craftsmen murdered in 1943 are included in this figure.¹³

SOURCES Relevant publications on the Jewish community of Teplik and its fate during the Holocaust include Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 1302–1303. One testimony regarding the fate of the Jews of Teplik can be found in the collection of published testimonies edited by Boris Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Valentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 192–194.

Documents on the murder of the Jews in Teplik can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/2332); DA-VINO; GARF (7021-54-1237); USHMM (Acc. 1995.A.512); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. BA-L, B 162/6169 (II 213 AR-Z 20/63 [Friese and others, DGIV], vol. 18), p. 3227.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. USHMM, Acc. 1995.A.512, personal testimony of Filipp Biberman, born 1931. According to Konrad Schweser, the German construction leader with the Organisation Todt in Teplik, the Jews were not concentrated into one quarter of the town until April 1942; “about four to six weeks before the mass shooting” at the end of May 1942, see BA-L, B 162/2332, pp. 33–57, statement of Konrad Schweser, January 18, 1962. However, Schweser himself did not arrive in Teplik until April 1942.

4. See the entry in this volume on Sobolevka.

5. Sophia Palatnikova, “This Can Never Be Forgotten,” in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 192–194.

6. BA-L, B 162/6169, pp. 3226–3246. This site will be dealt with in a later volume covering Jewish forced labor camps (ZALs) and other types of camps.

7. Ibid., B 162/2332, pp. 375–392.

8. GARF, 7021-54-1237, p. 101; Palatnikova, “This Can Never Be Forgotten,” pp. 192–194.

9. USHMM, Acc. 1995.A.512, personal testimony of Filipp Biberman.

10. BA-L, B 162/2332, p. 382, statement by the Jewish survivor Srulya Benevica Volosina, September 27, 1967.

11. USHMM, Acc. 1995.A.512; it is not clear if Biberman is referring to the German commandant or to the Ukrainian commandant or “warden” named in his testimony as Kozar. Biberman returned briefly to Teplik in 1945 and then lived in the eastern regions of the Soviet Union before migrating to New York City in 1988.

12. Palatnikova, "This Can Never Be Forgotten," pp. 192–194.

13. GARF, 7021-54-1237, pp. 87–88, 102.

TERNOVKA

Pre-1941: Ternovka, village, Dzhulinka raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ternovka, Rayon Dshulinka, Gebiet Gaissin, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Ternivka, Bershad' raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Ternovka is located about 130 kilometers (81 miles) southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 population census, there were 1,488 Jews living in the Dzhulinka raion, including the 212 Jews in Dzhulinka itself. Most of the remainder—about 1,276 Jews—lived in Ternovka.

Between late June 1941 and July 26, 1941, when the village was captured by German armed forces, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, while a few dozen men were called into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 1,000 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

In August 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. From August 4, 1941 onward, the functions of the Ortskommandantur in the village were performed by Armee-Gefangenensammelstelle 15.¹ In late October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. From this date until liberation in March 1944, the village was incorporated into Rayon Dshulinka, in Gebiet Gaissin, within Generalkommissariat Sbitomir. The Gebietskommissar was Kreisleiter Becher, and the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer was Leutnant der Gendarmerie Pösselt.² Subordinated to the latter were several Gendarmerie posts, including one in Ternovka. The Ternovka post was in charge of several Ukrainian policemen.

On August 19, 1941, on the instructions of the Ortskommandantur, the men of the 602nd Wachbataillon and the 414th Landeschützenbataillon searched the residences of Jews with the aim of confiscating weapons and "hidden property." No weapons were found, but they took clothing and nine bales of dried wool from the Jews. At about this time, the Ortskommandantur ordered the Jews to wear white armbands with the Star of David.³ Subsequently the Jews were made to wear yellow stars on the left side of their chests.⁴

In the summer, or more likely the fall of 1941, the German authorities established an open ghetto, or "Jewish residential district," in Ternovka. All the Jews were moved together onto one or two streets in the center of the village. The Jews were permitted to take with them some of their property, such as bed linens, cooking utensils, and furniture, but the rest had to be left behind. The Ukrainians were not allowed into the ghetto, and the Jews were not permitted to leave, except for work assignments, such as agricultural labor on the nearby kolkhoz. The Jews lived in crowded conditions, with several families in each dwelling.⁵

Despite the restrictions, local Ukrainians came to the ghetto and traded food for the Jews' remaining possessions, such as clothing or shoes. There were therefore few cases of starvation in Ternovka. There were no mass killings of Jews before the summer of 1942, but sometimes groups of about 10 Jewish men were taken away for forced labor and were subsequently shot. The Germans also robbed the Jews of any valuables. People were scared to go outside.⁶

In the winter of 1941–1942, able-bodied Jews under the guard of Ukrainian policemen were ordered to clear the snow from the roads and were beaten and humiliated while doing this. In the spring of 1942, a group of young Jews were transported to a labor camp. Several Jewish families ran away into the Romanian zone of occupation.

On May 27, 1942, the first large-scale Aktion was carried out against the Ternovka ghetto. German and Ukrainian police arrested and shot most of the Ternovka Jews in a pit in the forest, about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) from the village.⁷ After the Aktion was completed, the ghetto was reduced in size; it consisted of only a few residences near the market square. In these homes lived the Jewish artisans and their families and also those Jews who had been in hiding and thus escaped the mass shooting on May 27. For example, Raisa Teplitskaia remained hidden for three days without food and water; when she emerged she saw dead bodies lying everywhere. However, she was able to enter the remnant ghetto unmolested. Severe overcrowding, unsanitary conditions, and semi-starvation resulted in an outbreak of epidemic typhus. At the start of March 1943, the ghetto was liquidated. Only a few artisans were left alive. A small group of Jews survived by going into hiding.⁸ In total, in the years 1942–1943, at least 756 Jews of the village of Ternovka were killed.⁹

A few Jews survived from the Ternovka ghetto. They passed as non-Jews, went into hiding with the assistance of local Ukrainians, or fled to the Romanian-occupied zone, which by 1943 had become considerably safer than on the German side of the Bug River, where hardly any Jews remained alive.

SOURCES The Ternovka ghetto is mentioned in the following publications: Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 1999), pp. 407–410; Yitzhak Arad, ed., Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoï okkupatsii, 1941–1944: Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1991), p. 225.

Documents dealing with the destruction of the Jews of Ternovka can be found in the following archives: DAVINO; GARF (7021-54-1240); RGVA (1275-3-664); USHMM (RG-31.027); and VHF (# 445).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-664, p. 4, report of the Ortskommandantur in Ternovka, August 22, 1941.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. RGVA, 1275-3-664, pp. 4 and reverse side, report of the Ortskommandantur of Ternovka, August 22, 1941.

4. VHF, # 445, testimony of Roza Nemirovskaia; USHMM, RG-31.027, interview with Raisa Kivovna Teplitskaia.

5. VHF, # 445, Nemirovskaia states that the ghetto was made immediately after the Germans arrived. Testimony of Lidia Stepchuk-Goikhma, in Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, p. 407, dates it in the fall. USHMM, RG-31.027, Raisa Kivovna Teplitskaia dates it within six months of the occupation (probably sooner).

6. VHF, # 445.

7. Testimony of Grigorii Umanskii, in Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoï okkupatsii, 1941–1944, p. 225; VHF, # 445.

8. Testimony of Goikhma, in Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, pp. 408–410.

9. I.S. Finkel'shtein, "Massovoe unichtozhenie evreev Podolii natsistskimi palachami v 1941–1944 gg.," in Katastrofa i opir ukrains'koho evreistva, 1941–1944: Narisy z istorii Holokostu i Oporu v Ukraini (Kiev, 1999), p. 76. The Jewish victims are listed there by name. The ChGK's figure of 2,400 murdered Jews (see GARF, 7021-54-1240) seems to be far too high unless this includes other Jews brought into Ternovka for labor, perhaps from the Romanian zone of occupation.

TSIBULEV

Pre-1941: Tsibulev, village, Monastyrishche raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Zybulew, Rayon and Gebiet Monastyrishchtsche, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Tsybuliv, Monastyrishche raion, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Tsibulev is located about 120 kilometers (75 miles) east-southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, Tsibulev had 434 Jewish residents, 7.3 percent of the village's total population.

German armed forces occupied Tsibulev on July 22, 1941, just one month after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. By then, some of the local Jews had managed to escape eastward, fleeing ahead of the advancing German army. Other Jewish men were drafted or volunteered for service in the Red Army. About 60 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, the village was under the command of a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), which created a village council headed by an elder. The military administration also established an auxiliary Ukrainian police force made up of local residents. In November 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The village of Tsibulev was located in the Rayon and Gebiet Monastyrishchtsche, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the Ortskommandantur ordered the village council to register and mark the local Jewish population, requiring them to wear armbands with the Star of David. In addition, the Jews were used for forced labor.

The first killing of Jews occurred in late July 1941. At that time, all six members of the rabbi's family were publicly shot.¹ On September 25, 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 carried out the first Aktion in the village in which 78 Jews were killed, according to the Einsatzgruppen report "for insolence towards the Ukrainian population."²

No detailed information has been found about the living conditions of the Jews in Tsibulev during the occupation, but it appears that, as in the nearby Rayon center of Monastyrishchtsche, the remaining Jews of the village were forced into some form of ghetto in the summer or fall of 1941. In any case, more than 200 Jews remained in the village throughout the winter of 1941–1942.

According to an account prepared for publication by Ilya Ehrenburg: "The winter of 1941–1942 was a severe one. The Germans forced unclothed women and barefoot old men to work." The same report mentions the murder of about 100 children, shot and buried in a pit not far from the village.³

The ghetto was liquidated on May 29, 1942, when all its inmates were herded to Monastyrishche to be shot there together with most of the remaining Jews of the Rayon. On the way there, 105 children and around 50 elderly people were taken out of the column and shot in the forest.⁴

According to the account prepared for The Complete Black Book, an eight-month-old baby boy was cast onto the road as the Jews were being transported away in the hope that he might be rescued, but a German smashed the baby's head against the side of a vehicle. Tamara Arkadevna Rozanova hid a Jew in her cellar, but the Germans burned down her house, and Rozanova was herself only spared by chance.⁵

SOURCES Relevant information can be found in the following publications: Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002), p. 28; "Cybulev," in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 284.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Tsibulev can be found in the following archive: BA-BL (R 58/218).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities in Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), Memory of the Holocaust Program, Cherkasy oblast', village of Tsibulev.

2. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 119, October 20, 1941.

3. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Complete Black Book, p. 28.

4. Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities in Ukraine.

5. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Complete Black Book, p. 28.

ULANOV

Pre-1941: Ulanov, village and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Ulanow, Rayon center, Gebiet Kalinowka, Generalkommissariat Shtomir; post-1991: Ulaniv, Khmil'nyk raion, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Ulanov is located about 70 kilometers (44 miles) north-northwest of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 population census, 1,188 Jews were living in the village (70.5 percent of the total population). Altogether, in 1939 there were 1,754 Jews living in the Ulanov raion, with most of the others residing in the nearby village of Sal'nitsa.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a small part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate. At that time, some men of eligible age were conscripted into or enrolled voluntarily in the Red Army. More than 80 percent of the total pre-war Jewish population remained in Ulanov at the start of the occupation.

German armed forces occupied the village in July 1941. From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the village's affairs. The military commandant established a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police unit recruited from among the local residents. The head of the Ukrainian police was a man named Lorenz. Initially there were seven men serving under him.¹

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the Ortskommandantur organized the registration of the Jewish population. The Jews were required to wear armbands on their sleeves and also to perform various forms of heavy manual labor. In August 1941, the German military administration recorded a village population of 1,200, a figure that included some 1,000 Jews.²

At the end of October 1941, authority passed into the hands of a German civil administration. Ulanov was incorporated into Gebiet Kalinowka, and Regierungsrat Dr. Seelemeyer became the Gebietskommissar. In turn, Gebiet Kalinowka became part of Generalkommissariat Shtomir.³ In November or December of 1941, a squad of four Gendarmes arrived in Ulanov from Germany and established a post initially under the command of Josef Rückl. The Gendarmerie also assumed control over the Ukrainian police, now renamed Schutzmannschaft-Einzeldienst, which consisted of about 30 men.⁴

At some time prior to December 1941, the German authorities in the village ordered the creation of a ghetto. One street was cordoned off in the center of Ulanov and was surrounded by barbed wire. Jewish families lived together in this confined area.⁵ Jews were prohibited from leaving the limits of the ghetto and were forbidden to buy goods from the local Ukrainians. Starvation quickly broke out in the ghetto as a consequence. In December 1941 and in the spring of 1942, more than 450 Jews from the village of Sal'nitsa were resettled into the ghetto.⁶ Probably in mid-May 1942, several hundred able-bodied Jews were taken in two groups to an airfield site near Kalinovka, where a Jewish forced labor camp was established.⁷

The ghetto was liquidated on June 10, 1942.⁸ The Gendarmes in Ulanov received notice of the forthcoming Aktion, as they were instructed to prepare the necessary pits in advance. The Gendarmerie and local police, including forces brought in from Kalinovka under the command of the SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer, Leutnant der Gendarmerie Konrad Lange, rounded up somewhere between 600 and 1,200 people from the ghetto and escorted them to the Jewish cemetery opposite the Gendarmerie post on the edge of town. Here a small squad of the Security Police and SD, probably from Vinnitsa, carried out the shootings, while the Gendarmerie and local police guarded those waiting to be shot. The Gendarmerie based in Ulanov also carried out at least two subsequent shooting Aktions at the same site against smaller groups of Jews uncovered in and around the town over the ensuing weeks.⁹

Only a few Jews managed to survive the Ulanov ghetto by escaping and either hiding in the surrounding countryside or successfully concealing their Jewish identity.¹⁰

SOURCES Documentation regarding the annihilation of the Ulanov Jews can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/7364); DAVINO (R4422-1-39; R1683-1-10); GARF (7021-54-1234); RGVA (1275-3-662); VHF (# 29072, 29097, and 51316); and YVA. Microfilm copies of much of this documentation are also available at the USHMM.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 24, Feldkommandantur 675 (Abt. VII) in Winniza an Sicherungsdivision 444 (Abt. VII), August 25, 1941.

2. Ibid.

3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

4. BA-L, B 162/7364 (ZStL, 204a AR-Z 134/67), pp. 135–138, statement of E. Heinisch on July 19, 1977.

5. Ibid.; Heinisch commented that the ghetto was in existence on his arrival in Ulanov in November or December 1941. Also see DAVINO, R4422-1-39; R1683-1-10.

6. GARF, 7021-54-1234, p. 4.

7. See the entry in this volume for the Kalinovka ghetto.

8. GARF, 7021-54-1234, pp. 1, 5.

9. Ibid., pp. 1, 5, 7. According to the findings of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), during the course of the three Aktions in June 1942, there were 3,285 Jews killed. This number appears to be significantly too high. E. Heinisch on July 19, 1977, stated that the number of Jews in Ulanov at the time could not have exceeded 600; see BA-L, B 162/7364, pp. 135–138.

10. VHF, # 29072, 29097, and 51316, video testimonies of Aleksandra S., Elizaveta G., and David F.

VCHERAIŠHE

Pre-1941: Vcheraishe, village and raion center, Zhitomir oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Wtscherajsche, Rayon center, Gebiet Rushin, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Vcheraishe, Ruzhyn raion, Zhytomyr oblast', Ukraine

Vcheraishe is located 57 kilometers (36 miles) southeast of Zhitomir. According to the 1939 population census, 494 Jews lived in the village (12.9 percent of the total population). Additionally, 131 Jews lived in the villages of what was then the Vcheraishe raion.

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, some of the Jewish population was able to evacuate, but others who tried to leave were forced back by the rapid German advance. At that time, men of military age were conscripted into or enlisted voluntarily for the Red Army. Around 400 Jews remained in Vcheraishe at the start of the German occupation.

The village was occupied by German armed forces in mid-July 1941. From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of Vcheraishe. The German military commandant set up a local administration and organized an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from among the local villagers. Soon after the occupation of the village, the Ortskommandantur ordered the registration and marking of the Jewish population. The Jews had to wear armbands bearing the Star of David.

Between August 10 and August 23, 1941, Einsatzkommando 5 "inspected" the village on two separate occasions. During the first Aktion, the German Security Police shot 22 Jews and Communists; during the second one, they shot an undisclosed number of Jews and activists.¹

At the end of October 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Vcheraishe was initially incorporated into Gebiet Rushin, where Regierungsassessor Ganglhoff was the Gebietskommissar. In turn, Gebiet Rushin formed part of Generalkommissariat Sbitomir, within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.² The head of the local police in Vcheraishe from April 1942 until December 1943 was the ethnic German Feldwebel in the Schutzmannschaft, Arthur Reglin. In July 1942, the Gendarmerie post in Vcheraishe had a nominal strength of four Gendarmes and 40 local policemen (Schutzmänner).³ By 1943 Vcheraishe had been transferred to the neighboring Gebiet Kasatin, where the police forces were commanded by Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer Behrens.

In the late summer or fall of 1941, all the Jews of Vcheraishe were forcibly resettled into an open ghetto (Jewish residential district) on one street. Some Jews were also brought into the ghetto from outlying villages. Several families were forced to share a single house. People had to sleep on wooden bunks or on the floor. The local physicians were forbidden to provide medical care to the Jews, and the local population was forbidden to sell them food. Despite some illegal bartering for food, people suffered from hunger in the ghetto, and in the overcrowded conditions diseases spread rapidly. The Jews were routinely beaten by the local police as they were escorted daily out of the ghetto to various forms of manual labor.⁴

On May 1, 1942, a large Aktion took place in which about 200 Jews were brutally dragged out of their houses in the ghetto and were assembled by the German Gendarmerie and the local police. Once the skilled workers had been selected, these forces then escorted the bulk of the Jews to the ditches that had been prepared in the forest about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) from Vcheraishe near the village of Budenovka. Some Jews were shot on the way. Four Gestapo men (members of the Security Police and SD from Berdichev) then shot the Jews in a mass grave.⁵ Warned by the head of the village, Vladyk, some Jews managed to escape or hide during the Aktion, but most returned to the run-down houses of the ghetto a few days later, as they were unable to find refuge among the surrounding population.

A second Aktion was carried out about six weeks later when about 40 Jews were shot. After these two Aktionen, around 40 artisans remained behind in the village. The Gendarmerie and local police continued to search for any escaped Jews in the surrounding countryside for many months afterwards. On June 9, 1943, Meister der Gendarmerie Strumpf in Vcheraishe reported that he had "resettled" (shot) 3 Jews who had been found wandering around in Rayon Wtscherajsche.⁶

For over a year, the remaining Jews continued to perform forced labor, registering every day with the police. At the end of July 1943, 6 of the Jews escaped.⁷ When this was discovered at the daily roll call, the Germans decided to kill most of the few Jews left. On July 31, 1943, the Gendarmerie post in Vcheraishe reported that the SD in Berdichev had "resettled" 24 Jews in the village.⁸ According to witness evidence, the Jews were shot by two Gestapo men at the cemetery.⁹ After this Aktion, only about 7 Jews remained. To prevent an escape, they were placed in cells and employed only for special work assignments. On one occasion Soviet partisans attempted to liberate them, but 4 of the 7 detainees were shot in the ensuing exchange of gunfire.¹⁰

Altogether about 300 Jews were killed in the village of Vcheraishe between July 1941 and August 1943, including more than 100 children.¹¹

SOURCES There is a brief testimony by Sofia Rozenberg, a survivor of the open ghetto in Vcheraishe, published in Boris Rabiner, My rodnom iz getto: Vospominaniia byushikh uznikov Mogilev-Podolskogo getto (New York, 1996), pp. 79–81.

Documents regarding the annihilation of the Vcheraishe Jews can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R58/216); BA-L (ZStLII 204 AR-Z 128/67); DAZO (e.g., 1182-1-6); GARF (7021-60-289); USHMM (RG-31); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel and Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. BA-BL, R58/216, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 58, August 20, 1941; and EM no. 60, August 22, 1941; Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 160, Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht Nr. 3, Berichtszeit 15.8.–31.8.1941, reported that

1576 ZHYTOMYR REGION

22 functionaries, plunderers, and saboteurs were executed in Vcheraishche.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 8–9, KdG Shitomir, Gend. Hauptmannschaft Winniza, Hauptmannschaftsbefehl Nr. 15/42, July 11, 1942. For lists of the Wtscherajsche Schutzmänner, see also there 1182-1-15, p. 3, list dated June 1, 1942; and 1182-1-24.

4. Rabiner, My rodomy iz getto, pp. 79–81.

5. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67 Ganglhoff (Rushin), vol. 1, pp. 139–140, confrontation between witness A.F. Smoljanskij and accused Arthur Reglin, December 30, 1951.

6. DAZO, 1182-1-6, Gend. Posten Wtscherajsche an SS- und Polizeigebietsführer in Kasatin, June 9, 1943.

7. Rabiner, My rodomy iz getto, pp. 79–81.

8. DAZO, 1182-1-6, Gend. Posten Wtscherajsche, July 31, 1943.

9. BA-L, ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 128/67 Ganglhoff (Rushin), vol. 1, pp. 138–140.

10. Rabiner, My rodomy iz getto, pp. 79–81.

11. GARF, 7021-60-289, p. 3.

VINNITSA

Pre-1941: Vinnitsa, city, raion, and oblast' center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Winniza, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Vinnytsia, capital, Vinnytsia oblast', Ukraine

Vinnitsa is located 198 kilometers (123 miles) southwest of Kiev. In 1939, there were 33,150 Jews living in the city (35.6 percent of the total population).

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, a part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Eligible men were conscripted into or enlisted voluntarily for the Red Army. At the start of the German occupation, about 18,000 Jews remained in the city.

German armed forces occupied the city on July 19, 1941. In July and August 1941, a German military administration ran Vinnitsa. On July 22, 1941, the Feldkommandant appointed a local administration and an auxiliary police unit recruited from among local inhabitants. In October 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Vinnitsa had its own city administration (Winniza-Stadt) within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. Fritz Margenfeld was named the city commissioner (Stadtkommissar).¹ A variety of police units, including Einsatzkommando 6 and parts of Einsatzkommando 5, along with local auxiliaries, provided the forces to back up German edicts.

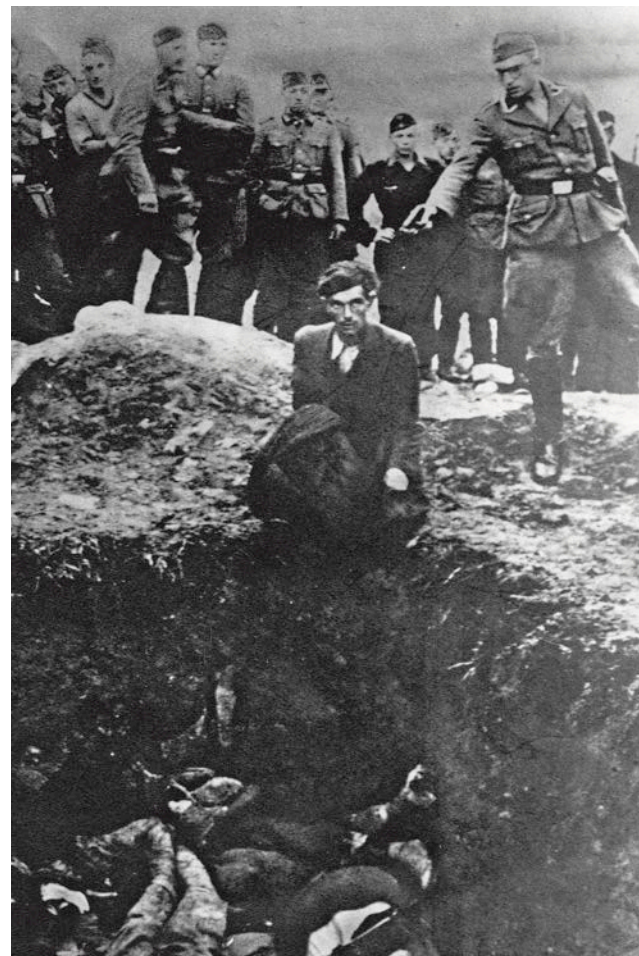

In the summer of 1941, the German occupying forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Vinnitsa. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was created. Jews were required to wear distinctive armbands bearing the image of the Star of David. They were forced into different forms of heavy labor for the German military forces and occupation administration. The Jews were not allowed to leave their place of residence without permission, had to surrender all items of value, and were prohibited from buying products at the market. The local Ukrainian residents of Vinnitsa were not permitted to have any contact with the Jewish population.

The main functions of the Judenrat were to assign Jews to different labor tasks, to maintain order within the community, and to look after the health and welfare of the Jewish population. But in the first days of its existence as an organization, the Security Police and SD liquidated the first Judenrat, and another one was established in its place. The military commandant's office also collected a massive fine or "tribute" from the Jews of the city.²

The German police conducted a series of mass executions in the summer and fall of 1941, first of Jewish Intelligentsia and then of ordinary Jewish citizens. In a large Aktion on September 19, the 45th Reserve Police Battalion shot more than 10,000 Jews. Then on April 15, 1942, about 4,800 Jews were shot in the Pianichanskii Forest. After this Aktion, approximately 1,000 Jews, all artisans, remained alive.

From among the Jewish artisans, the mechanics and technicians were immediately sent to Zhitomir,³ and those left Waffen-SS and Reich Labor Service (Reichsarbeitsdienst) members look on as an Einsatzgruppe member prepares to shoot a Ukrainian Jew kneeling on the edge of a corpse-filled ditch near Vinnitsa, n.d.

USHMM WS #64407, LC

behind were assigned to different groups for specialized labor tasks. About 150 Jews were resettled into a labor camp run by the Organisation Todt (OT), which was located in a former military barracks at the end of Krasnoarmeiskaia Street.⁴ Some 26 people who worked as cabinetmakers, as coopers, and as other specialists formed a work team at the carpentry factory. They lived in makeshift barracks, consisting of a former stable on the grounds of the factory.⁵

The majority of the Jewish artisans lived in the “ghetto,” which was located in a cordoned-off area on the former Kommunisticheskaia Street.⁶ On May 15, 1942, 801 Jewish specialist workers were recorded in Vinnitsa.⁷ Among the crafts represented, there were tailors, dyers, and leather workers. There was also overcrowding in the ghetto, with at least 12 people per room. According to one witness, conditions were slightly better in the ghetto than in the other labor camps in Vinnitsa, as the beatings were less frequent and there was more food in the ghetto.⁸ The majority of the artisans were shot during the course of 1942 and 1943. For example, in March 1943 a number of elderly people were taken from the ghetto and shot; and the last remaining Jewish leather workers were “removed” in September 1943.⁹ A small group of Jews were able to escape and survived with the help of local Ukrainian residents in Vinnitsa.

At least 17 Jews in the city were members of the underground organization, including six Communists, three members of the Komsomol youth organization, and eight unaffiliated (nonparty). At least nine of these Jewish resistance fighters were killed in combat against the German occupying forces.¹⁰ A small number of Jews were able to flee into the forests and join the partisan resistance.

SOURCES The following publications contain information on the destruction of the Jewish population of Vinnitsa: Vin-

Undated portrait of rescuer Boris Bochkov (top right) and family. Bochkov hid two Jewish escapees from the Vinnitsa ghetto, Yuri Rakhman and his father, for which he was honored as Righteous Among the Nations in 1995 by Yad Vashem.

USHMM WS #57644, COURTESY OF JFR

nychchyna v period Velykoi Vitchyznianoï viiny 1941–1945 rr.: Khronika podii (Kiev, 1965); Vinnychchyna v roky Velykoi Vitchyznianoï viiny 1941–1945: Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (Odessa, 1971); Y. Maliar and F. Vinokurova, Vinnitskaia oblast': Katastrofa (Shoa) i soprotivlenie: Svidetel'stva evreev—uznikov kontslagerei i getto, uchastnikov partizanskogo dvizheniia i podpol'noi bor'by (Tel Aviv and Kiev, 1994); A. Kruglov, Unichtozhenie evreiskogo naseleniia v Vinnitskoi oblasti v 1941–1944 gg. (Mogilev-Podol'skii, 1997); Y.M. Finkel'shtein, Kniga muzhbestva i skorby (Evrei Vinnitsy v gody Velikoi Otechestvennoi Voiny), vol. 1 (Vinnitsa, 1999); and A. Kruglov, “Unichtozhenie evreiskoi obshchiny Vinnitsy v 1941–1942 gg. v svete nemetskhkh dokumentov,” Istoki: Vestnik Narodnogo Universiteta Evreiskoi Kul'tury v Vostochnoi Ukrainie, no. 7 (2000). Information on the activities of the Ukrainian nationalist unit “Bukovyns'kyi Kurin'” can be found in V. Veryga, “Bukovyns'kyi Kurin' 1941,” in Na zov Kyiva: Ukrains'kyi natsionalizm u II svitovii viini: Zbirnyk statei, spohadiv i dokumentiv (Kiev, 1993).

Documents and testimonies regarding the extermination of the Jews of Vinnitsa can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58); BA-L (ZStL, 204 AR-Z 136/67); BA-MA (RW 30/201); DAVINO (R1312-1-13); GARF (7021-54-1236); RGVA (e.g., 1323-2-230 and 1275-3-662); TsDAVO (R3637-4-116); USHMM (RG-50.226); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März, 1942, Berlin, March 13, 1942. After the war, Fritz Margenfeld was under investigation by the West German authorities for some time. The state prosecutor in Stuttgart discontinued the investigation on July 28, 1971.

2. RGVA, 1275-3-662, pp. 17–18, Feldkommandantur 675 (V), Winniza, report, August 14, 1941.

3. Testimony of Boris Pritsker, in Maliar and Vinokurova, Vinnitskaia oblast', p. 105.

4. Testimony of Iurii Rakhman, in ibid., p. 61.

5. Testimony of Pritsker, in ibid., p. 105.

6. Testimony of Rakhman, in ibid., p. 63.

7. DAVINO, R1312-1-13, p. 24.

8. Testimony of Rakhman, in Maliar and Vinokurova, Vinnitskaia oblast', p. 63; USHMM, RG-50.226.0027, interview with Iurii Rakhman.

9. USHMM, RG-50.226.0027, interview with Iurii Rakhman; BA-MA, RW30/201, Military Economic Administration Vinnitsa, report for July to September, September 30, 1943.

10. Maliar and Vinokurova, Vinnitskaia oblast', pp. 174–175.

VORONOVITSA

Pre-1941: Voronovitsa, village and raion center, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Woronowiza, Rayon center, Gebiet Nemirow, Generalkommissariat Sbitomir; post-1991: Voronovitsa, Vinnytsia raion and oblast', Ukraine

Voronovitsa is located 21 kilometers (13 miles) southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, 860 Jews lived in the village. An additional 70 Jews lived in the villages of what was then the Voronovitsa raion.

VOLUME II: PART B

1578 ZHYTOMYR REGION

Units of the German 17th Army occupied Voronovitsa on July 21, 1941. The majority of the Jewish population did not evacuate and remained in town. The speedy advance of the German troops caught them off guard, and even many of those who attempted to leave were forced to turn back and return home on foot. From July until October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. It established a local administration and formed an auxiliary police unit from among the local residents. A man named Lishchuk was initially appointed head of the Ukrainian police at the end of July 1941. In August 1941, there were 10 policemen under his command. At this time there were 2,000 residents of the village, including 1,000 Jews.¹

On October 20, 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. Voronovitsa was incorporated into Gebiet Nemirow. Kameradschaftsführer Sittig was appointed as Gebietskommissar.² In 1942, Leutnant der Gendarmerie Karl Heinze served as the SS- und Polizei-Gebietsführer in Nemirow.³ He had authority over the Gendarmerie post in Voronovitsa, commanded by a man named Lorenz. In the summer of 1942, the nominal strength of the Gendarmerie post was four Gendarmes and 40 local policemen (Schutz Männer).⁴

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in the village. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established, which was tasked with collecting a large "contribution" from the Jews. Jews were ordered to wear an armband bearing the Star of David and later a yellow circle on the front and back of their clothing. They were forced into daily hard labor: cleaning, cutting wood, and loading railway cars. The local police ensured that the Jews complied with German regulations and orders.

A ghetto was set up in August 1941 in the southwestern part of the village. It was not fenced off, but whenever a Jew ventured outside the two streets where the Jews were forced to reside, he or she would be severely beaten and sometimes killed. The policemen Kostiuk, Kondratiuk, Mudrik, and Kravchuk were especially zealous in abusing and torturing the Jews. A new head of the police, Panas Boiko, was appointed once the ghetto was established. Alongside these brutes, there were decent people among the local population, and some of them risked their lives to smuggle food to the inmates of the ghetto.⁵

On November 11, 1941, the Jews were herded into the building of the former Catholic church, where the Germans singled out about 30 Jewish craftsmen. The following morning, the remaining Jews were loaded onto trucks and taken to large silage pits behind the sugar refinery in Stepanovka, about 5 kilometers (3 miles) to the east of the village. The Jews were ordered to undress and were shot by a squad of five or so SD men using machine pistols. Among the victims were women, children, and the elderly. The mass shooting lasted the entire day. The policemen were drinking alcohol at the execution site during the Aktion. According to investigative records, somewhere between 600 and 900 Jews were shot in this first Aktion.⁶

A number of Jews managed to escape from the Aktion into the forests and fields, but hunger and cold soon forced the fugitives to return to the ghetto, where they discovered that their houses had been plundered. The survivors of the massacre were placed in the few remaining houses. In the second Aktion, which took place on December 3, 1941, 380 Jews were murdered.⁷ Security Police officers from Einsatzkommando 5, which was based in Vinnitsa at this time, organized the two Aktions with the assistance of the local Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie. The commander of the Security Police detachment in Vinnitsa was Theodor Salmanzig.

On May 27, 1942, the ghetto in the village was liquidated. On that day, 270 Jews were shot in a ditch near the Stepanovka sugar refinery.⁸ This mass shooting was carried out by a detachment from the Security Police and SD post in Vinnitsa (consisting mainly of former members of Einsatzkommando 5), assisted by the Ukrainian police.

Some Jews who had escaped from the massacres in Generalkommissariat Shitomir in 1941 and the first half of 1942 passed through the Voronovitsa area in an effort to cross the Bug River and make it to the Romanian-occupied zone to the south (Transnistria), where conditions for Jews were comparatively better.⁹

In August 1942, a labor camp was created in the village. Around 500 Jews were taken there as prisoners, many of whom were from the ghetto in Mogilev-Podolskii, at that time under Romanian administration.¹⁰ The prisoners were utilized for building roads. On January 20, 1943, 280 Jews deemed unfit for labor were shot near the Machine-Tractor Station (MTS) in Stepanovka. On May 24, 1943, the prison camp was liquidated, and all the remaining prisoners (270 people) were killed.¹¹

SOURCES Documents regarding the extermination of the Jews of Voronovitsa can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL II 204a AR-Z 141/67); GARF (7021-54-1260); RGVA (1275-3-662); USHMM; VHF (# 30099); and YVA (M-33).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel and Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 24, Feldkommandantur 675 (Abt. VII), Winniza, an Sicherungsdivision 444 (Abt. VII), August 25, 1941.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. DAZO, 1151-1-9, pp. 37-39, KdG Shitomir, Kommandobefehl Nr. 30/42, September 3, 1942.

4. BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 141/67, Abschlussbericht (Gebiet Nemirow), May 29, 1974, pp. 23-30; DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 8-9, KdG Shitomir, Hauptmannschaft Winniza, Hauptmannschaftsbefehl Nr. 15/42, July 11, 1942.

5. USHMM, letter dated May 10, 1998, concerning Iosif Katz, a survivor from Voronovitsa, received by Vadim Altskan at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Boiko is listed in German Gendarmerie documents as an NCO in the Schutzmannschaft; see DAZO, 1151-1-703, pp. 13–14. The existence of a ghetto is also mentioned by the Report of the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies—Cemetery Project, prepared in 1996, see www.iajgs.org.

6. GARF, 7021-54-1260, p. 6, gives the figure of 630. USHMM, letter dated May 10, 1998, concerning Iosif Katz, states that some 1,500 Jews were shot during the Aktion on November 12, 1941 (this figure is probably too high). BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 141/67, Abschlussbericht (Gebiet Nemirow), May 29, 1974, pp. 14–16, gives the figure of some 900 victims.

7. GARF, 7021-54-1260, p. 6; BA-L, ZStL, II 204a AR-Z 141/67, Abschlussbericht (Gebiet Nemirow), May 29, 1974, pp. 14–16. USHMM, letter dated May 10, 1998, concerning Iosif Katz—this source again gives a much higher number of victims of this Aktion.

8. GARF, 7021-54-1260, p. 6.

9. VHF, # 30099, testimony of Elina Zinaida.

10. Testimony of D. Mann, in B. Rabiner, My rodomy iz getto: Vospominaniia byvshikh uznikov Mogilev-Podol'skogo getto (New York, 1996), p. 32.

11. GARF, 7021-54-1260, p. 7.

ZHITOMIR

Pre-1941: Zhitomir, city, raion and oblast' center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Shitomir, Rayon and Gebiet center, capital of Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Zhytomyr, raion and oblast' center, Ukraine

Zhitomir is located 136 kilometers (85 miles) west-southwest of Kiev. According to the 1939 population census, 29,053 Jews lived in the city of Zhitomir (30.6 percent of the total population).

Jews rounded up by the Wehrmacht to view the hanging of Mosche Kogan and Wolf Kieper on the Zhitomir market square, August 7, 1941. USHMM WS #17549, COURTESY OF DÖW

On July 9, 1941, German forces of the 1st Panzer Division occupied the city, just 17 days after the German invasion of the USSR. During this intervening period, nearly 20,000 Jews evacuated the city. Eligible men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. No more than 7,000 Jews remained in Zhitomir at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military administration ran the affairs of the city. The Wehrmacht established a city authority in Zhitomir and an auxiliary Ukrainian police unit recruited from among the local residents.

At the end of October 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Zhitomir became the administrative center of Gebiet Shitomir. Regierungspräsident Kurt Klemm became the Gebietskommissar. Gustav Magass was appointed as Stadtkommissar. SS-Oberführer Otto Hellwig served from November 1941 to May 1943 as the SS- und Polizeistandortführer in Generalkommissariat Shitomir. In October 1942, Gauleiter Ernst Ludwig Leyser was appointed as deputy to the Gebietskommissar. Initially the head of the Schutzpolizei was Hauptmann Friedemann from the police administration in Dresden; he was succeeded by Hauptmann Netzbandt. They each served under Gotthilf Oemler, the Kommandeur der Ordnungspolizei (KdO) in Generalkommissariat Shitomir.¹

From July to September 1941, Sonderkommando (Sk) 4a, commanded by SS-Standartenführer Paul Blobel, was the first of the various punitive German units to be deployed in the city of Zhitomir. Starting in October 1941, Einsatzkommando (Ek) 5 was deployed in the city. It was commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Herbert Meyer. In January 1942, part of Ek 5 was reorganized into the office of the Kommandeur der Sicherheitspolizei und SD (KdS) in Generalkommissariat Shitomir, which was headed until the end of 1942 by SS-Sturmbannführer Dr. Franz Razesberger.²

The first murders of Jews in Zhitomir were carried out by Sk 4a upon its arrival in the city. As of July 26, 1941, the unit had killed 363 persons; between July 27 and August 9, 1941, it killed 1,015 people; between August 10 and August 23, 1941, it killed 266 people. Of these 1,644 people who were murdered, the majority were Jews.³

At the end of July, Sk 4a shot 148 Jews “for robberies and engaging in communist activity.” Following that Aktion, Ek 5 killed another 74 Jews in the city.⁴ The best-documented anti-Jewish Aktion during this period was carried out on August 7, 1941, when 2 Jews were hanged and 402 Jews were shot in public.⁵

Further mass executions of Jews were carried out at the end of July 1941 by the 3rd Company of the 45th Police Reserve Battalion, commanded by Oberleutnant Berensen.⁶ Altogether, in the months of July and August 1941, around 2,000 Jews were murdered in the city of Zhitomir. Many of the mass shootings took place in a wooded area about 9 kilometers (5.6 miles) west of the city.

In the summer and fall of 1941, German forces implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Zhitomir. A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was established. Jews were ordered to wear distinctive armbands bearing the Star of David. Jews were also subjected to forced labor.

In August 1941, a ghetto or Jewish residential quarter was created in Zhitomir. A number of streets—Chudnovskaia, Ostrovskaia, and Katedral'naia—were cordoned off for that purpose, enclosing an area of roughly 500 by 400 meters (547 by 437 yards). Inside the ghetto area was the largest synagogue and also a former prison building, both of which were used to house Jews, together with a number of residences. The ghetto was overcrowded, with about 5 people sharing each room. Jews were not permitted to leave the ghetto, and they were forced to perform the dirtiest and hardest work.⁷ According to one witness, the ghetto was fenced with barbed wire, but it was still possible for the inhabitants to barter items for food. The Ukrainian police guarded the ghetto, but Jews were able to leave its area for one or two hours per day, and some non-Jews also approached the fence.⁸ A local census taken on September 5, 1941, registered 4,820 Jews in the ghetto.⁹

On September 19, 1941, Sk 4a carried out a large-scale Aktion against the prisoners in the ghetto. The following details are taken from Einsatzgruppen report no. 106, dated October 7, 1941:

After the resettlement of the Jews into the designated area by the Feldkommandantur, at the behest of Sonderkommando 4a, the situation in the markets and other public places appeared to calm down considerably. At the same time, stubborn rumors began to die out and it appeared that the concentration of the Jews had largely denied communist propaganda its basis of support. Within a few days, however, it seemed that the mere concentration of the Jews without the establishment of a formal ghetto was not sufficient and in a short time the previous problems emerged again. Various offices reported complaints about the insolent behavior of Jews in their places of work. It was ascertained that the Jewish living quarter was the source for the dissemination of [communist] propaganda among the Ukrainians, which asserted that the Red Army would soon return to recover its lost territory. The local police was shot at from concealed positions both at night and in broad daylight. Furthermore, it was established that Jews were selling their belongings for cash and trying to leave the city in order to settle in Western Ukraine—that is—on territory that was already under a civil administration. All these developments were confirmed, but the Jews concerned were only rarely captured, since they had sufficient possibilities to escape arrest.

Therefore, on September 18, 1941, a meeting was convened with the Feldkommandantur on this issue, which concluded that the Jews of Zhitomir should be radically and completely liquidated, since the previous warnings and special measures had not produced a noticeable relief.

On the evening of September 18, 1941, the Jewish quarter [Judenviertel] was encircled by 60 Ukrainian policemen. At 4:00 A.M. on September 19, 1941, it was cleared. The transport operation was carried out using 12 trucks, which had been made available by the Feldkommandantur and also the city administration of Zhitomir. Once the transport was completed, and the necessary preparations [digging the grave] had been completed with the assistance of 150 prisoners, 3,145 Jews were registered and executed.¹⁰

Charna Glibovskaya, who managed to escape from the ghetto at this time by telling one of the guards she was a Ukrainian from a children's home who had only come to look at the ghetto, says that the Germans duped the Jews before the Aktion by announcing that they would be resettled to the west for a better life. She understood, however, that the Germans wanted to kill the Jews and made good her escape.¹¹

In October 1941, Ek 5 and the Ukrainian police shot the majority of those who had remained alive in the ghetto after the Aktion on September 19. On October 5, 1941, a local newspaper reported that 340 Jews were still living in the city of Zhitomir.¹² These people were doctors, craftsmen, and skilled laborers, resettled into a special labor prison camp.¹³ In April 1942, a few hundred artisans and skilled laborers from Vinnitsa were added to the population of the camp.¹⁴ At least a part of the workforce was responsible for the building of Himmler's field command post (Feldkommandostelle Hegewald), which was located a few kilometers south of the city. In the second half of 1942, the majority of the prisoners in the labor camp were shot. On August 19, 1942, 237 Jewish laborers were executed.¹⁵ At the end of October and November 1942, there were two separate mass shootings: during the first one, approximately 60 people were killed, and during the second, around 300 Jews. These shootings were carried out by an SS-Feldgendarmerie company under the command of SS-Obersturmführer Karl Gillner, which was stationed in Zhitomir from May to November 1942.¹⁶ In 1943, all the remaining Jewish artisans—only a small group by this time—were murdered.

From September 15, 1941, to November 26, 1943, a number of Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) were incarcerated in what was designated as POW prison camp no. 358 (Kriegsgefangenen-Stammlager 358), located in Boguniia, on the western outskirts of the city of Zhitomir. The prison population included Jews and Communists or those suspected of being Jews and Communists. SD forces separated them from the rest of the POWs and regularly took them out to be shot in the nearby woods. Friedrich Buck, former chauffeur in the prison, testified that during the first few months of the prison's existence, he and five or six other chauffeurs transported 1,200 to 1,400 Jewish POWs to the site, where they were shot.¹⁷

Of the 7,000 or so Jews trapped in Zhitomir by the German occupation in July 1941, only around 20 people are known to have survived to be liberated by the Red Army in December 1943.

SOURCES Relevant publications include Wendy Lower, Nazi Empire-Building and the Holocaust in Ukraine (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2005), pp. 73–74, 79–83, which deals especially with anti-Jewish violence in Zhitomir during the first months of the occupation, including photographs of the public hanging of two Jews; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 31 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), Lfd. Nr. 694 (hereafter cited as JuNS-V); Y. Maliar (Israel) and F. Vinokurova, eds., Vinnitskaia oblast': Katastrofa (Shoa) i soprotivlenie. Svidetelstva evreev—uznikov kontslagerei i getto, uchastnikov partizanskogo dvizheniia i podpol'noi bor'by (Tel Aviv and Kiev, 1994); and Bernd Boll and Hans Safrian, “Auf dem Weg nach Stalingrad: Die 6. Armee 1941/42,” in Hannes Heer and Klaus Naumann, eds., Vernichtungskrieg: Verbrechen der Wehrmacht 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 1995), pp. 260–296, here pp. 270–272.

Documents on the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Zhitomir can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/214-18); BA-L (e.g., II 204 AR-Z 8/80); DAZO; GARF (7021-60-294); RGVA (1323-2-121); USHMM (e.g., RG-50.226*0009); TsDAHOU (57-4-225); VHF (e.g., # 31379); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SShO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March, 13, 1942. See also the memorandum (Schnellbrief) of the Security Police chief of October 25, 1941, in RGVA, 1323-2-121, pp. 33–34; and the Abschlussbericht d. Zentralen Stelle der Landesjustizverwaltungen Ludwigsburg betr. Kommandeur der Sipo u.d. SD in Shitomir, February 20, 1980 (BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 8/80, Bd. I).

2. Abschlussbericht betr. Kommandeur der Sipo u.d. SD in Shitomir, February 20, 1980 (BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 8/80, Bd. I).

3. Ereignismeldungen UdSSR nos. 30, 37, 38, 47, 58, 86 (BA-BL, R 58/214-17). See also the Ukrainian-language newspaper Ukrains'ke slovo (Zhitomir), August 3, 1941. It included an announcement that the shooting of Jews in the city was a reprisal for alleged Jewish arson attacks. GARF, 7021-60-294, p. 116.

4. Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 58 (BA-BL, R 58/216). Details about the operations can be found in Schwurgericht bei dem Landgericht in Darmstadt, Urteil vom November 29, 1968 in der Strafsache gegen Kuno Callsen u.a., in JuNS-V, vol. 31, Lfd. Nr. 694.

5. See Ernst Klee, Willi Dressen, and Volker Reiss, The Good Old Days: The Holocaust as Seen by Its Perpetrators & Bystanders (New York: Konecky & Konecky, 1997), pp. 107–117.

6. On these murders, see the report of January 3, 1942, by Major Rösler, commander of the 528th Infantry Brigade, in Prestupnye tseli—prestupnye sredstva (Moscow, 1968), pp. 108–112.

7. VHF, # 31379, testimony of Michail Blioumenfeld; GARF, 7021-60-164; 7021-60-294, p. 118; TsDAHOU, 57-4-225. A German translation of the Soviet protocol dated February 5–16, 1944, can be found in BA-L, B 162/5681, pp. 129–137.

8. VHF, # 31379.

9. GARF, 7021-60-294, pp. 83, 118. See also report of Feldkommandantur 197, September 20, 1941, which reads: “In almost all the territories of the Feldkommandantur there are no Jews left. Only in Zhitomir, there still remained approximately 5,000 Jews on September 18, assembled in a ghetto.” NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 34, fr. 46.

10. Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 106, October 7, 1941 (BA-BL, R 58/218). On the details of this operation, see Schwurgericht bei dem Landgericht in Darmstadt, Urteil vom November 29, 1968 in der Strafsache gegen Kuno Callsen u.a., in JuNS-V, vol. 31, Lfd. Nr. 694.

11. USHMM, RG-50.226*0009, interview with Charna Glibovskaya.

12. Abschlussbericht d. Zentralen Stelle der Landesjustizverwaltungen Ludwigsburg betr. Kommandeur der Sipo u.d. SD in Shitomir, February 20, 1980 (BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 8/80, Bd. I, p. 73).

13. BA-L, 204 AR-Z 1301/61, p. 4, statement of Karl Kietzmänn, September 9, 1960, as cited by Lower, Nazi Empire-Building, p. 234.

14. Testimony of the witness Boris Pritsker, in Maliar and Vinokurova, Vinnitskaia oblast', p. 105.

15. Khronika Kholokosta v Ukraine (Dnepropetrovsk: Tsentri “Tkuma”; Zaporozh'e: Prem'er, 2004), p. 117.

16. Abschlussbericht betr. Kommandeur der Sipo u.d. SD in Shitomir, February 20, 1980 (BA-L, II 204 AR-Z 8/80, Bd. I, pp. 75–76).

17. Ibid., p. 83.

ZHORNISHCHE

Pre-1941: Zhornishche, village, Il'intsy raion, Vinnitsa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Shornishchtsche, Rayon and Gebiet Illinzi, Generalkommissariat Shitomir; post-1991: Zhornysbche, Vinnytsia raion and oblast', Ukraine

Zhornishche is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) east-southeast of Vinnitsa. According to the 1939 census, 375 Jews resided in all the villages of the Il'intsy raion, but most lived in Zhornishche.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the village on July 16, 1941. The German occupation forces appointed a village headman (Gordienko), a chairman of the village council (Kozovenko), and two Ukrainian policemen. The village headman was sentenced to 15 years in a corrective labor camp after the war, and the chairman of the village council was killed by partisans in February 1943.

In August 1941, the German Security Police organized the first Aktion against the Jews in the village. They arrested and shot 13 Jewish men, including one teenage refugee from Vinnitsa.¹

In September 1941, a ghetto was created in the center of the village, to which all Jews were relocated—both local residents and refugees from Vinnitsa. The ghetto was guarded by the local policemen, the village headman, and the chairman of the village council to ensure that nobody left without permission. Jews had to wear armbands with a blue Star of David on a white background. A certain number of Jews were assigned to various work tasks, mainly in agriculture, each day.²

1582 ZHYTOMYR REGION

In October 1941, authority was transferred from the military to a civil administration. Zhornishche was located in Gebiet Illinzi, within Generalkommissariat Shitomir. The Gebietskommissar in Il'intsy was Kreisleiter Heinrich Scholdra. The Gendarmerie post in Il'intsy was commanded by Meister Andreas Wagner. The German Gendarmerie also took over responsibility for the Ukrainian local police, which was renamed the Schutzmannschaft.

On May 27, 1942, a team of Security Police assisted by the Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft surrounded the Zhornishche ghetto at night. These forces rounded up all the Jews living there (some 200 to 300) and escorted them to Il'intsy. Here they were shot, together with Jews from the Il'intsy ghetto, in pits just outside the town.³

Some Jews evaded the roundup by hiding, including Boris Yavorsky and two of his siblings, who hid in an attic. The three children (aged 8, 13, and 15) survived with the help of non-Jewish friends, the Vershigora family. They received shelter and food in return for work and were not betrayed to the authorities. Subsequently they moved to the Romanian-occupied area, where they became inmates of the ghetto in Pechera. Only about 20 Jewish residents of Zhornishche are known to have survived.⁴

SOURCES The testimony of Boris Yavorsky concerning the fate of the Jews of Zhornishche has been published in the volume edited by Boris Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine (Portland, OR: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005), pp. 385–387. The ghetto in Zhornishche is also mentioned in A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravoch-nik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 116. A brief article on the Jewish community in Zhornishche can be found in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2000), 4:453.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, p. 385 (testimony of Boris Yavorsky).
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid., p. 386.
4. Ibid., pp. 386–387; GARF, 7021-54-1243, pp. 45, 99.

KIEV REGION

A member of Sonderkommando 4a orders Jews to undress at the killing site at Lubny in Generalkommissariat Kiev, October 16, 1941. Piles of clothing can be seen in the background; from the Johannes Hähle photographic collection.
USHMM WS #83022, COURTESY OF A-HIS

KIEV REGION (GENERALKOMMISSARIAT KIEW)

Pre-1941: Kiev and Poltava oblasts, Ukrainian SSR, Soviet Union; 1941–1943: initially Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd), then from September 1941 (west bank of the Dnieper River) or from September 1942 (east bank of Dnieper) Generalkommissariat Kiew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; 1943: Kiev and Poltava oblasts, Ukrainian SSR; 1954: Kiev and Poltava, and part of Cherkassy oblasts; 1991: Ukraine

Generalkommissariat Kiew (GkK) was a German administrative unit carved out of the pre-war Soviet Kiev and Poltava oblasts. In contrast to western Ukraine, especially Distrikt Galizien, where a number of ghettos existed until the summer of 1943, in the eastern and central regions of Ukraine almost all ghettos were destroyed in the fall of 1941 or the spring and summer of 1942. Judging from available sources, such as Soviet and German wartime situation reports, war crimes trial records, and survivor testimonies, it appears that the longevity of the ghettos in GkK depended on the will and whim of the local German military and civil administrations. In accordance with Nazi guidelines, German officials aimed at the total annihilation of Soviet Jews as the most dangerous racial and political enemy of the Third Reich. However, they retained a substantial degree of autonomy in administering the ghettos, depending on the specific needs of the army and the civil administration. In localities with large Jewish populations, the Germans created some “work ghettos,” whose inmates were temporarily deployed to perform a variety of agricultural and construction tasks. Other Jewish ghettos became merely “death traps,” serving as collection points until the killing units arrived in the locality or the local administration had the manpower necessary to complete the mass murders.

Before the Soviet invasion of Poland in September 1939, Kiev oblast’ contained the largest Jewish community of the Ukrainian SSR—297,409 people including 224,236 in the city of Kiev. In Poltava oblast’, the majority of Jews—32,740 out of 46,928—also lived in the largest urban centers of Poltava and Kremenchug. Since Soviet contingency plans prioritized the evacuation to the east of industries, specialists, and state and party functionaries, large numbers of Jews who belonged to these categories and their families were evacuated in the summer and early fall of 1941. From Kiev alone, about two thirds of the Jewish population—approximately 140,000 people (of the total 335,000 evacuees)—left in July to September of 1941. Similarly, between 50 and 70 percent of the Jews in Poltava oblast’ were also evacuated.¹

In late September 1941 in the area west of the Dnieper River, the German military was replaced by the civil administration. Kiev oblast’ on the west bank was named the Generalkommissariat Kiew and became a part of the Reichskommissariat Ukraine (RKU). The east bank of Kiev oblast’ and the entire Poltava oblast’ remained under the jurisdiction of the Rear Area Army Group South until September 1942, when it was also transferred to the RKU. The Generalkommissar in Kiev supervised the district chiefs, or Gebietskom-missars. Military commandants performed similar functions in the east bank area. On both sides of the Dnieper, low-level administrative posts were filled mainly with reliable Ukrainians, Russians, and some ethnic Germans.

The blueprint for ghettoization in the Soviet Union was the “Brown Folder,” which defined ghettos as the means to separate Jews from the rest of the population and exclude them from social, cultural, and economic life. In his May 1941 provisional guidelines, Alfred Rosenberg, who would head the Ministry of the Occupied Territories, proposed that Jews in the occupied territories were to be removed from all spheres of public life, concentrated in ghettos, and forced to work on construction and in agriculture. All Jewish property was to be registered and confiscated. After the war broke out, several additional decrees stipulated the deployment of Jewish men and women aged 14 to 60 into labor details and the supervision of the ghettos by the Jewish Councils and the Jewish Police.² The RKU government issued similar instructions to create “Jewish residential districts” in localities with over 200 Jews. The inmates of the ghettos were to be prohibited from leaving the premises without a special authorization. Although on paper Jewish laborers were to be paid for their services, special taxes were levied on Jews so that most payments came back to the RKU treasury.³

The German military matched the initiative of its civil counterparts. In mid-July 1941, the commander of Rear Area Army Group South Karl von Roques ordered the creation of Jewish ghettos and the formation of labor details deployed for clearing rubble and repairing streets; Jewish communities were to pay for transportation and equipment. Jewish religious services were prohibited and religious artifacts confiscated. Further directives of the German High Command specified the racial definition of a “Jew” according to Nazi regulations, authorized the registration and labeling of the Jews, and ordered the formation of Jewish Councils.⁴

The ghettoization process began with the registration and labeling of Jews by the Ukrainian town and village councils. The councils also assisted the military in selecting ghetto sites, often in large vacant structures, such as stables, abandoned factories, schools, or military barracks. The size of the ghettos varied according to the Jewish population. Thus, in a large pre-war Jewish enclave in Belaia Tserkov’, up to 4,000 Jews from the town and vicinity were ghettoized in the former military barracks and a brick factory. In Zvenigorodka, the ghetto was confined to several houses, where at least 2,000 Jews from the district and Jewish refugees from western Ukraine and Belorussia shared a very limited space. In the east bank area, one of the largest ghettos was in Kremenchug, where about 3,000 Jews were confined to a military barracks. In contrast to many ghettos in GkK, the military commandant in Kremenchug ordered the ghetto fenced, to prevent “Jewish sabotage.” In Piriatin, the ghetto grew from several hundred to 1,500 Jews by the spring of 1942, while in Kobeliaki, around 100 older Jews were confined to a ghetto on the town’s outskirts. Since the Kobeliaki military commandant expected that the ghetto would soon be liquidated, food rations for the inmates were drastically reduced.⁵

That the Germans expected the ghettos to exist only for a short time is attested to by their makeshift character—most were unfenced, and in a number of places, like Lokhvitsa, most Jews were allowed to live in their pre-war houses and apartments. Some small Jewish communities of several dozen individuals were not ghettoized. As long as the German Army needed Jewish skills, a number of blacksmiths, tailors, and shoemakers were allowed to operate outside the confined areas. In total, during the second half of 1941, about 25,000 Jews were confined within about 26 ghettos in GkK and the area then still under military control; of these ghettos, 7 had already been liquidated by the end of the year.

Life in the ghettos was strictly regulated by numerous restrictions and prohibitions. Entering and leaving the premises was forbidden without a special permit. The Ukrainian police set up checkpoints, and those who avoided ghettoization or were apprehended outside the ghetto were shot as a deterrent for others. Maintaining contact with non-Jews was also prohibited, although in Zvenigorodka ghetto inmates were occasionally allowed to go to the local market to buy food. The Germans appointed Jewish elders, selected from the Jewish intelligentsia or religious Jews. For example, in Uman one of the councilmen was Dr. Rabinovich (later hanged by the Germans), while in Belaia Tserkov’ some members were of more modest social origin. The elders were to oversee the collection of valuables, money, and furniture from ghetto inmates, and in the countryside, of cattle and poultry. In several large ghettos the administration ordered the formation of a unit of Jewish Police to enforce order among the inmates. Survivors from Uman recall the policewoman Ida Teplitskaia-Shkodnik, who in an attempt to curry favor with the Germans was especially brutal to her fellow Jews.⁶

Day in the ghetto began with the formation of labor details. Under the supervision of the Jewish Councils, all inmates with the exception of small children were dispatched for various forced labor tasks. In the summer and early fall of 1941, Jews in Piatigory, Boguslav, and Skvira collected the harvest and were initially remunerated with grain. In Chernobyl’, the ghetto residents had to collect scrap metal; in Ol’shana, they cleaned fuel containers and repaired roads; in Cherkassy and Korsun’ Shevchenkovskii, they cleaned the streets, and in Tarashcha and Boguslav, they repaired roads. Some Jewish women cleaned German officers’ quarters and worked as maids in German hospitals. In winter, the Jews in the ghettos were deployed to clear snow from roads. In some localities, Jewish laborers received rations of flour or millet or between 200 and 400 grams (7 and 14 ounces) of bread a day; nonworking family members received only 200 grams. Because of German food rationing and corruption among Ukrainian councilmen, by late September or early October 1941, most ghettos faced starvation.⁷

The threat of death was an ever-present psychological burden as the Germans used reprisals for any alleged “transgressions” such as unfulfilled work quotas or violation of the curfew. For example, in Uman, when fire broke out in a German office, several Jews were publicly hanged. The conditions became especially precarious as the first cold set in. Since the ghettos had no heat or electricity, and water had to be brought in from neighboring wells, they were soon hit by a wave of epidemics. Fearing the spread of disease, in some ghettos, such as Ol’shana and Kremenchug, the Germans allowed Jewish medical personnel to attend the inmates. In Zvenigorodka, Dr. Starosel’skaia performed complicated surgery without necessary medication or equipment. Jewish dentists also treated Jews and German officials.⁸

Robbery, economic exploitation, and deliberate starvation of Jews served as the tools for the ethnic “remapping” of Ukraine. In the fall of 1941, the killing units returned to the localities they had “combed” in the summer. On September 21, local rabble and German soldiers carried out a vicious pogrom in Uman, sparked by antisemitic agitation in the town newspaper Uman’skyi holos, which caused Einsatzkommando (Ek) 5 to complain that it had disrupted their “planning” for the orderly mass execution of the Jews. Once order was restored, on September 22 and 23, Ek 5 and the Order Police murdered about 1,400 Uman Jews. A group of young Jewish women was spared and deployed to help build roads using grave stones from the Jewish cemetery.⁹

The attitudes of the Ukrainian population towards the ghettos varied from direct participation in German anti-Jewish policies to providing assistance and shelter. All survivors and eyewitnesses stress the deadly role of the Ukrainian police, which in many localities supervised the ghettos and robbed the Jews at will. These policemen hunted Jews who escaped or avoided ghettoization, and they participated in mass executions with or without German supervision. Ukrainian guards also constantly harassed and brutalized Jewish labor details. Some Ukrainians and Russians entered ghettos to barter food for Jewish valuables, money, or furniture, enriching themselves at the expense of their former neighbors. In other instances, Ukrainians moved into empty Jewish apartments.¹⁰ On the other hand, Jewish survivors admit that they managed to escape death because of the bravery and kindness of individual Ukrainians and Russians. Galina Klotzman, who posed as a Ukrainian in Piatigory, recalls that local Ukrainians were helpful to her, while one policeman warned the ghetto inmates of impending Aktions. The Kremenchug mayor, Synytsia Verkhovs’kyi, provided Jews with false baptism certificates and was later executed by the Germans.¹¹

The speed of destruction in the eastern regions of the USSR impeded organized resistance in the ghettos. In contrast to Lithuania, Belorussia, and Eastern Galicia, where the traditional communal structures of Jewish communities contributed to resistance, in Soviet Ukraine it came mainly in the form of individual acts of defiance. Thus, in GkK some Jews escaped from the ghettos and joined the partisans, while others avoided registration, wandered in the countryside, or posed as Ukrainians or Russians.¹²

In comparison to Reichskommissariat Ostland (the Baltic regions and Belorussia), where economic considerations forced the German civil administration to slow down the killing, there was very little letup in the annihilation in GkK. Problems with food supplies in urban centers—largely due to Soviet scorched-earth policies and German requisitions—caused the German administration to reduce food rations for non-Germans, especially Jews. Those incapable of work were deemed “superfluous mouths” and were marked for annihilation. Once the ghettos in GkK had been robbed of their financial means, they outlived their usefulness. Hence, racial and economic considerations drove the resumption of mass murder.

With the assistance of the German military and civil administration, Einsatzgruppe C and the forces of the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) Friedrich Jeckeln (from late October, Hans Prützmann) continued their murderous task. The same ruse was used to allay the fears of the victims—public announcements indicated that the ghetto inmates would be “resettled,” and Jews had to have warm clothing and provisions for several days. Between the end of September and the end of November 1941, Jeckeln organized several mass shootings in Kremenchug, which resulted in the deaths of 8,000 Jews from the city and its environs. By December, the majority of Jewish males had been murdered on both sides of the Dnieper River. In small localities the Ukrainian police did the killing or escorted victims to the collection points for mass executions.

The “second sweep” in central and eastern regions of Ukraine began in the winter, rather than in the spring of 1942. It appears there was no specific instruction from Berlin to resume the annihilation, but local German officials took the initiative as soon as they had the means to carry it out. Again, the “Jewish question” was viewed as the core of economic and security issues. Thus, the administration expected that the murder of Jews would solve the food-supply problem. In addition, since Jews were allegedly fomenting resistance, their murder would nip the growing partisan movement in the bud. In January 1942, Einsatzgruppe C and the HSSPF murdered Jews from the ghettos in Zolotonosha, Zen’kov, and Kremenchug as part of an antipartisan sweep through the region. Military commandants stimulated the killing by requesting that the “Jewish problem” within their jurisdiction be solved as soon as possible. Simultaneously, the killing also accelerated in the RKU area. In the first months of 1942, Gendarmes and Ukrainian police shot more than 500 Jews in Belaia Tserkov’ in several Aktions.¹³

In early spring, RKU headquarters ordered the “removal” of all Jews not employed in German enterprises and construction. On March 1, Reichskommissar Erich Koch authorized Prützmann to take over the “Jewish affairs.” He was assisted by the Chief of the Security Police and SD in the RKU Max Thomas. Thomas ordered all the Sipo/SD commanders to report how many Jews were still in the areas of their jurisdiction and to begin their liquidation.¹⁴ On March 17, 800 Jews from the Shpola ghetto were murdered, and 500 younger inmates were sent to construction camps near the town, where they had perished by December 1942. The German administration also spared 13 Jewish tailors and blacksmiths, who survived until 1943. The destruction of the Uman ghetto proceeded along similar lines. On April 22, 1942, the Germans selected able-bodied inmates for the so-called Durchgangsstrasse (highway) IV (DG IV) strategic construction camps. The remaining Jews were shot.¹⁵ In the Zvenigorodka ghetto the Germans concentrated approximately 1,500 Jews from the town and the district. In June they separated out able-bodied individuals who were assigned to the DG IV. Jewish craftsmen and their families were also temporarily spared until August 1943. The remaining 1,375 people were shot in a nearby meadow.

SS-Obergruppenführer Hans Prützmann, Higher SS and Police Leader of Ukraine-Russia South (right), reports to Reichsführer-SS Heinrich Himmler, ca. 1942.

USHMM WS #60411, COURTESY OF JAMES BLEVINS

Thus, by the summer of 1942 the majority of the ghettos had been destroyed. Nevertheless, the German civil administration still retained small Jewish enclaves, disregarding Heinrich Himmler’s insistence on the total liquidation of Jews. In Uman, Gebietskommissar Rudiger still maintained a small remnant ghetto until the winter of 1942–1943.

Most surviving Jews were employed on the DG IV. The SS transferred those exempted from the ghetto massacres to a series of construction camps, including those in Smel'chintsy, Budishche, and Nemorozh along the road. The ghetto in Buki was converted into a labor camp, once those incapable of work had been shot and other working Jews were brought in. Conditions in the camps were similar to life in the ghettos except that the numbers of inmates were smaller, and those incapable of work were immediately liquidated. The inmates lived in barracks, pigsties, and stables; wore armbands with the Star of David; and were prohibited from leaving the quarters. Receiving rations of only 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread daily, they labored 14 hours a day felling trees or working in stone quarries. Constantly brutalized by Ukrainian and Lithuanian guards, the camp inmates were subjected to frequent "selections," and those no longer able to work were shot. The last Jewish labor camps were liquidated in the summer of 1943.

The history of the Jewish ghettos in the GkK reveals the relatively decentralized Nazi ghettoization policies. Although the ghettos served German economic interests by performing a wide variety of work tasks, the availability of Ukrainian laborers rendered them only temporarily useful and hence easily discarded. In addition, the smaller numbers of Jews remaining here—in comparison with Weissruthenien or Wolhynien und Podolien—made the killing process easier and quicker. Hence, the existence of the ghettos depended entirely on the will of the local civil or military administration. Simultaneously with the liquidation of the ghettos, the local German administration—the DG IV is the case in point—retained small numbers of Jewish laborers to be killed more slowly through work (Vernichtung durch Arbeit). Very few Jews survived from these ghettos, leaving only a fragmentary picture behind for historians.

SOURCES There are very few secondary sources dealing specifically with the fate of the Jews and particularly with German ghettoization policies in GkK. Of the many books and articles on the Holocaust in Ukraine, the following include key information on this specific region: Dieter Pohl, "The Murder of Ukraine's Jews under German Military Administration and in the Reich Commissariat Ukraine," in Ray Brandon and Wendy Lower, eds., The Shoah in Ukraine: History, Testimony, Memorialization (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2008); Yitzhak Arad, "Alfred Rosenberg and the 'Final Solution' in the Occupied Soviet Territories," Yad Vashem Studies 13 (1979); Wendy Lower, "Facilitating Genocide: Nazi Ghettoization Practices in Occupied Ukraine, 1941–1942," in Eric J. Sterling, ed., Life in the Ghettos during the Holocaust (Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2005), pp. 120–144; Norbert Müller, "Massenverbrechen von Wehrmachtorganen an der sowjetischen Zivilbevölkerung im Sommer/Herbst 1941," Zeitschrift für Militärgeschichte 8:5 (1969); Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005); Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001); Il'ja Al'tmann, Opfer des Hasses: Der Holocaust in der UdSSR 1941–1945 (Zurich: Gleichen, 2008); and Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000).

Relevant collections of testimonies and other primary sources include the following: Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007); Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002); Pinchas Agmon and Iosif Maliar, eds., Vagne katastrofy (Shoa) na Ukrainie: Sviditel'stva evreev-uznikov kontslagerei i getto, uchastnikov partizanskogo dvizheniia (Kiryat-Heim, Israel: Izdatel'stvo "Beit lokhamei kha-gettaot," 1998); F.D. Sverdlov, ed., Dokumenty obviniaiat. Kholokost: Sviditel'stva Krasnoi Armii (Moscow: Nauchno-prosvetitel'nyi tsentr "Kholokost," 1996); Samuil Gil', Krov' ikh i segodnia govorit: O katastrofe i geroizme evreev v gorodakh i mestechkakh Ukrainy (New York, 1995); I.M. Liakhovitskii, Perezhivshie katastrofu: Spassbieszia, spasiteli, kollaboranty, martirolog, sviditel'stva, fakty, dokumenty (Kharkov-Jerusalem, 1996); and Boris Zabarko, ed., Holocaust in the Ukraine (London: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; DACHO; DAKiO; DAPO; GARF; NARA; RGVA; TsDAHOU; TsDAVO; USHMM; VHAP; VHF; and YVA.

Alexander Prusin

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-11.001M, reel 92, p. 15.
2. Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal (IMT) (Nuremberg: n.p., 1947), 25:302–303.
3. TsDAVO, 3206-2-30, pp. 13 verso, 23 and 23 verso.
4. NARA, RG-242, T-315, reel 2217, fr. 111.
5. USHMM, RG-11.001M.15 (Osobyi Fond # 1323), reel 80, p. 18; NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 7, fr. 499–504, reel 33, fr. 000391; TsDAVO, KMF-8-2-157, vol. 2, p. 75; TsDAHOU, 166-3-242, pp. 36–39; DAPO, r-3388-1-688, pp. 5–6.
6. USHMM, RG-31.018 (SBU), reel 4, case. 1747, pp. 24, 32, 33–35.
7. USHMM, RG-50.226, # 0015, 0022, 0024; USHMM, SBU, reel 3, case. 19896, vol. 3, p. 14, reel 4, case. 1747, pp. 24, 32, 33–35; TsDAHOU, 62-9-4, pp. 157–158, 166-3-351, pp. 1–3, 166-3-256, p. 1, 166-3-242, pp. 38–39; DACHO, r-51-1-20, p. 10.
8. TsDAVO, KMF-8/2/157, t. 1, p. 244; USHMM, RG-50.226, # 0016 and 0032; DAKiO, 4758-2-20, p. 30; USHMM, SBU, reel 7, case. 7250, p. 97.
9. NARA, RG-242, T-175, reel 234, fr. 976, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 119; USHMM, SBU, reel 4, case. 1747, pp. 19–20, 163.
10. USHMM, SBU, reel 4, case. 1747, pp. 33–35, reel 5, case. 4452, vol. 2, pp. 7–24; TsDAHOU, 166-3-242, pp. 38–39.
11. NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 7, fr. 499–504; TsDAVO, KMF-8-2-157, vol. 2, pp. 75, 238, 4620-3-236, p. 144; TsDAHOU, 62-9-4, pp. 157–158, 166-3-242, pp. 37–39; DACHO, r-51/1/20, p. 10; USHMM, RG-50.226, # 0015.

VOLUME II: PART B

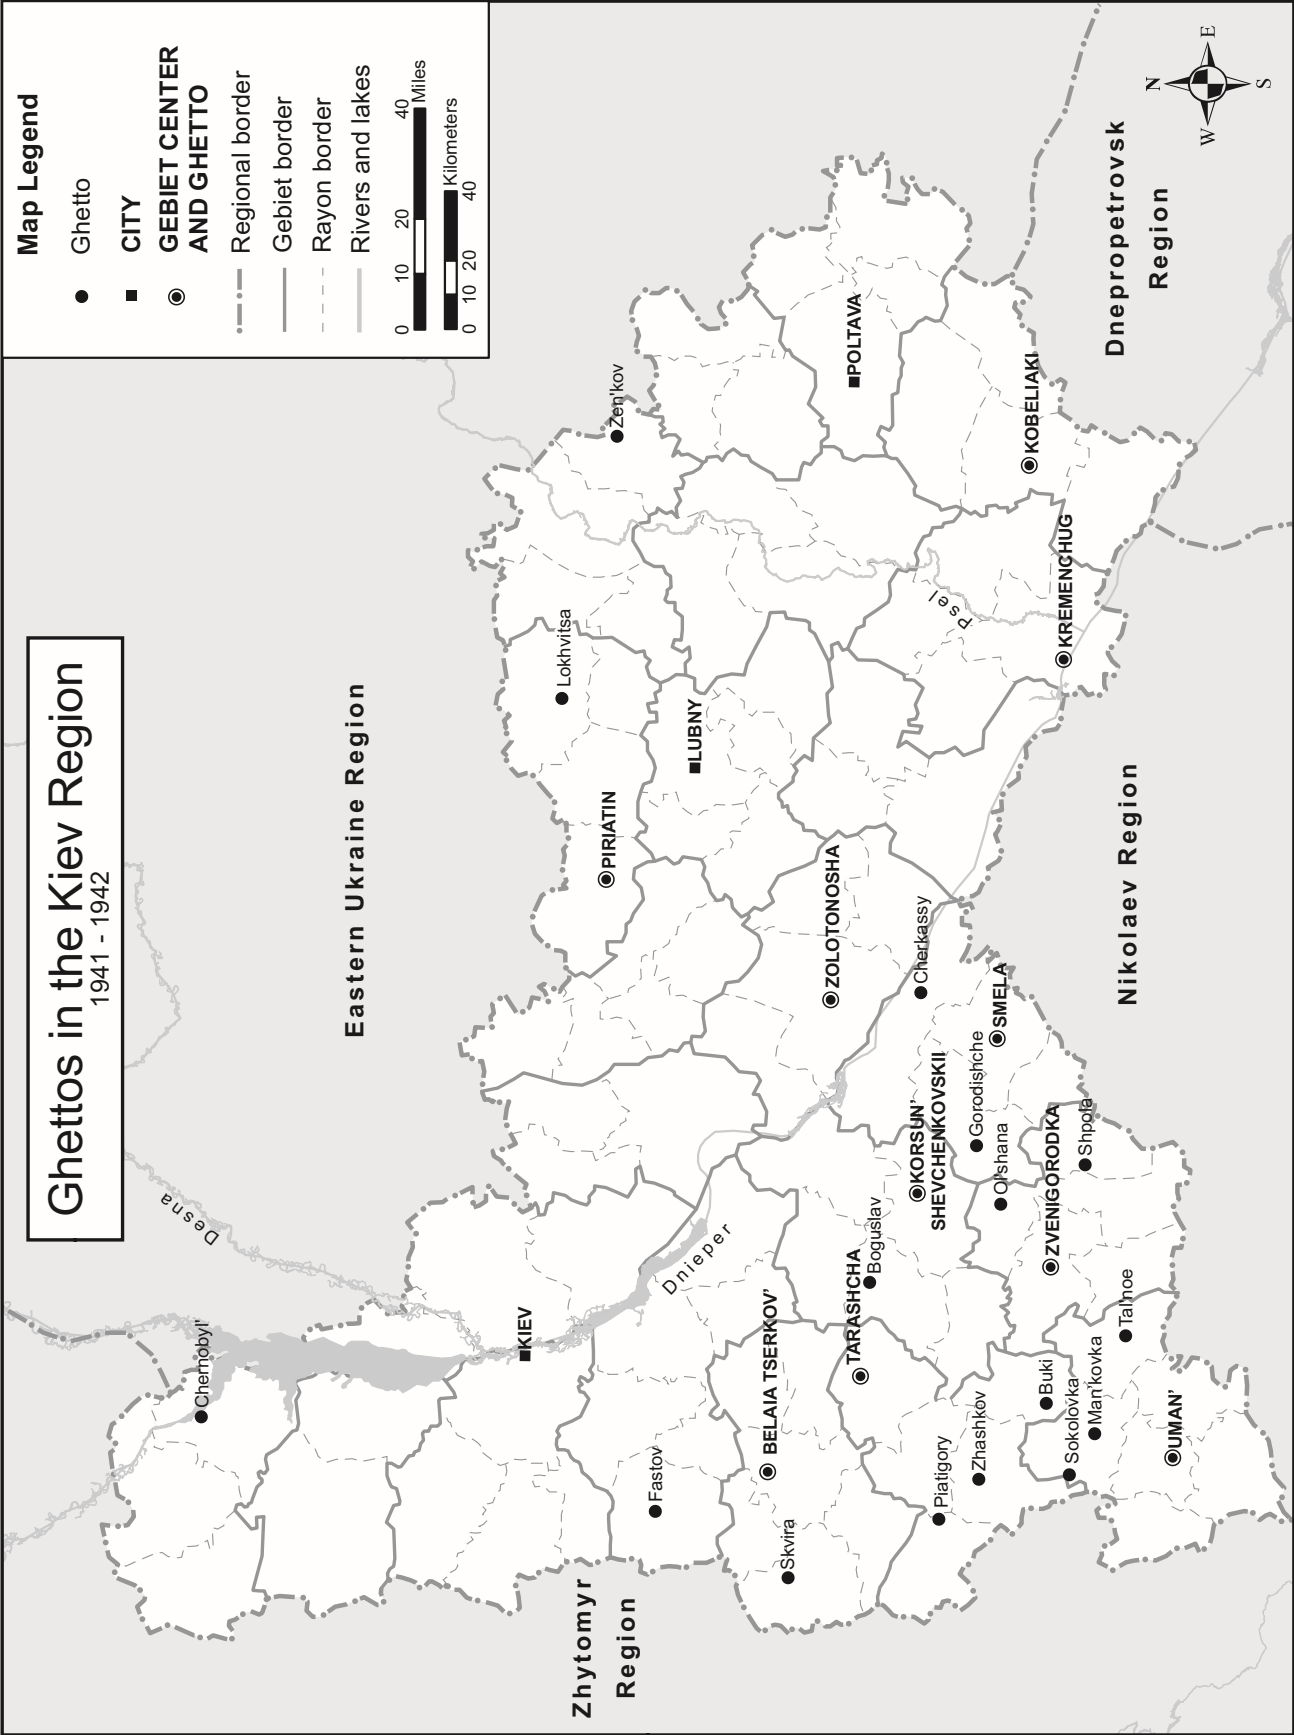

1588 REICH COMMISSARIAT UKRAINE

12. NARA, RG-242, T-175, reel 233, fr. 2722586, EM no. 94; T-501, reel 33, fr. 391, reel 349, fr. 483, 486, 569–570, 611.

13. NARA, RG-242, T-175, reel 235, fr. 2722675, EM no. 156; T-501, reel 7, fr. 415, 424; USHMM, RG-48.004M (VHAP), reel 1, fr. 100899, 100950, 100955; BA-L, B 162/6650, Ermittlungsverfahren gegen die Angehörigen des Polizeiregiments ‘Süd,’ Bd. 2, pp. 376–377.

14. TsDAVO, 3206-2-3, pp. 12–14; 3206-2-14, pp. 5–6; KMF-8-2-175, pp. 99, 148; NARA, RG-242, reel 39, fr. 000259-000261, 000267-000268; BA-L, B 162/1570, Ermittlungsverfahren gegen Robert Mohr, Bd. 1, p. 56.

15. USHMM, SBU, reel 4, case. 1747, pp. 15–17, 21; TsDAHOU, 1-22-269, vol. 1, p. 118, 166-3-351, p. 3; GARF, 7021-65-241, pp. 46, 87–88; TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, p. 7.

Boundaries as of August 1942

BELAIA TSERKOV'

Pre-1941: Belaia Tserkov', town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Belaja Zerkow, Gebiet and Rayon center, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Bila Tserkva, Kiev oblast', Ukraine

Belaia Tserkov' is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) south-southwest of Kiev. On the eve of the German invasion, there were 9,284 Jews in Belaia Tserkov'.

After the beginning of the Soviet-German war, approximately half of the Jews of the city managed to evacuate. On July 16, 1941, the Germans captured Belaia Tserkov', and in August the military administration ordered Jews from the town and the surrounding area to move into a ghetto located in the former Red Army military barracks and in a brick factory with no light or water. Between 2,000 and 4,000 ghetto residents were registered and made to wear identifying insignia. A council of elders was established to assign Jews to various work tasks, especially collecting the harvest, street cleaning, and tree felling.¹ On August 19–20, 1941, a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a shot adult Jews near POW Camp (Stalag) 334; about 500 people were murdered. On August 22, under the supervision of a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a, led by SS-Obersturmführer August Häfner, the Ukrainian police shot 90 Jewish children. The murder of the children marked the beginning of the attempt to exterminate the Jews in the USSR.² According to some sources, there was another mass shooting of about 3,000 Jews in the city at the beginning of September 1941.³

In October 1941, the military administration was replaced by a German civil administration. Belaia Tserkov' was integrated into Generalkommissariat Kiev in Reichskommissariat Ukraine. The district commissar (Gebietskommissar) in Belaia Tserkov' was Regierungsrat Dr. Stelzer. Among the leaders of the Ukrainian police in Belaia Tserkov', notorious for his brutality, was Anton Spak.⁴

Several hundred Jews remained in the ghetto and were deployed to clean the streets. The Ukrainian police closely supervised the Jews and guarded the ghetto. In January 1942, the Gendarmes and Ukrainian police carried out a further Aktion, capturing about 30 old and sick Jews, who were taken to the site near the POW camp and shot. In February, in a large sweep through the district, the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police escorted several hundred Jews to the town where they were placed in two prisons. Then 100 Jews incapable of work were shot. On March 15, 1942, the Gendarmerie and the Ukrainian police murdered about 500 Jewish men, women, and children at Stalag 334. The last large killing Aktion took place in early May, when the Security Police from Belaia Tserkov', the Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian police murdered all the remaining Jews in the ghetto. As late as September 1943, the Germans were bringing Jews from the surrounding countryside to Belaia Tserkov', where they were murdered.⁵

SOURCES Background information on the Jewish community of Belaia Tserkov' can be found in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 99. On the murder of the Jewish children, see Ernst Klee, Willi Dressen, and Volker Riess, eds., "The Good Old Days": The Holocaust as Seen by Its Perpetrators and Bystanders (New York: Free Press, 1988), pp. 138–151; and Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, ed., Verbrechen der Wehrmacht: Dimensionen des Vernichtungskrieges 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2002), pp. 598–605.

References to the murder of the Jews of Belaia Tserkov' can be found in documents from the following archives: BA-L (B 162, AR-Z 269/60, AR-Z 11/61, AR 1.477/62, AR-Z 1.163/62, and AR-Z 21/58); NARA (RG-242, T-175 and T-501); USHMM (RG-06.025*02 and RG-31.018M); and YVA.

Alexander Prusin

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-06.025*02, "War Crimes Investigation and Prosecution," microfiche 19, file 312; NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 7, fr. 000886, reel 33, fr. 000886; F.D. Sverdlov, ed., Dokumenty obviniaut. Kholokost: Svidetel'stva Krasnoi Armii. (Moscow: Nauchno-prosvetitel'nyi tsentr "Kholokost," 1996), pp. 51–52.

2. NARA, RG-242, T-175 (Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 86, September 17, 1941), reel 233, fr. 27222379; T-501, reel 7, fr. 000886; USHMM, RG-06.025*02, "War Crimes Investigation and Prosecution," microfiche 19, file 312; BA-L, AR-Z 269/60, Ermittlungsverfahren gegen die Angehörigen der Sk 4a, Bd. 34, pp. 374–375.

3. Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005), pp. 108–111.

4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942. On the activities of Anton Spak, see Their True Face (Kiev: Ukraina Society, 1978), pp. 50–57. Spak retreated with the Germans and later migrated to Canada.

5. USHMM, RG-06.025*02, "War Crimes Investigation and Prosecution," microfiche 2, file 133; microfiche 19, file 311, 312; USHMM, RG-31.018M, Acc.2002.97, "Postwar war crimes trials related to the Holocaust," reel 3, spr. 56527, ark. 14, 24, 62rev-63, 106rev-107; BA-L, B 162/3785, p. 174 (AR-Z 11/61, Ermittlungsverfahren gegen die Angehörigen der Sk 4b); BA-L, B 162/2643, pp. 1849–1857, 2645, p. 3175 (AR-Z 21/58, Ermittlungsverfahren gegen Erich Ehrlinger u.a.); BA-L, B 162/5999 (AR-Z 1.163/62, Ermittlungsverfahren gegen die Angehörigen der Dienststelle des KdS Kiev), p. 4.

BOGUSLAV

Pre-1941: Boguslav, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Boguslaw, Gebiet Korsun, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Bobuslav, Kiev oblast', Ukraine

Boguslav is located about 100 kilometers (62 miles) south-southeast of Kiev on the Ros' River. According to the 1926 population census, the Jewish population of Boguslav was 6,432 out of a total of 12,140.¹ The 1939 census reported the figure of 2,230 Jews, or 25.53 percent of the total population. An additional 195 Jews were residing in what was then the Boguslav raion (including 125 Jews living in the villages of Medvin).² This considerable decline in the Jewish population was due mainly to the migration of Jews to other areas.

The German Army occupied Boguslav on July 26, 1941, about one month after the German attack on the Soviet Union. Following the invasion, most Jews managed to evacuate eastward, while those eligible for military service were either drafted or volunteered for the Red Army. Only around 15 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Boguslav under German occupation. In the summer and fall of 1941, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. The German military administration set up a town council and an auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. The latter took an active part in the anti-Jewish Aktions.

In November 1941, the military authorities were replaced by a German civil administration. Boguslav was incorporated into Gebiet Korsun, where Gemeinschaftsführer Lomann was appointed as Gebietskommissar. Gebiet Korsun was in turn part of Generalkommissariat Kiew in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.³

Soon after the occupation of the town, the German military commandant ordered the newly established Jewish Council (Judenrat) to register all the local Jews. They were forced to wear a distinctive armband on their sleeves and were employed for forced labor tasks (including road maintenance and construction work).

In August 1941, the German occupying forces conducted a first Aktion in Boguslav, in which 45 people (including some Jews) were seized and shot as Communists and Soviet activists.⁴ On August 15–20, 1941, the military commandant ordered all the Jews to be resettled into one area of the town (Proval'naya Street), which was declared to be a "Jewish residential district."⁵ This open ghetto was liquidated one month later, on September 15, when a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 shot 322 Jews and 13 Communists.⁶

In September 1941, German forces shot 49 Jews in the village of Medvin I and more than 100 in Medvin II.⁷ These shootings were probably carried out by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5.

According to one source, some Jewish skilled workers remained in Boguslav after the Aktion in September 1941; the Germans shot them in July 1943, shortly before retreating.⁸ A few Jewish children from Boguslav managed to survive the occupation in hiding.

SOURCES Documents on the persecution and murder of the Jews in Boguslav can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; DAKiO (4758-2-5); GASBU (79-1-937); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ksenia Krimer

NOTES

1. TsDAVO, 505-1-395, p. 40.
2. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), pp. 20, 56.
3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
4. DAKiO, 4758-2-5, p. 3.
5. GASBU, 79-1-937, p. 100 (intelligence report: "On the history of the anti-Jewish pogroms carried out by the German fascists in Boguslav in 1941").
6. Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 119, October 20, 1941, published in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), p. 92.
7. DAKiO, 4758-2-5, pp. 63–65.
8. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 165.

BUKI

Pre-1941: Buki, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rayon center, Gebiet Taraschtscha, Generalkommissariat Kiew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Buki is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) north-northeast of Uman'. According to the census of December 16, 1926, there were 1,114 Jews living in the entirety of what then was the Buki raion.¹ According to the 1939 census, 546 Jews (17.64 percent of the population) lived in Buki, with 183 more residing in the villages of the Buki raion: in total, 729 Jews. The reduction of the raion's Jewish population by one third in the years 1927–1938 was due to the death of Jews during the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933 and to the resettlement of Jews to other towns and villages.

German armed forces occupied Buki on July 19, 1941, almost one month after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this intervening period, some of the Jews had managed to evacuate eastward, and men eligible for military service were drafted or volunteered for the Red Army. About 60 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Buki at the start of the occupation.

In the period from July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office governed the town. The German military administration set up a town council headed by a starosta, or elder, and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force made up of local residents.

In November 1941, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Buki became part of Gebiet Taraschtscha, which in turn was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Kiew in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

Soon after Buki was occupied, the German military commandant's office ordered the local authorities to organize the registration and marking of the Jews with an armband displaying a six-pointed star, as well as their use for various types of forced labor.

1592 KIEV REGION

As early as August 1941, German security forces conducted a first Aktion in Buki, in which they shot several dozen Jews. The shooting took place near the Gornyi Tikich River on the southeastern outskirts of the town. Today a granite monument stands there, bearing this inscription: “To the victims of fascism from their mourning relatives and countrymen.” In the fall of 1941, members of the Jewish “intelligentsia” were shot in a livestock burial ground 100 meters (about 328 feet) northwest of the village. Those Jews still alive, along with the Jews of the surrounding villages, were forced to move into a ghetto set up at a former landowner’s country house, about 1.5 kilometers (0.9 miles) from the center of Buki. In May 1942, those Jews who were unable to work were shot, while those deemed fit for work labored in a quarry. Additional Jews capable of work were brought in to the Buki labor camp from Man’kovka and Piatigory in the second half of April 1942.³ This work camp was liquidated in 1943 when the Germans shot all the remaining prisoners.

SOURCES Information on the ghetto and forced labor camp in Buki can be found in the Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities of Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), program “Pamiat’ Holokosta,” report on the village of Man’kovka, Cherkasy oblast’; and in A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 51.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Vsesoiuznyi perepys liudnosti 1926 roku (Moscow, 1929), 12:210.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities of Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), program “Pamiat’ Holokosta,” Cherkassy District, village of Man’kovka; directive issued by the Man’kovka Area Council No. 41 from March 18, 1999; and Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg., p. 51.

CHERKASSY

Pre-1941: Cherkassy, city, Kiev oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Tscherkassy, Rayon center, Gebiet Smela, Generalkommisariat Kiev; post-1991: Cherkasy, oblast’ center, Ukraine

Cherkassy is located 26.5 kilometers (16.5 miles) south of Zolotonosha. In 1939, there were 7,637 Jews living in Cherkassy.

The Germans captured Cherkassy on August 22, 1941, but the majority of the Jewish population was evacuated or managed to flee before the German advance. Much of the city was destroyed in the fighting. The military administration organized the registration of the Jews and ordered them to wear distinctive armbands. The military administration also ordered the establishment of a Jewish Committee consisting of three people that was to take responsibility for the actions of the Jewish community and to pass on German instructions. Initially the Jews still lived in their homes or with relatives if their houses had been occupied or destroyed. Jews ages 15 to 65 were taken by the Ukrainian police to perform menial labor tasks. Some Jews were also robbed by the Ukrainian police.¹

In October 1941, a German civil administration assumed authority from the military. Cherkassy became a Rayon center in Gebiet Smela. The Gebietskommissar in Smela was Regierungsrat Schwehr.²

On October 10, 1941, the German authorities ordered the creation of a ghetto (“Jewish residential district”) near the customs office within two days, which was supervised by the Ukrainian Rayon administration and the Ukrainian police. The ghetto consisted of just three streets. Approximately 900 ghetto inmates, including women and children, were deployed for cleaning the streets. In November or December 1941, the Security Police from Kiev (Einsatzkommando 5), the Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian police liquidated the ghetto, murdering the majority of its Jewish inhabitants. According to some sources, there was a further Aktion in early 1942, when almost all of the remaining Jewish population was murdered.³

With the help of a friend, the Ukrainian woman Aleksandra Shulezhko organized a Children’s Home for orphans, which by the end of 1942 had collected about 100 children, some 25 of whom were Jews. She saved the Jewish children by changing their names and nationalities when registering them. The Red Army recaptured the city on December 14, 1943. Yad Vashem honored Shulezhko as a person “Righteous Among the Nations” for her work.⁴

SOURCES Information on the Holocaust in the city of Cherkassy can be found in the following archives: DACHO (R49-1-20); DAKiO (4758-2-52); GARF; TsDAHOU (166-3-256; 62-9-4); USHMM (RG-50.226); and YVA (M-31, M-33, and M-52).

Alexander Prusin and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-50.226 # 0024, interview with Dmitri Mironenko.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942, p. 25.

3. TsDAHOU, 166-3-256, p. 1; 62-9-4, pp. 157–58; DACHO, R49-1-20, p. 10. DAKiO, 4758-2-52, p. 43 reverse side, indicates that the liquidation of the ghetto took place in November 1941 with more than 300 victims. See also Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 246–247.

4. YVA, M-31. See also the useful article by Esther Rechtshafner, “Research on Cherkassy,” available at www.jewishgen.org/Ukraine/Kiev/cherghassy/cherkassy_3.htm.

CHERNOBYL’

Pre-1941: Chernobyl’, town and raion center, Kiev oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Tschernobyl, initially in Gebiet Nowo-Schepelitschi, then Gebiet Chabnoje, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Chernobyl’, Kiev oblast’, Ukraine

Chernobyl’ is located 101 kilometers (63 miles) north-northwest of Kiev.

In 1926, the Jewish population of Chernobyl’ numbered 3,165 (39 percent of the total population). According to the 1939 census, there were 1,783 Jews living in Chernobyl’ (21 percent of the population).¹ The significant decline in the Jewish population by almost 1,400 in the years 1926–1939 is explained by the resettlement of Jews to other areas, as well as by the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933 and political repression.

German armed forces occupied the town on August 25, 1941, two months after the invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this time, many Jews were evacuated or fled to the east, and reservists born between 1905 and 1918 were called up for military service. Less than one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Chernobyl’ on the arrival of the German army.

In the period from the end of August until November 1941, a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town. The German military administration created a raion council (uprava) and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force, recruited mainly from local residents. Between September 12 and 14, 1941, units of the 1st SS-Brigade conducted security operations in the region between Chernobyl’ and Ovruch, in which they killed 437 Jews. At this time, however, most remaining Jews capable of work and their families were left alive in the larger towns.²

In November, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Chernobyl’ initially became part of Gebiet Nowo-Schepelitschi, within Generalkommissariat Kiev, in Reichskommissariat Ukraine. Subsequently it became part of Gebiet Chabnoje. The Gebietskommissar in Nowo-Schepelitschi and then in Chabnoje was Nachwuchsführer Venediger.³

Soon after the town’s occupation, the German commandant ordered the council to register and mark the Jews (they were made to wear armbands). In October 1941, by order of the Ortskommandantur, a small “Jewish residential area” (open ghetto) was created in the town, and all the Jews were forcibly moved into it. Jews from the ghetto were compelled to perform forced labor. Among the assigned tasks was the collection of scrap metal.

German security forces liquidated the ghetto on November 19, 1941,⁴ by shooting all the Jews. More than 500 Jews were killed in total.⁵ The Aktion was probably carried out by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5.

SOURCES Documentation regarding the persecution and extermination of the Jews of Chernobyl’ can be found in the following archives: DAKiO (4758-2-52); GARF (7021-65-241); and USHMM (RG-31.002M and RG-31.018M).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 20.

2. Martin Cüppers, Wegbereiter der Shoah: Die Waffen-SS, der Kommandostab Reichsführer-SS und die Judenvernichtung 1939–1945 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2005), p. 205. The Brigade also reported that the Ukrainian police (Miliz) had assisted in the arrest of Jews, handing them over to the German army.

3. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; and USHMM, RG-31.002M, reel 3, 3206-2-19, p. 34.

4. The date of the shooting is taken from the inscription on the memorial erected at the site of the execution. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 248, however, dates the Aktion as occurring on November 7, 1941.

5. DAKiO, 4758-2-52, p. 43 reverse.

FASTOV

Pre-1941: Fastov, town and raion center, Kiev oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Fastow, Rayon center, Gebiet Wassilkow, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Fastiv, Kiev oblast’, Ukraine

Fastov is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) southwest of Kiev. According to the 1926 census, there were 3,545 Jews living in Fastov.¹ The 1939 census recorded a Jewish population of 2,149, or 10.37 percent of the total.² This considerable decrease in the number of Jews in the period from 1926 to 1939 was due largely to the resettlement of Jews to other areas.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the town on July 22, 1941, one month after the invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During this intervening period, a large part of the Jewish population managed to evacuate to the eastern regions of the USSR, and men liable for military service entered the Red Army as conscripts or volunteers. Around 40 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

1594 KIEV REGION

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town. The German military administration created a town council and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force consisting of local residents, which took an active part in the anti-Jewish measures.

In November 1941, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Fastov became part of Gebiet Was-silkow. The Gebietskommissar was Kameradschaftsführer Döhrer.

Soon after the start of the occupation, the Ortskommandantur ordered the newly created Judenrat to organize the registration and marking of the Jews (they were required to wear armbands), as well as the collection of a monetary "contribution" and the use of the Jews for various types of forced labor. In August 1941, a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a conducted the first Aktion in the town, in which its members seized and shot 261 Jews between the ages of 12 and 60 and one "terrorist." Before the detachment's arrival, the Wehrmacht (a detachment of the Geheime Feldpolizei and members of a Landeschützenbataillon) had already shot 50 Jews and about 30 snipers (partisans).³

The remaining women, children, and old people in the town were then moved into an open ghetto. The Germans liquidated the ghetto on October 6, 1941, by shooting all the Jews. The victims included not only the local Jews but also Jewish refugees from Zhitomir and Jews from the Jewish kolkhoz in the village of Veprik.⁴ In total, up to 1,000 Jews were murdered in the town in the period from August to October 1941.⁵

A few Jews from Fastov managed to survive by going into hiding or assuming a non-Jewish identity.⁶

SOURCES Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/217); BA-L (B 162/5641-72); DAKiO (4758-2-49); USHMM; VHF (# 42017, 47413, and 47453); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. TsDAVO, 505-1-395, p. 40.
2. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 20.
3. BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 80, September 11, 1941; see also BA-L, 114 AR-Z 269/60, Concluding Report, December 30, 1968.
4. Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities of Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), "Memory of the Holocaust" Program: Kiev oblast'.
5. According to lists of names, 120 people were killed in the town, including 85 Jews (DAKiO, 4758-2-49, pp. 5-6), while information from the town soviet indicates that 172 people were killed (ibid., p. 4).
6. VHF, # 42017, testimony of Mikhail Roitman, who assumed a non-Jewish identity; # 47413, testimony of Boris Goldschmidt, who went into hiding with the aid of non-Jews; and # 47453, testimony of Galina Kuchinskaia, who also went into hiding.

GORODISHCHE (IMENI G.I. PETROVSKOGO)

Pre-1941: Imeni G.I. Petrovskogo (former Vorontsovo-Gorodishche), town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1943: Petrowskovo, (later renamed Woronzowo-Gorodishche), Rayon center, Gebiet Smela, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Gorodishche, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Gorodishche is located 107 kilometers (67 miles) northeast of Uman'. According to the 1939 census, 570 Jews (4 percent of all residents) were living in the town. At that time, it was a settlement named after G.I. Petrovskii.

At the start of August 1941, six weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, German armed forces occupied the town. Part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Approximately 60 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Gorodishche at the start of the occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town. The Ortskommandantur established a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force. The head of the Ukrainian police was a man named Nosar', and a certain Zhuk served as his deputy.

In December 1941, authority was transferred to the German civilian administration. Gorodishche was incorporated into Gebiet Smela, which in turn became part of Generalkommissariat Kiev in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹

Shortly after the occupation of the town, the German military ordered the registration and marking of all Jews. The Jews had to wear distinguishing armbands, and they were forced into various kinds of heavy physical labor, such as road construction and repair.

In the fall of 1941, by order of the German military administration, a ghetto was created in Gorodishche. Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto and were not allowed to buy goods from Ukrainians. As a result, the inmates of the ghetto suffered from hunger and disease.

The Germans liquidated the ghetto on March 29, 1942. All the remaining Jews in Gorodishche, around 300 Jews altogether, including some from nearby villages, were driven into a courtyard by the Gorodishche police. At dawn the next morning they were taken out and shot by the Ukrainian police and the German Gendarmerie in a ditch near "Sadstantsia."²

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Act of the Gorodishche Town Commission dated March 7, 1944, published in Karatel' zhivet v Klifone: O fashistskikh prispeshnikakh, ukryvaiushchikhsia v SSba (Moscow: Iuridicheskaiia literatura, 1985), p. 40. According to another source (Karatel' zhivet v Klifone, p. 22), the ghetto was liquidated on April 4, 1942.

KOBELIAKI

Pre-1941: Kobeliaki, town, Poltava oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Kobeljaki, from September 1942, center of Gebiet Kobeliaki, Generalkommissariat Kiew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Kobeliaky, Poltava oblast', Ukraine

Kobeliaki is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) southwest of Poltava on the River Vorksla. On the eve of World War II, there were 360 Jews in Kobeliaki (3.85 percent of the town's total population).

The Germans occupied Kobeliaki in September 1941, and until September 1942, it remained within the jurisdiction of Rear Area, Army Group South. The military administration set up a ghetto on the outskirts of the town. Adult Jews were taken from the ghetto to perform menial jobs. The ghetto was not guarded. Due to shootings and starvation the number of ghetto inmates declined rapidly. According to German reports, by the end of December 1941 there remained mainly older Jews in Kobeliaki, who received "very small rations" of food.¹

On January 19, 1942, Group 719 of the Secret Field Police (GFP) reported that men of the German police had been fired upon from the Jewish ghetto. Since they were unable to find the culprits, the GFP suggested to the military commandant in Kobeliaki that 56 Jews be shot as a reprisal. The commandant ordered that the guard around the ghetto be strengthened, and between January 21–26, 1942, the GFP, the Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian police shot the remaining Jews in the ghetto (about 100 people) in a mass grave 1.5 kilometers (0.9 mile) to the east of the town.² Then in March 1942, with German consent, the health department of the Ukrainian town council, the Ukrainian police, and the personnel of the town hospital carried out the murder of about 25 Jewish children and elderly people by giving them lethal injections.³

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community in Kobeliaki can be found at the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies—Cemetery Project: Ukraine (2001), published on the Web at www.jewishgen.org. Documentation on the destruction of the Jews in Kobeliaki can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/204 AR-Z 48/68); GARF (7021-70-1119); NARA (RG-242, T-501); USHMM (RG-31.018M, reel 8, GASBU [Poltava oblast'], no. 7250, trial of Makar I. Sklyar, and no. 17576, trial of Mikhaïlo I. Khodot and others); and TsDAVO.

Alexander Prusin

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-31.018M, reel 8, GASBU Poltava oblast', file no. 7250, ark. 97; NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 7, fr. 000499 and 000504; TsDAVO, f. KMF-8, o. 2, spr. 157, t. 2, p. 75.

2. GARF, 7021-70-1119, pp. 33–34; USHMM, RG-31.018M, reel 8, GASBU Poltava oblast', file no. 17576, ark. 68zv., 90, and 125; NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 349, fr. 000568.

3. USHMM, RG-31.018M, reel 8, GASBU Poltava oblast', file no. 17576, ark. 88-88 verso and 193–194; and GARF, 7021-70-1119, pp. 33–34. See also Samuil Gil', ed., Krov' ikh i segodnya govorit (New York, 1995), p. 129, which dates the murder of 25 children (using morphine) in March 1943, probably incorrectly, as this source dates the mass shooting of the Jews in December 1942.

KORSUN' SHEVCHENKOVSKII

Pre-1941: Korsun' Shevchenkovskii, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Korsun, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Kiew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Korsun' Shevchenkovskiyi, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Korsun' Shevchenkovskii is located 122 kilometers (76 miles) south-southeast of Kiev. According to the 1926 census, 2,486 Jews were living in the Korsun' raion, most of them (2,449) in the town. In 1939, a census recorded 1,329 Jews in the town itself (14.2 percent of the total population) and another 570 Jews in villages (Shenderovka and Steblev) in the Korsun' raion, as it was then constituted, for a total Jewish population of 1,899.¹ The decrease in the Jewish population from 1926 to 1939 was mainly the result of the migration of Jews to other regions during that period.

German forces occupied Korsun' on July 30, 1941, five and a half weeks after Germany attacked the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. In the interval, a significant number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Eligible men were called up or volunteered for military service. Roughly one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town following the occupation.

A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered Korsun' during the summer and fall of 1941. The German military administration established a municipal authority and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force, both staffed by local inhabitants. The Ukrainian police took an active role in the implementation of anti-Jewish measures during the occupation.

In November 1941, governing authority shifted to a German civil administration. Korsun' became the administrative center of Gebiet Korsun. The Gebietskommissar was Gemeinschaftsführer Lohmann. Gebiet Korsun was part of Generalkommissariat Kiew in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

By order of the German military commandant's office soon after the occupation, the municipal authority organized the registration of all Jews, required them to wear armbands identifying them as Jews, and subjected them to various kinds of manual forced labor. Among the labor tasks performed by the Jews of Korsun' were trash collection and cleaning the streets.

In October 1941, the German military administration in Korsun' ordered the creation of an "open ghetto" in the town, for which purpose several houses were commandeered. The Germans forbade the Jews from leaving the limits of the ghetto to buy produce from the Ukrainians.

The Germans and their collaborators liquidated the ghetto in November 1941 when they shot the Jews of Korsun'³ as well as Jews brought from the town of Kanev⁴—altogether 543 people.⁵ The shooting took place in a ravine known as "Rezanii Iar."

SOURCES Documentation on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Korsun' Shevchenkovskii can be found in the following archival files: DAKiO (4758-2-24 and 26).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Robert Haney

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), pp. 20, 55.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzen Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10 März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. Information from the Cherkassy oblast' branch of the Ukrainian Society for the Preservation of Historical and Cultural Remembrance, no. 72, October 15, 1990, PAAKru.

4. DAKiO, 4758-2-24, pp. 11 and reverse side.

5. Information from the Cherkassy oblast' branch of the Ukrainian Society for the Preservation of Historical and Cultural Remembrance, no. 72, October 15, 1990, PAAKru. DAKiO, 4758-2-26, pp. 5–6, contains a list of 74 of the Jews from Korsun' who were shot when the ghetto was liquidated.

KREMENCHUG

Pre-1941: Kremenbug, city, Poltava oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Krementschuk, initially under the control of Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd) and (from September 1942) center of Gebiet Krementschuk, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Kremenbuh, Poltava oblast', Ukraine

Kremenbug is located 133 kilometers (83 miles) west-northwest of Dnepropetrovsk. In 1939, there were 19,880 Jews residing in Kremenbug.

In the weeks after the start of the German invasion in June 1941, about two thirds of the Jews of Kremenbug managed to evacuate to the east. Units of the German 17th Army captured Kremenbug on September 9, 1941, and the city remained under the jurisdiction of Rear Area, Army Group South until September 1942. One week after capturing Kremenbug, the military administration ordered that Jews be registered with the city council and that they wear the Star of David on their sleeves. Between September 13–26, 1941, Sonderkommando 4b, under the command of SS-Sturmbannführer Günther Herrmann, arrived in Kremenbug and shot 125 Jews.¹

On September 27, 1941, the military commandant ordered the Jews to move into a ghetto located in a barracks on Lenin Street no. 22 in the suburb of Novo-Ivanivka, where they were deprived of all possessions and documents. Altogether about 3,000 Jews from Kremenbug and the vicinity were concentrated in the ghetto. After their departure, the Ukrainian policemen and city rabble plundered the empty Jewish apartments; some Ukrainians also attempted to seize Jewish apartments.²

The German administration imposed a special curfew on the ghetto, and Jews were not allowed to visit the "Aryan" quarters or communicate with Ukrainians. The Ukrainian city council, headed by Synytsia Verkhovs'kyi, was authorized to organize Jewish labor details for various tasks such as cleaning streets. Those working in the labor details received 400 grams (14 ounces) of bread daily; those remaining in the ghetto received only 200 grams (7 ounces) per person. The German administration imposed several "contributions" on the ghetto, which were collected by the Jewish council of elders. The Germans and Ukrainian police often raided the ghetto, robbing Jews of their remaining possessions. In late September, the Germans discovered that city council chief Verkhovs'kyi had procured false certificates of baptism for Jews through a local church (allegedly in return for large bribes). He was subsequently arrested and executed.³

On October 28, 1941, the forces of the Higher SS and Police Leader South Russia (HSSPF Russland-Süd) collected about 2,000 Jews from the Kremenbug ghetto and the surrounding countryside and murdered them outside the city at a place known as the Sand Hill.⁴ About 500 Jews remained in the ghetto. Between November 5–19, German forces subordinated to HSSPF Russland-Süd murdered 285 more Jews (147 men, 101 women, and 37 children) in Kremenbug in a series of Aktions.⁵ On November 24, 1941, the local military headquarters (Ortskommandantur 239) reported that Kremenbug was "almost cleansed of Jews." Nevertheless, a number of Jews still lived in the ghetto. They were again registered, and the registers were handed over to the HSSPF. Some Jewish doctors and nurses were also spared to work at local hospitals. In January 1942, during a large antipartisan sweep through the Poltava region, the Germans shot all the remaining Jews they could find in Kremenbug. Altogether about 8,000 Jews from Kremenbug and its vicinity lost their lives during the war.⁶

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Kremenbug can be found in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 676. The ghetto in Kremenbug is mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), pp. 129–131.

Documentation relating to the murder of the Jews of Kremenchug can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162, AR 6700045, AR-Z 6000013); DAPO (R-3388-1-688); GARF (7021-70-917); NARA (RG-242, T-501, reel 33; NO-5384; NOKW-2272); NARB (861-1-36); TsDAHOU (57-4-270 and 166-3-242); TsDAVO (KMF-8-2-157); USHMM; VHAP; and YVA.

Alexander Prusin

NOTES

1. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 111, October 12, 1941.

2. TsDAHOU, 166-3-242, pp. 38–39; GARF, 7021-70-917, p. 11 and reverse, testimony of E.A. Bradebur, November 14, 1943; DAPO, R3388-1-688, p. 5.

3. TsDAHOU, 166-3-242, pp. 36–37; NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 33, fr. 000391; DAPO, R3388-1-688, pp. 5–6.

4. GARF, 7021-70-917, p. 4, gives the figure of 3,000 Jews killed in this Aktion.

5. See the reports of HSSPF Russia South published in A. Kruglov, ed., Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), pp. 279–280.

6. TsDAHOU, 166-3-242, pp. 38–39; TsDAVO, KMF-8-2-157, vol. 1, p. 244; NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 33, fr. 000398; DAPO, R-3388-1-688, pp. 6–7.

LOKHVITSA

Pre-1941: Lokhvitsa, Poltava oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Lochwiza, initially Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); from September 1942, center of Gebiet Lochwiza, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Lokhvitsia, Poltava oblast', Ukraine

Lokhvitsa is located 101 kilometers (63 miles) south of Khotyn. In 1939, there were 614 Jews residing in Lokhvitsa and another 114 Jews residing in the villages of the Lokhvitsa raion.

The Germans occupied Lokhvitsa on September 12, 1941, signifying also the completion of the encirclement of Soviet armies to the east of Kiev. Many Jews from Lokhvitsa were evacuated or managed to flee before the arrival of the Germans. The town remained under the jurisdiction of Rear Area, Army Group South and then Rear Area, Army Group B (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet B) until September 1942, when it became the center of Gebiet Lochwiza in Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine.

In early October 1941, the German military commandant ordered the creation of a ghetto, which restricted the Jews to the most densely Jewish-populated areas of the town. The ghetto consisted of two separate sections: the first included part of what was then called Lane III (later, Tupikova Street); and the other section included two Jewish quarters in the area of Gogol' and Tel'man Streets. The ghetto was not sealed, but the Ukrainian police set up checkpoints, and Jews apprehended outside the ghetto were shot on the spot. In addition to the town's Jewish residents and those Jews fleeing from further west who became trapped in Lokhvitsa, the Germans also brought some Jews from surrounding villages to the ghetto. For example, in December 1941, Jews from the village of Sencha were brought to the Lokhvitsa ghetto.

With the onset of winter and left with no means to survive, adult Jews sneaked out of the ghetto to collect wood or to exchange any valuables they had left with the Ukrainians for food. The Ukrainian auxiliary police in Lokhvitsa, which in April 1942 comprised 116 men,¹ escorted the Jewish labor details tasked with cleaning the streets of mud, snow, and ice.

In early May 1942, additional Jews from the vicinity of Lokhvitsa, including a few from the nearby town of Chervonozavodskoe, were brought to the ghetto.² On May 12, 1942, a Sonderkommando headed by Karl Plath (operating under the auspices of the Higher SS and Police Leader Russia South) and the Ukrainian police escorted 287 Jews outside the town to the northeast and shot them in a ravine near the village of Blagodarovka. After the mass shooting, the edge of the ravine was blown up to cover the bodies.³ Feldkommandantur (V) 239, responsible for a large area including the town of Lokhvitsa, reported on June 17, 1942, that a "Jewish Aktion" (Judenaktion) had been conducted in Lokhvitsa on May 12, 1942, and that thereafter only a few individual Jews remained within its jurisdiction.⁴

Farmers working on a kolkhoz near Lokhvitsa assisted the female Jewish doctor Tsipa Sherman, who was living there on Aryan papers as a medical student. When she was arrested following a denunciation, the farmers wrote a petition asserting that she was a good worker and definitely not a Jew. Shortly afterwards she was released.⁵

Soviet forces drove the Germans from Lokhvitsa in the fall of 1943.

SOURCES Information on the ghetto in Lokhvitsa can be found in: BA-MA (RH 22/203); the Lokhvitsia Ethnographic Museum (Lokhvits'kyi krayeznavchyi muzei im. G.S. Skovrody), file 6/R/2; and YVA (M.31/6386).

Alexander Prusin and Alexander Kruglov

NOTES

1. NARA, T-501, reel 18, fr. 815.

2. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravocchnik (Kharkov: "Karavella," 2001), p. 338. In 1939 the Jewish population of Chervonozavodskoe in Lokhvitsa raion was 89. Most Jews managed to flee before the arrival of the Germans.

3. Interview with Vera Riazanskaia, July 22, 1998, Lokhvitsia; Lokhvitsia Ethnographic Museum, file 6/R/2, pp. 1–10. Some sources indicate there may have been 340 victims in total, although only 287 people are recorded in the list of names—information supplied by Alexander Kruglov.

4. BA-MA, RH 22/203, Feldkommandantur (V) 239, Abtlg. VII, Monatsbericht May 16 to June 16, 1942.

5. YVA, M.31/6386, as cited by Frank Golczewski, "Die Revision eines Klischees: Die Rettung von verfolgten Juden im Zweiten Weltkrieg durch Ukrainer," in Wolfgang Benz and Juliane Wetzels, eds., Solidarität und Hilfe für Juden während der NS-Zeit: Regionalstudien II, Ukraine, Frankreich, Böhmen und Mähren, Österreich, Lettland, Litauen, Estland (Berlin: Metropol, 1996), p. 66.

MAN'KOVKA

Pre-1941: Man'kovka, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mankowka, Rayon center, Gebiet Uman-Land, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Man'kivka, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Man'kovka is located about 34 kilometers (21 miles) north of Uman'. According to the 1939 census, there were 105 Jews residing in Man'kovka, where they comprised 2.2 percent of the local population, and an additional 719 Jews lived in the other settlements of the Man'kovka raion.¹

Man'kovka was occupied by units of the German 6th Army in late July 1941, about one month after the German attack on the Soviet Union. During the chaos following the invasion, some local Jews managed to flee eastward, ahead of the advancing German troops. Jewish men born between 1905 and 1918 found themselves conscripted into military service. On the arrival of German forces in Man'kovka, about 70 percent of the community's pre-war Jewish population remained in the town.

Between July and October 1941, Man'kovka was ruled by a German military administration (Ortskommandantur), which established a village council and appointed a local mayor. The military administration also set up a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. In November 1941, a German civil administration assumed authority over Man'kovka, which became a Rayon center in Gebiet Uman-Land, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine. In December 1941, the Gebietskommissar was Kameradschaftsführer Peterson.²

Shortly after the German invasion, the military administration ordered the village council to register the Jews and required them to wear armbands bearing the Star of David. The military administration ordered all able-bodied Jews to perform various kinds of physically demanding labor for little or no pay.

In late 1941, all the Jews of Man'kovka were forced to relocate into a separate area within the town designated as a ghetto. On April 18, 1942, those Jews able to work were transferred to a labor camp in Buki. Those ghetto residents deemed unfit for work, mainly children and the elderly, numbering about 50 people, were shot on May 2, 1942.³ A few Jews managed to survive by joining Soviet partisan units operating in the area.

SOURCES Published sources on the Jewish community of Man'kovka and its fate during the Holocaust include the following: Aleksandr Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedichesii spravocchnik (Khar'kov: "Kara-vella," 2001), p. 204; and Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 5:378.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 55.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942; and USHMM, RG-31.002M, reel 3, 3206-2-31, p. 9.

3. Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities of Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), program "Pamiat' Holokosta," Cherkassy oblast', village of Man'kovka; directive no. 41 issued by the Man'kovka Area Council, March 18, 1999.

OL'SHANA

Pre-1941: Ol'shana, town, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Olschana, town and Rayon center, Gebiet Swenigorodka Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Ol'shany, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Ol'shana is located 88 kilometers (55 miles) northeast of Uman'. Due to the effects of World War I, the Bolshevik Revolution, the Russian Civil War, the migration of Jews to the cities, and the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933, the size of the Jewish community declined considerably from 1,233 in 1897 to only 195 in 1939.

German forces of Army Group South captured Ol'shana on July 25, 1941. In August the military administration (Ortskommandantur) ordered the Jews to surrender all their valuable items such as gold, as well as furniture, cattle, and poultry. In October 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 (subordinated to Einsatzgruppe C) shot all the adult Jewish males (up to 100 people) in Ol'shana.¹ In the fall of 1941, Ol'shana was transferred to the German civil administration. The town became a Rayon center within Gebiet Swenigorodka, in Generalkommissariat Kiev. The Gebietskommissar in Swenigorodka was Hannjo Becker.

Sometime between August and October 1941, the German authorities ordered the Jews to move into a ghetto, which was set up in a few dozen houses in the northern part of town. Jews from the smaller settlements around Ol'shana were also ordered to move into the ghetto. All inmates over the age of 12 had to wear special armbands, and Jews were forbidden to speak to local Ukrainians. The military commandant appointed a Jewish Council (Judenrat) within the ghetto. The German and Ukrainian police guarded the ghetto, and Jews apprehended outside its limits without permission could be shot. The Ukrainian and German police also searched the ghetto frequently, looking for concealed valuables. Inside the ghetto, several Jewish doctors and nurses provided medical services to the inmates. The German military and the local Ukrainian administration forced all ghetto inmates, with the exception of small children, to perform a variety of forced labor tasks, including cleaning fuel containers, repairing roads, collecting the harvest, and clearing snow. The Jews were beaten at work, and sick or weak Jews were shot.²

During the winter of 1941–1942, the number of ghetto inmates declined due to deaths from sicknesses, starvation, and the terror imposed by the German administration and the Ukrainian police. Some Ukrainians supplied food to their friends in the ghetto. On May 2, 1942, the German administration formed the remaining 100 or so ghetto inmates into a column and marched them to Zvenigorodka, where the Jews were divided into two groups: the elderly and small children were put into a ghetto, while the older children and younger women were sent to forced labor camps at Smil'chyntsi and Nemorozh, which were established for the construction of the new highway (Durchgangsstrasse IV).³ In June, many of the Jews from Ol'shana perished during the liquidation of the Zvenigorodka ghetto. On November 2, 1942, the Germans murdered the inmates of the Smil'chyntsi camp; and on August 23, 1943, the remaining Jews at Nemorozh were murdered.⁴

SOURCES Information on the ghetto in Ol'shana can be found in Pinchas Agmon and Iosif Maliar, V ognie katastrofy (shoa) na Ukraine: Svidetel'stva evreev-uznikov kontslagerei i getto, uchastnikov partisanskogo dvizheniia (Kiryat-Haim, Israel: Beit Lokhamei ha-gettaot, 1998), pp. 205–209; and in Boris Zabarko, ed., “Nur wir haben überlebt.” Holocaust in der Ukraine: Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004), pp. 54–55.

Additional information can be found in the following archives: DACHO; DASBU (spr. 19896, tom. 3); GARF (7021-148-11); USHMM (RG-31.018M, reel 13; and RG-50.226.0032); and VHF.

Alexander Prusin

NOTES

1. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravocnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 243; I.M. Liakhovitskii, ed., Zhel'taia Kniga: Svidetel'stva, fakty, dokumenty (Khar'kov: Biblioteka gazety “Bensiakh,” 1994), p. 100.

2. Agmon and Maliar, V ognie katastrofy, p. 205; letter of Nina Umanskaia published in Leonid Koval', ed., Kniga spasiennia (Urmala: Golfstrim, 1993), 2:121–124; DASBU, spr. 19896, tom. 3, ark. 14 (USHMM, RG-31.018M, reel 13); Zabarko, “Nur wir haben überlebt,” p. 54; USHMM, RG-50.226.0032, interview with Tatyana Pit'kina (Shnaider); another testimony by the same person can be found in Liakhovitskii, Zhel'taia Kniga, pp. 100–101. According to the deposition of I.T. Nesterenko, the former chief of police in the Ol'shana district, there were 103 Jews; see GARF, 7021-148-11.

3. USHMM, RG-50.226.0032, interview with Tatyana Pit'kina (Shnaider).

4. Ibid.; Agmon and Maliar, V ognie katastrofy, pp. 205, 209.

PIATIGORY

Pre-1941: Piatigory, village, Tetiev raion, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rayon Tetijew, Gebiet Taraschtscha, General-kommissariat Kiew; post-1991: Cerkasy oblast', Ukraine

Piatigory is located about 69 kilometers (43 miles) north-northwest of Uman'. According to the census of December 1926, 531 Jews were living in Piatigory. By 1939, however, the Jewish population had declined to less than half this number.

Two German light tanks entered Piatigory on July 16, 1941. In the four weeks from the start of the German invasion, part of the Jewish population attempted to evacuate to the east using horses and carts or traveling by rail. Some, however, such as the family of Galina Klotsman, were forced to turn back by the rapid German advance. On their return, by July 10, the family found that their house had been robbed; Galina's father was then conscripted into the Red Army, just before the Soviet authorities abandoned Piatigory.¹

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered Piatigory. Shortly after the occupation of the village, the German military commandant ordered the registration of the Jews and required them to wear distinguishing armbands. On July 31, 1941, German security forces shot 2 Jews in Piatigory as hostages. Then on August 28, 1941, the Germans ordered the Jews to report to the school building. They selected 17 male Jews over the age of 14. These men were taken away and shot, including the father of Raisa Zelenkov.²

The remaining women and children, together with a few male specialist workers, were held in the school building, and some form of ghetto was probably established in Piatigory. The female Jews were required to perform farmwork every day. Some Jews who had evaded the roundup passed themselves off as Ukrainians and worked for a time on nearby kolkhozy, but eventually most were denounced and forced to register as Jews with the Gendarmerie and local police in Piatigory. Half-Jews, however, were treated with somewhat greater leniency, not being required to wear armbands.³

At the end of October 1941, power was transferred to the German civilian administration. Piatigory was incorporated into Gebiet Taraschtscha, where Kameradschaftsführer Wurach served as Gebietskommissar.⁴

On April 26, 1942, those Jews capable of work—namely, the young and couples without children—were selected and transferred to the Buki labor camp, where they worked in a nearby quarry.⁵ The 133 Jews that remained in Piatigory were shot in a local park on November 16, 1942. According to the testimony of Raisa Kleter (Zelenkov), who with several other Jews from mixed marriages was spared at the killing site along with her daughter, German Gendarmes, including a man named Hochmann, and local Ukrainian police were responsible for the shooting.⁶

SOURCES The recollections of Raisa Zelenkov, “In the Shtetl of Pyatigory, Kiev Region,” have been published in Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book:

1600 KIEV REGION

The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007), pp. 169–185. An oral history by the same woman, now called Raisa Kleter, can be found in VHF (# 37434). Another relevant oral testimony can be found in USHMM (RG-50.226 # 0015).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. “In the Shtetl of Pyatigory, Kiev Region,” pp. 169–185, here p. 170; and USHMM, RG-50.226 # 0015, Oral History interview with Galina Iosifevna Klotsman, born 1923.

2. “In the Shtetl of Pyatigory, Kiev Region,” pp. 170–171; and A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovet Ukrainy, Fond “Pamiat’ zhertv fashizma,” 2000), pp. 87, 90.

3. USHMM, RG-50.226 # 0015. “In the Shtetl of Pyatigory, Kiev Region,” pp. 169–185, does not use the term ghetto; however, VHF, # 37434, testimony of Raisa Kleter (aka Zelenkov), has been indexed by the Shoah Foundation as describing the ghetto in Piatigory. Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2007), 6:312, also states that a ghetto was established in Piatigory.

4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

5. A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskiy spravochnik (Kharkov: “Karavella,” 2001), p. 51; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 985; and USHMM, RG-50.226 # 0015.

6. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta, pp. 89–91. Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, 6:312, indicates that 133 Jews were shot on November 16, 1942, but the source for this is unclear. “In the Shtetl of Pyatigory, Kiev Region,” pp. 169–185, dates the shooting in November 1942, but gives no numbers. VHF, # 37434, testimony of Raisa Kleter (aka Zelenkov), however, dates the shooting in November 1943 (sic).

PIRIATIN

Pre-1941: Piriatin, town and raion center, Poltava oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Pirjatin, initially under the control of Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd), subsequently (from September 1942) center of Gebiet Pirjatin, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Piriatin, Poltava oblast’, Ukraine

Piriatin is located on the Udai River 142 kilometers (88 miles) to the east-southeast of Kiev. According to the population census of 1939, 1,747 Jews lived in Piriatin (12.68 percent of the total).

After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, and particularly during August and September 1941, a small portion of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Eligible men were conscripted into or volunteered for the Red Army. Yet more than 80 percent of the Jewish population remained in Piriatin and came under German occupation.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Piriatin on September 18, 1941. A military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur) administered the township and the Rayon until September 1942. A local administration and Ukrainian auxiliary police force were created, serving under the German occupying forces.

In September 1942, power was transferred into the hands of a German civil administration. Piriatin was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Kiev and became the administrative center of Gebiet Pirjatin, which included the Rayons of Pirjatin, Tschernuchi, and Sentscha.

Shortly after the occupation of the township, the German administration ordered all Jews to be registered and marked. The Jews were obliged to wear white armbands bearing six-pointed stars in plain view. A large amount of Jewish property was confiscated, including any items of value. Jews were forbidden to appear in public places. Jewish men had to perform various forms of forced labor.

At some date between the end of September 1941 and the beginning of 1942, the Germans established a ghetto in Piriatin. At the end of March or the beginning of April 1942, the Jewish population in the ghetto numbered 1,530 persons.¹ On April 6, 1942, German security forces liquidated the ghetto. Almost all the Jews, mainly old men, women, and children, were shot in the woods at Pirogovskaia Levada about 3 kilometers (1.9 mile) south of the town.² The Jews were made to undress, and their remaining property was taken from them. Then the Germans forced them into a pit and shot them in groups of 5 with submachine guns. The graves were filled in by local non-Jewish residents, including Pyotr Chepurenko. As he worked, he saw several Jews who had only been wounded, including a five-year-old boy, trying to climb out of the pits. However, they were immediately shot and killed by Germans and local policemen who were still overseeing the operation.³

The mass shooting was apparently organized and carried out by the SD unit “Sonderkommando Plath” (headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Plath). On May 18, 1942, it is likely that this command force carried out another Aktion in the town. On this occasion the SD shot 380 Communists and Soviet activists, along with 25 Roma (Gypsies) and 163 Jews belonging to various families.⁴

SOURCES A brief description of the mass shooting on April 6, 1942, can be found in Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Black Book: The Ruthless Murder of Jews by German-Fascist Invaders Throughout the Temporarily-Occupied Regions of the Soviet Union and in the Death Camps of Poland during the War of 1941–1945 (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981), p. 57.

Documentation on the extermination of the Jews of Piriatin can be found in the following archives: DAPO (R3388-1-1086; R-1876-8-98); GARF; NARA; and YVA (O-3/3951).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. NARA, T-501, reel 33, fr. 643, report of Feldkommandantur 607 on activities during the period from March 18 to April 15, 1942; Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 6:235–236, dates the establishment of the ghetto at the beginning of 1942, but it is unclear on what sources this is based.

2. DAPO, R1876-8-98, p. 1; see also International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies—Cemetery Project, available at www.jewishgen.org/cemetery/e-europe/ukra-p.html.

3. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 57.

4. DAPO, R3388-1-1086, p. 1.

SHPOLA

Pre-1941: Shpola, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Shpola, Rayon center, Gebiet Swenigorodka, Generalkommissariat Kiew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Shpola, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine.

Shpola is located about 33 kilometers (20.5 miles) east-southeast of Zvenigorodka. According to the 1926 census, 5,401 Jews lived in what was then the Shpola raion. This included the Jews living in the town of Shpola.¹ The 1939 census counted 2,397 Jews living in Shpola (16.24 percent of the total population). The decline in the Jewish population by more than half between 1926 and 1939 can be explained mainly by the resettlement of Jews to other regions.

Shpola was occupied by German forces on August 1, 1941, five and a half weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. During this period, the Germans bombed Shpola, and some Jews were able to evacuate to the east. It is estimated that just over 40 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained at the start of the German occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. The German military commandant established a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from local residents, which played an active role in the anti-Jewish measures.

In November 1941, power was transferred to the German civil administration. Shpola became part of Gebiet Swenigorodka, and Oberbannführer Becker became the Gebietskommissar. In turn, Swenigorodka was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Kiew in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

Shortly after the occupation of the town, the German military commandant ordered the registration and marking of the Jews with armbands. The Jews were also forced to perform heavy labor tasks, such as street cleaning, construction work, and cutting wood.

At the start of September 1941, the Germans conducted the first Aktion in Shpola, during which 160 people, including members of the intelligentsia, were seized and shot.³ A detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 apparently carried out these killings.

In October 1941, a ghetto was established in Shpola on the orders of the German military administration. A few streets were cordoned off and surrounded by barbed wire. The ghetto was guarded by the Ukrainian police, and Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto or buying products from the Ukrainians. Some non-Jews secretly gave food to people in the ghetto, but famine developed; after a time, some 10 or 12 people were dying of starvation or disease each day.⁴ In the ghetto a Jew named Gofman, under the direction of Ukrainians, assigned Jews to specific work tasks each day. There were also police raids in the ghetto in the fall of 1941: the Germans selected men in good physical condition, and they were taken away, never to return.⁵

The Jews were confined within the ghetto for more than half a year. Just prior to the ghetto's liquidation, a few Jews were able to escape following tip-offs from well-disposed Germans. On May 13, 1942, the German forces and their collaborators started to liquidate the ghetto. The 117th Battalion of the Ukrainian police force (Schutzmannschafts-Bataillon 117) combed the ghetto and rounded up more than 800 Jews. They kept the Jews in custody until May 17. From May 14–17, members of the battalion conducted "clearing operations," searching Jewish homes for any people who were hiding.⁶ On May 17, 1942, the German-led forces shot 760 of the captured Jews. The able-bodied were selected out and forcibly resettled into a labor prison camp in the village of Brodetskoe, where they were used to build highways. A small group of 13 craftsmen was allowed to remain behind in the town, but they were shot in 1943.⁷

The 255 Jewish workers in the labor prison camp in the village of Brodetskoe were killed on December 15, 1942. On the same day, 105 Jews in the prison camp in the village of Shestakovo were also shot.⁸

Only a handful of Jews survived from the Shpola ghetto. The Berezenko family was among the Ukrainian families in Shpola who helped to hide fugitive Jews for a while.⁹

SOURCES Information on the Jewish community of Shpola can be found in the memorial book in Hebrew edited by David Cohen, Shpolah: Masekhet haye Yebudim be-'ayarab (Haifa: Irgun yots'e Shpolah [Ukrainah] be-Yisrael, 1965); this book, however, contains very little information on the period of the German occupation and the destruction of the community.

Documents regarding the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Shpola can be found in the following archives: BA-L (Dok.-Sammlung UdSSR, Band 245e, pp. 419–422; Band 245Ag, pp. 180–205); DACHO (R2479-1-1); GARF (8114-1-965); USHMM (RG-50.226, # 0037 and # 0041); and VHF (# 7367, 23060, 29751, and 46014).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Vsesoiuznyi perepis liudnosti 1926 roku (1929 All-Union population census) (Moscow, 1929), 2:210.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. GARF, 8114-1-965, p. 51. A published version of this can be found in Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007), pp. 185–186. There is also a report on the Jewish men who were arrested and executed on August 21–22, 1941; see Evreiskie vesti (Kiev, 1992), no. 9, p. 5.

4. GARF, 8114-1-965, p. 51; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1172, date the establishment of the ghetto to late September 1941.

5. USHMM, RG-50.226 # 0041, Oral History with Fira Zamenskaya.

6. Account of June 15, 1942, from the supervising officer (Aufsichtsoffizier) of Schutzmannschafts-Bataillon 117 to the commander of the Gendarmerie (KdG) in Kiev, DACHO, R2479-1-1, p. 27.

7. GARF, 8114-1-965, pp. 51–52.

8. Ibid., p. 52.

9. USHMM, RG-50.226 # 0037, Oral History with Klara Semyonovna Vinokur.

SKVIRA

Pre-1941: Skvira, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukraine; 1941–1944: Skwira, Gebiet Belaja-Zerkow, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Skvyra, Kiev oblast', Ukraine

Skvira is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) south-southwest of Kiev. The 1939 census recorded that only 2,243 Jews lived in the town (comprising 20.3 percent of the total population).¹ The Jewish population in Skvira had declined by more than half since 1926, when the population had been 4,861 (33.6 percent).

German forces occupied Skvira on July 14, 1941, almost a month after the German attack on the Soviet Union (June 22, 1941). During that interval, a large part of the Jewish population had managed to evacuate to the east. Men eligible for military service were either called up or volunteered for the Red Army. About 40 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Skvira under German occupation. A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town during the summer and fall of 1941. The Germans created a town administration and an auxiliary force of Ukrainian policemen, both composed of local inhabitants. In November 1941, governance passed to a German civil administration. Skvira became part of Gebiet Belaja-Zerkow in Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine. The Gebietskommissar was Regierungsrat Dr. Stelzer.²

Among the German punitive units active in the Skvira region from the end of August until the end of September 1941 was Einsatzkommando 5, at that time under the command of SS-Standartenführer Erwin Schulz. The staff unit and other detachments of Police Regiment South were also in Skvira

Jewish women assembled by the German authorities in preparation for a mass murder near the Skvira ghetto, September 1941. The German caption on the back of the original reads: "They will be massacred." USHMM WS #17060, COURTESY MJH/CHS for several days from September 18, 1941. By order of the military commandant, soon after the German occupation of the town, the newly created "Jewish Soviet" (Jewish Council) organized the registration of the Jews, the collection of "contributions," and the wearing of identifying armbands. Jews were made to perform various kinds of heavy labor, including bringing in the harvest, for which they initially received some payment in the form of grain from the military administration.³

In August 1941, the German authorities created a "Jewish residential area," or ghetto, in the town on Taras Shevchenko Street, which was only partially fenced in with barbed wire. Ukrainians continued to live on the same street. The Jews lived in overcrowded conditions in small houses or cottages. The Jews ate whatever they could find, but they received little assistance from the local population. The Ukrainian police entered Jewish houses and robbed them of their valuable possessions. From mid-September 1941, the Jews were no longer permitted to go to work.⁴

The ghetto existed for just over a month and was liquidated on September 20, 1941. On that date, the Germans and their Ukrainian collaborators broke into the ghetto at dawn and ordered the Jews onto the street. They rounded up some 850 Jews and confined them in schoolhouse no. 2. From there they took them on foot or in vehicles to the Jewish cemetery. At the cemetery they shot them in four pits.⁵ Men from Einsatzkommando 5, assisted by a detachment of Police Regiment South, carried out the mass killing. Several days after this Aktion, the occupiers shot around 140 more Jews in what had been a stable.⁶

SOURCES Documents on the fate of the Jews of Skvira during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: DAKiO (4758-2-41); DASBU (79-1-937); and VHF (# 44779).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. TsDAVO, 505-1-395, p. 40; Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 20.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. DASBU, 79-1-937, p. 22, "Report concerning the Totally Criminal Acts of the German-Fascist Occupiers in Skvira raion, Kiev oblast."

4. VHF, # 44779, testimony of Mikhail Bykov.

5. Ibid.; and act dated January 1, 1944, Atrocities of the German-Fascist Invaders, published in Voenizdat, no. 13 (1945), pp. 5–6.

6. Voenizdat, no. 13 (1945), pp. 5–6.

SMELA

Pre-1941: Smela, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Smila, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Smela is located 133 kilometers (83 miles) northeast of Uman'. According to the 1926 population census, there were 5,978 Jews in what was then the Smela raion, which included the town. The 1939 census indicated that only 3,428 Jews lived in the town of Smela (10.1 percent of the total population). There were another 106 Jews in the villages of the Smela raion.¹ The decrease in the Jewish population from 1926 to 1939 by more than 40 percent can be explained mainly by the resettlement of Jews to other regions.

German forces occupied Smela on August 4, 1941, six weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this period, some of the Jewish population was able to flee to the east, and Jewish men were conscripted into or volunteered for the Red Army. Approximately one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Smela at the start of the German occupation.

More than 400 people, including some Jews, were killed in the first two days of the occupation.² The murders were probably carried out by SS soldiers of the Wiking Division, which was active in the region at that time.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administrated the town. The commandant set up a local administration and organized an auxiliary Ukrainian police force from among the local residents.

Shortly after the occupation of the settlement, the German military commandant and the local administration registered the Jews and made them wear armbands. They were also forced to perform heavy physical labor (such as the repair of roads and buildings). The head of the Rayon, Rayonchef Streidenberger, was especially vigilant regarding the Jews, chastising his subordinates for violations in their registration and employment—most likely resulting from bribes.³

In October 1941, a detachment of the Secret Field Police (Geheime Feldpolizei or GFP) attached to the 213th Security Division (Sicherungsdivision 213) shot 55 partisans, 37 collaborators of the partisans, and 17 Communist Party functionaries in Smela.⁴ Jews also were among the 109 people who were killed.

In November 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Smela became the administrative center of Gebiet Smela, which included the Rayons of Tscherkassy and Woronzowo-Gorodischtsche. Regierungsrat Schwehr became the Gebietskommissar. Gebiet Smela was in turn part of Generalkommissariat Kiev in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.⁵

At the end of 1941, the German administration ordered the formation of a ghetto ("Jewish residential district") in Smela. A few streets were cordoned off. Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto and from buying products from local Ukrainians. As a result, famine quickly developed in the ghetto. In January 1942, eight Jewish families from the settlement of Rotmistrovka were resettled into the ghetto.⁶ A Jewish boy, Dmitro Mironenko, who arrived in January 1942 from Cherkassy, noted that the Jews of Smela had not yet been killed by the Germans. He registered himself in Smela and lived for several weeks in the home for invalids. He was fortunate that he left the town in February, sensing the danger of an upcoming German Aktion.⁷ It is probable that the Smela ghetto was liquidated at the end of February 1942, when the German Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police arrested 512 Jews and subsequently shot them.⁸

SOURCES Documents on the persecution and murder of the Jews in Smela can be found in the following archives: DAKiO (4758-2-40 and 42); GARF (7021-65-241); NARA (T-501, reel 6, fr. 371); TsDAHOU (166-3-358); TsDAVO (3676-4-317); and USHMM (RG-50.226*0024).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), pp. 20, 57.

2. P.T. Tron'ko et al., eds., Smila: Istoriia mist i sil URSR—Cherkas'ka oblast' (Kiev, 1972), 26:495.

3. TsDAHOU, 166-3-358, p. 41.

4. NARA, T-501, reel 6, fr. 371, Report of the 213th Security Division to the head of the home militia detachment "Iug," October 30, 1941.

5. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

6. DAKiO, 4758-2-40, pp. 4 and reverse.

7. USHMM, RG-50.226*0024, interview with Dmitri Mironenko.

8. See the report of the Higher SS and Police Leader and the head of the Security Police in Reichskommissariat Ukraine for the period from March 6 to April 1, 1942, TsDAVO, 3676-4-317.

SOKOLOVKA

Pre-1941: Sokolovka (Yiddish: Justingrad/Sokolievka), village, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Sokolowka, Rayon center, Gebiet Taraschtscha, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Sokolievka, Zhasbkiv raion, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Sokolovka is located 192 kilometers (119 miles) south of Kiev and 32 kilometers (20 miles) north of Uman. Available documentation indicates that on the eve of the German occupation there were more than 150 Jews residing in the village of Sokolovka.¹

The village of Sokolovka was occupied by the units of the German armed forces on July 24, 1941, about one month after the German attack on the Soviet Union. By late July, when the German forces entered the village, an unknown number of Jews had fled eastward. The young Jewish males who left the village either volunteered for the Soviet army or were drafted into its units.

Between July and October 1941 the village was under the command of a German military administration, which recruited some local residents to serve on a newly established village council, with a mayor, or in an auxiliary police force. In November 1941, local administrative authority was taken over by a German civil government. Sokolovka became part of Gebiet Taraschtscha in Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the Jews were registered and obligated to wear armbands bearing the Star of David on the sleeves of their outer clothing. Furthermore, Jews were now organized into labor details and forced to carry out the most physically demanding work, often without payment. On September 19, 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 carried out the first Aktion against the Jews of Sokolovka, in which they shot 35 Jews.² The remaining Jews of Sokolovka were then forced to resettle into a ghetto. The Jews were confined to the ghetto until the Germans conducted a further Aktion in May 1942. According to local residents, the Germans escorted the Jews into the forest and forced them to dig their own graves. The Germans shot the adult Jews and buried the children alive.³

This Aktion did not, however, affect skilled laborers, who were allowed to stay in the ghetto and continue their work. In September 1942, another smaller shooting Aktion was carried out, and in the summer of 1943 all the remaining skilled workers were shot. In the period from 1941 to 1943, a total of 146 Jews were killed in Sokolovka.⁴

A female doctor of the family of Yehoshua Abramov traveled to Sokolovka soon after the Germans were driven out by the Red Army. She did not find any Jews living there. The Jewish houses were empty and in ruins.⁵

SOURCES On the history of the Jewish community of Sokolovka before the Holocaust, there is a yizkor book edited by Leo Miller and Diana F. Miller, Sokolievka/Justingrad: A Cen- tury of Struggle and Suffering in a Ukrainian Shtetl (New York: Loewenthal Press, 1983).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Association of the Jewish Organizations and Communities in Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), program “Pamiat’ Holokosta,” Cherkassy oblast’, village of Sokolovka.
2. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldungen UdSSR no. 119, October 20, 1941.
3. Miller and Miller, Sokolievka/Justingrad, p. 57.
4. Association of the Jewish Organizations and Communities in Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), program “Pamiat’ Holokosta,” Cherkassy oblast’, village of Sokolovka.
5. Miller and Miller, Sokolievka/Justingrad, p. 57.

TAL’NOE

Pre-1941: Tal’noe, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Talnoje, initially a Rayon center, Gebiet Uman-Land, then center of Gebiet Talnoje, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Tal’noe, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Tal’noe is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) northeast of Uman’. According to the 1939 census, there were 1,866 Jews living in Tal’noe (15.6 percent of the total population).¹

On July 29, 1941, units of the German 6th Army occupied Tal’noe. A number of Jews managed to evacuate to the east before the Germans arrived. On August 10, 1941, a short time after the start of the occupation, on orders issued by the military commandant in the town, Degen, around 1,000 Jews were gathered outside the commandant’s office for registration. There they were told that they were being led to Uman’. These Jews were escorted out of Tal’noe in two columns, then killed near the village of Belashki, a few kilometers to the southwest, by German soldiers and auxiliary police forces under the leadership of local ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsche). According to a German military report, the ethnic German who had assumed authority in Tal’noe and organized the anti-Jewish Aktion had to be dismissed soon afterwards, when the Germans discovered that before the invasion he had been a Communist Party member who had defamed the Führer.²

Immediately after the Aktion in August, around 100 remaining Jews, including Jews from mixed marriages, were rounded up in the town. The authorities relocated them, together with the half-Jewish children and their non-Jewish spouses, to a small ghetto. The ghetto consisted of three single-story houses with adjoining courtyards and was surrounded by a fence. Jews were also brought there from the villages surrounding Tal’noe. Those confined within the ghetto had to live in crowded and unhygienic conditions. Periodically the Germans ordered them to perform various kinds of forced labor. Some of them had to work within the ghetto itself.³

According to somewhat contradictory information published in the Black Book, either at the time of the first Aktion or subsequently on September 20, 1941, in Tal'noe itself the Germans also killed 30 elderly and infirm Jews who were unable to perform labor.⁴ During the following months, the Germans and local police continued to shoot Jews for any violation of German regulations. One Jewish woman named Ratushnaya was hanged because a German was dissatisfied with the milk she delivered to him, and her body was left swinging outside the commandant's office for a long period of time. Those living in the ghetto suffered from disease and starvation. Sometimes members of the local Ukrainian population brought them something to eat and passed food to them through the fence.⁵

On April 6, 1942, the Germans and local police murdered 115 of the ghetto inmates near the town's slaughterhouse as they liquidated the ghetto. Among the 115 victims, there were 80 children. They took the children of mixed marriages by force and shot them in front of their non-Jewish mothers, who remained alive. A few of the Jews of Tal'noe, including several children, were able to escape and hide among the local population.⁶

A brave young Jewish resistance fighter, Zigmunt Grossbart, who spoke good German, obtained a job under a false identity at the office of the German Gebietskommissar in Tal'noe, Kameradschaftsführer Meede. He exploited this position to assist other resistance fighters in obtaining weapons; he also stole two telegrams in March 1943 that prevented the German Gendarmerie from receiving outside assistance from Kiev for an antipartisan operation.⁷

The Red Army liberated Tal'noe on March 16, 1944.

SOURCES Information regarding the fate of the Jewish population of Tal'noe during the Holocaust can be found in the following publications: Vladimir Lidin, "Talnoe," in Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002), pp. 20–21; and A. Kruglov, Katastrofa ukrainskogo evreistva 1941–1944 gg.: Entsiklopedicheskii spravochnik (Kharkov: "Karavella," 2001), pp. 86–92.

Relevant documentation on the destruction of the Jews of Tal'noe can be found in the following archives: DAKiO (4758-2-44); RGVA (1275-3-664); USHMM (RG-11.001M.13); VHF (# 42320, oral testimony of Maria Gatiatulina); and YVA (M-33/178; and O-3/6158).

Albert Kaganovich and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1286.

2. RGVA, 1275-3-664, p. 8, Lagebericht Ortskommandantur I (V) 839, Uman, August 30, 1941. Lidin, "Talnoe," p. 20, dates the first Aktion on September 19, 1941. This date conflicts with the above-cited German report from the end of August.

3. Lidin, "Talnoe," pp. 20–21; VHF, # 42320, also mentions the existence of a ghetto in Tal'noe.

4. Lidin, "Talnoe," p. 20. This source, however, describes the first Aktion and the selection of those unfit for work as having taken place at the same time.

5. Ibid., p. 21; and VHF, # 42320.

6. DAKiO, 4758-2-44, p. 6. Lidin, "Talnoe," p. 21, gives the date of April 17, 1942, for the liquidation Aktion.

7. Il'ja Al'tmann, Opfer des Hasses: Der Holocaust in der UdSSR 1941–1945 (Zurich: Gleichen, 2008), p. 388.

TARASHCHA

Pre-1941: Tarashcha, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Taraschtscha, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Tarashcha, Kiev oblast', Ukraine

Tarashcha is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) north of Uman. According to the 1939 population census, 1,140 Jews lived in the town (13 percent of the total population). Additionally, 250 Jews lived in the villages of what was then the Tarashcha raion.¹

German armed forces occupied the town on July 23, 1941, just over one month after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. Part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate eastward during this intervening period. Men of an eligible age were called up to serve in the Red Army. About three quarters of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Tarashcha at the start of the occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of German commandant's offices (Ortskommandanturen) ran Tarashcha and established a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from among local residents. In August and September 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5 (Einsatzgruppe C) was based temporarily in Tarashcha in the school building and took over the responsibilities of the Ortskommandantur from the departing military forces.

In November 1941, authority passed to the German civil administration. Tarashcha became the administrative center of Gebiet Taraschtscha. Kameradschaftsführer Wurach was appointed as Gebietskommissar. Gebiet Taraschtscha included the Rayons of Zhashkov, Tetiev, Buki, and Stavishche and was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Kiev within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

Shortly after the occupation of the town, the German military commandant issued an order for the Jews to wear armbands bearing the Star of David. The Jews were also obliged to perform forced labor that included road repair work. The Jews were also forbidden to buy food and other products at the market, and the Ukrainians were not allowed to sell them anything.

About one week after the Germans' arrival, all the Jews were ordered to resettle from their own residences into a few designated buildings on one street in Tarashcha (Proletarskaia Street) within two days, establishing a ghetto. However, some Jews, including the local blacksmith, were initially exempted and only moved into the ghetto about a month later. The Ukrainian police were in charge of the ghetto and robbed the Jews of their belongings. Even children in the ghetto were put to work, sewing Jewish stars; there was no school in the ghetto.³

German security forces started killing the Jews in Tarashcha in a series of sporadic Aktions from the first day they arrived. The precise dates and numbers killed in each Aktion are, however, difficult to reconstruct precisely from the fragmentary and sometimes contradictory recollections of the witnesses. In August 1941, two Aktions directed against the Jewish population were carried out. At the very beginning of the month, the SS military-engineering platoon of the "Wiking Division" shot around 400 Jews.⁴ At the end of August, a detachment of Einsatzgruppe C (either from Einsatzkommando 5 or from Sonderkommando 4a based in Belaia Tserkov') shot 109 Jews.⁵

The detachment of Einsatzkommando 5, which was commanded by SS-Obersturmführer Jung for at least part of the time it was based in Tarashcha, also conducted a series of Aktions to round up and kill the Jews living in the smaller villages surrounding the town. On each occasion, about 20 or 30 Jews were shot with the assistance of the local village heads (starostas) and the Ukrainian police.⁶ On or around September 10, 1941, Einsatzkommando 5 carried out a third Aktion in Tarashcha and shot a few hundred Jews. Among those shot at this time were Jewish women who had been working as cleaners at the base occupied by the Einsatzkommando.⁷

On November 9, 1941, the "open ghetto" (Jewish residential district) in Tarashcha was more or less liquidated, and most of the remaining Jews were shot.⁸ This mass shooting was again probably carried out by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5. Altogether up to 1,000 Jews were exterminated in Tarashcha between August and November 1941. On each occasion, the Jews were searched for any valuables before being escorted out of town. The Germans then shot and buried them in a large mass grave dug in a gravel pit located between the Jewish and Orthodox cemeteries, about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) to the northwest of Tarashcha.⁹

After the last Aktion, a handful of specialist workers and their families remained in a small remnant ghetto or labor camp in Tarashcha for another year or so. Three boys who escaped from the ghetto were captured and then beaten to death. One Jewish child, Miriam Gopman, managed to survive, as she was smuggled out of the ghetto by a Ukrainian policeman who took her to live with his brother, who initially did not know that she was Jewish. When her Jewish identity was discovered, she had to leave; she survived the remainder of the occupation by passing as a Ukrainian. Shortly after her departure from the ghetto, the Germans killed the remaining Jews there, including her mother and father, apparently for refusing to reveal where she had been hidden.¹⁰

SOURCES Documents on the destruction of the Jews of Tarashcha can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/5224-30, 4630, and 14211); DAKiO (4758-2-45); USHMM (RG-31.018M, reels 2, 4, and 5); and VHF (# 8746).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1288; and Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), pp. 20, 56.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. DAKiO, 4758-2-45, p. 8; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam: University Press, 1998), vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 636a, p. 525 (Landgericht Düsseldorf 8 Ks 1/66, verdict of August 5, 1966); and VHF, # 8746, testimony of Miriam Gopman (née Shir).

4. Testimony of the former SS-Rottenführer Hans Wilhelm Isenmann is in the transcripts of judicial proceedings in Kiev from January 1946. Isenmann himself shot 60 Jews. Information can be found in L. Abramenska, ed., Kyivs'kyi protsess: Dokumenty ta materialy (Kiev: Lybil', 1995), p. 51. On this first Aktion, see also Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 636a, p. 536, which notes that the perpetrators reportedly wore black uniforms, as opposed to the field gray worn by most Einsatzgruppen personnel.

5. BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 86, September 17, 1941.

6. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 636a, pp. 526–527.

7. Ibid., pp. 527–528, 550. SS-Untersturmführer Huhn directed the operation. According to the testimony of the witness and collaborator Rössler, the former translator for the squad, around 300 people were shot in this Aktion.

8. DAKiO, 4758-2-45, p. 8; see also Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 636a, p. 538, which notes that according to one Jewish survivor, the main killing Aktions stretched over a period of about four months.

9. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 636a, pp. 524–525, 535. A monument to the Jewish victims erected after the war is located on the site.

10. VHF, # 8746.

UMAN'

Pre-1941: Uman', city, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Uman, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Uman', Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Uman' is located 190 kilometers (118 miles) south-southwest of Kiev. According to the census of January 1939, there were 13,233 Jews in Uman', or 29.81 percent of the city's population.

German troops occupied the city on July 31, 1941. Sonderkommando 4b (commanded by SS-Sturmbannführer Günter Herrmann) arrived shortly afterwards and carried out the first anti-Jewish Aktion—executing the Jewish intelligentsia. On the pretext that “certain questions” had to be clarified, the Jewish intelligentsia was ordered to appear at the municipal administration. The 80 men who appeared on August 13, 1941, were arrested and then killed.¹ Sometime later, 6 Jewish doctors (including Burshtein and Gitis) were publicly hanged in a prominent place.²

Ortskommandantur I/839, which administered the city at the time, appointed a new Jewish Council in the second half of August 1941 and ordered that Jews register and wear white armbands bearing six-pointed stars. Registration was accompanied by the beating of Jews with sticks, rifle butts, and lashes. German soldiers and Ukrainian policemen often robbed Jewish homes, and individual Jews were killed.

A large Jewish pogrom occurred in the city on September 21, 1941. German soldiers and Ukrainian policemen rounded up more than 1,000 women and children, forced them into the cellar of the Pioneer Palace on Lenin Street, and tightly sealed all the doors and windows. As a result of the overcrowding in the cellar, many women and children suffocated.³ The next day the surviving women and children were released, but the men who had been rounded up and placed in the prison were shot by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5. Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 119, dated October 20, 1941, described these events as follows:

According to observations made by Einsatzkommando 5, over the last few weeks a large number of Jews from near and far have gathered in Uman'. The population of Uman' before the outbreak of the war was about 55,000, of which about 10,000 were Jews. In spite of the large-scale flight of Jews originally living in Uman' after the outbreak of the war, due to many [new] arrivals, the number has been reported at about 8,000. A good intelligence network was discovered among the Jews of Uman'. Information about many events at the front and in the rear areas was passed on by the Jews not only to their co-religionists but also to the Ukrainian population. They very quickly received information about the Aktions against Jews conducted in the vicinity. A two-day Aktion was planned in order to combat this source of danger in Uman'.

Already on September 21, 1941, contrary to the plan, excesses were perpetrated against the Jews by members of the militia with the participation of numerous German soldiers. During these events, Jewish apartments were completely demolished and robbed of all utensils and valuables. In this operation, almost exclusively German soldiers were involved. Spot checks of the apartments of militia members, which a squad from Einsatzkommando 5 conducted immediately after its arrival in Uman', were without any result.

Due to the unplanned excesses against the Jews in Uman', the organization of the Aktion by Einsatzkommando 5 suffered extraordinarily. Above all very many Jews now received advanced warning and fled the city. . . .

In the remainder [of the Aktion], 1,412 Jews were executed by Einsatzkommando 5 in Uman' on September 22 and 23, 1941.⁴

Also worth noting is the report by Ortskommandantur II/575, September 25, 1941: “On September 21–22, 1941, the SD carried out a round-up of Jews. To prevent excesses and robbery, the department sent patrols out throughout the city on September 21, and on September 22 assigned guards to certain places to prevent disturbances and other incidents. Individual servicemen from the Luftwaffe and Organisation Todt attempted to take part in the anti-Jewish Aktion, but the Feldgendarmarie of the Ortskommandantur prevented this in order to guard against Wehrmacht involvement in political actions which should be conducted only by the SD.”⁵

Soon after the Aktion on September 21–23, the Jews of the city were ordered to move to a residential district (ghetto) that had been set aside for them near the marketplace on Rakovka, Vostochnaia, Nekrasov, and other streets, in agreement with the city administration. The local commandant's office—Ortskommandantur II/575 (V)—ordered that the move to this district be completed by the end of September 1941.⁶ The Jewish district was not isolated and only lightly guarded, but Jews were forbidden to leave it, and Ukrainians were forbidden to enter. Those who violated this order were severely punished by being beaten and heavily fined. A Jewish elder and his assistant administered the district. Samburskii was appointed as the elder; his assistant was Tabachnik. They had at their disposal three Jewish police officers, one of them a woman. With their assistance the elder collected the “contributions” that were periodically imposed on the Jews. If Jews refused to hand over gold or valuables, Jewish police officers placed them face down on a trestle bed and beat them on their backs and buttocks until they agreed to hand over what was demanded of them.⁷

A week after the move into the ghetto, German Police Battalion 304 carried out a further Aktion in the city, with the assistance of the Ukrainian police. The battalion arrived in Uman' from Kirovograd on October 7, and at 4:00 A.M. the next morning, German and Ukrainian police began herding Jews to the market square. From the market square they were taken to the prison, where they were forced to undress; their money, valuables, and papers were confiscated. From the prison the Jews were taken to three large trenches in Sukhoi Iar outside the city and shot. Sick people, cripples, and small children were driven to the trenches in trucks and murdered. In all, that day Police Battalion 304 shot 5,400 Jewish civilians from the city and 400 Jewish prisoners of war.⁸ A memorial has been erected on the site.

After the Aktion on October 8, 1941, about 1,500 Jews remained in the “open ghetto,” compressed together now onto one street. Starting on January 8, 1942, they were forced to wear round yellow patches 8 centimeters (3.2 inches) in diameter on their backs and chests. The Jews were sent out every day under Ukrainian police escort to perform various jobs (shoveling snow, moving rocks, and repairing roads). From time to time public executions of Jews were carried out. On January 5, 1942, 2 men and a woman were publicly hanged.⁹ According to a report on March 7, 1942 (for the period from February 2 to March 5) by the Higher SS and Police Leader—issued by the Senior Commander of the Order Police in Reichskommissariat Ukraine—the Gendarmerie in Uman' executed 3 Jews, 2 former Ukrainian police commanders, and 6 partisans. According to his report for March 6 to April 1, 1942, first 5 Jews were publicly hanged, and subsequently another 8 people were hanged, including 1 Jew and the commanding officer of a Ukrainian police detachment.¹⁰

Security Police and SD forces under the command of SS-Sturmbannführer Xaver Schnöller, assisted by German Gendarmes, and Lithuanian and Ukrainian police auxiliaries, liquidated the ghetto in Uman' on April 22, 1942. During the Aktion, those Jews fit for work were selected and to a labor camp in the Gaisin raion. Those not fit for work were escorted to a nearby forest, where Lithuanian and Ukrainian police took part in shooting them under German direction.

Also involved in clearing the ghetto were members of the 1st platoon, 2nd Company of the Polizeisicherungsabteilung an der Durchgangsstrasse (highway) IV (DG IV) (German police assigned to supervise forced laborers on road construction work). According to testimony by members of this unit, SS-Brigadeführer Jürgen Stroop, in charge of security for the entire length of the DG IV project, ordered the ghetto to be liquidated to prevent Jews fleeing to the partisans and to confine those fit for work in secure labor camps. The ghetto was surrounded at dawn, and most Jews were assembled on the market square for the selection. A few hid within the ghetto, however, and a number were shot as the Germans and their collaborators searched the ghetto, including the attic of the synagogue, looking for those in hiding.¹¹ After the liquidation of the ghetto, 50 to 60 Jewish craftsmen remained in the town; they were shot in 1943.

A group of former policemen from Police Battalion 304 were convicted at several trials in the former East Germany. They were accused of killing Jews in several cities in Ukraine, including participation in the Aktion in Uman' on October 8, 1941. Three former members of the battalion were convicted and sentenced to death in Halle on October 26, 1978.

SS-Sturmbannführer Günter Herrmann, commanding officer of Sonderkommando 4b, was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment in Düsseldorf on October 12, 1973. His unit organized the shooting of Jews in Uman' in August 1941.

In 1970, the Staatsanwaltschaft in Lübeck closed the investigation of Xaver Schnöller and Robert Deneke, who took part in the liquidation of the Uman' ghetto, because there was insufficient evidence.

SOURCES There are no books or articles devoted exclusively to the history of the ghetto in Uman'. Accounts by Jewish survivors from Uman' can be found in Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007); and Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev: Zadruga, 2000). The documentary collection Sbornik dokumentov i materialov ob unichtozhenii natsistami evreev Ukrainy v 1941–1944 godakh (Kiev: Institut iudaiki, 2002), edited by A. Kruglov, contains several documents relating to the destruction of the Jews of Uman' in 1941.

Relevant documentation on the extermination of the Jews of Uman' can be found in the following archives: BA-L; GARF; NARA; RGVA; TsDAVO; USHMM (RG-11.001M.13); VHF (e.g., # 30123 and 51179); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Ester-Basya Vaisman

NOTES

1. Neizvestnaia Chernaia kniga: Svidetel'stva ochividshev o katastrofe sovetskikh evreev (1941–1944) (Jerusalem, Moscow: Yad Vashem and GARF, 1993), p. 185 (testimony of M. Faingold).
2. Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, p. 130 (testimony of M. Demb).
3. Nezvestnaia Chernaia kniga, pp. 185, 194 (testimony of R. Dudmik); and ibid., p. 131 (testimony of M. Demb).
4. NARA, T-175, reel 234, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 119, October 20, 1941, pp. 4–6.
5. USHMM, RG-11.001M.13 (RGVA), 1275-3-662, p. 40, Ortskommandantur II/575 (V) [in Uman'] an Feldkommandantur 676, September 25, 1941.
6. Ibid.
7. Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, p. 133 (testimony of M. Demb).
8. Former Stasi Archive in Dahlwitz-Hoppegarten (now Bundesarchiv), original file ref.: MIS-HA IX/11, ZUV 78, Bd. 6 (diary of Otto Müller, a former member of the 304th Police Battalion); see also DDR-Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2002), vol. 1, Lfd. Nr. 1029, pp. 731–746, Verdict of BG Halle 1 Bs 23/75, August 28, 1975 (case against members of Pol. Batl. 304).
9. See the testimony of M. Faingold in Neizvestnaia Chernaia kniga.
10. TsDAVO, 3676-4-317.
11. See BA-L, II 213 AR-Z 20/63 (Friese and others, DG IV), vol. 18, pp. 3259–3279.

ZEN'KOV

Pre-1941: Zen'kov, town and raion center, Poltava oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Senkow, Rear Area Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); after September 1, 1942, Rayon center, Gebiet Gadjatsch, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Zin'kiv, Poltava oblast', Ukraine

Zen'kov is located 133 kilometers (83 miles) west of Khar'kov. According to the 1926 census, there were 608 Jews living in Zen'kov. The 1939 census, however, recorded only 142 Jews residing in the town.¹ This sharp decline in the Jewish population between 1926 and 1939 was due to the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933 and to the resettlement of Jews to other areas.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the town on October 9, 1941. In the more than three months since the start of the German invasion, a large part of the Jewish population managed to evacuate to the eastern USSR, and men liable for military service entered the Red Army as conscripts or volunteers. About 15 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Zen'kov at the start of the occupation.

From October 1941 to September 1942, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur 258 in Gadiach) was in charge of the town. The German military administration established a town council and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force (Hilfspolizei) composed of local residents. Authority was transferred to the German civil administration in September 1942. Zen'kov (renamed Senkow) became a Rayon center in Gebiet Gadjatsch in Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine.

In late 1941, all the remaining Jews of the town were herded into a single house, which served as a temporary ghetto. In late January 1942, the Germans shot all the Jews, 19 in total, in the quarry of a brickyard on the southeastern edge of town.² In addition to the local Jews, four Jewish families from the village of Grun' (in Sumy oblast') were also shot; the German police had brought them to Zen'kov on January 18, 1942.³ It is possible that the 7 Jews who were recorded as having been shot in the town cemetery in January 1942 were these same Jews.⁴ The shootings of the Jews were apparently the work of the 303rd Police Battalion (commanded by Police Major Robert Franz), part of which was based in Zen'kov from December 25, 1941.⁵ On February 1, 1942, in the course of a "cleansing Aktion" (Säuberungsaktion) in Zen'kov, this battalion was engaged in "executions by shooting in accordance with the laws of war."⁶ This is possibly a reference to the shooting of Jews in Zen'kov.

SOURCES Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-MA (RH 22/22); GARF (7021-70-950); NA (HW 16/54); NARA (RG-242, T-501, reels 6 and 33); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 4); and VHAP (Kdo.-Stab RFSS, 6/12).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. "Zen'kov," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000), 4:483.

2. Poltava Oblast' Organization of the Ukrainian Society for the Protection of Historical and Cultural Monuments: List of burial sites of victims of shootings of Soviet citizens of Jewish nationality during the occupation of the Ukraine in 1941–1944, Poltava oblast' (archive of the author); GARF, 7021-70-950, p. 1, reports only that all remaining Jews were killed.

3. NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 33, fr. 1284 and 1293.

4. Poltava Oblast' Organization of the Ukrainian Society for the Protection of Historical and Cultural Monuments, PAAKru.

5. See Fernschreiben no. 2083, December 25, 1941, 14.30, from HSSPF Russland Süd to RFSS, Kdo.-Stab RFSS, Chef Orpo (VHAP, Kdo.-Stab RFSS, 6/12; and NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 6).

6. See Fernschreiben, February 2, 1942, from Einsatzstab HSSPF Russland Süd to RFSS, Kdo.-Stab RFSS, Chef Orpo, Chef Sipo (NA, HW 16/54, GPD 605; NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 10; and BA-MA, RH 22/22).

ZHASHKOV

Pre-1941: Zhashkov, village and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Shaschkow, Rayon center, Gebiet Taraschtscha, Generalkommissariat Kiev; post-1991: Zhashkiv, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Zhashkov is located about 56 kilometers (35 miles) north of Uman'. The 1939 population census counted 877 Jews in Zhashkov (14.58 percent of the population) and 299 Jews in the villages of the Zhashkov raion, bringing the total number to 1,176 Jews.

German forces occupied Zhashkov on July 19, 1941, nearly one month after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this month, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were conscripted into or enlisted voluntarily for the Red Army. Around 60 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Zhashkov at the start of the occupation.

From July to October 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered Zhashkov. The German military administration created a local council and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force recruited from among the local residents.

At the end of October 1941, power was transferred to the German civilian administration. Zhashkov became a Rayon center in Gebiet Taraschtscha, where Kameradschaftsführer Wurach was named as Gebietskommissar.¹

Shortly after the occupation of the settlement in July, the German military commandant ordered the registration and marking of the Jews with yellow stars. At the end of July or beginning of August 1941, the German military administration ordered the formation of a ghetto ("Jewish residential district") in the center of the settlement. One street was cordoned off. Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto to buy products from the Ukrainian locals; as a result, famine quickly ensued. The Jews in the ghetto were required to perform forced labor every day. Among the tasks performed was the cleaning of toilets.²

In 1941, a number of Jews were murdered in the settlement and in the villages of the Zhashkov Rayon.³ On March 15, 1942, able-bodied Jews were selected and sent to various forced labor camps, including those in the villages of Buki and Antonovka.⁴ The remaining Jews in the Zhashkov ghetto—more than 100—were shot in September 1942 (exact date unknown) in a quarry located 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) to the east of the settlement.⁵ In Zhashkov during 1941 and 1942, the Germans and their collaborators murdered around 500 Jews in total.⁶

1610 KIEV REGION

SOURCES Documents regarding the persecution and destruction of the Jews in Zhashkov can be found in the following archives: DACHO; and DAKiO.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. Association of Jewish Organizations and Communes in Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), program “The Memory of the Holocaust” (Pamiat’ Kholokosta), Cherkassy Province, Town of Zhashkov; and Leonid Koval, ed., Kniga spaseniia (Urmala: Golfstrim, 1993), 2:107, testimony of Ol’ga Zuslina.

3. In the summer of 1941, German soldiers and policemen murdered around 300 Jews in the Zhashkov raion. See F.D. Sverdlov, Dokumenty obviniaut. Kholokost: Svidetel’sstva Krasnoi Armii (Moscow: Nauchno-prosvetitel’ skii tsentr “Kholokost,” 1996), p. 39.

4. Koval, Kniga spaseniia, 2:107, testimony of Ol’ga Zuslina.

5. Sverdlov, Dokumenty obviniaut, p. 39. Another account indicates that 150 Jews were shot in 1942 at the boundary of Berestova, between the villages of Petrovka and Okhmatov. Administrative report by the administration of the Cherkassy Provincial Organization of the Ukrainian Society for the Protection of Historical and Cultural Monuments, no. 72, October 15, 1990, addressed to the Council Head of the Ukrainian Society for the Protection of Historical and Cultural Monuments in Kiev.

6. Association of Jewish Organizations and Communes in Ukraine (Vaad Ukrainy), program “The Memory of the Holocaust” (Pamiat’ Kholokosta), Cherkassy Province, Town of Zhashkov.

ZOLOTONOSHA

Pre-1941: Zolotonosha, town, Poltava oblast’, Ukrainian SSR;
1941–1943: Solotonoscha, from September 1942, Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine;
post-1991: Zolotonosha, Cherkasy oblast’, Ukraine

Zolotonosha is located 139 kilometers (86 miles) east-southeast of Kiev. According to the 1939 census, there were 2,087 Jews residing in Zolotonosha.

The Germans entered Zolotonosha on September 19, 1941. In the weeks prior to the Germans’ arrival, a large part of the Jewish population managed to evacuate or flee to the interior of the Soviet Union. According to the report of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission, on the third day after the occupation of the town, the German commandant ordered the execution of 300 local citizens. Among those killed were many refugees from western parts of the Soviet Union, and it is most likely that a high proportion were Jews.¹ The German unit responsible for the shooting was probably a detachment of Sonderkommando 4a. The remaining Jews were herded into a ghetto, from which they were taken to perform menial jobs such as cleaning streets and repairing roads.

On November 21, the German commandant announced that all Jews would be “resettled” to Kremenchug the following day. They were ordered to gather all their valuables, money, and best clothes and to assemble near Gestapo headquarters at 9:00 A.M. on November 22, 1941. On that day guards were posted all over the town, and they thoroughly searched the Jewish apartments and the neighboring houses for any Jews who went into hiding. The Gestapo men robbed the assembled Jews of all their valuables. The Jews were then escorted under close guard to a ravine about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside of Zolotonosha to the northwest, where they were shot. Involved in the Aktion were forces of the Higher SS and Police Leader Russia South, namely, Police Battalion 303, men of Sonderkommando 4a, and members of the Ukrainian police, commanded by the Ukrainian police chief in the town, Vladimir Ivanovich Kalanchuk. The precise number of victims, Jewish men, women, and children from Zolotonosha and its environs, is unknown, but estimates range from 600 up to 3,500 or more.²

In the ensuing period until the spring of 1942, several hundred more Jews were successively brought in to Zolotonosha from the countryside and confined in the ghetto. In January 1942, during a German antipartisan sweep through the Poltava oblast’, a number of Jews were shot in Zolotonosha. The rest were murdered by men of Sonderkommando “Plath” in June 1942.³

SOURCES Regarding the murder of the Jews in Zolotonosha, see Nimets’ki okupanty na Poltavshchyni (1941–1943): Zbirnyk dokumentiv (Poltava: Vydavnytstvo “Zoria Poltavshchyni,” 1947), pp. 24–29. An English translation can be found in A.F. Vysotsky et al., eds., Nazi Crimes in Ukraine, 1941–1944: Documents and Materials (Kiev: Naukova Dumka, 1987), pp. 151–155.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: DAPO; GARF; NARA (T-501, reel 6, fr. 1013); and TsDAHOU.

Alexander Prusin

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-70-952, p. 1. This Soviet report named German officers Hauptmann Greisching and Oberleutnant Ilger as being responsible.

2. Nimets’ki okupanty na Poltavshchyni (1941–1943), pp. 24–29. The figure of 3,500 victims can be found in DAPO, R-4085-3-2276, p. 2. Wolfgang Curilla, Die deutsche Ordnungspolizei und der Holocaust im Baltikum und in Weissrussland 1941–1944 (Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh, 2006), p. 797, gives the figure of at least 1,000 killed. A. Kruglov, Entsiklopediia kholokosta: Evreiskaia entsiklopediia Ukrainy (Kiev: Evreiskii sovets Ukrainy, Fond "Pamiat' zhertv fashizma," 2000), pp. 142, 144, however, gives a figure of probably only around 600 in light of the pre-war Jewish population of only 2,087.

3. TsDAHOU, 166-2-34, p. 1; DAPO, R-1876-8-98, p. 1; and R-3388-1-1086, p. 1.

ZVENIGORODKA

Pre-1941: Zvenigorodka, town and raion center, Kiev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Swenigorodka, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Kiev, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Zvenigorodka, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Zvenigorodka is located 156 kilometers (97 miles) south of Kiev and about 65 kilometers (40 miles) northeast of Uman'. In 1926, there were 6,584 Jews in the town (36.5 percent of the total population); in 1939, there were 1,957 (14 percent of the total population).

On July 29, 1941, German forces occupied Zvenigorodka. In the intervening five weeks after the start of the German invasion, a few hundred Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and a number of Jewish men were called up to the Red Army. Others stayed behind, believing they had nothing to fear from the Germans as they were not members of the Communist Party. Approximately 1,300 Jews remained in Zvenigorodka at the start of the German occupation, including some refugees from western Ukraine who became trapped in the town as they tried to flee eastward.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. The German military commandant established a local administration in the town and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from local residents.

In December 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Zvenigorodka became the administrative center of Gebiet Swenigorodka, which also included the Rayons of Shpola, Ekaterinopol', Mokraia Kaligorka, and Ol'shana. Oberbannführer Hannjo Becker became the Gebietskommissar. In turn, Gebiet Swenigorodka was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Kiev within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹ A squad of German Gendarmerie based in the town supervised the local Ukrainian police.

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the German military commandant ordered the local administration to register the Jews, who were required to wear white armbands bearing the Star of David. The Jews were forced to perform heavy manual labor (such as repairing roads, cleaning, and construction work), during which they were frequently beaten. A few weeks later, in September 1941,² an open ghetto ("Jewish residential district") was established on the orders of the German military commandant, on Comintern Street, Gul'kina Street, and several other small streets in the northern part of town. Jews were also brought to the ghetto from the surrounding villages of the Swenigorodka Rayon. Several families had to share each house. The ghetto was not surrounded by barbed wire, but Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto area or communicating with the local population. Jews were permitted to visit the market for only a short period in the afternoon. Ukrainian police guards manned checkpoints around the ghetto to enforce these regulations. The Ukrainian policemen and German officials often entered the ghetto and took clothing, dishes, shoes, and any valuables. At night drunken policemen assaulted and robbed the Jews in their houses.³

In September 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 5, commanded by SS-Obersturmführer Lehmann, arrived in Zvenigorodka, where it was based for several weeks.⁴ At the end of September or the beginning of October 1941, Lehmann's mobile squad of Security Police conducted the first Aktion in Zvenigorodka, seizing about 100 Jewish men and shooting them.⁵

German regulations prohibited the Jews from buying products from the local Ukrainians. However, although entering and leaving the ghetto was forbidden without a special permit, some Ukrainian civilians still came to the ghetto to exchange food for Jewish clothing and furniture. Conditions in the ghetto were very overcrowded, with several families sharing each house. Due to lack of food and heating materials, some ghetto residents died of starvation and disease, including at least one death from typhus. There also were arbitrary arrests and individual killings of Jews conducted by the local police and the Germans.⁶

In the ghetto, there was a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which was established on the orders of the German authorities. The head of the Jewish Council was a man named Lazurik. Among the tasks of the Jewish Council was the organization of daily Jewish labor details, including the repair of roads and cleaning latrines. There was a clinic headed by Dr. Starosel'skaia, who still managed to perform complicated surgery without adequate medications or equipment. There were two dentists, one of whom, Lisa Prober, also treated the locally based German officials. The Germans closed down the clinic in the ghetto after a short time, but the residents continued to improvise medical services despite the lack of medicine and bandages.

At the beginning of May 1942, the German authorities transferred about 100 Jews from the ghetto in the town of Ol'shana.⁷ They brought them to Zvenigorodka at the end of the day, and at night they put them in a prison. The next morning, they selected the able-bodied Jews among them for assignment to a labor camp. Those who were not considered fit to work were sent to the Zvenigorodka ghetto.⁸ On May 5, 1942, by order of the Gebietskommissar, the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie rounded up the able-bodied Jews to perform road repair work on the Transit Highway IV (Durchgangsstrasse IV) project. These Jews were resettled into a labor camp that was created in the stables in the village of Nemorozh.⁹ On May 17, 1942, around 150 Jews were resettled in Zvenigorodka from the village of Ekaterinopol',¹⁰ bringing the total number of people in the ghetto to around 1,500. On June 18, 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. Before the liquidation, a group of Jewish craftsmen, their families, and other able-bodied individuals were selected out. The remaining 1,375 people were shot in the nearby meadow.¹¹ The shooting was organized by a detachment of the Security Police and SD subordinated to the Commander of the Security Police (KdS) in Kiev, assisted by the Ukrainian police and German Gendarmerie. The Jewish craftsmen survived in the town until August 1943, when they were also shot.¹²

Fanya Shubinskaya managed to flee when the labor camp at Nemorozh was liquidated and survived with the help of Zinaida Shchaslyva in Novaia Greblia.¹³

SOURCES Published testimonies about the ghetto in Zvenigorodka can be found in collections edited by Pinchas Agmon and Iosif Maliar, V ogne Katastrofy (Shoa) na Ukraine: Svidetel'stva evreev-uznikov kontslagerei i getto, uchastnikov partizanskogo dvizheniia (Kiryat-Heim, Israel: Izd. "Beit lokhamei kha-gettaot," 1998), pp. 15–33, 148–167; and in that edited by Boris Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev: Zadruga, 2000), also available in English as Holocaust in the Ukraine (London: Vallentine Mitchell, 2005); there is also a testimony by L. Kraslovskaya published in Evreiskie vesti (Kiev), nos. 1–2 (1994), p. 4.

Documents regarding the persecution and murder of the Jews in Zvenigorodka can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL, II 204 AR-Z 26/68); DAKiO (4758-2-18 and 20); GARF (7021-148-11 and 7021-65-241); USHMM (RG-50.226*0016); and VHF.

Alexander Kruglov and Alexander Prusin
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.
2. Agmon and Maliar, V ogne Katastrofy (Shoa) na Ukraine, p. 151, testimony of Lubov Krasilovskaya; see also USHMM, RG-50.226*0016, Oral History with Lubov Krasilovskaya.
3. Testimony of Fanya Shubinskaya (Sapozhnikova), in Zabarko, Holocaust in the Ukraine, pp. 363–364.
4. Verdict of LG-Düss on August 5, 1966, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), vol. 24, Lfd. Nr. 636a, p. 523.
5. Testimony of L. Kraslovskaya, p. 4; and Boris Zabarko, ed., "Nur wir haben überlebt": Holocaust in der Ukraine: Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004), p. 278.
6. Testimony of L. Kraslovskaya; Testimony of Fanya Shubinskaya (Sapozhnikova), pp. 363–364.
7. Testimony of T.E. Shnaider (Pit'kina), in Iu. M. Liakhovitskii, Perezhivshie katastrofu: Spassbiesia, spashiteli, kollaboranty, martirolog, svidetel'stva, fakty, dokumenty (Kharkov-Jerusalem, 1996), p. 139. According to the deposition of I.T. Nesterenko, the former chief of police in the Ol'shana Rayon, there were 103 Jews; see GARF, 7021-148-11.
8. Testimony of Grigorii Basovskii, in Zabarko, Zhivymi ostalis' tol'ko my, pp. 46–47.
9. DAKiO, 4758-2-20, p. 30.
10. Ibid., 4758-2-18, p. 4.
11. Testimony of L. Kraslovskaya; DAKiO, 4758-2-20, p. 30. Fanya Shubinskaya (Sapozhnikova) dates the mass shooting at the beginning of May 1942, see her Testimony, pp. 363–364.
12. Testimony of L. Kraslovskaya.
13. Testimony of Fanya Shubinskaya (Sapozhnikova), pp. 363–364.

NIKOLAEV AND DNEPROPETROVSK REGIONS

The bodies of two Jewish men hang from a gallows outside a market building in Novomoskovsk, 1942.
USHMM WS #25240, COURTESY OF YIVO

NIKOLAEV AND DNEPROPETROVSK REGIONS (GENERALKOMMISSARIAT NIKOLAJEW UND DNJEPROPETROWSK)

Pre-1941: Nikolaev, Kherson, Kirovograd, Dnepropetrovsk, and Zaporozh'e oblasts, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Generalkommissariat Nikolajew und Dnjepropetrowsk, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Mykolaiv, Kirovograd, Dnipropetrovsk, Zaporizh'e, and parts of the Kherson and Cherkasy oblasts, Ukraine

In these two southeastern regions of Reichskommissariat Ukraine, the German occupying authorities established around 18 ghettos, which probably contained up to 24,000 Jews. Research has uncovered 11 ghettos or probable ghetto sites in Generalkommissariat (Gk) Nikolajew that contained up to 19,000 Jews and another 7 such sites in Gk Dnjepropetrowsk, which held around 5,000 Jews. The period of ghettoization extended from August 1941 until the spring or early summer of 1942. It was accompanied by the mass murder of the Jewish population by units of the Security Police (Einsatzgruppen and Commanding Officer of the Security Police and SD, or KdS), Wehrmacht, Order Police, SS, the German civil administration, and various non-German auxiliaries.

As the German forces of Army Group South advanced eastward in the late summer of 1941, much of the area concerned came temporarily under the administration of the 444th Security Division, which was responsible for securing areas in the immediate rear of the frontline troops. Most of the Nikolaev and Dnepropetrovsk regions were occupied by German forces between early August and early October. Malaia Viska, about 55 kilometers (34 miles) west-northwest of Kirovograd, was captured at the beginning of August. Krivoi Rog was taken on August 14, and the city of Nikolaev on the Black Sea coast fell on August 17. Further to the east and south, Dnepropetrovsk was captured on August 25, and Zaporozh'e on October 4, 1941.

Precise figures for the number of Jews who managed to evacuate are not available. According to the calculations of historian Alexander Kruglov, of the 26,419 Jews residing in the Kirovograd oblast' in 1939, approximately 12,000 (about 45 percent) were murdered during the German occupation. That means that probably around 50 percent of the Jews were able to evacuate or flee. The figures for the Dnepropetrovsk oblast' are that of 129,439 Jews registered in 1939, probably around 35,000 were murdered (about 27 percent). The higher rate of evacuation here is probably explained by the concentration of Jews in industrial centers and the location further east, giving people more time to leave.

For Adolf Hitler and Heinrich Himmler the murder of the Jews was the first step in a large-scale plan for the demographic restructuring and resettlement of the occupied territories. By the end of August 1941, the Einsatzgruppen and other German security forces had widened the group of Jews targeted for extermination to include women, children, and the elderly, and they had begun wiping out entire Jewish communities. In Ukraine, this shift was demonstrated most clearly by the large-scale massacre of Jews at Kamenets-Podolskii in late August 1941, in which more than 20,000 people were murdered.¹

This transition to mass murder by Einsatzgruppen C and D, assisted by Order Police forces subordinated to the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) South Russia (Friedrich Jeckeln), in mid-August, meant that the establishment of ghettos in the region was conducted only in a few places and on an ad hoc basis. On August 28, 1941, the commander of Rear Area, Army Group South, General Franz von Roques, ordered that ghettos were to be established in places, especially towns, with a larger Jewish population only if this was necessary or useful. It was to be deferred if the administrative tools were insufficient or if it might result in more urgent tasks being neglected.²

In late August and early September 1941, the German military administration established the first ghettos in the region in the towns of Pervomaisk and Novaia Odessa. These short-lived ghettos served mainly as collection points to facilitate the destruction of the Jews later in September.³

Available records for Krivoi Rog reveal the series of anti-Jewish measures implemented in this town, where no ghetto was established. In August 1941, a detachment of Einsatzgruppe C shot 39 Communist officials, 11 saboteurs and plunderers, and 105 Jews there.⁴ By mid-September, Jews were required to perform forced labor, to wear distinguishing armbands, and to use separate shops. They were also forbidden to slaughter livestock and had to surrender any foreign currency, precious metals, jewels, or other valuables. Feldkommandantur (FK) (V) 538 was then examining the question of whether it would serve its goals to establish a ghetto there—but by mid-October, all the Jews had been shot with the assistance of the Ukrainian auxiliary police.⁵

The establishment of the ghetto in Kherson, which existed for only two weeks, is well documented in contemporary German reports, survivor testimony, Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) materials, postwar German investigations, and published accounts. Sonderkommando 11a issued an order that the Jews could only reside on certain streets, thereby establishing a ghetto on September 7. The ghetto was located in a remote section of the city, near the crossroads of Frunze and Rabochnaia Streets, and a Jewish police force was created. Overseeing the ghetto was SS-Scharführer Baron Leo von der Recke of Sonderkommando 11a. On a daily basis the Jews were summoned to perform various forms of humiliating and heavy physical labor.⁶

On September 24–25, 1941, Sonderkommando 11a organized the liquidation of the Kherson ghetto.⁷ Prior to the Ak-

tion, the Jews were informed that they would be resettled to Palestine. A few Jews managed to escape, but most of these people were subsequently captured and killed. When the Aktion started, the Jews were marched on foot to a factory site on the edge of the city. From there they were conveyed on trucks to an antitank ditch 7 kilometers (4.3 miles) northeast of the city, near Zelenivka. The Jews were shot in groups by two rifle squads. Those waiting could hear the shots.⁸ Soviet forensic experts estimated that more than 8,000 people were buried in the mass graves.⁹

A similar ghetto was established in Nikolaev to facilitate the mass murder of around 7,000 Jews there under the supervision of Sonderkommando 11a, also in September 1941. However, Feldkommandantur 193 reported somewhat misleadingly on October 5, 1941, that “in Nikolaev and Kherson the Jews had been ‘evacuated’ by the SD. The intended establishment of ghettos therefore was not completed. Also in the countryside, as far as can be determined here, the Jews had in the meantime disappeared.”¹⁰ In fact, ghettos had been briefly created in Nikolaev and Kherson by Sonderkommando 11a as part of the destruction process, but FK 193 misrepresented this, as by October these ghettos had been completely liquidated.

In many places in Gks Nikolajew and Dnjepropetrowsk, no ghettos were established, especially in the Zaporozh’e oblast’, where the only ghetto discovered was in Novozlatopol’. Instead, the remaining Jews were killed in mass-shooting Aktions or by other means, without formal ghettoization. In Dnepropetrovsk it was reported that about 70,000 of the 100,000 Jews originally living there had fled before the arrival of the Germans. Of the remainder, more than 10,000 were shot by units subordinated to HSSPF Russia South (especially Police Battalion 314) on October 14–15, 1941.¹¹ It appears that the Wehrmacht (FK 240) made preparations for the establishment of a ghetto in Dnepropetrovsk, but the rapid massacre of some 15,000 Jews by the SD soon rendered this unnecessary.¹²

In Zaporozh’e, where about 4,000 Jews were living at the start of the German occupation, the German military authorities also did not deem it “appropriate” to move the Jews into a ghetto. Jewish medical personnel were still working here, but it was planned to exclude them as quickly as possible, allowing for the health-care needs of the population.¹³

The area of GK Nikolajew was officially transferred from military to civilian control in mid-November 1941, when Generalkommissar Oppermann took over the region.¹⁴ In December 1941, part of Gk Dnjepropetrowsk was officially transferred to a civil administration, although the military commandants continued to play an important role in these areas for several months more. Both Generalkommissariate were divided up into a number of Kreisgebiete, each administered by a Gebietskommissar. In Gk Nikolajew, there were three Stadtkommissare (for the cities of Kherson, Nikolaev, and Kirovograd) and 13 Gebietskommissare. In Gk Dnjepropetrowsk, there were four Stadtkommissare (for Dnepropetrovsk, Zaporozh’e, Krivoi Rog, and Kamenskoye) and 16 Gebietskommissare.¹⁵ However, the eastern section of Gk Dnjepropetrowsk was not handed over from military to civilian administration until October 1942.

With the handover to the civil administration, the Ukrainian militia was formally dissolved, and a Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft was created under the control of the Order Police, which was composed of the Schutzpolizei in the cities and the Gendarmerie in the towns and country areas. The Kommandeur der Gendarmerie (KdG) in Nikolajew was Major Gansinger. By November 1942, there were approximately 410 Gendarmes subordinated to the KdG Nikolajew, in charge of nearly 5,000 local policemen (Schutzmannschaft-Einzeldienst). In Gk Dnjepropetrowsk about 600 officials of the Schutzpolizei and 400 Gendarmes were responsible for some 6,000 Ukrainian auxiliaries. The Kommandeur der Ordnungspolizei (KdO) Dnjepropetrowsk was Colonel Gotthilf Hoffmann. Small outposts of the Security Police were established in major cities such as Nikolaev, Kirovograd, Dnepropetrovsk, and Zaporozh’e.

In some areas of Generalkommissariat Nikolajew, ghettos were not established until after the arrival of the civil administration at the end of 1941. This was the case in Aleksandrovka, in Kamenka, and also in Bobrinets, where Gebietskommissar Holzmann ordered the establishment of an enclosed Jewish residential area in late December. In the absence of much survivor testimony or German documentation, historians are forced to rely on other sources to identify ghettos in these regions. For example, information on the ghetto in Bobrinets comes from the ChGK and a postwar NKVD report from 1946. The ghetto in Bobrinets was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded day and night by the local police.¹⁶ It existed only until early February 1942, when more than 300 people were shot just outside the town.

A variety of different structures were used as ghettos in these regions. The small ghetto in Novaia Praga (Gk Nikolajew) was established at the end of 1941 in a building in a schoolyard. Jews from nearby villages were also resettled into the ghetto, which was not liquidated until the following summer.¹⁷ In Pavlograd (Gk Dnjepropetrowsk), the German authorities established a Jewish “prison camp” or “ghetto” in the spring of 1942, on the grounds of a large factory.

As already noted, following the large-scale massacres in major cities in September and October 1941, conducted mainly by mobile units of the SS and police, the remaining smaller ghettos were liquidated successively from February through the summer of 1942, mostly by the Gendarmerie and local Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft, with close coordination by the civil administration. The Zlatopol’ ghetto (Gk Nikolajew) was subjected to at least three separate Aktions by German police and their Ukrainian helpers. In some of these Aktions, conducted on instructions from the Gebietskommissar, the Jews were murdered using poison gas.¹⁸ The Aleksandrovka ghetto was liquidated in March 1942, when several hundred Jews were shot by German and local police, again coordinated by the Gebietskommissar, as was the case at another mass shooting of Jews, near the village of Izrailevka, although these Jews had not previously been ghettoized.

In July 1942, Generalkommissar Oppermann in Nikolajew reported curtly that “only individual Jews had appeared in one Gebiet and that a corresponding report had been passed on to the SD.”¹⁹

In Gk Nikolajew and Gk Dnjepropetrowsk there were a number of rural Jewish settlements, most notably in the Stalin-dorf Jewish national raion. On October 20, 1941, FK (V) 246 reported that in “Rayon Stalin-dorf” only just over 2,500 Jews remained, compared with a figure of more than 7,000 registered there in 1939. “Most of those [that remained] had been excluded from the economy and they stayed completely calm. Through the repeated Aktionen of the police, the Jewish question was becoming ever less important.”²⁰ This reflected the pattern in the Jewish agricultural settlements that a number of Jews remained on their respective kolkhozy and were liquidated in successive Aktionen from the fall of 1941 through the summer of 1942. In a few kolkhozy/villages, however, survivors recall some form of open ghetto being established, where Jews were concentrated together with only limited access to food and restricted movement, as well as forced labor.²¹

Despite the above-cited report of the Generalkommissar Nikolajew indicating that almost all Jews had been removed by July 1942, the exploitation of Jewish labor remained an issue into 1943. In Aleksandrovka, for example, some Jewish craftsmen were spared from the main Aktion in the spring of 1942 and continued to live and work in the ghetto for some time afterwards.

In several other ghettos in these regions, Jews were selected for work and sent to labor camps during the liquidation Aktionen in the spring and summer of 1942, where they survived for several months more. In March 1942, when most of the remaining Jews in Rayon Mala Wiska were shot, those Jews able to work were selected and sent to a labor camp in the Rayon center. These Jewish prisoners had to live in the stables of a sugar refinery, and they worked on building and repairing roads.²²

In Novovitebskoe, where the Jews had been isolated in an open ghetto, located on a single street, those deemed fit for work were selected in April 1942 and taken to a nearby labor camp run by the SS and the Organisation Todt (OT), where they were used to build the highway (Durchgangsstrasse IV or DG IV) between Krivoi Rog and Dnepropetrovsk. On May 20, 1942, around 300 young Jews were transported from the ghetto in Ingulets to another labor camp in the village of Novoselovka, which was also part of the DG IV project.

In only a few cases is information about the existence of a Jewish Council, or Jewish elder (starosta), available. The main functions of such officials included the assignment of Jews to forced labor and the raising of contributions. Jewish responses included, on rare occasions, physical resistance in the face of death and also suicide. A number of Jews tried to hide and escape, but many of these were captured shortly after the ghetto liquidation Aktionen.

In view of the small number of survivors from these regions, little information is available about the reactions of the local population. A number of accounts mention the brutality of local Ukrainian and ethnic German policemen and administrators. The local police robbed the Jews, beat them, and in a number of locations, played an active part in their murder. A few instances of non-Jews helping Jews are recorded. They provided food to Jewish acquaintances and, in rare cases, warned Jews or helped them to escape (including older local policemen). For example, Nikifor Cheredenko, a farmer from the village of Prishib, traveled several hours by cart to rescue the Tsviling family of Jews shortly before their scheduled arrest. In Prishib, the other local inhabitants also did not give away the family, even though they were known to be Jews, having lived there before the war.²³ Generally, however, those that did escape from the ghetto had the best chances of surviving if they could pass as non-Jews and were able to get away from their home village, where they might be recognized. A few were even sent to Germany as Ostarbeiter (eastern workers).

The last occupying German forces were driven from the region by the Red Army during 1944. Precise figures are not available, but it seems likely that of the Jews trapped by the German occupation in the ghettos of this region, only a few hundred managed to survive. The postwar populations in these towns and cities were composed overwhelmingly of Jews who had returned (or arrived) from the Soviet interior or had served in the Red Army.

SOURCES Only limited research has been conducted into the Holocaust in these regions, partly due to a lack of detailed sources. Among those publications dealing with all or part of these regions, the following are worthy of mention: Andrej Angrick, Besatzungspolitik und Massenmord: Die Einsatzgruppe D in der südlichen Sowjetunion 1941–1943 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2003); Michael Gesin, “Holocaust: The Reality of Genocide in Southern Ukraine” (Ph.D. diss., Brandeis University, 2003); I.M. Liakhovitskii, ed., Zbeltaia Kniga: Svidetel'stva, fakty, dokumenty (Kharkov: Biblioteka gazety “Bensiakh,” 1994); Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001); Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000); Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007); Boris Zabarko, ed., “Nur wir haben überlebt: Holocaust in Ukraine—Zeugnisse und Dokumente (Wittenberg: Dittrich, 2004); Alexander Kruglov, The Losses Suffered by Ukrainian Jews in 1941–1944 (Kharkov: Tarbut Laam, 2005); Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vols. 4–6 (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2000–2007); S.F. Orlianskii, Kholokost na Zaporozh'e (Zaporozh'e, 2003); and Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; DADO; DAKherO; DAKO; DAMO; DASBU; DAZPO; GARF; NARA; RGVA; TsDA-HOU; TsDAVO; USHMM; VHAP; VHF; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-BL, NS 33/22, HSSPF Jeckeln to RFSS, August 27–30, 1941.
2. Order of General von Roques, August 28, 1941, BA-L, Versch, vol. 4, p. 891, as cited in Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, ed., Verbrechen der Wehrmacht: Dimensionen des Vernichtungskrieges 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2002), p. 81.
3. GARF, 7021-68-182, pp. 157, 190–193.
4. BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 86, September 17, 1941.
5. Situation report of Feldkommandantur (V) 538, September 14, 1941, BA-L, Dokumentation UdSSR III, pp. 768–769, 774; and RGVA, 1275-3-665, OK I/253 Krivoi Rog, October 15, 1941.
6. Bericht über die Tätigkeit des Sk 11a in Cherson vom 22.8. bis 10.9.1941 (NARA, N-Doc. NOKW-636); Oleksandr Ivanovych Melnyk, “Behind the Frontlines: War, Genocide and Identity in the Kherson Region of Ukraine, 1941–1944” (Master’s thesis, Edmonton University, 2004), pp. 49–53; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen vol. 33 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), pp. 452, 458–459.
7. GARF, 7021-77-421, pp. 11, 13, and reverse.
8. JuNS-V, vol. 33, pp. 448–449.
9. See Zverstva nemetsko-fasistskikh zakbvatchikov: Dokumenty, vypusk 13 (Voennoe izdatel’stvo NKO, 1945), pp. 59–62. According to the testimony of SS-Hauptscharführer Robert Barth on September 12, 1947, Sonderkommando 11a executed around 5,000 Jews in Kherson with the support of Sonderkommando 10b; see NARA, N-Doc. No-4992.
10. RGVA, 1275-3-662, pp. 41–53, FK 193 an Bfh. rückw. H. Geb. Süd, October 5, 1941.
11. BA-BL, R 58/219, EM no. 135, November 11, 1941.
12. USHMM, RG-11.001M.13 (RGVA), reel 92, 1275-3-666, report of Feldkommandantur 240, Dnjepropetrowsk, October 19, 1941, p. 3.
13. Ibid., 1275-3-661, pp. 41–42, report of Abt. VII, FK 676, November 2, 1941, with attached report of Abt. VII, FK 676, October 21, 1941.
14. BA-BL, R 94/9, Order of the Führer, November 4, 1941.
15. USHMM, RG-31.002M, reel 3, 3206-2-19.
16. Correspondence of the NKVD-chief for the Bobri-nets raion, March 30, 1946, in Evreiskie vesti (Jewish News), Kiev 1994, # 23–24, p. 15; and GARF, 7021-66-124.
17. Testimony of S. Peskova, personal archive of Fiodor Plot-nir, a regional ethnographer from Novaia Praga; F.F. Oksanych, “Nova Praha—selyshche khliborobiv: Korotkyi istoryko-kraeznavchyi narys,” in the Aleksandria (Ingulets) State Ethno-graphic Museum.
18. TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, Report of the HSSPF and chief of the Security Police in Reichskommissariat Ukraine for March 6 to April 1, 1942.
19. BA-BL, R 6/94, Gk Nikolajew, situation report for July 1942.
20. Situation report of Feldkommandantur (V) 246, Octo-ber 20, 1941, BA-L, Dokumentation UdSSR III, pp. 793–804, as cited in Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, Ver-brechen der Wehrmacht: Dimensionen des Vernichtungskrieges, p. 155.
21. VHF, # 40734, testimony of Sofia Goldshtein regard-ing the Fraidorf ghetto.
22. DAKO, 6656-2-1, p. 41.
23. Rubenstein and Altman, The Unknown Black Book, pp. 205–207.

Borders as of 1942

ALEKSANDROVKA

Pre-1941 and post-1943: Aleksandrovka, town and raion center, Kirovograd oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Aleksandrovka, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Oleksandrivka, Kirovohrad oblast', Ukraine

Aleksandrovka is located 54 kilometers (34 miles) north of Kirovograd. According to the 1939 population census, there were 565 Jews residing in Aleksandrovka, or 10 percent of the town's total population. At that time, another 117 Jews were counted in the villages of the then Aleksandrovka raion.¹

On August 5, 1941, six weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, German armed forces occupied the town. In this interim period, some of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Approximately 60 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Aleksandrovka at the start of the German occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town. The German military established a local administration and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. The chief of the raion police in Aleksandrovka was a man named Filonenko, and his deputy was Zakrevkii.

In November 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. Aleksandrovka was incorporated into Gebiet Snamenka, in Generalkommissariat Nikolajew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine.²

Shortly after the occupation of the town, the German military ordered the registration and marking of the Jews. All Jews had to wear Stars of David, and they were forced to perform various kinds of physical labor, such as road construction.

In December 1941, on the orders of the German authorities, a ghetto was established in Aleksandrovka, consisting of four streets that were fenced off. At this time, in the winter of 1941–1942, Jews were also brought to the ghetto from neighboring villages, such as Stavidlo. Initially Jews were able to go to a market nearby, and they exchanged remaining items of property for food. Some food was also delivered to the ghetto fairly regularly. The Jews in the ghetto were repeatedly robbed; the Germans took away items such as samovars and furniture. Living conditions were very primitive, with people sleeping on straw covered only by their clothes. Jewish adults went out every day to perform forced labor, leaving the children behind.³

There was a Jewish elder in the ghetto; he was a former beer trader. According to one of the survivors, he acted in a very cruel manner. German soldiers were stationed nearby, but they did not act aggressively towards the Jews.⁴

In the spring of 1942, probably at the end of March, the Germans assembled the Jews in a cowshed and conducted a selection. A few Jewish craftsmen with their families were spared and sent back to the ghetto, while the other Jews were taken away to be shot. Testimony from the trial of two local policemen indicates that the Jews from Aleksandrovka were probably taken away on trucks with other Jews from the Rayon, about 300 people altogether composed mostly of women, children, and the elderly, to a ravine near the village of Ivangorod. The Aktion was supervised by Gebietskommissar Lange and carried out by about 25 local policemen and around 100 members of the German SS and police. The victims were forced to undress before they were shot. The local policemen were rewarded with bottles of vodka for their participation.⁵

Following the Aktion, the Jewish craftsmen and their families were not permitted to leave the area of the ghetto, but occasionally older local policemen would let them out. Thanks to a warning from one of the policemen, some Jews escaped shortly before the remaining Jews were shot in the spring of 1943. The family of Anatolii Zvanskii then survived in hiding with the help of local inhabitants until the Red Army liberated the region in the winter of 1943–1944.⁶

SOURCES Publications on the fate of the Jews of Aleksandrovka during the Holocaust include Yitzhak Arad, ed., Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoj okkupatsii, 1941–1944: Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1991), pp. 211–212.

Documents on the persecution and annihilation of the Jews of Aleksandrovka can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-66-123); VHF (# 43727 and 43350); and YVA (O-4/72-1).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 59.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. VHF, # 43727, testimony of Mark Babenko, and # 43350, testimony of Anatolii Zvanskii.

4. Ibid., # 43350.

5. Ibid.; and testimony of former policeman Zhilenko in Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR, pp. 211–212. Jews from Elizavetgradka, Krasnosel'e, and Ivangorod were also shot in Aleksandrovka. The findings of the ChGK (GARF, 7021-66-123, p. 1), however, note that more than 600 Jews were shot in Aleksandrovka in the fall of 1941, along with 49 Jews from the village of Krymki and 72 Jews from the village of Sosnovka. These two villages lay within the Aleksandrovka raion.

6. VHF, # 43350.

BOBRINET'S

Pre-1941 and post-1943: Bobrinets, town and raion center, Kirovograd oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; 1991: Kirovohrad oblast', Ukraine.

Bobrinets is located 54 kilometers (34 miles) south of Kirovograd. According to the census of 1926, the town had 2,265 Jewish residents (20.4 percent of the total population); in 1939, there were only 654 Jews remaining (14 percent of the total).

This population decline was mainly due to the resettlement of Jews to other regions. In what under German occupation was to become the area of Gebiet Bobrinets, in 1939 there were also 353 Jews in the Ustinovka raion, 189 in the Bobrinets raion, 123 in the Rovnoe raion, and 21 in Vytiazevka. According to a German report dated October 10, 1941, there were 33 Jews registered in Rayon Rownoje at that time.¹

Forces of the German XIV Motorized Corps occupied Bobrinets on August 6, 1941. By the time German troops arrived in the town, several hundred local Jews had escaped to the east. All men of military age were drafted into or voluntarily joined the Red Army. About 55 percent of the pre-war Jewish population was still in town when the German forces arrived. In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military administration was in charge of the town. For part of that time, it was under the control of the 444th Security Division. The military authorities established a local administration in Bobrinets and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force recruited from local inhabitants.

In mid-November 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The town became the administrative center of Rayon and Gebiet Bobrinets. Three other towns also became Rayon centers within the Gebiet: Vytiazevka, Ustinovka, and Rovnoe.

A short time after the start of the occupation, the German military authorities gave instructions to register all the Jews of the town. They also ordered the Jewish population to wear special armbands on their sleeves. The German authorities forced the Jews to perform physically demanding work of various kinds (such as repairing the streets and damaged buildings). While conducting forced labor, the Jews were also subjected to humiliations and beatings at the hands of the local Ukrainian police. At the end of December 1941, the Gebietskommissar, Gemeinschaftsführer Holzmann, ordered the establishment of an enclosed Jewish residential area. The ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded day and night by the local police.² At the beginning of January 1942, one inmate managed to escape from the ghetto. As a punishment, the German police killed 10 Jews, burning them alive in a house. At the end of January or at the beginning of February 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. They shot all remaining ghetto residents—344 persons in all—in an area to the southwest of the town. Among the victims were 20 men, 180 women, 120 children, and 24 older persons. In May 1942, the German forces shot another group of 20 Jews close to the regional hospital (12 women, 6 children, and 2 older persons).³ Including the killing of another 5 Jews on August 10, 1942,⁴ the total number of Jewish victims in Bobrinets was 379.

In the late spring of 1942,⁵ the Gebietskommissar in Bobrinets issued orders for some 25 Jews scattered in the surrounding villages of Rayon Ustinovka to be arrested and brought to the local police station in Ustinovka. Another 35 to 40 Jews were brought to Ustinovka from Bobrinets, where they had been collected from the other outlying Rayons of the Gebiet.⁶ In the village of Izrailevka, there were about 60 Jews still living in their own homes who had not been confined to a ghetto.⁷

The Gendarmerie and local police (Schutzmannschaft) escorted the Jewish women, children, and men from Izrailevka to a freshly dug pit near Izrailevka, to which those held in Ustinovka were also brought. Members of the Security Police, Gendarmerie, and Schutzmannschaft then shot the Jews in the pit. The Bobrinets Gebietskommissar and the Rayonchef in Ustinovka, a local ethnic German by the name of Friedrich Strohmeier, stood by and observed the massacre.⁸ Having taken away the “racially pure” Jews that morning, some policemen were sent back to Izrailevka to collect about 20 half-Jewish children, who were then killed as well. In total, more than 100 people were murdered at this site.⁹

SOURCES The correspondence of the NKVD chief of the district of Bobrinets from March 30, 1946, can be found in Evreiskie vesti (Jewish News) (Kiev, 1994), nos. 23–24.

Documents on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Bobrinets and the surrounding raions can be found in the following archives: ANA; GARF (7021-66-124); DAKO; and Sta. Dortmund.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-11.001M.13, reel 92, 1275-3-664, p. 39.
2. GARF, 7021-66-124, Soviet Extraordinary State Commission report for the Bobrinets raion, p. 2.
3. See the correspondence of the NKVD chief for the Bobrinets raion dated March 30, 1946, in Evreiskie vesti, nos. 23–24, p. 15.
4. Testimony by the witness M.D. Globodzinskii of Bobrinets, GARF, 7021-66-124, p. 2.
5. The precise date of the Aktion is not clear from the Soviet witness statements. The main surviving eyewitness dated the shooting in May or June 1942; see Australian Special Investigations Unit (SIU), statement of Ivan Konstantinovich Zhilun, December 23, 1989. However, the German Generalkommissar for the Nikolajew Generalkommissariat reported in the spring of 1942 that there were no longer any Jews or half-Jews in his region as of April 1, 1942.
6. SIU (SBU Kirovograd), statement of Alexander A. Gibner (Hübner), March 20, 1947, at his own trial. See also the additional evidence collected by the SIU in the case of Heinrich Wagner and by Sta. Dortmund in the case of Ernst Hering (45 Js 30/93).
7. SIU, statement of Ivan K. Zhilun, December 23, 1989.
8. See SIU (SBU Kirovograd), statements of Alexander A. Gibner, March 20, 1947, and April 1, 1947, at his own trial; F.F.S., March 1, 1958, and I.K.K., February 13, 1958, in Criminal Case File No. 4419 (Mefodii Marchik).
9. LG-Kö (4. grosse Strafkammer, 1. Jugendkammer), Verdict (Urteil) B. 104-28/97 in der Strafsache gegen Ernst Hering, December 19, 1997 (Hering Verdict), pp. 43–49; in June 1991, a team of forensic experts employed by the Australian SIU exhumed the mass grave near Izrailevka. The skeletal remains of 19 children aged less than 11 years were uncovered, lying at the top of the grave. Under these bodies, a layer of soil was found and beneath that the remains of more than 100 adult humans.

DOBROVELICHKOVKA (AKA DOBROVELICHNEVKA)

Pre-1941: Dobrovelichkovka, town and raion center, Kirovograd oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Dobrowelitschkowka, Rayon center, Gebiet Perwomaisk, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Dobrovelichkovka, Kirovograd oblast', Ukraine

Dobrovelichkovka is located 100 kilometers (62 miles) west of Kirovograd. According to the 1939 census, 366 Jews (10.3 percent of the total population) were living in Dobrovelichkovka.¹

At the start of August 1941, six weeks after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22, German armed forces occupied the town. Part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were called into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Approximately 55 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Dobrovelichkovka at the start of the German occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town. The German military created a local authority and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from local residents. The Ukrainian police played an active role in the implementation of most of the anti-Jewish measures imposed by the German occupiers.

In November 1941, authority was transferred to a German civilian administration. Dobrovelichkovka was incorporated into Gebiet Perwomaisk, within Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. The Gebietskommissar was Kameradschaftsführer Lafrentz.²

Shortly after the occupation of the town, the German military authorities ordered the registration and marking of all the Jews. They had to wear distinguishing armbands, and they were forced into various kinds of heavy physical labor such as road building and repair work.

According to one uncorroborated source, in the fall of 1941, on the orders of the German military administration, a ghetto was created in the town. Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto and were not allowed to buy goods from Ukrainians. As a result, starvation quickly ensued. The Germans shot the Jews of Dobrovelichkovka on December 23, 1941. On that day, 207 Jews (40 men, 57 women, 45 elderly people, and 65 children) were shot in a ditch to the northeast of the town near the village of Mar'evka.³ A number of Jews living in Rayon Dobrowelitschkowka, for example, 18 from the village of Lipniashka, were also murdered in the fall of 1941.

SOURCES The main published source used for this entry is Evreiskie vesti (Kiev, 1994), nos. 23–24, p. 15.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 59.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. See the memorandum of the head of the Dobrovelichkovka RO NKVD, in Evreiskie vesti, nos. 23–24, p. 15.

FRAIDORF

Pre-1941: Fraidorf, village, Sofievka raion, Dnepropetrovsk oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Friesen (Stalindorf), Gebiet Kriwoj Rog-Land, Generalkommissariat Dnjeopetrovsk; post-1991: Dnipropetrovsk oblast', Ukraine

Fraidorf is located approximately 100 kilometers (62 miles) southwest of Dnepropetrovsk. The Fraidorf village/kolkhoz was located about 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) from Stalindorf.¹

In August 1941, German armed forces occupied Fraidorf. The number of Jews that remained in Fraidorf at the start of the occupation is unknown. During the first months of occupation, a German military commandant's office governed the village. The Germans requisitioned livestock and food supplies in the area. They appointed a young ethnic German kolkhoz worker named Filip as the village head (starosta), and a man named Mazur served in the local Ukrainian police.

According to Sofia Goldshtein, a Jewish survivor from Fraidorf, soon after the start of the occupation the local police “kicked us out of our house, and took everything we had, our chickens, cows, and other possessions. There was an order that all the Jews had to move to a single street, several families to a single house. We couldn't take anything with us, not even a cow.”²

The ghetto in Fraidorf existed from the summer of 1941 until the spring of 1942. The Jews in Fraidorf also suffered from harassment by the local police, and some Jews were murdered as alleged Communists. Living conditions in the open ghetto were overcrowded, with six people sharing a single room. Those capable of work were taken out to perform unpaid agricultural labor, looking after horses and cattle. The Jews had to trade their last remaining possessions, such as bedding, to obtain food. Since the family of Anna Surzhenko had good relations with the family of the starosta, having helped them during the famine, she was able to leave the ghetto to barter items and was not troubled by the local police, who had been warned not to harm her. Most other Jews were not so fortunate. Local inhabitants warned the Jews to flee, but most remained in the ghetto, as they could not abandon sick and dependent relatives.³

At the end of 1941, authority in the region was transferred to a German civil administration. The village of Fraidorf was incorporated into Gebiet Kriwoj Rog, headed by Gebietskommissar Dr. Frick, which lay within Generalkommissariat Dnjeopetrovsk.

In March 1942, a number of young Jews capable of work, together with other Jews from Rayon Stalindorf, were marched together following horse-drawn wagons about 25 kilometers

(15.5 miles) to a labor camp established in a stable near the village of Langovka. These Jews were used to construct the highway (Durchgangsstrasse IV) between Krivoi Rog and Dnepropetrovsk. Soon after the young Jews' departure, the Germans shot all the remaining Jews in a ravine near the village. The total number of Jewish victims in Fraidorf is unknown. In 1939, there were 7,312 Jews living in the Stalindorf Jewish national raion. According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission, 3,911 Jews were shot in the Stalindorf raion during the German occupation, most of them between May 1942 and August 1943.⁴

After the war, the local Ukrainian policeman Mazur was tried and punished, but the ethnic German Filip fled with the German army and thereby evaded punishment.

SOURCES The article by Yakov Pasik, "Stalindorf Jewish National Rayon," available at http://xeroxsuperoffer.ru/index.php?f=stalindorf_en.htm, gives a concise history of the Stalindorf national raion.

Relevant information can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-57-70); and VHF (# 40734 and 41136).

Martin Dean and Crispin Brooks

NOTES

1. Pasik's article "Stalindorf Jewish National Rayon," includes a detailed map of the Stalindorf national raion, which, however, shows two villages named "Fraydorf," one about 25 kilometers (15.5 miles) west of Stalindorf and one about the same distance to the southeast. From the available oral testimonies, it has not been possible to determine which Fraidorf the witnesses lived in, only that they both lived in the same place.

2. VHF, # 40734, testimony of Sofia Goldshtein.

3. Ibid., and # 41136, testimony of Anna Surzhenko.

4. Pasik, "Stalindorf Jewish National Rayon."

INGULETS (AKA GAR SHEFER OR SHIROKAIA)

Pre-1941: Ingulets, village, Novolatovka sel'sovet, Shirokoe raion, Dnepropetrovsk oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Ingulez, Rayon Schirokoje, Gebiet Kriwoj Rog-Land, Generalkommissariat Dnjeprpetrowsk; post-1991: Inbulets', Dnipropetrovsk oblast', Ukraine

Ingulets is located 150 kilometers (93 miles) southwest of Dnepropetrovsk. On August 6, 1941, German armed forces occupied the village, about seven weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During this time, some Jews were able to evacuate, while able-bodied men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 1,000 Jews remained in Ingulets at the start of the occupation.

During the first months of occupation, a German military commandant's office governed the village. Shortly after the Germans' arrival, Jews living on nearby kolkhozy were ordered to move to Ingulets, and the Germans requisitioned the livestock and food supplies there.

After the occupation of the village, Ukrainian antisemites began to persecute the Jews. Several dozen Jews, accused of being Communists and Soviet activists, were shot. Most Jews continued to live together in their own houses, but they were subjected to a number of restrictions. According to the survivor Mariia Evtukhova, who uses the term "ghetto" to describe conditions in Ingulets at this time, the police never fed them. However, "since she had a Ukrainian passport, she was able to go to the market and the Ukrainians would sell her bread, potatoes, and other foodstuffs, so her family didn't go hungry. She shared this food with everyone in the ghetto."¹

At the end of 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The village was incorporated into Gebiet Kriwoj Rog, headed by Gebietskommissar Regierungsrat Dr. Frick. In turn, Gebiet Kriwoj Rog became part of Generalkommissariat Dnjeprpetrowsk. However, Germans were rarely visible to the Jews in Ingulets, who were very much at the mercy of the local Ukrainian police.

While she was in the ghetto, Mariia knew of many people who tried to commit suicide, but few were successful. The Ukrainian police occasionally drowned Jews; it appears that they did this merely because they were Jewish. One time, Mariia witnessed the police beat eight children and two elderly people to death and then throw them into a pit. Almost every night, the police would take girls and young women away from the ghetto and rape them; but they did not kill these women. In December 1941, the Germans organized a mass execution of elderly Jews. They were all assembled and then escorted with their hands behind their heads into the forest to be shot.²

On May 20, 1942, around 300 young Jews were transported to a labor camp in the village of Novoselovka. These Jews were used to build a highway between Krivoi Rog and Dnepropetrovsk. In late May or early June 1942, the remaining Jews in Ingulets were taken over a bridge and concentrated in a small group of houses, creating a more clearly defined (but still open) ghetto. By this time the Jews had scarcely any possessions left. The Jews remained in this ghetto for up to two weeks. On about June 10-11, 1942, the Germans and their collaborators liquidated the ghetto. First, they instructed the Jews to gather in the club building, and on the morning of June 11, 1942, they shot them all in a ravine near the village.³ Mariia Evtukhova managed to escape from the ghetto with two members of her family just before the mass shooting. According to Soviet Extraordinary State Commission documents, around 1,200 persons were shot. However, this number includes at least 50 Ukrainian Communists from the Shirokoe settlement who had dug the pits for the mass shooting in the ravine near the village.⁴

SOURCES Relevant published sources include the following: Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: "Epos," 2000), 4:508; Sholom-Aleikhem (Krivoi Rog), no. 7 (2004), and nos. 1-4 (2005); and "Nikoly bil'she," Tkuma: Vestnik Tsentral'nogo Ukrainskogo fonda istorii Kholokosta "Tkuma," no. 10 (60) (2005).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-57-71); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 11); and VHF (# 30084).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. VHF, # 30084, testimony of Mariia Evtukhova.
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid. Also see testimony of Raisa Leibusheva Bogomol, in Vozrozhdenie pamiaty: Vospominaniia svidetelei i zbertu Kholokosta, no. 1 (Dnepropetrovsk: Tsentr "Tkuma," 2008), pp. 68–69.
4. GARF, 7021-57-71, p. 8.

KAMENKA

Pre-1941: Kamenka, village, Sofievka raion, Dnepropetrovsk oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Sofijewka, Gebiet Kriwoj Rog-Land, Generalkommissariat Dnjepropetrowsk, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Kamianka, Dnipropetrovsk oblast', Ukraine

Kamenka is located about 140 kilometers (87 miles) southwest of Dnepropetrovsk. In the 1930s, the village became the center of its own Jewish sel'sovet with 1,458 residents, as part of the Stalindorf Jewish national raion.¹ By June 1941, the Jewish population had decreased significantly, owing to the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933 and the resettlement of Jews to other regions.

On August 16, 1941, the village was occupied by German armed forces. In the weeks prior to this, some Jews were able to evacuate from the village, and able-bodied men were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily.

In the first months of the occupation, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. At the end of 1941, authority was transferred to a German civilian administration. The village became part of Gebiet Kriwoj Rog, which was headed by a Nazi official named Dr. Frick, who served as Gebietskommissar. Together with Krivoy Rog, the village of Kamenka lay within Generalkommissariat Dnjepropetrowsk.

After the occupation of the village, Ukrainian antisemites persecuted the Jewish population. Dozens of Jews were shot, accused of being Communists and Soviet activists. In September 1941, all Jews were moved into an unfenced ghetto, consisting of one street in the village. Jews were not allowed to go beyond the boundaries of the street and were required to wear white armbands. There were about three or four families living in each house. Living conditions were very unsanitary, with no place to bathe, and Jews ate mostly soup, kasha, and corn. Jews were robbed or forced to surrender clothing such as fur items and other valuable possessions. The Jews were taken out to perform forced labor every day, mostly in agriculture or clearing snow from the roads. Children were also put to work removing the husks from corn.²

At the end of April or in early May 1942, the Germans and local police rounded up the Jews and selected those fit for labor. These people were transported to a labor camp surrounded with barbed wire in the village of Avdot'evka, where they were exploited for work in a quarry and the construction of a highway between Krivoy Rog and Dnepropetrovsk. On days off, they were allowed to return to see their relatives in the village. The Kamenka ghetto was liquidated on May 29, 1942, when all the Jews remaining there, mostly the elderly and children, were shot. The total number of Jewish victims from Kamenka was more than 200.³

SOURCES The testimony of Ol'ga Teitelman has been published in Shabat Sholom (Dnepropetrovsk), no. 10 (1997).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: TsDAVO (4620-2-358, p. 27, Inquiry of the Kamenka sel'sovet); and VHF (# 24086 and 35008).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Yakov Pasik, "Stalindorf Jewish National Rayon," available at www.evkol.nm.ru/stalindorf_en.htm. His article includes a detailed map of the Stalindorf national raion.
2. VHF, # 35008, testimony of Ilya Boltianskii (born 1924); # 24086, testimony of Ol'ga Teitelman (born 1928).
3. TsDAVO, 4620-2-358, p. 27; and VHF, # 35008 and 24086.

KAMENKA-SHEVCHENKOVSKAIA

Pre-1941: Kamenka-Shevchenkovskaia, town and raion center, Kirovograd oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rayon center, Gebiet Aleksandrowka, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; 1991: raion center, Cherkasy oblast', Ukraine

Kamenka-Shevchenkovskaia is located about 66 kilometers (41 miles) north of Kirovograd. The 1939 census reported 618 Jews in Kamenka (7.92 percent of the total population) and 737 Jews in the entire Kamenka raion. By the summer of 1941, however, the Jewish population also included a few refugees from Poland, who were forewarned about the brutality of the Germans.

German forces occupied Kamenka on August 5, 1941. During the six weeks after the initial German invasion of the Soviet Union, some of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and eligible men were drafted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. About 75 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Kamenka at the start of the German occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town. The Ortskommandantur set up a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from among the local population. The latter took an active part in all the anti-Jewish measures. In chronological order, the chiefs of police were: at the start, the former tsarist army officer Gladkikh; from the end of 1941, I. Nuzhdenko; and from the end of March 1942, a man called Briukhovetskii. Gladkikh was placed in charge of the prison at the end of 1941. The Ukrainian police received their orders from the German Gendarmerie. In November 1941, authority passed to a German civil administration. Kamenka became a Rayon center in Gebiet Aleksandrovka, within Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. The Gebietskommissar in Aleksandrovka was a man named Lange.

On their arrival in Kamenka on August 5–6, 1941, German soldiers conducted an Aktion in which several Jews were killed, including some children. More than 200 Jews managed to survive by hiding or fleeing to the surrounding villages, and they returned to the town over the following days. As Philip Portianskii recalls, on his return to Kamenka, he and his family received registration numbers from the local administration, and they were forced to wear distinguishing marks so that everybody knew they were Jews. At that time there were 268 Jews registered in Kamenka.¹ Jews were also required to perform heavy labor in groups segregated according to sex. At some date after October 19, 1941, two ghettos were established in Kamenka. A ghetto for craftsmen (including blacksmiths, cobblers, tailors, and cabinetmakers) with their families was set up at the Pokrov sovkhos (state-owned farm); all the remaining Jews were herded into another ghetto located in what was then the raion hospital building.² According to the testimony of Portianskii, who was probably in the noncraftsmen's ghetto, as his father was a laborer, it was an ugly camp on the edge of the village. There were neither bedclothes nor soap. However, with the help of the police chief (probably still Gladkikh), he was able to escape.³ Jews were prohibited from going outside the borders of the ghetto to buy products from Ukrainians. As a result, starvation soon ensued. According to the regulation of January 10, 1942, issued by the Ukrainian police chief Nuzhdenko, Jews were only permitted on the street between 7:00 A.M. and 5:00 P.M. Ukrainians were also forbidden to shelter Jews in their homes or to speak with them. For violating this regulation, Jews would be shot, and Ukrainians faced 30 days in prison and a fine.⁴

In February 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto for noncraftsmen on the hospital grounds. They rounded up the 280 Jews living there and shot them.⁵ At the beginning of March 1942, a second Aktion was conducted in which the ghetto for craftsmen was liquidated. At night, by decree of the Gebietskommissar, the more than 100 Jews who remained in that ghetto were arrested and taken to the horse stable in the yard of the police station. Then they were taken out in groups of 8 to 10 into the cellar of the police station building and shot by Ukrainian policemen.⁶

Altogether more than 400 Jews were murdered in Kamenka in February and March of 1942.⁷

The Ukrainian policemen from Kamenka also participated in the shooting of Jews in other nearby settlements. At the end of March 1942, under the chief of police, Briukhovetskii, they set out and shot Jews in the town of Aleksandrovka. Together with German forces and Ukrainian policemen from Aleksandrovka, they shot more than 300 Jews from Aleksandrovka in a ravine near the village of Ivangorod.⁸

A number of the local policemen in Kamenka were tried by the Soviet authorities at the end of the occupation. Among them were the policemen F.I. Tsvirkun, F.T. Zhilenko, and also Seregi Piven', named by one survivor as a policeman with the worst reputation for atrocities.⁹

SOURCES Information on the activities of the local police in Kamenka-Shevchenkivskaia can be found in the collection of published documents edited by Yitzhak Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoj okkupatsii (1941–1944). Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1991), pp. 209–212.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: DAKO (1004-1-35); GARF (7021-66-123); TsDAVO (166-2-5); USHMM (RG-50.226 # 0026); and VHF (# 43727).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. USHMM, RG-50.226 # 0026.
2. O.H. Shamrai, "Ekonomichni zbytky, naneseni nimets'ko-fashysts'kymy okupantamy na terytorii Kam'ians'koho raionu," in Cherkashchyna v konteksti istorii Ukrainy. Materialy Druboi naukovo-kraeznavchoi konferentsii Cherkashchyny (do 60-richchia Peremohy u Velykii Vitchyzniani viini 1941–1945 rr.) (Cherkasy: Vash Dim, 2005), p. 265. See also the affidavits of the former policemen F.I. Tsvirkun and F.T. Zhilenko in Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR, pp. 209–212. DAKO, 1004-1-35, p. 53, indicates the establishment of the "ghetto" at the end of December 1941. USHMM, RG-50.226.0026, Philip Portianskii, dates the formation of the camp in early November.
3. USHMM, RG-50.226.0026.
4. TsDAVO, 166-2-5, p. 10.
5. Certified Statement, October 15, 1990, No. 72, Cherkassy Oblast', Ukrainskoe obschestvo okhrany pamiatnikov istorii i kul'tury, addressed to the Head of the Advisory Board of the Ukrainian Society for the Protection of Memorials of History and Culture in Kiev. An official memorial now stands at the place of the shooting (the Kamenka district hospital).
6. Testimony of F.I. Tsvirkun; see Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR, pp. 210–211.
7. DAKO, 1004-1-35, pp. 53–54.
8. Testimony of the former Kamenka policeman F.T. Zhilenko; see Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR, pp. 211–212.
9. Ibid., pp. 209–212; and VHF, # 43727, testimony of Mark Babenko.

KHERSON

Pre-1941: Kherson, city, Nikolaev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Cherson, Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew; post-1991: Kherson, center, Kherson oblast', Ukraine

Kherson is located about 58 kilometer (36 miles) southeast of Nikolaev. According to the 1939 census, 16,145 Jews were living in Kherson (16.65 percent of the total population).¹ On August 19, 1941, eight weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, the SS Motorized Brigade “Leibstandarte-Adolf-Hitler” occupied the city. By that time, more than half of the Jewish population had been able to evacuate to the east. More than 7,000 Jews remained under German occupation (40–45 percent of the pre-war Jewish population).

From August until October 1941, a German military commandant’s office ran the city. Oberstleutnant von Rochow was in charge until September 5, 1941. Oberstleutnant von Lepel succeeded him until September 16, 1941, and after that date, Hauptmann Barth.² The military administration established a local council and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force recruited from among the city residents. The police force initially consisted of 157 men.³

In November 1941, the Germans established a civil administration. Kherson was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. Bürgermeister Mattern was named the city mayor (Stadtkommissar). Major Heinrich Hannibal of the Order Police (Schutzpolizei) became the senior commander of the SS and Police Leader (SS- und Polizeistandortführer) in the city. Hauptmann Lang of the Schutzpolizei administration in Wiesbaden became the new head of the Schutzpolizei. He was later succeeded in this position by Hauptmann Fischer.⁴

Portrait of rescuer Yevgenia Zamoroko-Lysenko (standing), 1937–1939. Zamoroko helped to falsify papers for her former student, Masha Gurevich-Spivak. Spivak’s family was murdered in an anti-Jewish Aktion in Kherson. Zamoroko was honored posthumously as Righteous by Yad Vashem in 2007.

USHMM WS #37367, COURTESY OF NIKOLAY ZAMOROKO

Starting on August 20, 1941, a detachment of Sonderkommando 11a, consisting of 13 men commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Eberhard Heinze, was stationed in Kherson.⁵ From the end of September to the start of November 1941, the entire force of Sonderkommando 11a, under the command of SS-Sturmbannführer Paul Zapp, was located in the city; after that, only a part remained.

In the spring of 1942, a regional Security Police outpost (Sipo-Aussendienststelle) was set up in Kherson. It served under the Commander of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. The first person in charge of the Kherson Sipo-Aussendienststelle was SS-Sturmscharführer Kurt Steffen. In June 1942, he was succeeded by SS-Obersturmführer Waldemar Kolter.

On August 23, 1941, the Sonderkommando formed a Judenrat and ordered the Jews of the city to wear a Star of David 10 centimeters (4 inches) in diameter as a distinguishing mark on their left breast pockets and backs as of August 25. From August 24 to August 27, 1941, the Jews were ordered to register and hand over to the Judenrat all money and objects of value. Anyone failing to comply would be shot.⁶ After marking and registering the Jews, Sonderkommando 11a issued orders that they could only reside on certain designated streets, establishing a ghetto on September 7. The ghetto was located in a remote section of the city near the intersection of Frunze and Rabochnaia streets. A Jewish police force functioned within the ghetto. Overseeing the ghetto from its establishment to its liquidation was SS-Scharführer Baron Leo von der Recke of Sonderkommando 11a. On a daily basis, the Jews were summoned to perform various forms of humiliating and heavy physical labor. According to one source, Jews were forced to clean toilets and were harnessed to carts instead of horses or obliged to pull heavy trucks with the engines switched off.⁷

Almost immediately after starting to impose these restrictions, Sonderkommando 11a began shooting Jews. On August 29, 1941, the city’s commandant announced the “execution” (by shooting) of 100 Jews and 10 “leading Bolsheviks” as a reprisal measure, and on September 6, 1941, the shooting of 100 Jewish men and 10 Jewish women.⁸ As of September 10, 1941, 400 Jewish men and 10 Jewish women had been killed.⁹ Just a short time later, 17 more Jews were shot for not wearing the Star of David.¹⁰

On September 24–25, 1941, the ghetto was liquidated, and the remaining Jews were shot.¹¹ Prior to the Aktion, Jews in the ghetto were informed that they would be resettled to Palestine. Sarah Yudkovich realized the likely purpose of the operation and escaped from the ghetto on September 23, fleeing to the hospital in search of help. However, the staff there were too afraid to assist her.¹² At this time the Germans searched the hospital, assisted by local policemen, who were better able to identify the Jews. The two most notorious native policemen, Val’ka the German and Grishka the Gypsy, shouted: “Who is hiding Yids here, big and small?” One of the Jewish doctors was stabbed in the buttocks by a local policeman before they left.¹³

When the Aktion started, the Jews were first marched on foot to a factory site on the edge of the city. From there they were conveyed in groups on trucks to an antitank ditch 7 kilometers (4.3 miles) northeast of the city, near the settlement of Zelenivka. The Jews were shot in groups of 10 to 12 by two rifle squads of the same size into two graves simultaneously. Those waiting their turn could hear the shots. Women and children screamed and clung to each other.¹⁴ According to evidence from the postwar German legal investigation, one 12-year-old blond Jewish girl was spared by the personal intervention of a senior SS officer, Heinze.¹⁵ Soviet forensic experts estimated in 1944 that more than 8,000 people were buried in the mass graves.¹⁶ Among those shot at this site were possibly also some Jewish Soviet prisoners of war, as the Jews were already being separated out from among the other Red Army captives held in the city from September 1941.¹⁷ Assisted by the local police and denunciations from the local population, German security forces continued to hunt down and kill Jews who had gone into hiding over the following weeks and months.

In January 1942, another mass Aktion was carried out. The victims were around 400 Jews living in mixed marriages, who had been quartered separately in September 1941.¹⁸ Einsatzkommando 12 was probably responsible for this killing Aktion.

SOURCES Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Kherson can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; DAKherO; GARF (7021-77-420 and 421); LG-Mü I (IV 9/69 Paul Zapp); NARA (N-Docs., NOKW and NO series); RGVA; and VHF.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 25.

2. Bericht über die Tätigkeit des Sk 11a in Cherson vom August 22 to September 10, 1941 (NARA, N-Doc. NOKW-636); Report of the Ortskommandantur II/915, September 18, 1941 (NARA, N-Doc. NOKW-1839).

3. NOKW-636.

4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942. See also the memo (Schnellbrief) of October 25, 1941, from the chief of the Security Police, RGVA, 1323-2-121, pp. 33–34.

5. NOKW-636; Eberhard Heinze died in Poznań on January 22, 1945. Sonderkommando 11a was itself a subunit of Otto Ohlendorf's Einsatzgruppe D.

6. Order from Sonderkommando 11a to the Jews in the city of Kherson on August 23, 1941, LG-Mü I, verdict of February 26, 1970—IV 9/69—in the case against Zapp and others, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), vol. 33, Lfd. Nr. 724, p. 451.

7. NOKW-636; Oleksandr Ivanovych Melnyk, "Behind the Frontlines: War, Genocide and Identity in the Kherson Region of Ukraine, 1941–1944" (Master's thesis, Edmonton University, 2004), pp. 49–53. Melnyk cites DAKherO, r-1479-

1-11, p. 26, regarding the types of forced labor imposed. Also see JuNS-V, vol. 33, Lfd. Nr. 724, pp. 452, 458–459; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 618.

8. GARF, 7021-77-420, pp. 153 and reverse.

9. NOKW-636.

10. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 107, October 8, 1941.

11. GARF, 7021-77-421, pp. 11, 13, and reverse.

12. Melnyk, "Behind the Frontlines," pp. 55–56. Yudkovich was shot with the other Jews of Kherson.

13. Ibid., p. 53, citing Zubris, "Ne zaroslo travoiu zabut-tia," Nadnyprians'ka Pravda, September 21, 1995.

14. JuNS-V, vol. 33, Lfd. Nr. 724, pp. 448–449.

15. Andrej Angrick, Besatzungspolitik und Massenmord: Die Einsatzgruppe D in der südlichen Sowjetunion 1941–1943 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2003), p. 437.

16. See the report of the court medical experts on March 23, 1944, in Zverstva nemetsko-fasbistskikh zakbvatnikov: Dokumenty, vypusk 13 (Voennoe izdatel'stvo NKO, 1945), pp. 59–62. According to the testimony under oath of former SS-Hauptscharführer Robert Barth on September 12, 1947, Sonderkommando 11a executed around 5,000 Jews in Kherson with the support of Sonderkommando 10b; see NARA, N-Doc. NO-4992.

17. Melnyk, "Behind the Frontlines," p. 54, citing DAKherO, r-3562-2-32, p. 106.

18. GARF, 7021-77-420, p. 117; Melnyk, "Behind the Frontlines," p. 48, notes that 150 female Jews living in mixed marriages with Ukrainians remained alive after the mass killings in September 1941, citing DAKherO, r-1824-1-95, p. 2.

MALAIA VISKA

Pre-1941: Malaia Viska, town and raion center, Kirovograd oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Mala Viska, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew; post-1991: Mala Vyska, Kirovograd oblast', Ukraine

Malaia Viska is located about 55 kilometers (34 miles) west-northwest of Kirovograd. In 1939, there were 207 Jews living in the town (2.56 percent of the total population). Another 101 Jews resided in the villages of the Malaia Viska raion.

The town of Malaia Viska was occupied by German troops at the beginning of August 1941, five and a half weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. During this period, some of the local Jews fled the town and managed to escape to the east. All men, Jewish or non-Jewish, of military age were drafted into the Red Army. A number of others joined the Soviet forces voluntarily. When German troops occupied Malaia Viska, only about one quarter of the pre-war Jewish population was still in the town. In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the administration of the town. The Ortskommandantur organized a local administration and established a unit of Ukrainian auxiliary police recruited from local inhabitants. The Ukrainian police took an active part in the anti-Jewish measures.

In November 1941, a German civil administration took over responsibility for the town. Malaia Viska initially became the center of Gebiet Mala Wiska under the command of Gebietskommissar Hinz. Several other towns and their raions, such as Khmelevoe, Novo-Arkhangel'sk, and Podvysokoe, belonged to the Gebiet. Gebiet Mala Wiska was part of Generalkommissariat Nikolajew within Reichskommissariat Ukraine.¹ By 1943 the administrative structure had been reorganized, and Malaia Viska became a Rayon center within Gebiet Nowo Mirgorod.

Shortly after the occupation of the town by German troops, the Ortskommandantur ordered several anti-Jewish measures. First, members of the Jewish population were forced to register and to wear distinguishing armbands identifying them as Jews. In addition, the Jews were ordered to carry out physically exhausting work, for which they received little or no payment. All these individuals were settled or relocated into a specific area of the town (an open ghetto). The first Aktionen against the Jews of Malaia Viska and its environs came in September 1941. On September 19, a detachment of the 8th SS-Regiment shot 17 Jews.²

According to the report of Ortskommandantur I/829 (based in Novaia Ukrainka), on October 10, 1941, there were 53 Jews still residing in Malaia Viska. At that time the head of Rayon Mala Wiska was an ethnic German named Johann Sartisson, and the head of the Ukrainian police (Hilfspolizei) was Jakob Chomitsch.³ Most of the remaining Jews were murdered between February and March 1942, when a general Aktion against the Jews in Rayon Mala Wiska took place. During the Aktion, those Jews able to work were selected and sent to a labor camp in Malaia Viska. These Jewish prisoners had to live in the stables of a sugar refinery, and they worked on building and repairing roads.⁴ This labor camp was closed in 1943. It is assumed that all the prisoners were then killed.

SOURCES Documentation regarding the persecution and killing of the Jews in Malaia Viska can be found in the following archives: DAKO (6656-2-1); RGVA (1275-3-3); and VHAP.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

2. VHAP, Kdo.-Stab RFSS, 1. SS-Infanteriebrigade (mot), Abt. Ic, report of September 26, 1941.

3. RGVA, 1275-3-3, p. 40, Ortskommandantur I/829 (Nowo-Ukrainka), report of October 14, 1941, appendixes I and II.

4. DAKO, 6656-2-1, p. 41.

NIKOLAEV

Pre-1941: Nikolaev, city and oblast' center, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nikolajew, capital, Gebiet and Generalkommissariat Nikolajew; post-1991: Mykolaiv, oblast' center, Ukraine

Nikolaev is located about 400 kilometers (249 miles) south-southeast of Kiev. According to the 1939 population census, 25,280 Jews were living in Nikolaev (15.2 percent of the total). German armed forces occupied the city on August 17, 1941, about eight weeks after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union. In these weeks, the majority of the Jews were able to evacuate to the east. One of those who escaped by rail recalled: "Every time there were bombings, the train stopped. We got out and took cover underneath it. Once the planes flew away, we got back in the train and it started moving again."¹ Men of eligible age were drafted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. More than 6,000 Jews remained in the city at the start of the occupation.²

From August 18 until October 1941, German Field Commandant's Office no. 193 (Feldkommandantur 193) ran the affairs of the city. The commandant established a local administration in the city, and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force consisting of 195 men was recruited from among local residents.³

Starting in November 1941, a German civilian administration assumed authority in the region. Nikolaev became the administrative center of Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. National Socialist Motorist Corps (NSKK)-Obergruppenführer Oppermann was appointed as Generalkommissar. Oberbürgermeister Nickau was named the city mayor (Stadtkommissar). SS-Brigadeführer Tittmann became the SS- und Polizeistandortführer in Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. Nickau and Tittmann held these positions until September 1942. Major Witzleb, who was transferred from Aussig, was in charge of the Schutzpolizei in the city. He served under Unter-Leutnant

Residents of an AJDC-supported Jewish home for the aged pose in the dining hall in Nikolaev, ca. 1928–1929.
USHMM WS #29877, COURTESY OF AJDC

Weiberg, who was Commander of the Order Police (KdO) for Generalkommissariat Nikolajew.⁴

From August 18 until the end of September 1941, a detachment of Sonderkommando 11a was based in Nikolaev. Sonderkommando 11a, commanded by SS-Sturmbannführer Paul Zapp, was subordinated to Einsatzgruppe D under the command of SS-Oberführer Otto Ohlendorf. From mid-September to the end of October 1941, Einsatzkommando 12 was also active in Nikolaev. From September 8 until early November 1941, Ohlendorf's headquarters staff (Gruppenstab) was deployed in the city.

Einsatzkommando 5, headed by SS-Untersturmführer Hans Sandner, was stationed in Nikolaev from early November 1941. In February 1942, an office of the Commander of the Security Police and SD (KdS) was created for the entire Generalkommissariat in Nikolaev; SS-Sturmbannführer Dr. Leopold Spann was the commander until September 1943.

When Sonderkommando 11a arrived in the city, it began conducting searches for civilians, who were then taken by the Wehrmacht to collection points for prisoners of war. Around 4,000 people were seized. Among those arrested and then shot were 227 "suspicious Jews, political functionaries, and released prisoners."⁵ Sonderkommando 11a also appointed a Judenrat, which had to register the entire Jewish population of Nikolaev. Forced labor groups were assembled from among the able-bodied Jews aged 16 to 60. They were assigned tasks according to the needs of various German units in the city.⁶

At the end of August or the beginning of September 1941, the Jews of the city were concentrated in a ghetto located on Pushkin Street. Order was kept inside the ghetto by an internal Jewish police force.⁷ The ghetto only existed for a little over two weeks. On September 14, 1941, the Jews received an order to assemble with their luggage at 10:00 A.M. on September 16 at the Jewish cemetery, for resettlement to another place in Ukraine. The Jews continued to report at the cemetery until September 18. On September 21, Sonderkommando 11a began the mass shooting of the Jewish population. The first people sent out to be shot were Jewish males older than 14. Women and children were subsequently subjected to the same fate. Over the course of three days, around 7,000 Jews were taken out and shot in ravines located between Voskresenskoe and Kalinovka, 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) from Nikolaev. Attempts to escape were prevented by a ring of perimeter guards. When the shooting was over, the Germans detonated explosives in the ravine area, and the corpses were covered with earth. Local residents from the Voskresenskoe and Kalinovka villages were also assigned to fill in the graves. The best clothing worn by the Jews was taken in six cars to Nikolaev, and the less valuable clothing was distributed to the local inhabitants of the Voskresenskoe and Kalinovka villages. Local inhabitants also complained that blood from the Jewish corpses had contaminated the water supply. They said that "they didn't want to drink Jewish blood."⁸

At the end of 1943 and the beginning of 1944, 50 prisoners were ordered to dig up the corpses and burn them. Members of the German civil administration recall that this resulted in a terrible stench throughout the city for days. After they had finished, the prisoners themselves were shot and killed and their bodies burned.⁹

There were very few survivors from among the several thousand Jews who were briefly interned within the Nikolaev ghetto.

In January 1946, a Soviet Military Tribunal in Nikolaev sentenced to death and promptly hanged Hans Sandner, Franz Witzleb, and Heinrich Schmale for crimes committed in occupied Soviet territory. A court in Munich sentenced Paul Zapp to life in prison on February 26, 1970.

SOURCES Published sources on the mass killing of the Jews of Nikolaev include: Andrej Angrick, Besatzungspolitik und Massenmord: Die Einsatzgruppe D in der südlichen Sowjetunion 1941–1943 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2003), pp. 241–251; and Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), vol. 33, Lfd. Nr. 724.

Relevant documentation on the murder of the Jewish population of Nikolaev can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; DAMO; GARF (7021-68-180 and 181); NARA (e.g., N-Doc. NO-2066); RGVA (e.g., 1275-3-662); Sta. Mü I; USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

Defendant Otto Ohlendorf, commander of Einsatzgruppe D, pleads "not guilty" during his arraignment at the Einsatzgruppen Trial, September 15, 1947. Seated behind him wearing a bowtie is Gustav Nosske, whose Einsatzkommando 12, along with Sonderkommando 11a, participated in murder operations around Nikolaev.

USHMM WS #43043 COURTESY OF NARA

NOTES

1. Haaretz, March 20, 2009, quoting Ella Lifshitz.
2. RGVA, 1275-3-662, p. 50, Feldkommandantur 193 (Abt. VII), Nikolajew, October 5, 1941, Bericht für August/September 1941.
3. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 101, October 2, 1941.

4. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942. See also the memo (Schnellbrief) of the chief of the Security Police from October 25, 1941, RGVA, 1323-2-121, pp. 33–34.

5. BA-MA, RH 20-11/488 (N-Doc. NO-2066), Bericht über die Tätigkeit des Sk 11a in Nikolajew vom August 18 bis zum August 31, 1941; LG-Mü I, Verdict of February 26, 1970—IV 9/69—in the case against Zapp and others in JuNS-V, vol. 33, Lfd. Nr. 724. See also the report of Ortskommandantur I/853 from August 31, 1941: “Last week the SD executed 230 Jews who refused to be registered and who had encouraged the remaining Jewish population not to serve the German military-administrative authorities.” NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 56, fr. 257.

6. N-Doc. NO-2066.

7. GARF, 7021-68-180, pp. 32–34, testimony of L.P. Kozuk, July 14, 1944; Sta. Mü I, 22 Js 204/61, vol. 15, p. 199, testimony of the former SS-Obersturmführer Albrecht Zöllner, April 24, 1967.

8. JuNS-V, vol. 33, Lfd. Nr. 724, p. 447.

9. GARF, 7021-68-181, pp. 3 (and reverse) and 16 (and reverse); LG-Mü I, Verdict of February 26, 1970—in JuNS-V, vol. 33, Lfd. Nr. 724. The burning of the corpses was carried out from the end of November 1943 until the middle of January 1944 by Sonderkommando 1005b. The unit commander was SS-Hauptsturmführer Fritz Zietlow. See LG-Darm, Verdict of March 13, 1969—Ks 22/67—in the case against Helfsgott and others, in JuNS-V (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2004), vol. 31, Lfd. Nr. 701; and Angrick, Besatzungspolitik und Massenmord, p. 685.

NOVAIA ODESSA

Pre-1941: Novaia Odessa, town and raion center, Nikolaev oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nowa Odessa, Rayon center, Gebiet Wosnessensk, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew; post-1991: Nova Odesa, Mykolaiv oblast', Ukraine

Novaia Odessa is located 126 kilometers (78 miles) north-northeast of Odessa. According to the 1939 population census, there were 228 Jews living in Novaia Odessa.¹

German armed forces occupied Novaia Odessa in mid-August 1941, about six weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. Part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were called into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Approximately half of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Novaia Odessa at the start of the German occupation.

Shortly after the occupation of the settlement, the German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ordered the registration of the entire Jewish population. The Jews were also moved into several buildings in a separate district near the local school, and the area was surrounded with barbed wire. The Jews were forced to wear the yellow Star of David and were prohibited from leaving this area on pain of death. They were also required to perform forced labor.²

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission report, German forces liquidated the ghetto in September 1941, removing 125 Jews and shooting them.³ According to one survivor testimony, the Germans shot the elderly and infirm first and then shot all the remaining Jews about two weeks later.⁴ German investigative sources indicate that the mass shooting was carried out by a detachment of Sonderkommando 10b. Some Jewish refugees from Bessarabia may have been among the victims.⁵

In mid-November 1941, authority was transferred from the military to a German civil administration. The town became a Rayon center in Gebiet Wosnessensk, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. Around this time, a Jewish family of five was also shot.⁶

SOURCES Relevant publications include Boris Zabarko, ed., Zhizn' i smert' v epokhu Kholokosta: Svidetel'stva i dokumenty (Kiev, 2006); Andrej Angrick, Besatzungspolitik und Massenmord: Die Einsatzgruppe D in der südlichen Sowjetunion 1941–1943 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 2003), p. 234; and Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 117.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-68-182); Sta. Mü I (22 Js 203/61); and USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 1).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 55.

2. Zabarko, Zhizn' i smert', pp. 192–194.

3. GARF, 7021-68-182, pp. 157, 190–193.

4. See Zabarko, Zhizn' i smert', pp. 192–194. This witness, Arkadii Bykovskii, dates the destruction of the Jews to mid- and late November 1941.

5. Sta. Mü I, 22 Js 203/61, vol. 8, p. 1752, testimony of Siegfried Suchart, who indicates that about 100 men, women, and children were shot. This source supports the contention that the mass shooting took place in September 1941.

6. GARF, 7021-68-182, p. 162.

NOVAIA PRAGA

Pre-1941: Novaia Praga, town and raion center, Kirovograd oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nowaja Praga, Rayon center, Gebiet Adshamka, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew; post-1991: Nova Praba, Oleksandriia raion, Kirovograd oblast', Ukraine

Novaia Praga is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) east-northeast of Kirovograd. According to the 1939 census, 113 Jews (1.2 percent of the total population) lived in Novaia Praga, and another 57 lived in the villages of what was then the Novaia Praga raion.¹

At the start of August 1941, six weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, German armed forces occupied the town. Part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were drafted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Less than one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Novaia Praga at the start of the German occupation.

1630 NIKOLAEV AND DNEPROPETROVSK REGIONS

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. The German military created a local authority and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from local residents.

In November 1941, authority was transferred to the German civil administration. Novaia Praga was a Rayon center within Gebiet Adshamka, which in turn became part of Generalkommissariat Nikolajew. The Gebietskommissar in Adshamka was Kameradschaftsführer Lange.²

At the end of 1941, the German authorities ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Novaia Praga. A building in a schoolyard was used as the ghetto.³ Jews from nearby villages were also resettled into the ghetto. The German police liquidated the ghetto on June 9, 1942, when they took out the elderly and children (29 people) and shot them 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside Novaia Praga.⁴ Jews, whom the Germans deemed able-bodied, were forced to work in a labor camp that was guarded by Latvian policemen. The prisoners of the camp were sent to work in a quarry. Sometime in 1943, the camp was liquidated and all the prisoners were shot.

SOURCES Published sources include Tkuma: Vestnik Tsentral'nogo Ukrainського fonda istorii Kholokosta "Tkuma" (Dnepropetrovsk), no. 10 (60) (2005), p. 3. Relevant documentation can be found in DAKO (1004-1-35).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 59.

2. BA-BL, BDC, SSHO 2432, Organisationsplan der besetzten Ostgebiete nach dem Stand vom 10. März 1942, hg. vom Chef der Ordnungspolizei, Berlin, March 13, 1942.

3. Testimony of S. Peskova, from the personal archive of Fiodor Plotnir, a regional ethnographer from Novaia Praga; F.F. Oksanych, "Nova Praha—selyshche khliborobiv: Korotkyi istoriko-kraeznavchyi narys," in the files of the Aleksandriia (Ingulets) State Ethnographic Museum.

4. Testimony of Leonid El'bert, published in Tkuma, p. 3; and DAKO, 1004-1-35, p. 67.

NOVOMOSKOVSK

Pre-1941: Novomoskovsk, city and raion center, Dnepropetrovsk oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941-1944: Novomoskovsk, Rayon center, Gebiet Dnjeppetrovsk, Generalkommissariat Dnjeppetrovsk; post-1991: Novomoskovsk', Dnipropetrovsk oblast', Ukraine

Novomoskovsk is located 26 kilometers (16 miles) north-northeast of Dnepropetrovsk. According to the 1939 census,

A column of Jews is marched along a muddy road by Ukrainian guards during an Aktion in Novomoskovsk, 1941-1942.

USHMM WS #76412, COURTESY OF APMD

757 Jews resided in the city (2.6 percent of the population). By the time the city was occupied, the number of Jews had decreased by several hundred due to the evacuations in August and September 1941 of some Jews to the east.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the city on September 27, 1941. Until August 1942, the city was governed by Ortskommandantur I/837, which consisted of four officers, one civilian official, 16 noncommissioned officers (NCOs), and 16 soldiers, as well as 30 people recruited from among the local residents to perform guard duty (Hilfswachmannschaften).¹ The commandant's office established a city council and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force; in April 1942 the latter consisted of 162 people, headed by V.F. Tkachenko and his deputy Ivan F. Shchenderi.²

From mid-November 1941 until mid-January 1942, Secret Field Police Group no. 725 (GFP-Gruppe 725) was located in the city; and from mid-January until May 1942, GFP-Gruppe 711 was based there.

On the third day of the city's occupation, the commandant issued an order that all Jews must register and wear white armbands bearing a blue Star of David on their left arm. Jews were also required to appear every morning at the municipal government building for work assignments. In November 1941, the Germans established an unfenced Jewish residential district (an "open ghetto") in Novomoskovsk, which was located in two large houses on Lesnaia and Kuznechnaia Streets.³ These streets were flooded in the spring by the Samara River and formed, as a result, a kind of island. By the end of December 1941, all the Jews of the town had been moved into the ghetto—those who were reluctant to move being forcibly resettled. There was considerable overcrowding in the ghetto.⁴

In mid-March 1942, on the orders of the German Security Police in Dnepropetrovsk, the local police collected all the Jews from the ghetto, telling them they would be relocated. They were then escorted to a five-story flour mill, together with some other Jews from the surrounding area, where they were held without food or water for a day or so. Their property items were also collected and confiscated by the police. On March 16, 1942, 2 Jews were publicly hanged on the marketplace. Then the remaining Jews (approximately 350 people) were escorted by the local police and German soldiers in a column to a sandpit on the outskirts of the city, behind the bridge on the road to Pavlograd. The Jews were forced to undress and then shot in the back of the neck by German Gestapo who had arrived from Dnepropetrovsk.⁵ Some 30 suspected partisans were shot together with the Jews.⁶

The shootings were probably carried out by SD Sonderkommando Platt (commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Platt) with the assistance of the Ukrainian police and the German Feldgendarmarie. The German Gestapo packed the valuable items in two large suitcases and took them back to Dnepropetrovsk. The remaining property of the victims was distributed among the local police.⁷

SOURCES Documents and testimonies regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Novomoskovsk can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/7177); DADO; GARF (7021-57-68); NARA (T-501, reel 18); TsDAVO (3538-1-53); and VHF (# 20288).

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. NARA, T-501, reel 18, fr. 586.
2. Ibid., T-501, reel 18, fr. 815. I.F. Shchenderei was tried and convicted by a Soviet Military Tribunal in 1947.
3. BA-L, B 162/7177, p. 343, interrogation of Vasilii V. Han, April 12, 1947, in Ufa, which specifically mentions the existence of a ghetto in Novomoskovsk, established between October and December 1941 by the local police. The other witnesses in this file do not mention the ghetto but were only asked about the mass shooting of the Jews.
4. VHF, # 20288, testimony of Leonid Gol'verk (born 1930).
5. A. Farimets, "Ekho Proshlogo," in Tkuma: Vestnik Nauchno-prosvetitel'skogo tsentra "Tkuma" (Dnepropetrovsk), no. 6 (37) (2003), pp. 6–7. BA-L, B 162/7177, pp. 330–365, there are contradictions concerning the number of Jews shot and also the dating of the Aktion in the German investigative files (some stating April 16, 1942), but otherwise the witness descriptions of the events largely concur.
6. TsDAVO, 3538-1-53, p. 48.
7. BA-L, B 162/7177, pp. 334–336, interrogation of I.F. Shchenderei, April 21, 1947. Shchenderei claims that 364 Jews were registered in Novomoskovsk just prior to the shooting.

NOVOVITEBSKOE

Pre-1941: Novovitebskoe, Novovasil'evka sel'sovet, Sofievka raion, Dnepropetrovsk oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nowo Witebsk, Rayon Sofijewka, Gebiet Kriwoj Rog-Land, Generalkommissariat Dnjeopetrovsk; post-1991: Novovitebs'ke, Dnipropetrovsk oblast', Ukraine

Novovitebskoe is located 96.5 kilometers (60 miles) southwest of Dnepropetrovsk. There were only 277 Jews living in Novovitebskoe in 1941. On August 18, 1941, about eight weeks after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22, German armed forces occupied the village. During that time, some of the Jews was able to evacuate.

In the first months after the village was occupied, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the village. At the end of 1941, authority was transferred to the German civilian administration. The village was incorporated into Gebiet Kriwoj Rog, within Generalkommissariat Dnjeopetrovsk.

After the occupation of the village, Ukrainian antisemites persecuted the Jewish population. All the Jews were isolated in an open ghetto, located on a single street, and Jews were not allowed to go beyond its designated borders. Jews deemed fit to work were selected in April 1942 and taken to a nearby labor camp run by the SS and the Organisation Todt (OT), where they were used to build the highway (Durchgangsstrasse IV, DG IV) between Krivoi Rog and Dnepropetrovsk. In May 1942, the ghetto was liquidated, and all the Jews there were shot. Most of the remaining Jewish forced laborers working on the DG IV in camps around Sofievka were shot during the winter of 1942–1943.¹

SOURCES Sources on the ghetto and/or the labor camp in Novovitebskoe are listed in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 69.

Documentation on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Novovitebskoe can be found in: BA-L (B 162/6169, pp. 3280–3282); and TsDAVO (4620-2-358, p. 7).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTE

1. BA-L, B 162/6169 (II 213 AR-Z 20/63, vol. 18), pp. 3280–3282.

NOVOZLATOPOL'

Pre-1941: Novozlatopol', village, Guliaipole raion, Zaporozh'e oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Nowo-Slatopol, Rayon center, Gebiet Kujbyschewo (Kuibyshevo), Generalkommissariat Dnjeopetrovsk; post-1991: Novozlatopil', Zaporozh'e oblast', Ukraine

Novozlatopol' is located 146 kilometers (91 miles) east-southeast of Dnepropetrovsk. According to the 1939 population census, there were 4,701 Jews living in the raion (30 percent of the total population), including 1,109 Jews in the village of Novozlatopol' itself (50 percent of the total population).

The village was occupied by units of the German 17th Field Army in early October 1941, nearly three and a half months after the initial Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. Some Jews were able to evacuate to the east. A number of Jewish men of eligible age escaped the occupation by conscription into the Red Army or by voluntary enlistment.

VOLUME II: PART B

During the first months of the occupation, when the mass murder of the Jewish population was carried out, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of Novozlatopol' and the surrounding Rayon. The German administration appointed a village elder and recruited a Ukrainian auxiliary police force.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the Ortskommandantur ordered the registration and marking of the entire Jewish population. Jews were also forced into various kinds of heavy labor.

Information on the fate of the Jews of Novozlatopol' and the surrounding settlements is sparse and somewhat contradictory. According to one witness, I.P. Pliasovitsa:

From the very first days of the Germans' administration of the raion territory, headed by the bloodthirsty officer Miller and the police chief Petkovskii, they began gathering together the Jewish population, ostensibly for shipment to Palestine. The order was given to take along their best clothing and food for the journey. After taking them to the Gendarmerie building, they made them dig four pits to serve as their own graves, and then the shooting started. Before being led to the pit, they were made to undress, and the perpetrators took the clothing for themselves. Those who offered any resistance were tossed into the pit alive. To drown out the cries and groans of the people thrown into the pit alive, the German accomplices beat on metal pails and buckets. For the same purpose, they also started up a tractor engine, but nothing could muffle these people's groans. When each pit was full of corpses, the police forced the kolkhozniks to fill them in with earth. The victims who were still alive moved about in the pits, and the earth rose up in these places.¹

According to the Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, hundreds of Jews from the area were "ghettoized" in Novozlatopol' in November and December 1941, prior to being murdered in a large-scale Aktion, which commenced on December 20, 1941. This source estimates that a few thousand Jews from Novozlatopol' and the surrounding area were executed, and some were expelled to Staryi-Kermenchik and perished there.²

According to other sources, the mass shooting of the Jews was probably not carried out until sometime in early February 1942. The approximately 800 victims were from Novozlatopol' and other villages in the raion. The bodies were buried in four pits on the outskirts of the village.³ The killings were organized, in all likelihood, by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 12, which was deployed in Guliaipole at that time, assisted by the Ukrainian police and local ethnic Germans.

Some local non-Jews, however, risked their lives in efforts to save Jews. For example, in early February 1942, Nikifor Cheredenko of the village of Prishib traveled several hours by cart to rescue the Tsviling family (former neighbors, then living in Friling, Novozlatopol' raion) shortly before their scheduled arrest and transfer to Novozlatopol'. He had to smuggle them through German patrols and quickly supplied them with false identity papers. However, the other villagers of Prishib also had to keep the secret in the face of repeated German investigations into the "new arrivals." The Tsviling family was one of the very few that survived in the Novozlatopol' Jewish national raion. Another Jew who survived was Ruvim Gershovich Platok, who fell into the pit alive and was buried but at night somehow managed to climb out and find refuge in the area.

At the end of the occupation, the police chief Petkovskii and the local German "colonists" Simon, Bauer, Krebs, and Risselman were tried by the Soviet authorities and found guilty of having committed mass murder in the Novozlatopol' raion.⁴

SOURCES Information about the destruction of the Jews of the Novozlatopol' raion can be found in the following publications: S.F. Orlanskii, Kholokost na Zaporozh'e (Zaporozh'e, 2003); and Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007), pp. 205–207. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 907, but reports the "ghettoization" of the Jews of Novozlatopol', unfortunately does not cite any sources for this.

Documentation pertaining to the elimination of the Jews of Novozlatopol' can be found in the following archives: DAZPO (1335-6-6; 1662-1-1; 1844-1-1 and 3); GARF (7021-61-29 and 8114-1-952, pp. 132–133); and TsDAHOU (57-4-14).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. DAZPO, 1662-1-1, p. 5, as cited in Orlanskii, Kholokost na Zaporozh'e, pp. 38–40.
2. Spector and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life, p. 907.
3. DAZPO, 1335-6-6, p. 182, inquiry of the executive committee of the Guliaipole Council of Peoples' Deputies, No. 08-27/86, February 17, 1986. In DAZPO, 1844-1-3, the number of 800 victims is given, together with a list of Jewish residents of the Novozlatopol' raion who were killed during the occupation. This list—which is not complete—includes the names of 661 persons.
4. DAZPO, 1844-1-3, p. 93, as cited in Orlanskii, Kholokost na Zaporozh'e, pp. 39–40.

PAVLOGRAD

Pre-1941: Pavlograd, city and raion center, Dnepropetrovsk oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Pavlograd, city and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Dnjepropetrowsk; post-1991: Pavlohrad, Dnipropetrovsk oblast', Ukraine

Pavlograd is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) east-northeast of Dnepropetrovsk. In 1939 the Jewish population stood at 2,510 (7.4 percent of the total population).

In the three and a half months following the initial German invasion of the USSR, a considerable number of Jews from Pavlograd were able to evacuate to the east. Jewish men of military age were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily.

On October 11, 1941, units of the German 6th Army occupied the city. From the middle of October 1941 until August 1942, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur I/829) controlled the city. The Ortskommandantur established a local administration and recruited a Ukrainian auxiliary police force, which in April 1942 consisted of 158 men.¹ Shortly after the occupation of the city, the commandant issued an order calling for all the Jews to be registered and requiring them to wear armbands bearing the Star of David on their left arms. All Jews were also ordered to appear in front of the city headquarters each morning for compulsory labor.

The first shooting of Jews in the city was apparently carried out at the end of 1941.² During the spring of 1942, the German authorities established a Jewish prison camp or "ghetto" on the grounds of factory no. 359. Local Jews from Pavlograd, as well as Jews from the surrounding area and possibly some refugees, were resettled there. The camp was liquidated in June 1942, and all the prisoners were shot. In total, around 2,000 persons were murdered. German forces assisted by Latvian collaborators conducted the shootings.³

SOURCES The "ghetto" in Pavlograd is mentioned in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 65.

Documents and witness testimonies regarding the persecution and destruction of the Jews of Pavlograd can be found in the following archives: DADO; GARF (7021-57-68, pp. 100–101); NARA; TsDAHOU (57-4-212, p. 60); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 11; and RG-22.005M, reel 2); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. NARA, RG-242, T-501, reel 18, fr. 814.

2. From November 1941 to January 1942, according to one source, 3,672 persons were killed in Pavlograd. See GARF, 7021-57-68, p. 103. In our view, this figure is much too high. These shootings were probably carried out by GFP-Group 711, commanded by an officer named Färber. In December 1941 and the first half of January 1942, this unit was stationed in Pavlograd.

3. Ibid., pp. 100–101; TsDAHOU, 57-4-212, p. 60. According to the inquiry (no. 23/1297) conducted by the committee of Pavlograd's City Council, on July 15, 1999, 2,100 Jews were annihilated on the grounds of the factory (now called "Pal-mash") where the prison camp was located. These victims were mostly Soviet citizens; the others (670 persons) were "Polish Jews." In our view, this figure is also too high. A Soviet intelligence report for 1942 mentioned that the Germans killed 1,000 Jews in Pavlograd; see USHMM, RG-22.005M (Russian State Archive for the Preservation and Study of Documents of Contemporary History), reel 2, 69-1-1090.

PERVOMAISK

Pre-1941: Pervomaisk, city and raion center, Odessa oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Perwomaisk, Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew; post-1991: Pervomais'k, raion center, Mykolaiv oblast', Ukraine

Pervomaisk is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) southeast of Uman'. According to the 1939 census, there were 6,087 Jews (18.5 percent of the total population) living in Pervomaisk.¹

The city was occupied on August 2, 1941. From August to November 1941, a German military commandant's office controlled the city. Initially, it was Feldkommandantur (V) 676; then, after October 1941, it became an Ortskommandantur headed by Major Georg Truckenbrod. In December 1941, authority was transferred to a German civil administration. The city of Pervomaisk, including its left-bank regions Ol'viopol' and Bogopol', became the administrative center of Gebiet Perwomaisk, headed by Gebietskommissar Kameradschaftsführer Lafrentz. The Gebiet formed part of Generalkommissariat Nikolajew within Reichskommissariat Ukraine. In October 1941, the right-bank part of the city, called Golta, came under Romanian administration as part of so-called Transnistria. It became the administrative center of the Golta uезд, headed by Lieutenant Colonel M. Isopescu.

In the first days of the occupation, hundreds of Jewish residents of the city were killed.² It is likely that the pogrom was carried out by Romanian soldiers who had occupied the city.

In August 1941, the German Feldkommandantur (V) 676 conducted the registration of the remaining Jews in the city, numbering around 2,000 people. They set up a Judenrat and resettled the Jewish population into a designated part of the city, which "had previously been a Jewish ghetto." The Germans also assigned different forms of compulsory labor to the Jews.³

A German report by Feldkommandantur (V) 676, dated September 21, 1941, seems to imply that most of the Jews from the ghetto were shot in mid-September: "the final resolution of the 'Jewish question' by the recent measures was received by the population as a just punishment for the immeasurable suffering inflicted upon them by Bolshevism. Since these measures were conducted without informing the Feldkommandantur in advance, it was not possible to preserve the currently very much-needed Jewish craftsmen."⁴

According to other sources, forces of the German Security Police rounded up the Jews from the ghetto and others found around Pervomaisk and shot them in several Aktions conducted between September 1941 and the spring of 1942. The Security Police was assisted by the local police, headed by an ethnic German named Geitel. One source indicates that about 30 to 40 Jewish artisans who survived the various Aktions in Pervomaisk were shot on an unspecified later date, in 1942 or 1943.⁵

From the Romanian part of the city, Golta, Jews declared unfit for labor were sent to the nearby Akmechetka camp. At the same time, a small group of Jewish artisans was sent to a newly created labor camp. In the middle of 1942, several hundred Jews were deported from Romania to Golta. In late 1942 and early 1943, the population in the two ghettos and labor camp in Golta stood at around 500 persons. In the spring of 1943, some of them were transferred to other camps. By October 1943 the population of Golta Jews numbered 300. The majority of them survived, but some died of hunger and disease.⁶

1634 NIKOLAEV AND DNEPROPETROVSK REGIONS

SOURCES Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-69-82); RGVA (1275-3-661); USHMM; and VHF.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 21.

2. Istoriia mist i sil URSS: Mykolaivs'ka oblast' (Kiev, 1971), p. 664.

3. RGVA, 1275-3-661, p. 12, Report of Feldkommandantur 676 (V), September 8, 1941.

4. Ibid., 1275-3-661, pp. 20–23, Report of Feldkommandantur 676 (V), September 21, 1941. This interpretation is not confirmed by other sources cited below. It is possible that additional Jews were found in the surrounding areas and then shot in groups over the following weeks and months.

5. Testimony of eyewitnesses V.I. Iaremchenko and R.Ie. Berman at the court proceedings in Kiev, January 17–28, 1946. See Kyivs'kyi protses: Dokumenty ta materialy (Kiev, 1995), pp. 83–85; GARF, 7021-69-82, pp. 242, 246. According to the materials of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission in Pervomaisk, 120 Jews were shot in November 1941, 3,600 Jews in December 1941, and 1,600 Jews in February–March 1942. These figures, however, appear to be too high.

6. D. Deletant, “Ghetto Experience in Golta, Transnistria, 1942–1944,” Holocaust and Genocide Studies 18:1 (Spring 2004): 9–18.

ZLATOPOL'

Pre-1941: Zlatopol', town, Novomirgorod raion, Kirovograd oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1944: Slatopol, Rayon center, Gebiet Nowo Mirgorod, Generalkommissariat Nikolajew; post-1991: part of Novomyrhorod, Kirovograd oblast', Ukraine

Zlatopol' is located about 65 kilometers (40 miles) northwest of Kirovograd. In 1939 the Jewish population numbered 1,047 (26 percent of the total population).¹

German forces occupied the settlement on August 1, 1941, six weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this intervening period, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were conscripted into or enlisted voluntarily for the Red Army. Around 75 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Zlatopol' at the start of the German occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the town. It established a local administration and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force recruited from local residents.

In November 1941, power was transferred to a German civil administration. Zlatopol' became the center of Rayon Slatopol in Gebiet Kirovograd, and later in Gebiet Nowo Mirgorod, within Generalkommissariat Nikolajew in Reichskommissariat Ukraine.

Shortly after the occupation of Zlatopol', the Ortskommandantur organized the registration and marking of the Jews with armbands. They were also forced to perform heavy forced labor tasks, such as the repair of roads and buildings, solely because of their race.

In the fall of 1941, the German military administration established a “ghetto camp” for the Jews in Zlatopol'.² Jews were prohibited from leaving the ghetto to buy products from Ukrainian local inhabitants. As a result, starvation quickly ensued among the ghetto inmates.

In November 1941, the first Aktion was conducted against the Jews of Zlatopol'. German security forces assisted by Ukrainian police used chloropicrin gas to suffocate 174 Jews in a basement.³ During the second Aktion in February 1942, on the instructions of the Gebietskommissar, the Ukrainian police suffocated 202 Jews, also using gas.⁴ In May 1942, a third Aktion was carried out in the same manner, killing 183 Jews.⁵ Altogether, 559 people were killed in the course of these three Aktions.

In June 1942, the German Gendarmerie captured 14 Jews who had been hiding and shot them in the forest nearby.⁶ By June 1942, 240 Jews remained in the ghetto.⁷ On September 30, 1942, around 100 Jews were shot in a deserted mine shaft near the village of Maslovo. When they were taken out of the building and led into the car for transportation to the killing site, a number of young Jews offered resistance. Armed only with metal bars, they threw themselves at the German and Ukrainian police, slightly wounding some of them.⁸ After this, only the craftsmen and their families remained in the ghetto. They were exterminated at some time later in 1942 or in 1943.⁹

Between 1941 and 1943, the Germans and their collaborators murdered more than 800 Jews in Zlatopol'.

SOURCES The ghetto in Zlatopol' is mentioned in the following publications: Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2000), 4:486; and in Handbuch der Lager, Gefängnisse und Ghettos auf dem besetzten Territorium der Ukraine (1941–1944) (Kiev: Staatskomitee der Archiven der Ukraine, 2000), p. 93. There is also a survivor testimony published in Yitzhak Arad, ed., Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoj okkupatsii, 1941–1944: Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1991), pp. 246–249.

Documents relating to the persecution and annihilation of Jews in Zlatopol' can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; DAKO; GARF (7021-66-123); TsDAHOU (57-4-170); TsDAVO (3676-4-317; R4328-1-1); USHMM; and YVA (O-33/154-1-4).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 27.

2. "Zlatopol'," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, 4:486, indicates the building of a children's home was used for this purpose. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1514, dates the establishment of the "ghetto camp" to December 1941. TsDAVO, R4328-1-1, pp. 61–62, 67–68, calls it a "ghetto camp" established in the forest on the outskirts of town.

3. GARF, 7021-66-123, p. 55.

4. TsDAVO, 3676-4-317, Report of the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF) and chief of the Security Police in Reichskommissariat Ukraine for the period from March 6 to April 1, 1942.

5. GARF, 7021-66-123, p. 55.

6. TsDAHOU, 57-4-170, p. 73, Meldungen aus den besetzten Ostgebieten, No. 12, July 17, 1942.

7. Testimony of Iosif Iakovlevich Butovetskii, in Arad, Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR, p. 247.

8. Ibid., pp. 247–248; the Butovetskii testimony has also been published in Yalkut Moreshet 45 (June 1988): 179–184.

9. Available sources indicate that 83 Jews were murdered in 1943; see GARF, 7021-66-123, pp. 55 and reverse side.

SECTION VII

REGIONS OF THE USSR UNDER GERMAN MILITARY OCCUPATION

Following Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, German forces penetrated deep into Soviet territory, reaching the outskirts of Moscow by November 1941. From August 1941, the western sections of occupied territory were handed over successively from German military administration to civil rule as Reichskommissariate Ostland and Ukraine were established and gradually expanded eastward through the end of 1941 and into 1942.

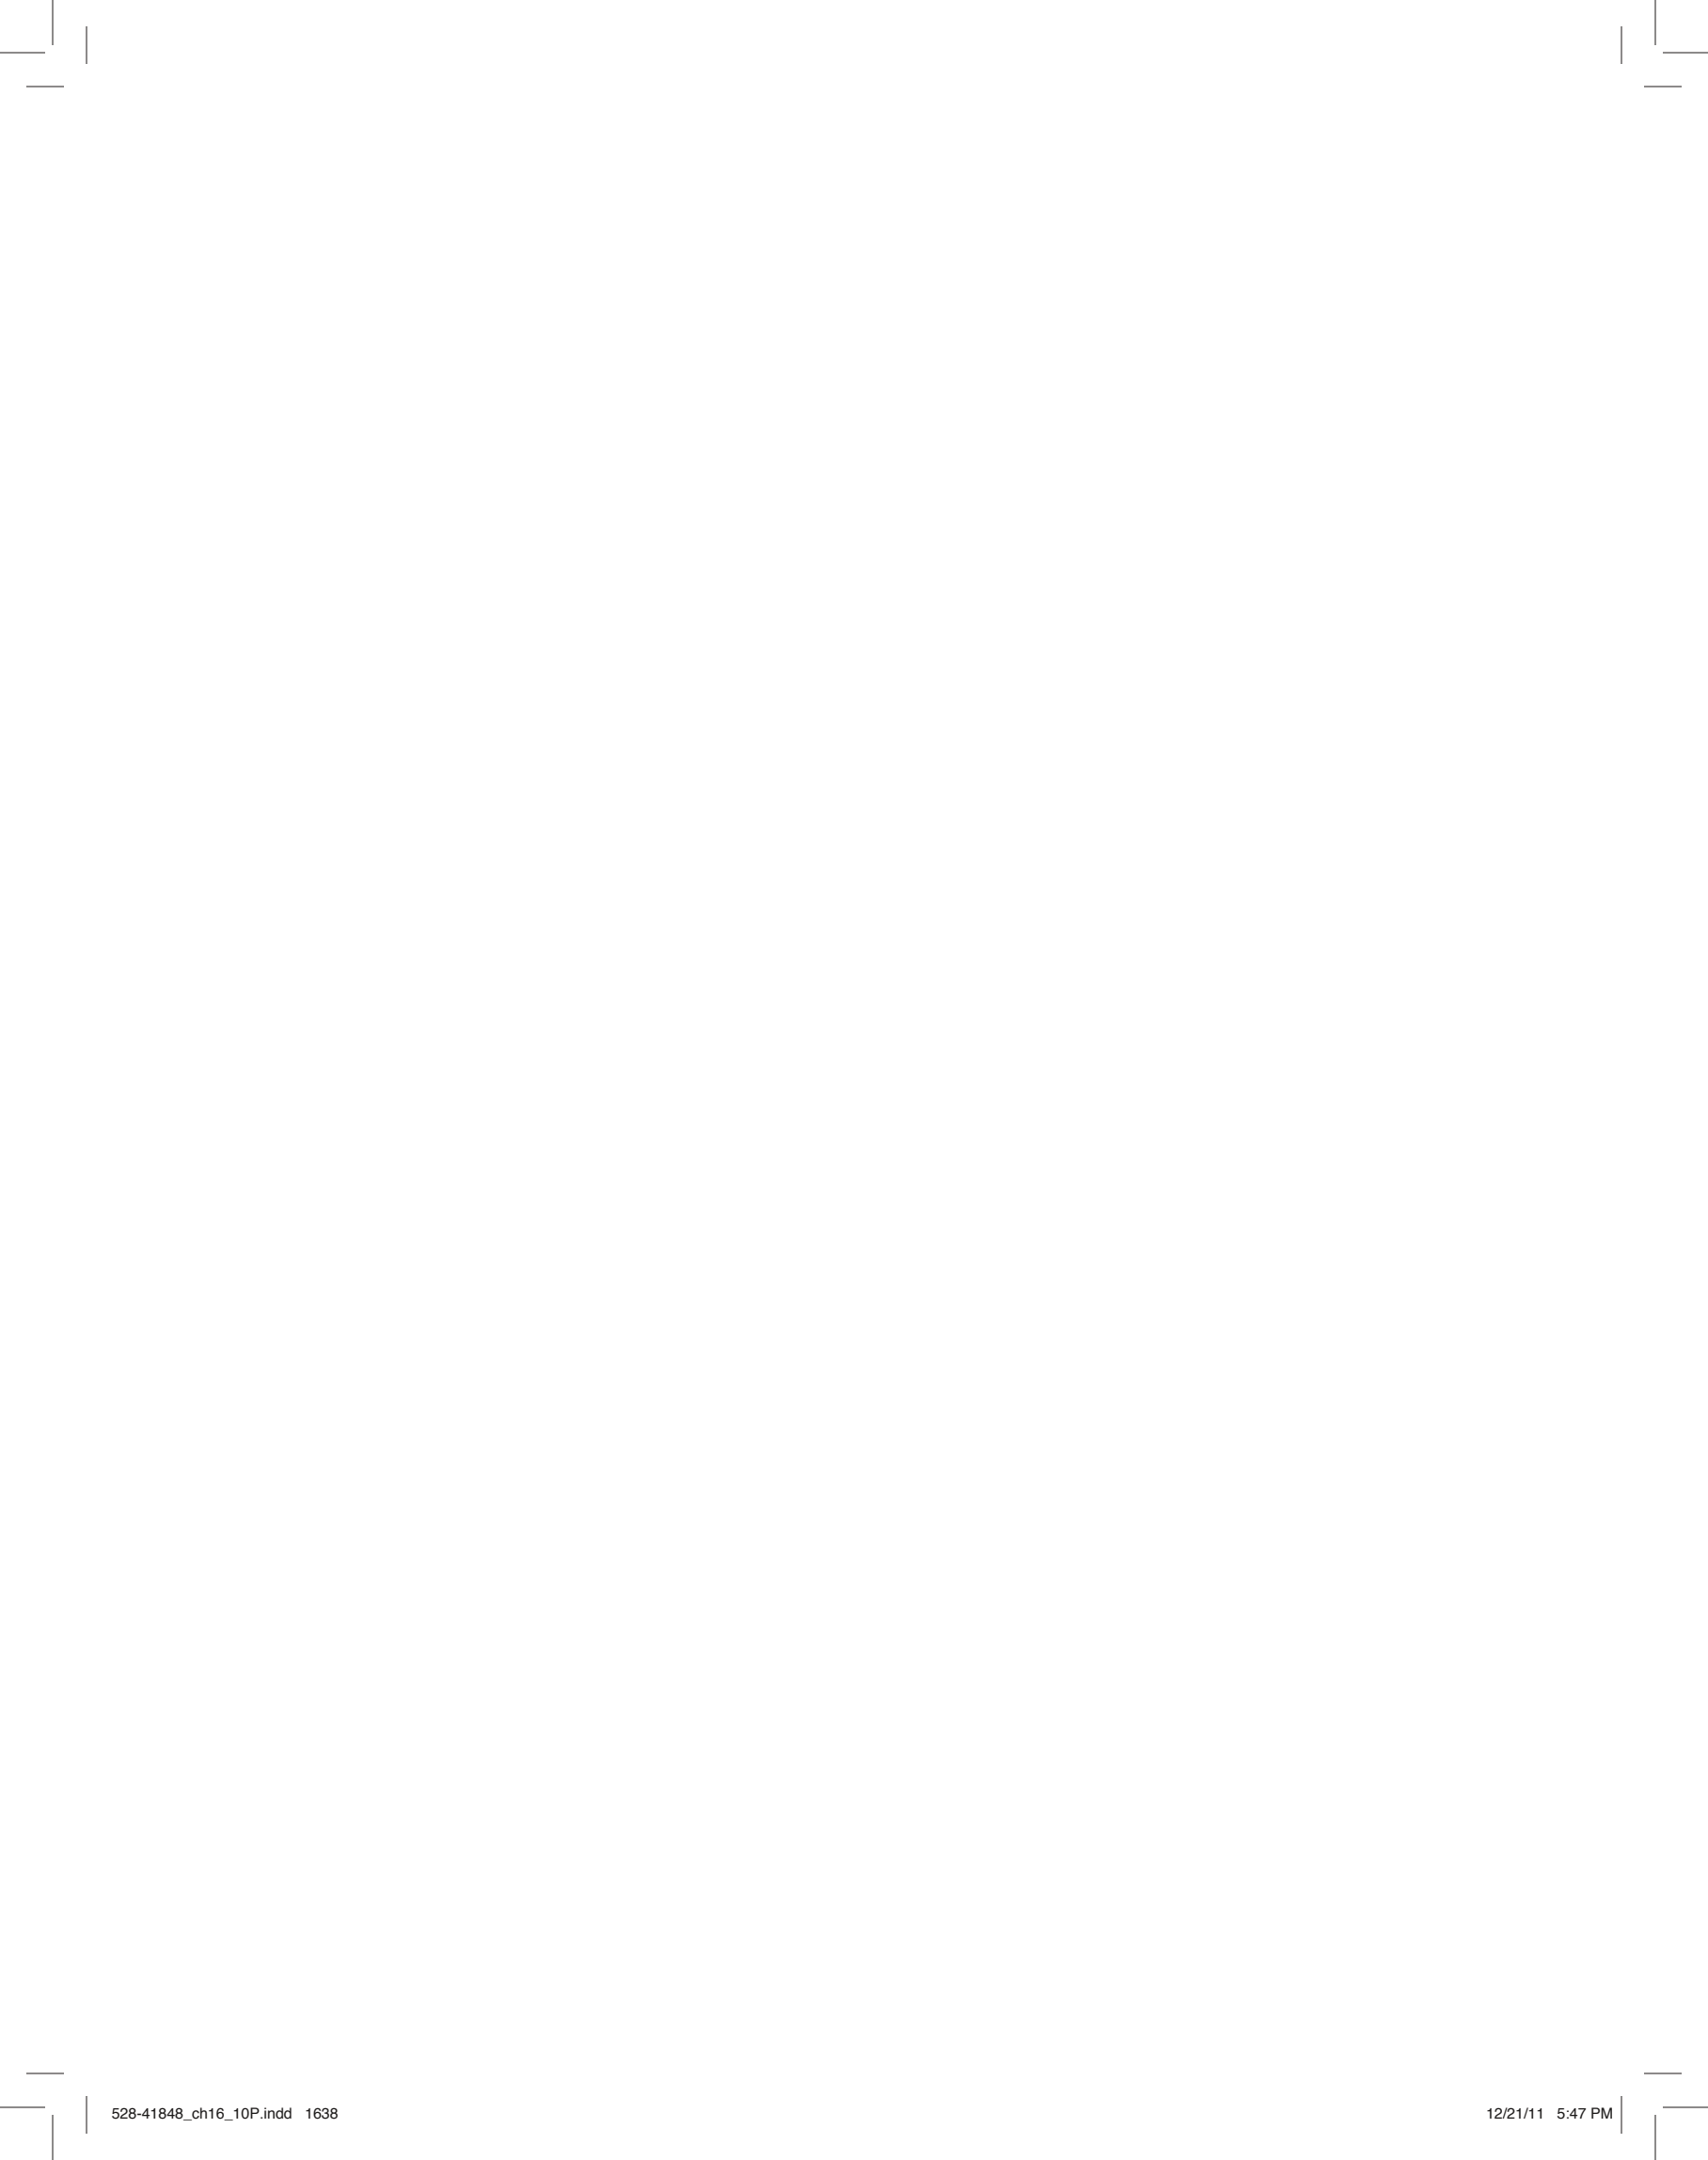

In this volume, those parts of the occupied Soviet Union that remained under German military administration during the occupation have been divided into three regions in accordance with the boundaries of the respective Soviet Socialist Republics at the time of the German invasion in June 1941: Eastern Belorussia, Eastern Ukraine and Crimea, and Russia. In 1941, before the German occupation, Crimea formed part of the Russian Federation, but here it is combined with Eastern Ukraine, as it also was occupied by forces of German Army Group South.

The Eastern Belorussia Region covers the Vitebsk and Mogilev oblasts and also parts of the Gomel', Minsk, and Poles'e oblasts of the Belorussian SSR. During the period when the ghettos in Eastern Belorussia were established and liquidated from the summer of 1941 until the summer of 1942, the region was occupied by the German army, and specifically it came under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte).

The Eastern Ukraine and Crimea Region covers the Chernigov, Khar'kov, Stalino, Sumy, and Voroshilovgrad oblasts of the Ukrainian SSR, as well as German-occupied Crimea, during the period of German military occupation. During the period when most of the ghettos in the Eastern Ukraine Region were established and liquidated from the fall of 1941 until the summer of 1942, the region was subordinated primarily to Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd). The four ghettos established in the Crimea lay within the Rear Area of the German 11th Army.

The Occupied Russian Territory covers primarily the area of the pre-1941 Kalinin, Leningrad, Orel, Smolensk, and Tula oblasts. The ghettos established in this region between the summer of 1941 and the spring of 1942 lay primarily within the jurisdiction of Rear Area, Army Groups Center and North, although some, such as that in Kaluga, remained under the control of German frontline troops. In addition, during the German offensive against Stalingrad, in the summer and fall of 1942, a few ghettos were established in the areas occupied by German Army Group A (Heeresgruppe A) in the Rostov oblast', the Ordzhonikidze krai, and the Kalmyk and Kabardino-Balkar ASSRs (Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republics).

EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

Jewish men remove guns from a barrack in Mogilev, July to October 1941. The German caption reads: "collection of looted guns."

USHMM WS #74318, COURTESY OF ZIH

EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

Pre-1941: Vitebsk, Mogilev, and parts of the Gomel', Minsk, and Poles'e oblasts, Belorussian SSR, Soviet Union; 1941–1944: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-2001: Republic of Belarus

The entirety of the eastern Belorussia region lay within the Belorussian SSR in 1938. After June 1941 and until the spring of 1942, the German military authorities and the Einsatzgruppen established some 101 ghettos or points of concentration for Jews in eastern Belorussia, divided as follows: 41 in the Vitebsk oblast', containing about 30,000 Jews; 31 in the Mogilev oblast', holding some 38,000 Jews; 15 in what is now the Gomel' oblast', with approximately 13,000 Jewish residents; and 14 in the Minsk oblast', with about 16,000 Jews. For some locations a lack of information has made it very difficult to determine whether or not a ghetto existed there. Most ghettos were located in the Rayon centers, sometimes also holding Jews brought in from surrounding villages, although several Rayons contained 2 or more ghettos. The period of ghetto formation was accompanied by the mass murder of the Jewish population by units of the Security Police (Einsatzgruppen), Wehrmacht, Order Police, Waffen-SS, and various non-German auxiliaries.

According to the 1939 census, there were more than 250,000 Jews living in the region of eastern Belorussia. Thousands of Jewish refugees arrived from western Belorussia in the first days after the German invasion on June 22, 1941, but many other Jews were evacuated, fled in time, or were recruited into the Red Army. However, a systematic evacuation of key personnel, mainly Communist Party and state officials, as well as industrial workers, was possible only from a few larger cities with good railway connections. For example, in Orsha, located on a main railway line, only about 25 percent of the Jews remained at the start of the German occupation, whereas in Polotsk, probably around 75 percent of the 1939 population was trapped there, although this number included many refugees from further west.

In the first two months, the rapidly moving units of Einsatzgruppe B, supported by SS, Order Police, and Wehrmacht units, conducted a number of killing Aktions directed against suspected Communists and the Jewish leadership. In August 1941, Einsatzgruppe B and other units initiated large-scale killings of Jewish women and children. For example, in Surazh, Einsatzkommando 9 carried out the total annihilation of the Jews on August 15, 1941, without forming a ghetto.¹ The liquidation of most of the larger ghettos established in the main cities was conducted in October and November 1941; but many ghettos in smaller towns and villages were not liquidated until the first six months of 1942. The limited personnel of the Einsatzgruppen, poor roads and communications, and the cold winter of 1941–1942 all contributed to the prolongation of the killing Aktions into the spring and summer of 1942.

An elderly woman sits among the ruins of her home, destroyed by the German attack on Vitebsk. The original German caption reads: "This was Vitebsk!"

USHMM WS #09468, COURTESY OF PATRICIA MARK

The military commandant's offices (Ortskommandanturen) appointed a local Belorussian administration and a local police force (Ordnungsdienst) in each Rayon. The first anti-Jewish measures introduced by the military included the wearing of identifying markings and the introduction of forced labor. Other regulations included restrictions on trading with non-Jews and confinement to the limits of the settlement.

The commander in charge of Rear Area, Army Group Center (Befehlshaber des rückwärtigen Heeresgebiets Mitte, or Berück Mitte), General der Kavallerie Max von Schenckendorff, issued an order for the creation of separate Jewish quarters on July 13, 1941. It stated that Jews were to be concentrated in a closed community in houses only occupied by Jews.² Among the first ghettos established in eastern Belorussia were those in Slavnoe (according to survivors, on July 9), Zembin (mid-July 1941), Ostrovno (on July 19), Krupki (July), and Bogushevichi (late July or early August). Ghettoization, however, was not a high priority. Subsequent guidelines issued by the Army High Command (OKH) in mid-August, and circulated by the Berück Mitte on September 12, advised that fenced ghettos were only to be established when the location of the Jewish quarter in relation to the non-Jewish residential area made it necessary for the effective guarding of the Jewish quarter, which could not be achieved by other means. Such ghettos were only to be established in towns with larger Jewish populations and only if other more urgent tasks would not be neglected in consequence. Jews could leave the Jewish quarters only for work assignments or with special permission from the Ortskommandant.³ These orders, which left much initiative to commanders at the local level, explain how the patchwork of open ghettos, enclosed ghettos, and also other places with no resettlement of the Jews came about.

As a result of the flexible guidelines, at least 17 unfenced or open ghettos (Judenviertel) were established in eastern Belorussia; but there were significant variations, even among these. In Beshenkovichi and Chashniki, Jews were not resettled, but they were forbidden to leave the town, and their houses were marked with wooden Stars of David. In Tolochin, the Jews were resettled into a separate area, which was not fenced but was guarded by the local Belorussian police. In Osipovichi, the Jews were confined to certain streets that they could not leave, but the area remained unfenced and non-Jews living there were not resettled. In Trudy, all the Jews were concentrated in three houses, from which the non-Jews were removed.

Among reasons given for establishing ghettos was the Germans' need for more housing space, especially in places that had witnessed considerable destruction. Another motivation was the aim of restricting Jews' access to the food supply. The ghettos also served the additional purpose of trapping much of the Jewish population in preparation for the killing Aktions.

A variety of different sites were used as ghettos. Many were established in the poorer parts of town, often where Jews had lived before in the small wooden houses typical of the region. In the village of Grodzianka, a long, wooden construction similar to a barracks served as the ghetto. The Jews of Tal'ka were concentrated in a former pioneer camp, and those of Pukhovichi in the former sanatorium of the postal service. In Gorodok, the ghetto was fenced on three sides, with a river forming its boundary on the fourth; a watchtower was built at the highest point along the ghetto fence. In the small village of Obol', a single house served as the ghetto. In Shumilino, the ghetto consisted of 10 houses "surrounded with barbed wire. Old cans and bottles were hung on the wire, and if somebody touched it, they rang. A guard with a machine gun sat on a watchtower, and he opened fire at everybody who came close to the wire."⁴

In most cases the ghettos were established and overseen by the Ortskommandanturen, but in some cases, especially in larger cities, the Einsatzgruppen also played a leading role. In Orsha, the ghetto was established following a decision taken in the office of the Ortskommandantur. It consisted of between 25 and 40 houses, where about 2,000 people were concentrated. The Jews were given three days to move in. On one side, the ghetto was bordered by the Orshitsa River, and on the other sides it was enclosed with barbed wire and guarded. The Jewish cemetery was included in the ghetto area.⁵

In September 1941, Egon Noack, commander of Vorauskommando Moskau subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B, arrived in Mstislavl', and after consulting with the mayor and the head of the local police, he ordered the creation of a ghetto in the "Sloboda" section of town. All Jews were ordered to move into the ghetto, while local Belorussians were evacuated from this area. During this visit, the Security Police under Noack collected fur coats from the Jews, and after the ghetto was established, the Security Police shot 30 Jewish men.⁶ Ghettoization was often accompanied by anti-Jewish violence and the confiscation or looting of property. In Mogilev, the Jews allegedly tried to sabotage resettlement into the ghetto, which resulted in the Security Police shooting 113 Jews.⁷ In Ostrovno, on the day of the resettlement, a young Jew who refused to move into the ghetto was shot and killed. During the resettlement of the Jews into the Polotsk ghetto, the Nazis confiscated Jewish property, beating many Jews in the process.

Most ghettos in the region were severely overcrowded, and despite the short duration of many of them, epidemics of typhus and other diseases linked to malnutrition, exposure, and overcrowding were common. In the Lepel' ghetto, some of the houses had neither doors nor windows. Jews were crammed 30 to 40 people to each house. The ghetto inmates were forbidden to leave their houses or even to look out the windows. In winter they were forbidden to take water from wells; they could only melt snow instead.⁸ In Vitebsk, the area of the ghetto was so severely damaged that the Jews had to scavenge in the ruins to find some makeshift shelter. In the Liuban' ghetto, each house contained at least three or four families.

A survivor of the Liozno ghetto, B. Chernyakov, has described conditions there: "The police burst into ghetto houses in the winter at any time of the day or night. They broke the windows, beat the Jews with sticks and whips, and chased them out into the freezing cold. Not a single window pane remained in one of the houses . . . even though 40 people lived there in -40° weather. Infested with lice, the people slept on rotten, wormy straw. A typhus epidemic broke out, claiming several lives every day."⁹ Survivors report from a number of ghettos that the Germans supplied no food at all to the inmates, which meant that deaths from starvation occurred, in some cases on a large scale.

Most historians argue that the exploitation of the Jews for labor was only of marginal importance in the ghettos of this region, since much of the heavy industry had been evacuated or destroyed by the Soviets, and sufficient non-Jewish manpower remained. Nonetheless, Jews were used for forced labor in almost all eastern Belorussian ghettos. Forced labor tasks included cleaning the streets, repairing roads, digging military defenses, and cleaning or craft work for the German occupying forces. Sometimes, however, forced labor was intended merely to humiliate the Jews. In Parichi, Jews were taken out each day for forced labor, and when there was no work for them, the authorities still made them move sand from one place to another.

In September 1941, the Wehrmacht forbade the use of Jewish workers other than in closed columns.¹⁰ According to historian Christian Gerlach, this order effectively excluded Jewish craftsmen from the economy and accelerated the process of destruction. As the measure was implemented, it was accompanied by the mass murder of most of the Jewish population in the larger cities. Since the Jews of eastern Belorussia were much less involved in crafts and light industry than those in the former Polish regions, they could be replaced more easily. The acute food shortages in the cities, exacerbated by the Germans' own "Hunger Plan," led German authorities to starve out and shoot Jews en masse. Fear of disease spreading became another reason to liquidate those that remained.¹¹

Among the main units responsible for the murder of the Jews in eastern Belorussia in the fall of 1941 were Einsatzkommandos 8 and 9 of Einsatzgruppe B. Einsatzkommando 8, assisted by Police Battalions 316 and 322, murdered more than 6,000 Jews in Mogilev in two large Aktions in October. Another Einsatzkommando 8 detachment shot 7,000 Jews in Borisov, assisted by the local Belorussian police. Detachments of Einsatzkommando 9 carried out mass shootings of Jews, for example, in Vitebsk, Ianovich, and Sirotino. Wehrmacht units participated in anti-Jewish Aktions, for example, in Krupki and Krucha, and provided support to the operations of the Einsatzgruppen. A report by Ortskommandantur I (V) 324 in Parichi reflects the suddenness of developments: "on October 18, 1941, a security command of the SD in Bobruisk appeared in Parichi and liquidated the Jews living here."¹²

Indigenous forces and other auxiliaries also played an important role. Apart from the Ordnungsdienst based in every town and village, men of the collaborationist Russian National People's Army (RNNA) and Ukrainian auxiliaries also participated in ghetto liquidation Aktions.

About 25 of the eastern Belorussian ghettos existed for less than two months, such that they can be considered destruction ghettos. Of these, 16 were liquidated in the fall of 1941 and the others in the first six months of 1942. In some places, such as Drissa or Osveia, the Jews were collected together in a "special camp" or ghetto for only a few days before they were shot; others existed for a few weeks, such as in Klimovich or Gorodok, and in most respects resembled other ghettos.

From a few ghettos, selected skilled workers were spared initially from the killing Aktions, but this was usually for only a few weeks. In Mogilev a forced labor camp for Jews was established alongside the ghetto, which later also held non-Jews before its liquidation in 1943. Jews from western Belorussia were sent to a forced labor camp near Borisov in December 1942; they were shot there after a few months in 1943.

Little is known about the Jewish Councils in the eastern Belorussian ghettos other than the names and professions of some Jewish elders and council members. As elsewhere, their tasks included registering the Jews and meeting German demands for forced labor and "contributions." They also probably allocated housing and provided some social services, including rudimentary medical care. In Vitebsk and a few other ghettos, there is evidence of a Jewish police force. In Tal'ka, Jewish elder Meyer Rabinovich was shot when he protested about the treatment of the Jews in the ghetto.¹³ Attempts were made to maintain religious observance and other social activities despite the difficulties. In Shchedrin, the Jews prayed at home, as there was no synagogue within the ghetto boundaries. Efforts were also made to bury the dead according to Jewish rites.

The attitudes of the local population towards the ghettos varied from direct participation in German anti-Jewish policies to providing assistance and shelter. Jewish survivors from

Ianovich recalled their non-Jewish neighbors with great bitterness, as with the coming of the Germans, the attitude of the local population towards the Jews changed drastically: "The locals could come to a Jew and take away whatever they wanted, even a cow . . . ; they might also beat you with a stick."¹⁴ The German authorities also spread virulent propaganda against the Jews. The establishment of ghettos gave non-Jews the opportunity to loot property that was left behind. In most ghettos in the region, Jews were able to barter their last possessions for food with the non-Jewish population despite German prohibitions. In Borisov, the initial mood of support for the anti-Jewish measures gave way to fears that the remaining local population might also be killed once the full scale of the massacres became known.¹⁵

From the end of 1941, a number of Jews escaped from the ghettos to join the growing Soviet partisan movement. Many Jews served with distinction in the Soviet partisans and carried out attacks against German garrisons and the local police. Despite some antisemitism in the ranks of the partisans, official Soviet policy treated all nationalities equally, and Soviet units offered some refuge to Jews escaping from the ghettos. Other Jews survived in hiding, usually with the help of a number of non-Jews.

Many of the Jews in the small open ghetto in Kolyshki were fortunate to be liberated by the Red Army. The German authorities had collected the Jews in a few intact houses marked with distinctive symbols. The Jews suffered from frequent robberies in the "ghetto," and some Jews caught foraging outside the village were shot. On February 9, 1942, a Soviet reconnaissance unit recaptured Kolyshki, and a few days later some of the Jews moved deeper into Soviet-held territory, with the unit commander's approval. Unfortunately, more than 100 Jews who remained behind were murdered in March, after the Germans' return.

The ghettos liquidated in the first six months of 1942 were mainly smaller ones in more remote towns and villages, although a few were larger, such as that in Beshenkovichi, which contained more than 800 people. The Khotimsk ghetto was liquidated in early September 1942 and was probably not the last ghetto in the region, as Belorussian sources date the liquidation of the Sloboda ghetto to October 1942.

On liberation by the Red Army, very few Jewish survivors of the German occupation remained in eastern Belorussia. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) documented the mass grave sites and obtained some descriptions of ghettos from local inhabitants. Just as German trials of Einsatzgruppen members have helped to piece together the daily brutality of the killing squads, now the trials of Soviet collaborators located in the Committee for State Security (KGB) archives are beginning to help historians gain a clearer picture of the attitudes among the local population during the persecution and murder of the Jews.

SOURCES Of the secondary works dealing with the fate of the Jews in the ghettos of eastern Belorussia, the following are recommended: Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 2000); Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997); Raul Hilberg, Die Vernichtung der europäischen Juden, vol. 2 (Frankfurt am Main: Fischer, 1982); Daniel Romanovsky, "The Holocaust in the Eyes of Homo Sovieticus: A Survey Based on Northeastern Belorussia and Northwestern Russia," Holocaust and Genocide Studies 13:3 (Winter 1999): 355–382; and Leonid Smilovitsky, "Ghettos in the Gomel Region: Commonalities and Unique Features, 1941–42" (presented at the Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies Symposium on "The Holocaust in the Soviet Union," United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, November 2003), available at jewishgen.org.

Of use in helping to identify smaller ghettos were the following publications: Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001); Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000); Emanuel Ioffe, Belorusskie evrei: Tragediia i geroizm, 1941–1945 (Minsk: Artifeks, 2003); Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vols. 4–6 (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2000–2007); and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001).

Relevant collections of testimonies and other primary sources include the following: R.A. Chernoglazova, ed., Tragediia evreev Belorussii (1941–1944): Sbornik materialov i dokumentov (Minsk: Izdatel' E.S. Gal'perin, 1997); Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, The Complete Black Book of Russian Jewry (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2002); David Meltzer and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005); Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007); Ida M. Shenderovich and Aleksandr Litin, eds., Gibel' mestecek Mogilevshchiny: Kholokost v Mogilevskoi oblasti v vospominaniiakh i dokumentakh (Mogilev: MGU im. A.A. Kuleshova, 2005); Leonid Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v

Belorussii 1941–1944 gg. (Tel Aviv: Biblioteka Matveia Chernogo, 2000); Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998); and Gennadii Vinnitsa, Slovo Pamiati (Orsha: Orshanskaia Tipografiia, 1997).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBMO; AŽIH; BA-BL; BA-L; BA-MA; BLH; CDJC; GAGO; GAMINO; GAMO; GARF; GAVO; IfZ; IPN; MA; NA; NARA; NARB; RGASPI; RGVA; USHMM; VHAP; VHF; YIVO; and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. YVA, TR-10/388a (Berlin trial of members of Einsatzkommando 9 [Filbert] held in 1961), p. 47; Soviet sources date the Aktion in Surazh on July 28 or August 2, 1941.

2. Berück Mitte, Abt. VII/Mil. Verw., Verwaltungsanordnungen Nr. 2, July 13, 1941, NARB, 409-1-1, p. 71, as cited by Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde, p. 524.

3. Berück Mitte, Abt. VII/Kr.-Verw., Verwaltungsanordnungen Nr. 6, September 12, 1941, as cited in ibid., p. 525.

4. Eyewitness Yakov Mogilnitskii, as cited by A. Shulman and M. Ryvkin, Porodnennye voynoi (Vitebsk, 1997), p. 33.

5. See Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol', pp. 66–69.

6. See Sta. Kiel, 2 Js 762/63, vol. 4, p. 152, statement of Woldemar Klingelhöfer, October 5, 1963; and vol. 1, pp. 48–49, statement of Klingelhöfer, July 1, 1947.

7. Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht, no. 6 (October 1–31, 1941), in Klein, Einsatzgruppen, p. 230.

8. Testimony of Roza Fishkina, GARF, 7021-84-104. See also Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol', pp. 46–48.

9. B. Chernyakov's letter, in Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Complete Black Book, pp. 187–188.

10. OKW/W.F.St./Abt. L (IV/Qu), Betr.: Juden in den neu besetzten Ostgebieten, September 12, 1941 (BA-MA), as cited by Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde, p. 578.

11. See ibid., p. 645.

12. BA-BL, R 2104/25, report of OK I(V)324, n.d.

13. BA-L, II 202 179/67, Dok. Bd. I, statements of Semen Panschey and Kondrat Molchan; Dok. Bd. II, statement of Anna Koreny.

14. YVA, O-3/4614.

15. NARA, N-Doc. 3047-PS.

Ghettos in the Eastern Belorussia Region

Borders as of 1942

BARAN'

Pre-1941: Baran', town, Orsha raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Baran, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Baran', Orsha raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Baran' is located a few kilometers to the southwest of Orsha. The 1939 census registered 81 Jews living in Baran' (out of a total population of 1,589).

German armed forces captured the settlement on July 16, 1941, three weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. During this intervening period, some Jews managed to evacuate to the east, and eligible men were conscripted for military service in the Red Army. Slightly more than half of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the settlement at the start of the German occupation.

A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of Baran' throughout the occupation, from July 1941 until February 1944. The German military administration established a local authority and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local residents.

Soon after the occupation of the settlement, the Ortskommandantur ordered all Jews to be registered and marked with badges and required that the Jewish population perform various forms of hard labor. In September 1941, all the remaining Jews in the settlement were rounded up and moved into a ghetto, consisting of just two houses, 19 and 21 Ialtinskaia Street.¹ The German commandant forbade Jews to go out onto the street after 6:00 P.M. As the Jews suffered from hunger, they exchanged valuable items for food with the local population.²

After about seven months, on April 8, 1942, the Germans, assisted by the local police, liquidated the ghetto; all the Jews—about 42 to 45 people—were shot and buried in a mass grave located about 300 meters (328 yards) from Sorokin Street.

SOURCES Brief articles on the Baran' ghetto can be found in the publications of Gennadii Vinnitsa: Slovo pamiati (Orsha: Orshanskaia Tipografiia, 1997), pp. 55–57, and Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), pp. 92–93. See also “Baran',” in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Rossiiskaia akademiia estestvennykh nauk, 2000), 4:84.

Documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission regarding the extermination of the Jews of Baran' can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-84-10); and GAVO.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., “Baran,” in The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), 1:86–87.

2. Vinnitsa, Slovo pamiati, p. 55.

BATSEVICHI

Pre-1941: Batsevichi, town, Klichev raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Bazewitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Batsevichy, Klichav raen, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Batsevichi is located about 35 kilometers (22 miles) due north of Bobruisk.

German forces of Army Group Center captured the area around Klichev in early July 1941. According to the testimony of Issak Moiseyevich Gershovich, the German military authorities established a ghetto in the town of Batsevichi by early September 1941. The Jews in the ghetto were served by a Jewish doctor and his wife, who was a midwife. The ghetto consisted of a few small cottages, in each of which lived about 25 to 30 people crammed together. One night in December 1941, German forces arrived in Batsevichi and shot all the Jews. Since the 1939 Soviet census recorded only 192 Jews living in the Klichev raion outside Klichev, it is likely that fewer than 100 Jews were murdered in Batsevichi.

In late February 1942, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 (Einsatzgruppe B) conducted a reprisal Aktion in Batsevichi, following an attack on German police forces nearby. During the Aktion, 47 inhabitants of Batsevichi, including men, women, and children, were murdered.¹

SOURCES The ghetto in Batsevichi is mentioned in David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), p. 428.

Martin Dean

NOTE

1. DDR-Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2002), Bd. II, Lfd. Nr. 1044, p. 288.

BELYNICHI

Pre-1941: Belynichi, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Belynitschi, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Bialynichy, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Belynichi is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) west-northwest of Mogilev. According to the 1939 census, there were 781 Jews living in Belynichi, comprising 24.8 percent of the total population.¹

German armed forces occupied the town on July 9, 1941, about three weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. In this interim period, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army.

During the course of the occupation, which lasted from July 9, 1941, until June 29, 1944, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) was in control of the town. The Ortskommandantur set up a town administration and a police force recruited from local residents. Shortly after the occupation began, the town administration, on the orders of the Ortskommandantur, organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were also required to perform heavy physical labor.

In September 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 (headed by Dr. Otto Bradfisch) arrived in Belynichi from Mogilev and conducted the first Aktion. On the pretext of sending Jews out to work on a bridge construction project, the German punitive squad rounded up more than 150 Jewish men. They escorted them about 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) out of town and then shot them, burying the bodies in two pits.²

After the Aktion in the fall of 1941, all the remaining Jews of Belynichi, together with Jewish families from some neighboring villages in the Rayon, were resettled into a camp or ghetto “Kvartal-Lager” established in a specific quarter of the town. The ghetto was strictly guarded; the Jews were not permitted to leave the ghetto, and non-Jews were also forbidden to enter.³ This resettlement was most probably conducted under the supervision of Ortskommandantur II/936, which was based in Belynichi in mid-October 1941.⁴

On December 12, 1941, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. At 9:00 A.M., a detachment of the German Security Police and SD based in Mogilev (Einsatzkommando 8), assisted by the local Belorussian police, gathered the remaining Jews of the ghetto, about 600 people, into a large column. The Jews were told that they were being resettled to Esmony, a village about 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) to the northwest of Belynichi. The Germans and their collaborators escorted the Jews along the road into the Mkhi woods to a site about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town, where two large pits measuring 40 meters by 30 meters (131 feet by 98 feet) and 3 meters (10 feet) deep had been prepared in advance. Here the Jews, mainly women, children, and the elderly, were forced to undress down to their underwear and lie facedown in the ditches; after one row was complete, the Germans shot the Jews; and then the next row had to get ready. After this horrendous deed was finished, the Germans transported the clothing and shoes of the murdered Jews back to Belynichi, and from there the most valuable items were sent to Mogilev in automobiles; the remaining less valuable items were distributed by the Germans among their collaborators.⁵

Between April and June 1942, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 shot several hundred more Jews in villages near Belynichi (presumably those who had not been brought into the Belynichi ghetto in the fall of 1941).

SOURCES Publications that mention the Belynichi ghetto and the murder of the Jews of Belynichi include the following: V.I. Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: Staatskomitee für Archive und Aktenführung der Republik Belarus, 2001), p. 135; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 104; and Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki Genotsida Evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), pp. 294–295.

Documents dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews of Belynichi can be found in the following archives: BA-L (B 162/II 202 AR 625/67, vol. 1); BA-MA (RH 26-221/14b); GARF (7021-88-34); NARB (861-1-9); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1993), p. 39.

2. GARF, 7021-88-34, p. 1. According to another source, the shooting of Jewish men took place in October 1941, in two ditches on the edge of Charopol'. In 1965, an obelisk was placed at the site of the shooting; see Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, p. 294.

3. GARF, 7021-88-34, p. 1.

4. BA-MA, RH 26-221/14b, map of Heeresgebiet Mitte as of October 9, 1941.

5. GARF, 7021-88-34, p. 1. A list containing the names of 360 of the murdered Jews can be found in GARF, 7021-88-34, pp. 30–37; among those murdered were apparently 224 refugees from western Belorussia. See also NARB, 861-1-9, p. 123.

BEREZINO

Pre-1941: Berezino, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Beresino, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Berazino, raen center, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Berezino is located just over 100 kilometers (62 miles) east of Minsk. According to the 1939 census, 1,536 Jews (31.8 percent of the total) lived in Berezino. An additional 786 Jews lived in the villages of the raion, bringing the total Jewish population to 2,322.

German military forces had occupied the town by early July 1941, just over a week after the start of the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During this period, several hundred Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. More than two thirds of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town.

During the entire occupation period, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. The Germans created a local authority and recruited a police force (Ordnungsdienst) from among the local residents.

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the local authority organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. By the end of July, some Jews of the Rayon from outside the town were also concentrated in Berezino. Jews were forced to perform various forms of heavy labor, including carpentry work. In August or September 1941, German security forces arrested and shot 150 Jews from the town.

In the summer or fall of 1941, a ghetto was created on Internatsional'naiia Street in Berezino, which after a few weeks was surrounded by barbed wire. Some Jews were also brought into the ghetto from other villages nearby. Jews were prohibited from bringing food products into the ghetto from the villages and were beaten by the local police when caught. Nevertheless, Jews continued to sneak out to beg for food, as some Jews were dying of hunger. Those who died were buried in the Jewish cemetery.¹

The ghetto was liquidated on January 31 and February 1, 1942. Einsatzkommando 8, a 20-man detachment of the Security Police and SD subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B, shot 962 Jews, including the elderly, women, and children.² According to the evidence of a former member, the 1st Company of the 12th Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft Battalion, commanded by Zenonas Kemzura, also participated in the Aktion.³

The killing site was cordoned off by members of German Landeschützenbataillon 452. According to the diary entry of one member of this unit, the ghetto was only 500 meters (547 yards) from his window; he could hear the screams and shouts as the houses were cleared systematically, and any Jews trying to flee were shot on the spot. The Jews were escorted in a column to two wooden huts near the ditches, where they put their valuables into the first and their outer clothing into the second hut. Then they were escorted on a path through the snow to the grave. They got down into the grave and were killed by two SS men, who took turns shooting. Some children later were found hiding in the ghetto and were also murdered.⁴

The local Belorussian police took part in the Aktion. One well-dressed local policeman from Berezino boasted shortly afterwards: "We finished off the kikes, all of them. In the end of December and beginning of January [sic] we liquidated the kike ghetto. We shot a thousand of them. Children were taken to the river and drowned in ice holes."⁵ Sometime after the Aktion, the Ortskommandantur in Berezino sent to Berlin $273 in U.S. currency, which had been confiscated from the Jews who were shot.⁶

Liza Aizendorf was hidden inside the ghetto with her other siblings by her grandmother, who gave herself up, as an empty house was likely to be searched thoroughly. Liza managed to escape with her sister three days after the Aktion. She survived the German occupation despite being denounced by local people on more than one occasion and eventually joined a Soviet partisan unit. After the Germans fled, she also participated in reprisals taken against local collaborators.⁷

Jews were also murdered in the villages of Rayon Beresino. In December 1941, German forces shot 380 Jews in the village of Bogushevichi. Sometime in early 1942, 200 Jews were shot in the village of Pogost.⁸

SOURCES Published sources on the fate of the Jews of Berezino during the Holocaust include the following: Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem;

New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 114; and Leonid Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii 1941–1944 (Tel Aviv: Biblioteka Matveia Chernogo, 2000), pp. 197–198.

Documents and testimonies on the persecution and elimination of the Jews of Berezino can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 2104); GAMINO; GARF (7021-87-2); NARB (861-1-8); VHF (# 7691); YVA (Oral History of Zinaida Krasner); and ZSSSta-D (45 Js 35/64).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-87-2, p. 1; testimony of Liza Aizendorf (Zorina), in Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii, pp. 197–198; and VHF, # 7691, testimony of Elizaveta Aizendorf (née Zorina).

2. Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 2000), p. 684. According to the materials of the ChGK, the Germans shot around 1,000 Jews in Berezino at the end of December 1941; see GARF, 7021-87-2, p. 1; and NARB, 861-1-8, p. 113.

3. See the trial proceedings against Antanas Impulevicius, Zenonas Kemzura, and others, in Vilnius, October 10–20, 1962, statement of the accused Juozas Knyrimas. Kemzura was sentenced to death, as was the commander of the battalion, Major Impulevicius (in absentia, as he was living in the United States).

4. ZSSSta-D, 45 Js 35/64, pp. 22–24, diary of P.H. (transcript), cited by Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde, p. 684 n. 983.

5. Unfortunately for this local policeman, his interlocutors were Soviet partisans in disguise, and they shot him shortly after these incautious words, as he had boasted also of having personally murdered two children. See David Meltzer and Vladimir Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), p. 431 (Isaak Moiseyevich Gershovich [New York], Commissar of the 277th Partisan Regiment, 2nd Klichev Partisan Brigade, recollections from his wartime diary).

6. BA-BL, R2104/Beutebuch Russland VI, no. 9584, pp. 30–31, report dated April 29, 1942.

7. Testimony of Liza Aizendorf (Zorina), in Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii, pp. 197–198.

8. GARF, 7021-87-2, pp. 6 (Bogushevichi) and 16 (Pogost).

BESHENKOVICHI

Pre-1939: Beshenkovichi, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Beschenkowitschi, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Beshankovichy, raen center, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Beshenkovichi is situated 51 kilometers (32 miles) west-southwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, according to the last pre-war census, 1,119 Jews lived in the town, making up 26.3 percent of the population. The main part of the town is situated on the left bank of the Zapadnaia Dvina River, where the majority of the Jews lived. On the right bank of the river is the suburb of Strelka. Only 21 Jewish families lived in this suburb in the late 1920s; just prior to the war there were even fewer. The other main location with a sizable Jewish population in the Beshenkovichi raion was Ulla, which had 516 Jews in 1939 (20.4 percent of the total population). The Jewish population of the raion (excluding Beshenkovichi and Ulla) was 385, the bulk of whom lived in the villages of Ostrovno and Svecha.

There was no mass evacuation or flight of Jews from Beshenkovichi. Many Jews failed to flee from the town because of the rapid German advance and lack of good roads. Only four Jewish families fled successfully from Strelka.

On July 5, 1941, the German XXXIX Army Corps of the 3rd Panzer Group seized the left bank of the Zapadnaia Dvina River from Beshenkovichi to Ulla; thus Ulla and the main part of Beshenkovichi, except for Strelka, were captured by the Germans. The right bank (Strelka) was taken no later than July 9. On July 12, forces of the V Army Corps of the 9th Army (Infantry) entered Lepel' and Chashniki; on July 13, they entered Ulla (5th Infantry Division) and, most probably, also Beshenkovichi. Both towns became part of the Rear Area, 9th Army (Strauss). From August 1941 onward, Beshenkovichi was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte), being situated on its western edge, close to the area under "civil administration" (Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien). This area was the realm of the 403rd Security Division; from October 13, 1941, Beshenkovichi was under the control of Ortskommandantur I/79.

A survivor, Yakov Genin, stated that a former math teacher, Ivan Ivitskiy, became the police chief. Witnesses attest that the men of the local police, including Ivitskiy, confiscated Jewish houses for themselves.¹

Beshenkovichi suffered severely from the fighting. Many wooden houses were burned down. The Belorussian police began to confiscate Jewish houses and give them to non-Jews. There was no formal ghetto in Beshenkovichi; the Jews were resettled into a certain district of the town and ordered to mark their houses with plywood Stars of David. A survivor says that some craftsmen (tailors, shoemakers, and the like) were lodged together in the same house; they worked for the Germans and were not subjected to forced labor. In Strelka, all the Jews were resettled into one house, which had belonged to someone whose first name was Shaye. The house was guarded at night. The Jews of Beshenkovichi also were ordered to wear a patch with a Star of David on their clothes. Forced labor was introduced: every morning all the Jews, men and women, had to gather in the town's park for distribution to the workplaces. Genin described the kinds of forced labor: "We loaded grain, repaired roads with picks. Most often we dismantled brick buildings, crushed bricks, and covered roads with it. In addition, we sawed trees in the forest and in the park for timber, and sometimes, when there was no work, the Germans made us dig pits or simply drag stones from one place to another."²

There were isolated killings before February 1942. Genin stated that the Germans killed some Jews "just for fun," but later "there were some more or less 'planned' shootings," victims of which were young strong men. The mass shooting of Jews took place on February 11, 1942. The perpetrators of the killing were members of Einsatzkommando 9 (Schäfer). On that day, all young and middle-aged men who were at work were taken from their workplaces and locked inside a stable; the rest of the Jews—women, children, and old people—were captured in a roundup carried out in the town by the local police. Some Jews offered resistance.

On the morning of the same day, the Germans gathered the town's Belorussians who had carts with horses. The Belorussian witness R.Sh., who participated in that operation, said: "The town commandant came out and spoke in Russian. . . . He said, 'You are liberated from the Jewish yoke, you are free people now,' something like that."³

The Jews—women, old people, and children—were formed into a column, which was escorted by the German and local police across the frozen Zapadnaia Dvina to Strelka and then to a nearby forest, where pits had been prepared. The Einsatzkommandos went separately. Some Jews tried to flee from the column; the police shot them, and the locals with the horse carts, who were following the column, had to pick up the bodies, put them onto the carts, and bring them to the pits.

The people brought to the forest near Strelka were all shot; then the men who had been locked in the stable were also taken there and killed. Later, the "specialists" (artisans) and the Jews who had fled from Beshenkovichi and were found in the vicinity were killed in another pit.

After the mass killing, the German authorities organized the sale of Jewish belongings to the local population.

According to the report of Einsatzgruppe B, 855 Jews were killed on February 11, 1942, in Beshenkovichi.⁴ Some 13 Jewish "specialists," who worked for the Ortskommandantur, and their families were spared on this day; they were killed in the fall of 1942.

The inscription on the monument erected at the site of the murder after the war states that 1,068 "innocent Soviet citizens" perished there on February 11, 1942. This figure includes either Jews who were killed before the last Aktion and the "specialists" or the non-Jews killed by the Nazis there—or both these groups.

Genin gives a rather negative description of the attitudes of non-Jews to the Jews in the town of Beshenkovichi during the war: "We heard from the Germans—Jude, Jude! The same attitude we got from part of the local population." Remarkably, he speaks positively about the attitude towards him shown by Soviet soldiers, whom he met after he crossed the front line in 1942.⁵

There are no recorded cases in Beshenkovichi where non-Jews attempted to rescue Jews, other than cases in which non-Jews attempted (unsuccessfully) to rescue their close Jewish relatives (in-laws).

The ghettos in Ulla and Ostrovno within Rayon Beshenkovitschi are dealt with in separate entries. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 93 Jews were killed in the villages of the Svecha sel'sovet (10 kilometers [6.2 miles] west of Beshenkovichi). Mass shootings of civilians took place also in Bocheikovo (19 kilometers [11.8 miles] west-southwest of Beshenkovichi; 84 people killed), Sokorovo, Markarovichi, and other sel'sovets. It is not clear from the documents the extent to which there were Jews among the victims in these places.

SOURCES The personal story of Yakov Genin, who survived the massacre in Beshenkovichi, was published in Yiddish as Meyer Brukazh, "Der lerer," Birobidzhaner Shtern 253 (December 23, 1973).

The documents of the ChGK for the Beshenkovichi raion can be found in GARF (7021-84-1). Relevant German documentation is located in RGVA (500-1-770), BA-BL (R 58/217), and BA-MA (RH 26-201/17). YVA contains not only all the witness statements consulted (O-3/4676 to 4680) but also copies of some German documentation (see O-51-Ossobi/43 and M-29-FR/208).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. YVA, O-3/4676 and O-3/4677.
2. YVA, O-3/4676.
3. As cited by Daniel Romanovsky, "The Holocaust in the Eyes of the Homo Sovieticus," Holocaust and Genocide Studies 13:3 (1999): 378 fn.24.
4. Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht der Einsatzgruppe B vom 16. bis zum 28. Februar 1942, in RGVA, 500-1-770.
5. YVA, O-3/4676.

BOBRUIISK

Pre-1941: Bobruisk, city and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Babruisk, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Bobruisk is located 110 kilometers (68 miles) southwest of Mogilev. According to the census of 1939, there were 26,703 Jews living there (31.6 percent of the total population). The initial advance of German forces into Soviet territory in late June and July 1941 induced some of Bobruisk's Jews to evacuate to the east, while a number of male Jews were called up into the Red Army. No precise figure exists for the number of Jews in the city on the day it was occupied.

On June 28, 1941, units of the 3rd Panzer Division, as well as elements of the 4th Panzer Division and the 1st Cavalry Division, entered Bobruisk. Initially, the city was part of the German 2nd Army's zone of operations, but from August 1941 the territory of Bobruisk was administered by Rear Area, Army Group Center. The various administrative tasks in the city were divided between the local commandant's office (Ortskommandantur I/274) and the field commandant's office (Feldkommandantur 581), but the former unit was subordinated to the latter.

From the first days of the occupation, the Germans ordered the inhabitants to observe a strict curfew and forbade them to leave "the limits of their residential area." Jews were forced to wear yellow six-pointed stars. Additionally, the Germans demanded that the Jews hand over their money, gold, jewelry, and furs. One of the first measures taken by the Germans was to register the entire population and compile a list of the Jews of Bobruisk. At about the same time, the German authorities established a Jewish Council (Judenrat), which also served to separate the Jews from other segments of the population.

The Bobruisk ghetto was established in the area defined by Novoshosseinaia, Zaturenskogo, and Bobrova Streets.¹ According to M.G. Kogan, by July 30, 1941, 10 days after its establishment, all the Jews of Bobruisk had been relocated into the ghetto. In the meantime, the local population plundered what was left of the Jews' property. The ghetto was enclosed by a fence and guarded. The prisoners were prohibited from leaving its confines.

These oppressive German policies forced people to live under absolutely intolerable conditions. Ghetto prisoners had to endure extreme overcrowding, with as many as 35 people sharing a room. In the ghetto it was forbidden to heat furnaces and cook food. It was possible for the Jews to obtain something to eat only by secretly escaping from the ghetto at night and bartering personal possessions for food.² Any Jews caught outside the ghetto were shot immediately. Inhabitants of the ghetto were perpetually exhausted. Many Jews died from starvation and disease. Prisoners of the ghetto were also not able to wash. Some inhabitants of the ghetto succumbed to despair and attempted to commit suicide by hanging themselves. The Germans and their collaborators came to the ghetto for entertainment, selecting beautiful girls and raping them. The chief of police would enter the ghetto and shoot anyone in sight. Similar visits by the murderers would end, as a rule, with the murder of between 15 and 20 Jews. On a regular basis, Germans would round up teenagers and bring them to the hospital, where their blood would be taken. Inhabitants of the ghetto were forced to do heavy physical labor (digging and railway construction work).³ Jews were forced to assist the Germans in defusing mines by dragging large rakes across the minefield. Many people died as the mines exploded. The Germans set dogs on those who tried to hide.

It seems that those with particular skills had a special status. Administrative correspondence between the municipal government and local enterprises, dated between September 13 and 18, 1941, reveals that the Jews H.M. Krichevski, R.S. Stison, L.A. Liakhovskoi, R.O. Ginsburg, N.B. Rozovski, and U.A. Golodez were entrusted with restoring a pharmacy and received special passes and bandages.⁴

According to Kima Rutman, some Jews from western Belorussia were also brought to the Bobruisk ghetto.⁵ He also saw how elderly Jews dug holes in the ground in which they secretly placed their Talmuds, prayer books, Torahs, and talles, as well as lists of prisoners of the ghetto.

In July 1941, the mass killings or Aktions began. Not everything about them is known, making it difficult to present a complete account of the destruction of Bobruisk Jewry.

From the available evidence, it has been determined that between September and October 1941, Einsatzkommando 8 (headed by Dr. Bradfish) conducted three mass shootings in and around Bobruisk, during which 407, 1,380, and 418 Jews were killed, respectively.⁶ The largest Aktion during this period was conducted by the SS-Cavalry Brigade in September 1941, in which some 7,000 Jews were killed in the area next to the airfield.⁷

Little is known about Jewish resistance in the city. The 1,380 Jews mentioned above were murdered supposedly because of their dissemination of propaganda directed against the German authorities. According to another Einsatzgruppen report, Jews in Bobruisk had shown open resistance against the orders issued by the German occupation authorities and had openly incited the population to acts of sabotage.⁸

The history of the Bobruisk ghetto came to an end on November 7–8, 1941. According to one source, the Aktion began on November 6, 1941.⁹ In the early morning, Belorussian policemen and German soldiers rounded up the Jews, forcing them out of their homes. They shouted instructions about a journey to Palestine, while beating Jews with rifle butts. They forcibly loaded the Jews into trucks that took them to the village of Kamenka. The loading process continued until evening. The place of extermination was 9 kilometers (5.6 miles) from Bobruisk, near the road to Slutsk. Earlier, prisoners had dug three large ditches in the area. As Jews arrived, they were ordered to remove their clothes and footwear, then shot.¹⁰ According to German sources, on November 7–8, 1941, 5,281 people were killed. The mass killing was carried out by units of Einsatzkommando 8 and Police Battalion 316.

A letter addressed to the commandant of the city of Bobruisk from the Belorussian mayor, Stankevich, reported that “the warehouses of the city contain the newly arrived property from the ‘ghetto.’ As these items were transported quickly, they arrived in a chaotic condition and were sorted first before their sale. After the goods were unloaded and organized, a number of military officials and private citizens visited the warehouse, selecting whatever items they wanted.”¹¹

After the extermination of November 7–8, 1941, the Germans declared that the territory of Bobruisk was “free of Jews,” although a few craftsmen from the ghetto were kept alive, as their work was still required. Part of the ghetto remained fenced in, and four houses on Novoshosseinaia Street held tailors, shoemakers, and blacksmiths.

In addition to keeping the Jews alive for their work, the Germans exploited their continued existence in another way. It was apparent that a considerable number of inhabitants from the ghetto had managed to survive. The occupiers posted announcements declaring that there would be no further punitive measures against the Jews and that they were invited back into the ghetto. The bait worked, as some of the surviving prisoners, having no other choice, returned. The Germans waited until December 30, 1941.¹² On that day, the police surrounded the rump of the ghetto, and all the Jews were placed into trucks and driven to a place of extermination. It is estimated that the Germans murdered up to 2,500 people during this Aktion.¹³

The exact number of survivors has not been determined. Evidence exists about only a handful of individuals.

For rescuing Maria Minz, Bronislav Altshuler, and Guini Maz, the award of “Righteous Among the Nations” was granted by Yad Vashem to the Belyavsky family (Efrosiniya and son Alexander), the Yalovik family (Julia and son Victor), and the Micholok family (Stephanida and daughter Galina), respectively.¹⁴

Starting in the fall of 1943 and continuing until January 1944, the German occupiers took the remains of the Jews killed at Kamenka, at Elovkin, and at the Jewish cemetery of Bobruisk and burned them, trying to hide all traces of the murder. This barbaric act was carried out by prisoners who were themselves later killed. In those places where the Germans did not have enough time to conduct similar operations, they tried to disguise the mass graves under freshly sown fields and new roads.

SOURCES In Christian Gerlach’s book Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 2000), there is, among many other things, a brief examination of the destruction of Bobruisk’s Jews (see pp. 599–600). The subject of the Holocaust is also examined in the regional history work: Pamiats’ Babruisk (Minsk, 1995). See also R.A. Chernoglazova, ed., Tragediia evreev Belorussii (1941–1944): Sbornik materialov i dokumentov (Minsk: Izd. E.S. Gal’perin, 1997), pp. 181–182.

This entry is based primarily on documentation from the following archives: GAMO (858-1-62 and 858-1-74); GARF (7021-82-2); YVA (O-3/3754); and materials in the personal archive of the author (PAGV). Additional materials can be found in BA-L (B 162/1548-49); and NARA (T-175, reels 233–234).

Gennadii Vinnitsa
trans. Ilya Bourtman

NOTES

1. PAGV, testimony of M.Ya. Mints.
2. Testimony of Mikhail Kogan, published in David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., Chernaia kniga s krasnymi stranitsami: Tragediia i geroizm evreev Belorussii (Baltimore, 1996), p. 272.
3. PAGV, testimony of M.Ya. Mints.
4. GAMO, 858-1-62, p. 2.
5. Testimony of Kima Rutman, published in Meltser and Levin, Chernaia kniga s krasnymi stranitsami, p. 268.
6. See NARA, T-175, reels 233–234, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 92, September 23, 1941; EM no. 108, October 9, 1941; and EM no. 124, October 24, 1941.
7. See BA-L, B 162/1548-49 (II 202 AR-Z 64/60).
8. NARA, T-175, reels 233–234, EM no. 108, October 9, 1941; and EM no. 92, September 23, 1941.
9. PAGV, testimony of M.Ya. Mints; testimony of Mikhail Kogan, published in Meltser and Levin, Chernaia kniga s krasnymi stranitsami, p. 273.
10. GARF, 7021-82-2, p. 18, testimony of P.F. Khomichenko.
11. GAMO, 858-1-74.
12. PAGV, testimony of M.Ya. Mints.
13. GARF, 7021-82-2, p. 32, report of the ChGK for the Bobruisk oblast, January 1945.
14. Inna Gerasimova and Arkadii Shul’man, eds., Pravedniki narodov mira Belarusi (Minsk, 2004), pp. 33, 71, 112.

BOBYNICHY

Pre-1941: Bobynichi, village, Vetrino raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Bobynitschi, Vetrino Rayon, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Babynichy, Polatsk raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Bobynichi is located 32 kilometers (20 miles) southwest of Polotsk. In 1920, there were 170 Jews living in the village out of a total population of 219. German forces of Army Group Center occupied the town in early July 1941.

A ghetto was established only one month before the final murder of the local Jews; it consisted of a single house, the former kolkhoz management building. The building was guarded. On January 15, 1942, a Belorussian squad headed by two Germans, most probably the same unit that conducted Ak-tions in the nearby villages of Voronichi and Gomel', appeared in Bobynichi; to judge from some of the names, they were probably Belorussian policemen from Polotsk. These men assembled 106 (108, according to one account) Jews (53 of them women), tied the hands of the young people, put the children, the old, and the sick onto horse carts, and led them to a nearby Belorussian cemetery. A pit had been dug beforehand. On the spot, the members of the squad shot the adult Jews and threw the children into the pit alive. A Jew named Isaak Ioffe was only wounded and went to a local hospital in search of assistance. At the hospital, Dr. Butko, however, betrayed him to the punitive squad, which shot Ioffe near the hospital and brought his body to the pit at the main killing site. The pit was filled in three days later on the orders of the mayor, Filipp A. Spasibeko. Of those killed in Bobynichi, 14 were not local Jews; they were probably refugees from the "western regions."¹

SOURCES The documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) for the Vetrino raion can be found in GARF and NARB.

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTE

1. GARF, 7021-92-210; and NARB, 3797-1-9 and 861-1-13, p. 143.

BOGUSHEVICHY

Pre-1941: Bogushevichi (Yiddish: Bushavitz), village, Berezino raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Bogushevitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Babushevichy, Berazino raen, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Bogushevichi is situated 82 kilometers (51 miles) southeast of Minsk. German forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on July 3, 1941. Some of the Jews were evacuated or succeeded in fleeing eastward. Following the occupation of the village, the German military commandant's office (Orts-kommandantur) appointed a village elder (starosta) and organized a Belorussian police force (Ordnungsdienst) consisting of local residents.

In the summer and fall of 1941, the German authorities implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Bogushevichi. Jews were registered and forced to wear yellow patches; they had to perform forced labor; and they were prohibited from leaving the limits of the village.

In late July or early August 1941, the military authorities established a ghetto in the village, located in a school building consisting of two floors. Both local Jews and others from surrounding villages, including the Jews of Seliba, were forced to move into the ghetto. In total, there were around 400 Jews in the Bogushevichi ghetto. There was no electricity in the ghetto, and the toilet facilities were located outside the building. A number of Jews were taken away and shot during the summer and fall of 1941.¹

Survivors state that they rarely saw Germans while in the ghetto but recall vividly local police coming to the ghetto while drunk, demanding "Jewish gold." Forced labor tasks included harvesting potatoes, and Jews who worked outside the ghetto were also able to beg for extra food from their non-Jewish neighbors.²

According to survivor testimony, at least some of the Jews from the Bogushevichi ghetto were transferred to the Berezino ghetto in October or November 1941, around the time of the first snowfall.³ The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, however, indicates that German security forces assisted by the local police liquidated the ghetto in December 1941, shooting most of the remaining 380 inmates in a forest 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) north of the village.⁴

SOURCES Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Bogushevichi can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-87-2); NARB; VHF (# 6551, 7052, and 20880); and YVA (M-33/420).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. VHF, # 6551, testimony of Roman Plaksa; # 7052, testimony of Evgeniia Guzik; and # 20880, testimony of Zinaida Elkind.
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid., # 7052 and # 20880.
4. GARF, 7021-87-2, p. 6; YVA, M-33/420, p. 14; and Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), p. 60.

BORISOV

Pre-1941: Borisov, city and raion center, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Borissow, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte), then (from 1942) Rayon and Gebiet center, Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien, Reichskommissariat Ostland; post-1991: Barysau, raen center, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Borisov is located 71 kilometers (44 miles) northeast of Minsk. In 1939, there were 10,011 Jews living in Borisov out of a total population of 49,108 (20.4 percent).

After capturing Minsk on June 28, 1941, the enemy advanced on Borisov. Some Jews were able to flee with the withdrawing Soviet Army, but the majority remained behind. German forces occupied Borisov on July 2, 1941, and soon began a pattern of theft, abuse, and murder.

The ghetto in Borisov was established on the edge of the city in the area bounded by Slobodka, Sovetskaia, and Krasnoarmeiskaia Streets. All the non-Jews living there were forcibly expelled by the local authorities and ordered to move into Jewish houses elsewhere. The transfer of Jews into the ghetto began on the morning of August 27, 1941; it was supposed to be completed within one day. The Jews were forbidden to use any form of transportation and had to carry everything in their arms. The ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire, with only one gate on Zagorodnaia Street (later Ruben Ibarruri Street). Belorussian police guarded the ghetto, in which there was terrible overcrowding, leading to unsanitary conditions and the spread of disease.¹ The chief of police, David Ehof (Egof), assisted by the local administration, rounded up about 1,000 Jews living in the city suburbs and surrounding villages, resettling them into the ghetto.²

Khatskel' Berkovich Baranskii (born 1895) was ordered by the Nazis to become head of the Jewish Council (Judenrat). The population of the ghetto was in excess of 7,000 people, and food rations consisted of only about 100 to 150 grams (3.5 to 5.3 ounces) of bread per person per day. Finding additional food was very difficult, as communication with the local population was strictly forbidden, and this regulation was enforced by severe punishment. Hunger and sickness soon became widespread. The police escorted ghetto inmates daily to perform forced labor, which entailed construction work and cleaning the streets. The ghetto inmates were ordered to surrender their best clothing and also to pay large contributions in money and valuables. Mayor Stankevich prepared lists of the Jewish belongings collected and reported these to the economic section of the German army. The more valuable items were delivered to the State Bank (Reichskreditkasse).³

In late September 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 under the command of SS-Hauptsturmführer Werner Schönemann "liquidated" 321 Jews in Borisov in reprisal for acts of sabotage, allegedly carried out by Jews in the town. Another 118 Jews were shot in Borisov as alleged plunderers. In early October 1941, responsibility for Security Police operations in the Borisov area was transferred to Einsatzkommando 3, based in Minsk.⁴ The order to liquidate the Borisov ghetto was issued in mid-October 1941 by the head of Einsatzkommando 3, SS-Obersturmführer Schlegel. The mass-shooting Aktion was planned for October 20, 1941. In the northern suburbs, 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from the city, a large ravine near the airfield was prepared as a mass grave (close to the Borisov-Zembin Road). Using Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) as manpower, three ditches, more than 100 meters (328 feet) long, 5 meters (16 feet) wide, and 3 meters (10 feet) deep, were dug in the ravine. Although the order for the liquidation of the ghetto was secret, the Jews soon got wind of it. They appealed to Mayor Stankevich for a stay of execution. Stankevich allegedly promised the Jews that he would intercede with the senior German general on their behalf, as they had successfully paid the recently imposed "contribution" of 300,000 rubles in gold and other valuables.⁵ A number of Jewish specialists were selected and transferred to the Minsk ghetto.

For the Aktion, which began at 3:00 A.M. on the morning of October 20, more than 100 local policemen from throughout the Borisov region had been assembled, together with SS men and Latvian auxiliaries from Minsk. First the Jewish men were driven out of the ghetto. Then the women and children were also taken along Polotsk Street towards the airfield, following the men at a considerable distance. The authorities ordered everyone else to stay indoors so as not to be shot by local policemen. As there was insufficient transportation, some of the women and children had to walk. The guards beat them with metal clubs. Shooting could be heard throughout the day. Trucks returned from the forest with the victims' clothing. Anyone present in Borisov that day had no illusions about what was happening. The mood of the non-Jewish population was transformed: some of those who the previous evening had approved of the executions, saying that the Jews deserved their fate, now asked: "How is it possible to kill off 6,500 Jews all at once? When will it be our turn?"⁶

According to the testimony of Oberwachtmeister Soenenken, a translator with the German forces temporarily in Borisov during the mass shooting, the first 20 people were told to jump into the ditch and were shot from above. The next group had to rearrange the bodies of those killed ahead of them, to make room so that they in turn could be shot. "When the ditch was full, the Jews had to put a layer of sand over the bodies and had to trample upon both sand and bodies." The most horrible scenes took place in these mass graves.⁷

After the Aktion, local police thoroughly searched the territory of the ghetto and elsewhere in Borisov for any Jews in hiding, looting Jewish property at the same time. During this operation, some of the houses in the ghetto were set on fire. The shooting of about 750 Jews found in hiding continued throughout Tuesday, October 21.⁸ Altogether, on October 20–21, 1941, 7,245 Jews were shot in and around Borisov.⁹

On November 11, 1941, Feldkommandantur (V) 244, which assumed responsibility for Borisov only after the massacre, ordered that the ghetto area could be entered only with the permission of the Feldkommandantur. The aim of this order was to prevent any looting and secure remaining Jewish property for the German authorities.¹⁰

The local policemen played an active role in the murder of the Jews. From August to November 1941, 14 men comprised the main leadership of the police, 10 were section leaders, and 73 were ordinary policemen. After the liberation of the city, 5 were sentenced to death and at least 16 imprisoned. It is impossible to determine what happened to the majority of the police force. Not all were tried. A number of former policemen escaped with the Germans; some changed their last names and used false papers; others opportunistically joined the Soviet partisans; and after the liberation of Belorussia in the summer of 1944, some joined the ranks of the Red Army. A few policemen were captured several years after the war. Aleksander Varfalomeevich Mironchik returned from the front with many decorations. His recollections of managing a warehouse for the police and commanding the “Kommunar” partisan division were included in the book Pamiat’ (Memory), devoted to Borisov and the Borisov raion. In fact, Mironchik was not the manager of a warehouse but the head of the police squad in Novo-Borisov and an accomplice in the murder of the Jews.¹¹ Former policemen Stepan Buryi and Konstantin Mozalevskii were tried and punished after returning from the front with Soviet decorations. Peter Logvin and Konstantin Pipin were both released after serving prison sentences, and 68-year-old Feodor Petrovskii, assistant chief of police in Novo-Borisov, was released early, owing to his advanced age. In 1947 a Soviet Military Tribunal sentenced David Ehof to 25 years’ imprisonment.

In early 1943, an SD translator in Minsk, Heinrich Schneider, brought an order to Borisov for the bodies of the Jews to be dug up and burned at night. In October 1943, Soviet POWs completed this task over about five nights, after which they were shot.¹²

According to the calculations of Aleksander Rozenblium in Pamiat’ na krovi, only slightly more than 50 Jews from the Borisov ghetto survived until the end of the occupation. Most were saved with the help of local citizens. Nine people from Borisov have been awarded the title of “Righteous Among the Nations” by Yad Vashem, and many more assisted with the survival of Jews in and around the city.

SOURCES Aleksander Rozenblium has published a monograph on the Jews of Borisov, Pamiat’ na krovi: Evrei v istorii Borisova (Petah Tikva, 1998), which contains much information on the destruction of the community during World War II, including a list of people who saved Jews in Borisov and the names of those they saved. Other relevant publications include the following: Pamiat’: Istoriko-dokumental’nye khroniki gorodov i raionov Belorussii: Borisov i Borisovskii raion (Borisov, 1997); David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005); Leonid Smilovitsky, “Borisov: A Mirror of the Holocaust in Belorussia. Review of Aleksander Rozenblium, Pamiat’ na krovi: Evrei v istorii Borisova,” Jews in Eastern Europe 42:2 (2000): 106–110; Leonid Rein, “Local Collaboration in the Execution of the ‘Final Solution’ in Nazi-Occupied Belorussia,” Holocaust and Genocide Studies 20:3 (Winter 2006): 381–409; Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000); and Aviv (Minsk, 2001), nos. 11–12.

Documentation concerning the persecution and murder of the Jews in Borisov under the German occupation can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/214-19 and R 2104/26); BA-L (B 162/6715-19); GAMINO (635-1-24, 31, 51, 74, 88, 184, and 6343-1-12); GARF (7021-87-3); NARA (N-Doc. 3047-PS); NARB (861-1-8, 845-1-206, and 4-29-111); USHMM (RG-53.002M, reel 6); VHF; and YVA (e.g., M-33/421; M-41/316 and 2396).

Leonid Smilovitsky and Martin Dean
trans. Ilya Bourtman

NOTES

1. NARB, 861-1-8, pp. 66–69; GAMINO, 635-1-24, pp. 220–222; GARF, 7021-87-3, pp. 3, 20.

2. USHMM, RG-53.002M, reel 6 (NARB, 845-1-206), p. 318, testimony of accused David Ehof, February 28, 1947.

3. See Vladimir Adamushko, Galina Knat’ko, and Natalia Redkozubova, eds., “Nazi Gold” from Belarus: Documents and Materials (Minsk: National Archive of the Republic of Belarus, 1998), pp. 34–37, 134–135. For his services in collecting gold, silver, and other precious valuables from the murdered Jews, Stankevich was awarded a decoration by the Germans, presented in Berlin.

4. BA-BL, R 58/217-18, Ereignismeldung (EM) UdSSR no. 108, October 9, 1941, p. 16, and EM UdSSR no. 124, October 25, 1941, p. 4; Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht no. 6 der Einsatzgruppen, October 31, 1941, in Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941–42: Die Tätigkeits- und Lageberichte des Chefs der Sicherheitspolizei und des SD (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 230.

5. NARA, N-Doc. 3047-PS, Soennecken report on executions of Jews in Borisov, October 24, 1941. An English translation can be found in International Military Trials: Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression (Red Series) (repr. Buffalo, NY: William S. Hein, 1996), 5:772–776.

6. NARA, N-Doc. 3047-PS; and USHMM, RG-53.002M, reel 6, pp. 318–323, Ehof testimony, February 28, 1947.

7. NARA, N-Doc. 3047-PS.

8. Ibid.; and USHMM, RG-53.002M, reel 6, pp. 318–323, Ehof testimony, February 28, 1947. Ehof was accused by the Nazis of having obtained Jewish property illegally; see BA-BL, R 2104/26, p. 108.

9. Rozenblium, Pamiat’ na krovi, pp. 61, 63.

10. YVA, M-41/316, p. 2, FK (V) 244, Standortbefehl no. 1, November 11, 1941. Subordinated to Infantry Division 339, FK (V) 244 was appointed the senior commandant in Borisov on November 7, 1941.

11. A.B. Mironchik died in 1986 and was buried in Borisov; information about his crimes became known publicly only after his death. On his service as police chief in Novo-Borisov, see GAMINO, 635-1-31, p. 22.

12. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, p. 228, testimony of David Ehof, February 23, 1947; and USHMM, RG-53.002M, reel 6 (NARB, 845-1-206), p. 313.

BOROVUKHA 1-IA (PERVAIA, THE FIRST)

Pre-1939: Borovukha 1-ia (Pervaia, the First), military settlement, Polotsk raion, Vitebsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Borowucha, Rayon Polozk, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Baravukha 1-ia (Pervaia), Palotsk raen, Vitsebsk voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Borovukha 1-ia is located 15 kilometers (9.3 miles) northwest of Polotsk. German forces of Army Group Center occupied the settlement in mid-July 1941. During the occupation, a German garrison was billeted in the former “military settlement” of Borovukha 1-ia. The German military authorities appointed Andrei Markin as mayor (Bürgermeister) of the settlement, and soon after their arrival, they ordered the Jews who lived there to wear white Stars of David on their clothes. In October 1941, the Germans surrounded Borovukha, combed the settlement and its vicinity, and assembled all the Jews they had found, 115 in total, in a military barracks there, beating them during the roundup. Two days later, 50 of them—men, unmarried women, and old people—were taken in trucks to a field and shot there.¹ The rest of the Jews were placed in a house surrounded with barbed wire. The inmates of this makeshift “ghetto” did not receive any food. Some Jews occasionally left the house (it is unclear whether it was with or without the permission of the Germans) and exchanged various items for food.

On January 13, 1942, a punitive squad appeared in the town. It took all of the 65 Jews, among them 40 children aged less than 16, and also women and old men, from the house, under the pretext that they would be sent to perform forced labor, and killed them in the area of a former tank training ground. Witnesses say that some of them, when they were driven to the tank training ground, were barefoot and without warm clothes. Mayor Markin and the German commandant, Leutnant Kremer, allegedly took an active part in the annihilation of Borovukha’s Jews.²

SOURCES Documentation on the murder of the Jews in Borovukha can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-92-221); TsGAMORF (239-2187-100, p. 57); USHMM (RG-06.025*04, Bobruisk Trial, doc. no. 808, p. 174); and YVA. Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-92-221, p. 5, ChGK report for the Polotsk raion, April 15, 1945; see also USHMM, RG-06.025*04, Bobruisk Trial of Bruno Jushkus, doc. no. 808, p. 174, testimony of Pavel Danilovich, Shunevich.

2. Ibid. TsGAMORF, 239-2187-100, p. 57, ChGK report for Borovukha I, July 7, 1944, states that all the Jews from the Jewish kolkhoz Sovetskaia Belorussia were gathered in one house and then shot with all family members at the firing range (poligon): 140 to 150 people. This probably refers to the same incident, although the number of victims may be too high.

BUDA-KOSHELEVO

1938–1941: Buda-Koshelevo, town and raion center, Gomel’ oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Buda-Koshelevo, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Buda-Kashaleva, raion center, Homel’ voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Buda-Koshelevo is located 48 kilometers (30 miles) northwest of Gomel’. A Jewish kolkhoz with 11 families was established there in 1924. From 1925 to 1928, three more kolkhozy were created on the outskirts of the township. Their population consisted of 49 Jewish families. The 1939 census showed that there were 496 Jews living in Buda-Koshelevo (14.7 percent of the total population).

Towards the end of June 1941, war refugees from western Belorussia began to arrive, and their numbers quickly swelled. The Red Army called up able-bodied men, forming a combat battalion of 310 soldiers under the command of Dovolev to defend the town and deal with deserters.¹ The population largely believed Soviet propaganda asserting that the Red Army’s setbacks were temporary and that soon the enemy would be crushed.

Buda-Koshelevo had a railway station, but the authorities used all available rolling stock to evacuate state property rather than local inhabitants. German planes pounded the town from the air. Most of the population either lacked the means to flee or feared they would perish on the road. The memory of decent treatment of the Jews by the German army in 1918 still deceived some people. Only a few Jews were fortunate enough to escape to the east.²

Buda-Koshelevo was occupied by German forces on August 14, 1941. They rapidly imposed their authority, placing the town under military command, with a garrison of around 50 men. Sonderführer Albrecht was the commandant; Bühlheim was chief of the punitive detachment; Hoffmann and Neidicke served as deputies. The chief of the local police was Marchenko.³ He was replaced in November 1941 by Vasilii Mikhaleiko.⁴

Buda-Koshelevo was administered by Rear Area, Army Group Center. Geographically, the Zhlobin-Gomel’ railway line split the entire area in two. There were eight subdistrict regions (volosti) in the northern part. The five volosti in the south lay along the left bank of the Dnieper River.

Police posts and garrisons were established in the villages of Rogin’, Merkulovichi, Gubichi, Zabab’e, Chabotovichi, and Pirevichi, among others. District and subdistrict authorities opened police stations and selected between 7 and 10 policemen from among the local residents. In Buda-Koshelevo, initially there were 15 policemen, a chief of police, and a police investigator, Voititskii.⁵ The German authorities set up a prison on Sovetskaia Street for Soviet prisoners of war (POWs), who worked at the railway station and on other town infrastructure. Subsequently they were transferred to Gomel’ and Rogachev.⁶

No anti-Jewish Aktionen were carried out in the town during the first two months of the German occupation, but relations between Jews and Belorussians changed for the worse. More than 400 Jews still remained within the town. At first, Jews were allowed to live in their own homes, monitored by the local police, but they were obliged to carry out German orders without question. On October 26, 1941, the Germans established a ghetto. All Jews had to resettle into the two-story stone school building. Buda-Koshelevo Chief of Police Marchenko organized the roundup.

The overcrowding was excessive: 50 or 60 people were crammed into each of the building’s six rooms in an area no larger than 40 square meters (431 square feet). The overflow lived in the corridors. The prisoners suffered terribly from hunger, and there was no heat. The windows lacked glass panes and were boarded up. Cold and exhaustion brought on disease and then the first deaths.⁷

The authorities did not feed the Jews, who were living on their own scanty reserves or on whatever was passed on to them by acquaintances among the Belorussian or Russian population. Some of the inmates bartered personal belongings for food. Such trafficking was forbidden, and it had to be done discreetly. Daily, Jews were led off to perform forced labor for up to 14 or 16 hours. Under the pretext of security searches, the Germans seized the Jews' most valuable personal belongings. They also raped girls and young women.

The guards periodically beat up the prisoners, insulting and abusing them "for fun." On November 23, 1941, police officer Kukharenski wounded Dania and Khaia Khankin, Lev Vilen'skii, Gurar'e, Estin, and Epstein with a rifle. The situation of the Jews became worse when Mikhalenko replaced Marchenko as chief of police. Under Marchenko, Jews were sometimes able to barter items for bread and potatoes or to receive things from acquaintances and neighbors. When Mikhalenko took over, all these practices were stopped, and conditions became unbearable. Everything worsened for the ghetto inmates. Verbal abuse and beatings were routine. The wounding and murder of prisoners by the police became more frequent.⁸

The Buda-Koshelevo ghetto did not exist for long. On December 27, 1941, two vehicles arrived in Buda-Koshelevo with policemen from Gomel'. Chief of Police Mikhalenko ordered increased vigilance and doubled the number of guards assigned to the ghetto from 6 to 12 men to prevent any chance of escape. The police separated the men from the women. Then they began to lead the prisoners, 2 at a time, into a separate room where Mikhalenko and the German officers sat. The Jews were strip-searched, and money, documents, and usable clothing were all seized. The occupiers and their collaborators placed the Jewish men—some 170 of them—in a room where all the windows were tightly sealed, and no water was available. A stove burning continuously filled the room with stuffy heat; breathing became difficult. The inmates were so tightly packed that they could not even turn around or sit down. In this state they spent the night; then at 5:00 A.M., on December 28, 1941, police officers began to lead the Jews out to be shot. Mikhalenko stood on the stairwell between floors in the school and checked them off. First they took the men into the courtyard, then the women.⁹ The police lined up the prisoners in a column and herded them to an antitank ditch in the village of Krasnyi Kurgan behind the Machine Tractor Station (MTS). Mayor Prusov and Chief of Police Mikhalenko supervised the Aktion.

They ordered the men to undress and began to lead them down into the ditch in groups. Three or four Germans made them lie facedown. Then the German marksman approached and killed each one with a single shot from his submachine gun. They laid the second group of men on top of the bodies of the first. About an hour after the start of the Aktion, police officers Kosmilo, Kabaev, Filip Oleinikov, and Dmitrii Kuzikov led the women to the antitank ditch. Mothers held infants in their arms. The police hauled older children and elderly men to the site in carts. All of the prisoners were made to undress. Then the police brought them to the ditch and shot them. Infants were killed with their mothers, older children along with the adults.¹⁰

The slaughter was accompanied by continuous cries of pain and grief. People begged for mercy, wept, and cried out. The killings went on from 8:00 A.M. until 3:00 P.M. On that day, 485 people were murdered. The murder squad only covered the bodies with snow; in the spring they were buried in the ground. Personal belongings of the Jews were given to a store in Buda-Koshelevo, which sold them.¹¹

The police had arrested a Belorussian, Evgenii Venglinskii, who, together with his Jewish wife and their child, was confined in the ghetto, where they all lived until the ghetto liquidation Aktion. The Venglinskii family escaped the fate of the others under lucky circumstances. They were able to convince one of the policemen who understood Russian that they had ended up in the ghetto "by mistake" and were not in fact Jews. Evgenii gave the policeman his leather coat. In exchange, the policeman put the family into a separate room. From the window, the Venglinskiis saw the Jewish inmates marched off to the antitank ditch. They hastily fled Buda-Koshelevo and wandered the countryside of the Zhlobin raion until they met up with Soviet partisans in May 1942.¹²

On the eve of the mass shooting, the police summoned inmate Hirsh Shvets to see the chief of the punitive detachment, whom they had told that Shvets was an especially skilled shoemaker. Shvets was put to work by the police and subsequently transferred to Gomel'. For the next two years, he was obliged to work for the Sicherheitsdienst (SD). When the Germans retreated from Gomel', they took Shvets away to Germany, where he was eventually liberated by the Red Army.¹³

Red Army units of the 4th Infantry Division and the 231st Armored Regiment of the Belorussian 48th Army liberated Buda-Koshelevo on November 27, 1943. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), which arrived in the town in November 1944, found that 1,287 civilians and 282 POWs had died at the hands of the Germans during the occupation of the town. Of the 485 Jews who were murdered on December 28, 1941, only 120 family names could be determined.¹⁴

During the German occupation, the population of the Buda-Koshelevo raion decreased from 41,459 in 1941 to 23,595 in May 1944, 57 percent of the pre-war figure. In the town, the population decreased from 3,371 in 1941 to 2,886 in 1944, or 86 percent of the pre-war figure.¹⁵ However, the general information collected by the ChGK does not specify the ethnicity of the victims.

SOURCES Some information on the town of Buda-Koshelevo under German occupation can be found in the book: Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Kniha, 1995).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBGO; GAGOMO; GARF (7021-85-35); NARB; and TsAKGBRB.

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Steven Seegel

VOLUME II: PART B

NOTES

1. NARB, 4-33a-65, p. 90.
2. Ibid., 4-33a-16.
3. Marchenko was killed by partisans in October 1941.
4. Mikhalenko remained chief of police in Buda-Koshelevo until July 1942, when he became chief of police in the Svetilovich Rayon. In September 1943, he retreated with the German forces to the Glusk Rayon. There he joined punitive Police Battalion no. 10 "Panin," where, with the rank of staff-captain, he commanded a company. He was twice awarded a German medal for bravery and was recommended for a third. At the beginning of July 1944, the "Panin" battalion was sent across the Vistula to an area where it was disbanded. From the proceedings of the military tribunal trial of Vasilii Avrahamovich Mikhalenko (born 1884); AUKGBRBGO, file 8579, pp. 360–371.
5. GAGOMO, 1345-2-2, pp. 2–4.
6. NARB, 3934-1-9, p. 2.
7. TsAKGBRB.
8. GAGOMO, 1345-2-2, pp. 3–4.
9. From the decision regarding the arrest of V.A. Mikhalenko, November 1, 1945, see AUKGBRBGO, file 8579, p. 51.
10. Interrogation of Mikhail Leonovich Kuznikov (born 1908), February 8, 1944, ibid., p. 178.
11. Interrogation of accused Ivan Adamovich Fomin, February 19, 1944, ibid., p. 109.
12. Interrogation witness Venglinskii (born 1914), October 26, 1945, ibid., pp. 112–116.
13. Interrogation in Buda-Koshelevo of witness Hirsh Hedelevich Shvets (born 1886), October 27, 1945, ibid., pp. 120–122.
14. Document of the ChGK, November 27, 1944, concerning the crimes of the Fascist German invaders on the territory of the Buda-Koshelevo raion, GARF, 7021-85-35, pp. 8–11.
15. Report dated November 27, 1944, concerning the population of Gomel' oblast', GAGOMO, 144-5-6, p. 218.

BYKHOV (AKA STARYI BYKHOV)

Pre-1941: Bykhov, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Bychow, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte);

post-1991: Bykhau, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Bykhov is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) south of Mogilev. According to the 1939 census, 2,295 Jews (20.8 percent of the population) lived in Bykhov. An additional 408 Jews lived in the villages of the raion, making a combined Jewish population of 2,703.

German mobile forces of Army Group Center occupied the town in the first half of July 1941. In the period before the Germans' arrival, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age joined the Red Army. However, the rapid German advance trapped some Jewish refugees in Bykhov who were fleeing from locations farther west. Probably between 2,500 and 3,000 Jews were in Bykhov at the start of the German occupation. During the fighting, the town burned for three days, damaging or destroying many Jewish homes.

During the entire period of occupation from July 1941 until June 1944, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) governed Bykhov.¹ According to Soviet sources, the Ortskommandant in the fall of 1941 was Oberleutnant Martus.² Shortly after the occupation began, the German administration ordered the registration and marking of the Jews. The German authorities instructed the Jews to sew yellow stars onto their clothing; however, because the fire in the town had destroyed most of the available yellow fabric, Jews who had no yellow material made their stars out of white fabric instead.³ The Germans also obliged the Jews to perform various forms of heavy labor.

On August 29, 1941, forces of Reserve Police Battalion 322, belonging to Police Regiment Center (Mitte) shot 84 Jews in Bykhov.⁴ On September 5, 1941, the Germans conducted another Aktion in Bykhov. They rounded up about 250 Jews capable of work and took them out of the town, seemingly for road construction, but instead they shot them all.⁵ They conducted the shooting in the Gan'kov ditch, located on the southern outskirts of the town. People in Bykhov could hear the victims' screams.⁶

Exterior and interior views of the Bykhov synagogue; the interior reveals extensive wartime damage; 1988.
USHMM WS #97249 AND WS #97260, COURTESY OF JACK KAGAN

At some time in the fall of 1941, most likely in September, just after the murder of the 250 people, the Germans made a list of all the remaining Jews and collected them in the Sapega Castle. Some local inhabitants describe this incarceration as a “ghetto,”⁷ although the Germans also imprisoned some non-Jews (“Soviet Party activists”) there together with the Jews. Local Belorussian police (politsais) guarded the area around the castle.⁸

According to one witness, his future wife went to the ghetto several times to take food to a Jewish friend, Khava Markhasina, who had been imprisoned. “The Jews were living in ghastly conditions, and people were tortured, too. She remembered that when she went up to the second floor, the wall next to the railings . . . was drenched in blood. The last time she went, a policeman warned her not to come back any more, because it could end badly for her.”⁹ Even the dark-haired Belorussians were frightened, fearing the Germans might kill them simply because they looked like Jews. There was also a rumor that some local non-Jews had managed to “buy” a child from the ghetto and pass her off as their own.¹⁰

Soviet sources state that the Germans held the Jews in the castle without any food or water for about a week. Then German security forces escorted them on trucks to an antitank ditch located near Voronino, 6 kilometers (3.7 miles) east of the town, where they carried out a mass shooting.¹¹ One Jew, Moïshe (Mikhail) Kats, reportedly jumped from one of the trucks at full speed and escaped into the forest. He was 25 at the time. They fired a submachine gun round at him but did not pursue him. He managed to stay alive, walking to Sumy in the Ukraine, where he spent the rest of the occupation.¹² At the antitank ditch, the Germans forced the victims to undress and pile their shoes and clothes neatly at one side, before shooting them in groups. Descriptions of the Aktion, together with forensic evidence, indicate that some victims, especially children, were probably thrown into the pit and buried alive. At this time (in the fall of 1941), a number of allegedly Communist non-Jews were also killed.¹³ A few Jews who evaded the mass shootings and subsequent searches hid with non-Jews, and some subsequently fought with Soviet partisan detachments.

Soviet estimates put the number of people murdered by the Germans in Bykhov in 1941 to be in excess of 4,000.¹⁴ However, in view of the pre-war Jewish population of only 2,703 for the entire raion, it seems unlikely that the number of Jewish victims exceeded this (allowing for a number of Jewish evacuees who were probably more or less replaced by the refugees who became trapped in Bykhov).¹⁵ Other evidence seems to indicate that many of the Jews of the surrounding villages were shot close to their homes (rather than being brought in to Bykhov). For example, in the village of Gomarnia, 14 people were shot “as Jews,” 71 in the Mokria sel’sovet, and several Jewish families in the village of Seliba.¹⁶

In late 1943, the Germans attempted to cover up their crimes by exhuming the corpses from the mass graves around Bykhov and burning them. They used Soviet prisoners of war from the camp at Pribor to conduct this work, then shot them once the task was complete.¹⁷

SOURCES The testimonies of several witnesses from Bykhov have been published in Ida M. Shenderovich and Aleksandr Litin, eds., Gibel’ mestechek Mogilevshchiny: Kholokost v Mogilevskoi oblasti v vospominaniakh i dokumentakh (Mogilev: MGU im. A.A. Kuleshova, 2005), pp. 34–44.

Documents on the persecution and elimination of the Jews of Bykhov can be found in the following archives: BA-MA; GAMO (306-1-9 and 10); GARF (7021-88-35; and 7021-148); NARB (861-1-8 and 9); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8; RG-48.004M, reels 1 and 2; and RG-53.002M, reel 7); VHAP; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft and Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. In October 1941, Ortskommandantur II 340 was based in Bykhov, as was Feldkommandantur 194, and III. Battalion of Police Regiment Mitte; see BA-MA, RH 26-221/14b.

2. GAMO, 306-1-10, pp. 66–67.

3. Reminiscences of Anatolii G. Zhdan (born in 1925) in Shenderovich and Litin, Gibel’ mestechek Mogilevshchiny, pp. 39–40.

4. VHAP, K1/1003386, 392, HSSPF Russland Mitte an RFSS, Kdo.-Stab RFSS und Chef Orpo, August 29–30, 1941.

5. See the diary of O. Berger, a staff drill sergeant (Stabsfeldwebel) in the 2nd Battalion of the 3rd Security Regiment, in GARF, 7021-148.

6. GARF, 7021-88-35, p. 11; NARB, 861-1-9, pp. 234, 236; and reminiscences of Anatolii G. Zhdan (born in 1925), in Shenderovich and Litin, Gibel’ mestechek Mogilevshchiny, pp. 39–40.

7. See, for example, the reminiscences of David S. Lakhtyrev and Dora M. Gekht, in Shenderovich and Litin, Gibel’ mestechek Mogilevshchiny, pp. 38, 42.

8. Reminiscences of Anatolii G. Zhdan (born in 1925), in ibid., pp. 39–40.

9. Reminiscences of Georgii D. Menshagin (born in 1924), in ibid., pp. 40–41.

10. Ibid., pp. 34–44.

11. NARB, 861-1-9, pp. 234, 236.

12. Reminiscences of Mila A. Rudakova (born in 1924), in Shenderovich and Litin, Gibel’ mestechek Mogilevshchiny, pp. 42–44.

13. Ibid., pp. 34–44.

14. NARB, 861-1-9, ChGK report for the Bykhov raion indicates that in fall 1941 Ortskommandant Martus imprisoned 4,679 persons (including some non-Jews) in the castle, who were shot shortly afterwards.

15. GARF, 7021-88-35, pp. 1, 11, 17.

16. Shenderovich and Litin, Gibel’ mestechek Mogilevshchiny, p. 35.

17. Ibid., pp. 35–37.

CHASHNIKI

Pre-1941: Chashniki, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Tschaschniki, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwartiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Chashniki, raen center, Vitsebsk voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Chashniki is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) southwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, 1,109 Jews lived in the town, making up 31.6 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Chashniki raion (without the town of Chashniki) constituted 867 people, the bulk of whom lived in the small towns of Chereia and Lukoml'.

Owing to Chashniki's location far from major highways and with no easily accessible railway station, only a few Jews were able to leave the town in 1941 before the Germans captured it.

The German forces (XXXII Army Corps of the 3rd Panzer Group) entered Chashniki on July 4, 1941. From August 1941 onward, Chashniki was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. This area was the realm of the 403rd Security Division; Chashniki was under the control of Feldkommandantur 181.

The Germans put together an indigenous local administration in Chashniki, including a local police force. The mayor of the town was Kalina, a former construction engineer who had worked for the town's health administration (gorzdrav); the head of the Belorussian police was Tislenok;¹ but it was his deputy Mikhail Pakhomov who was known for his hatred and atrocities towards the Jews. At the same time, a Jew named Chereiskii was appointed the elder of the community. According to witnesses, Chereiskii's only function was to appoint Jews to do forced labor, in accordance with German instructions issued to him. The witnesses do not refer to a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Chashniki, nor do they refer to a Jewish police force.

The Germans did not establish an enclosed ghetto in Chashniki, possibly because the whole Jewish population lived in the central part of the town. Some Jews were resettled from their houses, and their houses were turned over to non-Jews. The Germans gave instructions to mark all Jewish houses with plywood Stars of David; all Jews were ordered to wear a patch with a Star of David on their clothes. The Jews were forbidden to leave the town and to communicate with non-Jews. Witnesses do not mention any large-scale resettlement of Jews from other places to Chashniki in the period from July 1941 to January 1942.

The Germans did not supply the Jews with food. However, the survivors' accounts make no mention of starving. Most of the town's Jews had plots of land and could sustain themselves with what they grew on them. The day before the German entry into Chashniki, the town dwellers, including Jews, pilfered barley from the stores of the alcohol factory abandoned by the authorities, and this helped them to survive.

From the very beginning the Germans imposed compulsory labor on the Jews. Young people were sent to work at the railway station (quite far from the town center) and the fuel depot nearby, as well as at the officers' mess.

At the end of September 1941, a group of Jewish young people (according to various estimates, about 50 to 100 people, mainly males but also some females) were sent to a nearby peat farm to cut peat and load it onto carts. The work lasted until November. These laborers did not receive any food, but they were allowed to return home on Sundays in order "to collect some food for the next week." In fact, the young workers had to leave the labor camp at night and go to the villages to exchange clothes, utensils, and other items for food.

Witnesses make both positive and negative comments about the attitude of the surrounding non-Jewish population. Some locals maintained contacts and trade with their Jewish neighbors. On the other hand, the survivors say that it was not only Germans and members of the Belorussian police who robbed the Jews—many other people took food, clothes, and other items. Attempts to stop the robbers or to complain to the Germans sometimes ended with the one making the complaint getting a beating instead.

On September 13, 1941, the Germans murdered all the Jews of the small town of Lukoml', in the Chashniki raion, purportedly in reprisal after a Soviet straggler (presumed to be a local Jew) killed a German officer there.² It is unclear exactly who carried out the killings, although one witness mentions the participation of the Belorussian police. Local informants speak of some 300 victims.³ The news of this Aktion and subsequent rumors of other mass killings in nearby towns unsettled the Jews of Chashniki, but they were unable to gain much information about them.

The Jews of Chashniki were murdered on February 14–15, 1942. On the morning of February 14, about 100 young people were sent out of the town to clear snow from nearby roads. Thus the most youthful part of the Jewish population was moved away from the place of the future Aktion. At about 1:00 P.M., a detachment of Einsatzkommando 9 (commanded by Oswald Schäfer) entered Chashniki on horse-drawn sledges, coming from the direction of Beshenkovichi.⁴ From the morning of the same day, the Belorussian police began to assemble the Jews in the building of a former church, which had been turned into a "House of Culture" during the Soviet period. According to eyewitnesses, many Jews refused to go to the church, and towards dusk the area resembled a battlefield: there was shooting, and the police stormed some houses. Some Jews tried to flee and were killed on the run, some of them quite far from the town center. A group of policemen intercepted the young people who were returning to the town after clearing the snow and escorted them to the church.

About 1,000 Jews of Chashniki spent the night in the church, closely guarded by the Belorussian police. On the morning of February 15, at around 10:00 A.M., the police drove the Jews to some pits near the village of Trilesino. After a delay during which the Germans deepened the pits, the mass shooting began. The killers, both Germans and local police, took several people (probably an entire family) in turn, made them undress, placed them on the edge of the pit, and shot them with machine guns. Before the shooting, the Secret Field Police (GFP) unit that was responsible for rounding up the Jews (together with two volunteers from a local Luftwaffe unit) searched them for any valuables. The Aktion lasted all day. Over the following days the police combed the town and its vicinity and found some Jews who were trying to hide.⁵

After the Aktion, the belongings of the murdered Jews were collected, sorted, and under the auspices of the SD, handed over to the mayor to be sold to the Belorussian population. The proceeds were credited to the town's account.⁶

About a dozen mainly younger people, who had left the town some days before the shooting or succeeded in running away, survived the mass murder. Of those who survived, Zalman Solomonov, Fira Kharkevich (née Kaplan), Semen Shapiro, Arkadii (Abram) Pukhovitskii, Roza Topash (née Pukhovitskii), and Boris Plavnik were interviewed in 1985–1987.⁷

The murderers themselves estimated the number of those killed at 1,180.⁸ The list (probably incomplete) compiled by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report in 1944 indicates 700 Jewish victims. Of them, 321 (45.9 percent) were born in 1924 and later and thus were under draft age; 103 were born in 1901–1923 (draft age, 14.7 percent); and 276 (39.4 percent) were born in 1900 and before. The second group breaks down to 34 men and 69 women; the third group, to 125 men and 151 women.⁹ The disproportionately large number of children in this sample may be ascribed to the fact that among them there were children from large cities who were staying with their grandparents in Chashniki for the summer and that families with many children were less inclined to flee from the Germans.

The mass shooting of the Jews of Chereia, also in the Chashniki raion, took place on March 5, 1942. There may have been a similar form of “open ghetto” there prior to the shooting, as in Chashniki. The murderers shot the Jews at two locations: one was near the school, and the second was outside the town. It is unclear who the murderers were. The Germans spared some “specialists” for a while, but several days later they were also finished off together with the Jews who were found hiding in the vicinity after the first Aktion. The last mass shooting took place near the Khalnevichi road, west of the town. The ChGK report lists 201 Jews killed in Chereia.¹⁰

SOURCES The author has published a more detailed account of the fate of Chashniki's Jews in Vestnik Evreiskogo Universiteta v Moskve 1 (1992): 157–199. That essay also includes published versions of the main eyewitness accounts now located in YVA. The other major published source is G. Linkov, Voina v tylu vruga (1st ed., Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 1947; 2nd enlarg. ed., Moscow: Goslitizdat, 1959).

The documents of the ChGK for the Chashniki raion can be found in GARF (7021-84-15). Relevant German documentation is located in the following archives: RGVA (500-1-770) and BA-MA (RH 26-201/17). Witness statements and copies of some of the German documents can be found in YVA (O-3/4690–4706, O-51.Ossobi/43 and M.29.FR/208).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. The eyewitnesses call him Chislenok; the difference can be attributed to the Belorussian pronunciation.

2. See YVA, O-3/4706; there are some discrepancies with the version published in Linkov, Voina v tylu vruga.

3. The list of victims compiled by the ChGK contains 131 names of Jews; the informants were Nadezhda (an eyewitness, non-Jewish) and Yefim Rutman (not a witness).

4. YVA, O-3/4692.

5. Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht der Einsatzgruppe B von 16. bis 28. Februar 1942, in RGVA, 500-1-770; also YVA, O-3/4698, O-3/4699, O-3/4702, O-3/4703.

6. BA-MA, RH 26-201/17, p. 4, report of Sicherungsbri-gade 201, Abt. VII, March 15, 1942.

7. Their interviews are now located in YVA as O-3/4690–O-3/4695.

8. Tätigkeits- u. Lagebericht der Einsatzgruppe B von 16. bis 28. Februar 1942.

9. GARF, 7021-84-15.

10. Ibid.

CHAUSY

Pre-1941: Chausy, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Tschausy, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Chavusy, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Chausy is located 157 kilometers (98 miles) north of Gomel'. According to the 1939 population census, 1,272 Jews (17.6 percent of the total population) lived in the town of Chausy. In addition, another 252 Jews lived in the villages of the Chausy raion. Following the German invasion of Poland and the Soviet occupation of its eastern part in September 1939, a number of Jewish refugees from Poland arrived in the town.

German military forces occupied Chausy on July 16, 1941, three weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. Part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east before the arrival of the Germans, owing to the town's good rail and road communications, and men of eligible age were called up into the Red Army. A little more than half the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

Under German occupation, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town; almost immediately it set up a local administration and an auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local residents. Shortly afterwards, the Ortskommandantur ordered the registration and marking of the Jewish population. The Jews of Chausy were exploited for various kinds of forced labor.

In August 1941, Sonderkommando 7b (subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B) carried out two Aktions in the city. The men of Sonderkommando 7b murdered 31 Jews in the first Aktion, allegedly for being in contact with Soviet partisan forces.¹ In a second Aktion shortly afterwards, the Security Police (of Sonderkommando 7b) shot 20 Jews who were allegedly active Communists.²

At some time in the month of August, the German authorities established a ghetto in the suburb of Kozinki. A few weeks later, probably in late September or early October 1941, German security forces assisted by the local police liquidated the ghetto.³ They rounded up all the Jews, mainly women, children, and the elderly, deprived them of any remaining valuables, and escorted them to a site about 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside of town on the banks of the Pronia River, where a ditch had been prepared. The few Jews living in the nearby village of Dranukha were also brought to the same site at this time. Just as the shooting was about to start, a courageous teacher named Dora Ruvimovna Kagan jumped out of the crowd and confronted the head of the German police Danilov, shouting: "We are defenseless and can't fight you. But you can't kill us all. Millions of Soviet people are left, they will avenge us. Our innocent blood will be on their banners." According to another account, she spat in the face of Danilov before being cut short by machine-gun fire. Some of the Jews were only wounded as they fell into the ditch. After the grave had been filled in, the moans of the wounded could still be heard for many hours.⁴

Shortly afterwards the German authorities also rounded up and shot Jews born in mixed marriages with one Jewish parent. Among those shot was blond-haired, 18-year-old Ira Grubnykh, whose grandfather was a Jew.⁵ Estimates of the number of Jews murdered vary according to different sources. In total, the Germans and their collaborators shot more than 675 Jews in Chausy.⁶

SOURCES Information about the persecution and murder of the Jewish population of Chausy can be found in the following publications: Pamiats' Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Kniha, 1995), p. 473; and Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007), pp. 272–273.

Documentation on the Holocaust in Chausy can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/216); BA-L (ZStL/202 AR-Z 81/59, vol. 20); GAMO; GARF (7021-88-48); NARB (861-1-9, pp. 285–286); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. BA-BL, R 58/216, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 67, August 29, 1941.

2. Ibid., Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 73, September 4, 1941.

3. Sources disagree regarding the date: Rubenstein and Altman, The Unknown Black Book, p. 272, date it on August 16, 1941, but this is unlikely; GARF, 7021-88-48, indicates the end of September; Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000), p. 305, dates it on October 9, 1941. See also BA-L, ZStL/202 AR-Z 81/59, vol. 20, pp. 11, 126, which also gives contradictory dates.

4. Rubenstein and Altman, The Unknown Black Book, pp. 272–273.

5. Ibid.

6. GARF, 7021-88-48, pp. 1 and reverse, gives the figure of 624 Jewish victims for the final Aktion. To these must be added those reported by the Einsatzgruppen prior to this. Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, p. 305, indicates that around 1,000 Jews were murdered, but this figure is probably too high.

CHECHERSK

1938–1941: Chechersk, town and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Tschetschersk, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Chachersk, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Chechersk lies about 60 kilometers (37 miles) north of Gomel' on the Sozh River. In 1939, there were 977 Jews in the town, 18.2 percent of the total population.

After the Germans invaded the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, all able-bodied men of military age were drafted into the Red Army. In Chechersk, the local authorities formed a rifle battalion of 239 men commanded by Levkovich. The unit included many Jews. Although Chechersk was 37 kilometers (23 miles) away from the nearest railroad station, and despite the lack of an organized evacuation, nearly half of the Jewish population managed to leave before the arrival of the German army in Chechersk. Most of them hoped to return home soon.¹

German forces occupied Chechersk on August 16, 1941, placing the town under the administration of Rear Area, Army Group Center. Commandant von Maibaum assumed military command in the town; Heimann was in charge of the agricultural command office; Kondrat Ganzhin became the head of the Rayon, and Golubovskii, chief of the Rayon police. The German occupiers also set up military strong points in the villages of Pokat', Nisimkovichi, Poles'e, Zales'e, Beliaevka, Rovkovichi, Merkulovichi, and Dudichi. In these thinly populated settlements, the village elders were assisted by two or three local policemen.²

No anti-Jewish activity took place in Chechersk during the first two months of the occupation; then things changed for the worse. Chumakov became head of the town police and recruited Chechikov, Zbaromirskii, Bel'kin, Ginsher, Kozlov, and Zatikov, among others. Prisoners were held in a jail set up in a building of the veterinary training school in Chechersk.³

Until October 1941, Jews in the town continued to live in their own homes under the control of the local police. They strictly followed the orders issued by the German authorities. In October 1941, the Germans established a ghetto. They arrested all the Jews in Chechersk and held them under guard in the town hall and in nearby houses. Gypsies were confined at a separate location. In the course of interrogations, accompanied by beatings, jewelry and other valuables were taken from the Jews.

The ghetto in Chechersk had no purpose other than to concentrate the Jewish population and prevent those held from escaping before they were annihilated. Consequently, the German authorities took no measures for sanitation, medical services, or the social welfare of the prisoners in the ghetto. They forced the Jews to work without question or compensation. This included heavy labor. Often their warders ordered the inmates to perform degrading and senseless tasks: to swat flies in the commandant's office; to drag carts with water, bricks, firewood, and trash from one place to another; and to dig ditches and then fill them up again.⁴

It was forbidden to feed the prisoners. Sometimes their keepers brought them rotten potatoes but did not provide any other food. If a local inhabitant attempted any communication with an inmate, the guards immediately put a stop to it. Despite the threat of starvation, the authorities prohibited local inhabitants from giving bread to the Jews. In effect, all contact with the local inhabitants was suppressed.

Because of the poor quality of the food, the ghetto inmates suffered from all kinds of gastric ailments. Many of them began having bloody diarrhea from dysentery. Untimely death became the norm. Hunger also provoked mental disorders.

The ghetto in Chechersk existed for about three months. The 435 inmates included mostly elderly men, women, and children. Of the total, 289 were Jews, and 146 were Gypsies.⁵

The annihilation of Jews in the ghetto took place in two main stages. In the first, at the end of November 1941, the Germans slaughtered 84 elderly men and women. Germans and their collaborators transported the weaker inmates to the site of their execution in motor vehicles; those able to walk they herded on foot. Local inhabitants working in a field who witnessed this activity asked the police where they were taking these prisoners. Their warders explained that they were "going to Gomel' for medical treatment." The Germans executed this first group in an antitank ditch outside of Chechersk.

The second mass shooting took place towards the end of December 1941. Members of the Gestapo arrived from the military commandant's office in Gomel' and instructed the local police concerning this Aktion. In the town hall, early on the morning of December 28, the police began searching the prisoners. They beat them, stripped them naked, and seized whatever personal possessions the victims still had with them. The Germans took gold, watches, and other valuables; the police took clothing and underwear, which they tied into small bundles and hid in their houses. A tailor, Samuil Baskin (born in 1896), who was considered a specialist worker by the Germans, witnessed one of these search-and-seizure operations that took place in an adjoining room.⁶

Before the Aktion began, the Germans and the police went around the town to gather the Belorussians and Russians into the square in front of the town hall. To instill fear, the Germans obliged the assembled local citizens to observe the treatment of the Jews before their execution. At a temperature well below freezing (–30 degrees Centigrade [–22 degrees Fahrenheit]), the Germans made the prisoners strip to their underwear, remove their shoes, and stand in the snow. Then they brought several wooden sledges into the square. At the command of Mayor Ganzhin, the police took from their parents the younger children, including infants, and threw them onto the sledges. Eyewitnesses said that "weeping and wailing filled the streets of Chechersk." Everybody was crying, including the Belorussians who witnessed the scene. Ganzhin asked the Jews, "Why are you crying? Don't be afraid, they're not going to do anything to you, just take you around a bit and let you go."⁷

The Germans and the police counted the prisoners again, then lined them up in a column 4 abreast and marched them along Sovietskaia Street to the killing site. The place chosen for this purpose was an antitank ditch 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) from the town and not far from the village of Krasnyi Bereg, on the Chechersk-Zabolot'e road. Following the column of prisoners surrounded by members of the punitive expedition and policemen were sledges with the children. When they had all arrived at the site of the Aktion, the column halted, and the first group of male prisoners was ordered to lie face-down in the snow. These were the strongest and healthiest inmates. A member of the punitive party would pin down a doomed Jew by placing a pitchfork without center tines on the neck of the victim so that he could not move his head, while a second German executioner shot him in the back of the head with a pistol. Policemen with pitchforks dumped the bodies in the ditch. Then it was the turn of the next rank of 4 prisoners. The Jews awaiting execution began weeping and crying out. People bid good-bye to one another, and children begged their mothers to take them back home. The Germans, however, paid not the slightest attention. They laid out children in the snow and beat them to death with spades. They grabbed the legs of infants like piglets, beat their heads on the frozen ground, and threw them into the ditch. Many were still alive. By 8:00 P.M., things finally quieted down. The punitive detail covered the bodies with snow. The next day, Ganzhin rounded up local inhabitants and forced them to bury the dead.⁸ Some 500 people perished in the two Aktions, including the Gypsies. The Germans spared only 5 individuals who were tailors or shoemakers, whom they sent to Gomel'.⁹

After the mass killings, Ganzhin and the military commander in Chechersk, von Maibaum, held a banquet at police headquarters "to mark the deliverance of the town from the Jews."¹⁰ The police department received a cash reward. In January 1942, Mayor Ganzhin awarded Leonid Chechikov 400 rubles for his zeal in guarding the Jews, participating in removing them to the site of their execution, and arresting partisans.¹¹

During the years of the German occupation of the Chechersk raion, 130 inhabited localities were destroyed, while in the town itself some 300 houses were burned down. Before their retreat, German troops mined many buildings and streets in the town. Troops of the Soviet 61st Belorussian Army Front liberated Chechersk on November 27, 1943, in the course of the Gomel'-Rechitsa operation. When the war ended, the population of the Chechersk raion had dropped from 41,845 in 1941 to 30,991 in May 1944, a loss of 26 percent. Comparable figures for the town itself are 5,138 for the pre-war population, and 2,265 at the time of liberation, a loss of 59 percent.¹²

The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), which arrived in Chechersk on December 22, 1943, established that the Germans were responsible for killing 1,137 people in Chechersk and other communities in the raion; that included 716 people who had previously lived in other raions of the republic. The commission's documents do not identify the dead by nationality.¹³

SOURCES Other than those listed in the notes, published works about the fate of the Jews in Chechersk include Marat Botvinnik's Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000).

The main archival sources include AUKGBRBGO (file 2724); GAGOMO (560-1-3, 1345-1-13); GARF (7021-85-44); NARB (861-1-6); PALS; TsAKGBRB; and YVA.

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. NARB, 4-33a-65, p. 90.
2. Pamiat's': Chechersk raion (Minsk, 2000), pp. 205–208.
3. NARB, 861-1-6, pp. 207 and reverse.
4. Sovietskaia Belorussia, May 16, 1995.
5. GAGOMO, 560-1-3, pp. 2–3.
6. AUKGBRBGO, file 2724, pp. 50–51, witness testimony of Samuil Motelevich Baskin (born 1896), October 9, 1944.
7. TsAKGBRB, Minsk.
8. Ibid.
9. AUKGBRBGO, file 2724, witness testimony of Vladimir Stepanovich Pugin (born 1924), May 18, 1944.
10. PALS, excerpt from the diary of the secretary of the Chechersk underground party district committee, Pavel Dedik, Gomel', 1944, p. 146.
11. On December 29, 1944, the NKVD Military Court for the Gomel' oblast' sentenced Leonid Timofeevich Cherkov to 15 years of hard labor plus 5 years' deprivation of his civil rights. AUKGBRBGO, file 2724, p. 89.
12. Data concerning the population of Gomel' oblast' as of May 1, 1944, GAOOGO, 144-5-6, p. 218.
13. NARB, 3922-1-2, pp. 22–23.

CHERIKOV

Pre-1941: Cherikov, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1943: Tscherikow, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Cherykau, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Cherikov is located 77 kilometers (48 miles) southeast of Mogilev. According to the 1939 census, 949 Jews were living in Cherikov, comprising 14.8 percent of the total population. In addition, there were 132 Jews living in the villages of the Cherikov raion.¹

German armed forces occupied the town on July 17, 1941, about four weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. The town was taken only after bitter fighting, which resulted in considerable destruction.² In the interim period, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army.

During the entire German occupation, which lasted until October 1, 1943, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) was in control of the town. The Ortskommandantur established a Rayon administration and a police force recruited from local residents. In October 1941, Ortskommandantur 846 was based in Cherikov.³

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the local authorities, on the instructions of the Ortskommandantur, organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were also required to perform forced labor. The wearing of the Jewish Star of David was strictly enforced.

In August 1941, the first Aktion was carried out in the town. A detachment of Sonderkommando 7b shot a group of Jews.⁴ On October 29, 1941, the Ortskommandant in Cherikov ordered the shooting of Salmon Plotkin for repeatedly defying the order to wear the Jewish star and for allegedly having contacts with the partisans.⁵

Very little information is available about living conditions for the Jews in Cherikov under the German occupation. Two secondary sources use the term “ghetto” in connection with the town, and according to Marat Botvinnik, it appears that some Jews from the surrounding villages and settlements were brought into Cherikov at some time before the mass shooting of the Jews.⁶ It is likely that some form of open ghetto was established in Cherikov, with Jews prohibited from leaving the limits of the town.

Available accounts indicate that before killing the Jewish population of Cherikov in late October or early November 1941, German security forces, assisted by the local police, rounded up the Jews near the town hall, informing them that they would be resettled to another locality. The Jews were then escorted on foot to a site about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) north of the town near the mill, where a ditch had been prepared.⁷ Two Germans shot the Jews in the ditch in small groups. Six local Belorussians were ordered to fill in the ditch afterwards. One of these men recalled: “The Jews cried, screamed, and the Germans beat them with whips, dragged them to the ditch by force, tore children away from their parents, and threw them into the ditch. It was so horrible that I still don't understand how I kept from going mad.”⁸

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission report, the mass shooting took place on November 7, 1941.⁹ It was conducted by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 9 as part of an antipartisan sweep conducted by units of Security Division 221. Einsatzgruppe B reported later in December that 786 Jews of both sexes had been shot in Cherikov and Klimovichi.¹⁰ Estimates of the number of Jewish victims in Cherikov range from 238 up to 500, but since at least 500 Jews were murdered in Klimovichi, the actual number in Cherikov was probably towards the lower end of this range.¹¹

In 1943, members of the Soviet partisan detachment known as “Thirteen,” which contained a number of Jews, conducted anti-German operations near Cherikov. Following a police ambush, the Jewish partisan Girsh Izrailitin exploded a grenade rather than be captured, which resulted in the deaths of 16 local police collaborators, including the head of the Cherikov police.¹²

SOURCES Information about the persecution and murder of the Jewish population in Cherikov can be found in the following publication: Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Knaha, 1995), p. 481.

Documentation on the Holocaust in Chervik can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/218); BA-MA (RH 26-221/19); GAMO; GARF (7021-88-49 and 8114-1-955); NARB; USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Mordechai Altshuler, ed., Distribution of the Jewish Population of the USSR 1939 (Jerusalem: Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1998), pp. 39, 71.

2. See Konstantin Simonow, Kriegstagebücher (East Berlin, 1979), 1:15–52, 147.

3. BA-MA, RH 26-221/14b.

4. See the report of Einsatzgruppe B on police activity from August 24–30, 1941. Bundesbeauftragter für die Unterlagen des Staatssicherheitsdienstes der ehemaligen DDR, Zentralarchiv, ZUV 9, Bd. XXXI, p. 47.

5. GARF, 7021-88-49, p. 9, Ortskommandantur Tschervikow, Bekanntmachung, October 29, 1941, signed Ortskommandant Saup. See also BA-MA, RH 26-221/19.

6. David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), p. 266; and Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), p. 306.

7. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, p. 266; Joshua Rubenstein and Ilya Altman, eds., The Unknown Black Book: The Holocaust in the German-Occupied Soviet Territories (Bloomington: Indiana University Press in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, 2007), pp. 275–276; Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, p. 306; and GARF, 7021-88-49.

8. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, p. 266.

9. GARF, 7021-88-49, pp. 1 and reverse side, 6, and 7 with reverse side.

10. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 148, December 19, 1941, p. 9.

11. Pamiats': Belarus', p. 481, gives the lower figure of 238. In 1969 an obelisk was erected at the site of the mass shooting. GARF, 8114-1-955, pp. 9 and reverse, gives the higher figure of 500. Other estimates fall between these figures. The ChGK for Klimovich estimates at least 800 Jews killed there in early November 1941; see NARB, 861-1-9.

12. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, p. 231.

CHERVEN'

Pre-1941: Chervien' (until 1925, Igumen), town and raion center, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Tschervien, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Chervien', raion center, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Chervien' is located 62 kilometers (39 miles) south-southeast of Minsk. In 1939, there were 1,941 Jews in the town out of a total population of 6,376 (30.4 percent).

With the beginning of military operations, all men of military age were mobilized into the Red Army. Only a small number of Jews were able to flee before the rapidly advancing German forces. Units of the German 10th Panzer Division entered Chervien' on July 1–2, 1941. The Germans established a military administration (Ortskommandantur), and soon after their arrival they recruited a local police force. Grigorii Rusetskii was appointed chief of police, and Filip Razmyslovich, Maksim Kitov, Dmitrii Zenkovich, Karl Zhdanovich, Shirshov, and Iakovlev were among those who enlisted.¹

In August 1941 a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8, then based in Minsk, arrived in Chervien' and murdered 139 people, also collecting 125,880 rubles from town residents; the victims probably consisted primarily of male Jews.²

Then in the fall of 1941, the occupying forces ordered Griadka and Sovetskaia Streets in Chervien' to be cleared. Jews were resettled into these streets, which hitherto had been inhabited predominantly by Belorussians. According to eyewitnesses, during the resettlement, the smith Borukh Gelfand put up some resistance. For his actions, Gelfand was subjected to horrific torture: nails were hammered into his head.³ It is estimated that nearly 2,000 Jews lived in the ghetto. The ghetto in Chervien', like that of many other places in Belorussia, was of no particular economic significance. Its main function was to concentrate the Jews and prevent them from fleeing, to facilitate their subsequent extermination. The Jews were ordered to carry out their assigned forced labor tasks, including arduous physical work, calmly and obediently. The Jews were isolated: Belorussians and Russians were not allowed even to approach them, and they were systematically starved. The Jews' valuable possessions were seized.

The Jews in the Chervien' ghetto continued to suffer from persecution and starvation into the winter of 1941–1942. The mass killing of the remaining Jewish population was conducted on one day between January 31 and February 2, 1942. At this time Chervien' lay within the command area of Feldkommandantur 244 of Security Division 286. The killing Aktion was organized by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8, the command of which had just been taken over by SS officer Heinz Richter, based in Mogilev.⁴

At 6:00 A.M., the ghetto was surrounded by reinforced units of German and local Belorussian police. Search parties looked for Jews even outside the confines of the ghetto, in Chervien'. In the town hospital they found Gitlina, whose leg had been amputated and, in a separate room, a Jewish woman who had recently given birth. Both women were taken from their beds and sent to the ghetto.⁵ When all the searches had ended, the people were herded along the road towards the village of Zamestovka in the Kolodishchi sel'sovet. The column of Jews was stopped at the place known as Glinishche. The policemen in sleighs brought with them shovels and a box of ammunition. The mass shooting began at noon. In the winter frost, the prisoners were ordered to remove everything except their underclothing and then, in groups of 30 or 40 people, were escorted into the ditches and shot with automatic rifles. The Belorussian policemen played an important role in the Aktion. Among those who showed the greatest eagerness were Rusetskii, Razmyslovich, Kitov, Zenkovich, and Zhdanovich.⁶ On that day, approximately 1,400 people were shot. The German authorities ordered local Soviet citizens to fill in the pits. Because the ground was frozen, the pits were only lightly covered, and dogs started to scavenge the corpses. Therefore, they issued new orders for the pits to be filled in again more thoroughly.⁷

According to Soviet sources, during the occupation in Cherven' and in the Cherven' raion, 6,321 citizens of various nationalities lost their lives, including 766 Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) and 1,240 people who were burned inside buildings during the course of German reprisals against the Soviet partisans.⁸

Cherven' was liberated by the Red Army on July 2, 1944.⁹ After the liberation, three mass graves were found in the town: around the Jewish cemetery on Minsk Street (1,750 people); near the natural boundaries around Kurgane and Kirpichnoe (400 people); and on Bobruiskaia Street (315 people).

SOURCES There is no specific publication focused on the fate of the Jewish community in Cherven' during the Holocaust. For further details on the memorialization of the victims, see L. Smilovitsky, "Attempt to Erect Memorial to Holocaust Victims Blocked by Soviet Belorussian Authorities," East European Jewish Affairs 27:1 (1997): 71–80.

Documents on the fate of the Jews of Cherven' can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-87-17); NARA; YVA (O-53/24; M-33/435); and ZSSSt-D. In addition, the author's personal archive (PALS) contains some correspondence from the survivor Tsodik Rytov, received in 1998.

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Ilya Bourtman

NOTES

1. According to the testimony given to the ChGK by Ol'ga Lavrent'evaia (born 1907) and Ol'ga Ivenents (born 1891), see YVA, M-33/435, p. 24; O-53/24, p. 673.

2. NARA, T-175, reel 233, fr. 2722201, Ereignismeldung UdSSR (EM) no. 73, September 4, 1941.

3. PALS, letters from Tsodik Rytov (Israel) dated September 17 and December 3, 1998.

4. The available sources differ on the date of the mass shooting. In October 1941, Ortskommandantur II/252 was based in Cherven'; this unit was probably still in place at the end of January 1942.

5. According to the testimony given to the ChGK by Aleksandr Korotko (born 1920), YVA, O-53/24, p. 67.

6. YVA, M-33/435, pp. 2–8.

7. According to the letter of Lt. F.S. Tunik, September 23, 1944, published in Sovetskie evrei pisbut Il'e Erenburgu, 1943–1966 (Jerusalem, 1993), p. 158. German sources indicate that 1,342 Jews were killed in Cherven' on January 31 (or February 1), 1942, by a unit of Einsatzkommando 8; see ZSSSt-D, 45 Js 35/64, Bd. I, pp. 59–79, Verfügung dated September 8, 1967. The Einsatzgruppen reports erroneously give the figure of 15,000 victims, but probably 1,500 was intended; see EM no. 186, March 27, 1942, NARA, T-175, reel 233.

8. YVA, M-33/435, pp. 2–8.

9. Cherven' was liberated by the 110th and the 348th Artillery Divisions of the Soviet Army along with the Budinov, Zukov, and Kalinin partisan detachments. Jews comprised between 10 and 15 percent of these partisan units.

DARAGANOVO

Pre-1939: Daraganovo, village, Starye Dorogi raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Daraganowo, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Darabanava, Asipovichy raen, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Daraganovo is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) west of Bobruisk. In 1926, there were 60 Jewish families living in Daraganovo. By mid-1941, migration had slightly reduced the Jewish population of the village.

German armed forces captured Daraganovo in early July 1941, two weeks after Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union. During this intervening period, some Jews managed to evacuate to the east, while men eligible for military service were called up to active duty in the Red Army. About 100 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

During the entire occupation period, from July 1941 to June 1944, the village was governed by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). The German military administration created a village authority and a police force (Ordnungsdienst), recruited from local inhabitants.

Soon after the occupation, the Ortskommandantur ordered the village authority to make arrangements for the registration and marking of the Jews, as well as for their use in various types of forced labor.

On September 6, 1941, German security forces conducted the first Aktion in the village, in the course of which 11 people were accused of being Soviet activists and shot. The remaining Jews were forced into a ghetto, for which several houses on the edge of the village, on Pesochnaia Street, were allocated. The Germans liquidated the ghetto in May 1942, shooting 73 Jews in a forest north of the village. A detachment of Einsatzkommando 8, stationed in Bobruisk, carried out the shooting, in which the Ordnungsdienst also took an active part. On January 25, 1943, the children of mixed marriages were seized and shot in the village. In 1976, a monument was erected at the site of the mass grave.¹

SOURCES The following published sources contain some information on the annihilation of the Jews of Daraganovo: Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000), p. 303; V. Zaitsev and V. Novik, "Iz istorii Kholokosta v Osipovichskom raione," in D.V. Prokudin, comp., and Il'ia Al'tman, ed., My ne mozhem molchat'. Shkol'niki i studenty o Kholokoste. Vyp. 4: Sbornik (Moscow: Tsentr i Fond "Kholokost," 2008); and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 292.

Documentation on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Daraganovo can be found in the following archives: GAMO; and GARF (7021-82-8).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTE

1. According to the list of names, the number of victims was 85 (GARF, 7021-82-8, pp. 65–66).

DOBRUSH

Pre-1941: Dobrush, town and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Dobrush, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Dobrush, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Dobrush is located 25 kilometers (16 miles) east of Gomel' on the Iput' River. The town has a railway station on the Gomel'-Unecha line. In 1926, there were 372 Jewish inhabitants (2.7 percent of the total population of 13,800).

Following the German attack on the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, many refugees arrived in Dobrush. Dobrush was strategically significant, as it lay on the main rail line through Briansk to Moscow, so the Luftwaffe bombed the town. More than two thirds of the Jews in Dobrush managed to leave the town, either as staff of a factory or government organization or independently on foot towards Gomel'.¹

German forces occupied Dobrush on August 22, 1941. During the German occupation, Dobrush was subordinated to Rear Area, Army Group Center. The Germans appointed M.G. Sobolev to be the mayor and Karp Amel'chenko as his deputy. The former examining magistrate of the Dobrush raion, Fedosii Semenchik, became chief of police, and Anufii Klimenkov was the prison warden.² The police, the jail, local authorities, elders of the volost', and local communities were all subordinated to the German military command and the mayor.

No anti-Jewish Aktions took place in Dobrush during the first two months of the occupation. Jews were allowed to live in their own homes but were forbidden to visit public places, to go onto the main streets of the town, or to maintain contacts with Belorussians and Russians. Jewish children above age 10 and all Jewish adults were required to wear yellow patches on their outer garments.³ At the end of October 1941, the Gestapo ordered Mayor Sobolev to evict the Jewish population from within the town limits of Dobrush. In the municipal records Vasili Zheldakov recorded the names of the 106 Jews who were displaced. To calm them, the police informed the Jews that this was in preparation for their deportation to Palestine. On the appointed day, the authorities ordered the Jews to assemble at the town police station, from which they were escorted 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) south of the town to two outbuildings of the Machine Tractor Station (MTS). The police categorically forbade the Jews to enter the town limits. The guards starved the prisoners and escorted them to perform the hardest and dirtiest labor. Jews had to drag logs out of the river, clean streets, and unload freight cars. The local police and the Germans humiliated the Jews.

The liquidation of the ghetto was planned to take place at the same time as the execution of Communists and Soviet activists. The arrests of 19 Communists (18 men and 1 woman) took place on November 17, 1941. In the last days before the Aktion, the external perimeter of the ghetto was tightly guarded. On November 20, Gansevskii and Morozov made Jews dig a large ditch, 10 meters long, 2 meters wide, and 2 meters deep (about 33 by 6.6 by 6.6 feet).⁴ On the morning of November 21, at 10:00 A.M., eight policemen escorted the Communists in closed motor vehicles from the Dobrush jail to the MTS. The police took the Jews in a column of fours to within 50 meters (164 feet) of the ditch and made them kneel down. The police formed a cordon to prevent escape. Three officers of the Security Police, from the detachment in Gomel' (commanded by Wilhelm Schulz) of Einsatzkommando 8, directed the Aktion, assisted by 25 local policemen and 10 Germans.⁵ Among the local policemen present were Semenchik, Gansevskii, Sukalin, Lapunov, Khatskov, Kachanov, Kachalin, and Davydulin. A number of local residents, including many relatives and friends of the non-Jewish victims, came to the killing site, although Sobolev had instructed the policemen to keep observers at a distance.

First to be shot were the Communists; then it was the turn of the Jews. The policemen searched them, making them remove their clothing. Sukalin, Kachalin, and Lapunov undressed and searched the women. Khaia Kosolapova, in her early twenties, a Soviet clerk, tried to run away, but the policemen Sukalin and Kachalin caught her and dragged her back to be shot. As she was killed, Kosolapova shouted, "Goodbye, comrades, you who know me. I am dying for my homeland, for Stalin. Long live our Red Army!"⁶

The Germans went about their gruesome task as if they were slaughtering livestock. They would bring two or three victims to the ditch, where the German executioner stabbed the children with a knife and threw them, still alive, into the ditch. Police officer Khatskov was especially active in shoving people into the ditch. Among the first victims were members of the Aronchik family: the wife, husband, and four children. The mother, Basia Aronchik, 32 years old, held her 2-year-old son in her arms; the next-oldest child clung to her skirt, and the two older children followed behind. One of the older children appealed to Semenchik, begging him, "Dear Uncle, you know me. Dear Uncle, spare me, I want to live! I sat at the same desk as your boy in school, and I never did anything bad to anyone! Save me!" Whereupon a policeman grabbed him and threw him into the ditch, then shots rang out. The women and children sobbed so loudly that their wailing and moaning could be heard at a distance. Those only wounded were buried alive.⁷

The killing went on from 10:00 A.M. until 3:00 P.M. In total, 125 people were killed: 19 Communists and 106 Jews. After the mass shooting, the search began for those who had escaped by hiding. A week later, a 13-year-old girl named Ishevskaia, who had miraculously survived in Dobrush, sought out Amel'chenko to request some of the belongings of her parents, who had been killed. Amel'chenko arrested her and turned her over to the German commandant's office to be shot.⁸

The German occupiers used Jewish property to reward collaborators and as an incentive to the local population to be cooperative. Most of the property was distributed after the resettlement of the Jews into the MTS barracks, where the ghetto was established. The authorities took some of the Jewish belongings as fines or "contributions" in place of money: ornaments, gold and silver, and personal items. Finally, they took clothing, undergarments, and footwear removed from victims before the executions on November 21. After the mass shooting, the victims' belongings were hauled away in eight carts to the authorities' headquarters. German members of the punitive expedition and the police took some of the loot; whatever remained that was still usable was sold off to local inhabitants or distributed among those who worked for the authorities.

According to German investigative sources, a detachment of Security Police from Sonderkommando 7a based in Klinttsy arrived in Dobrush at the end of March or the beginning of April 1942 and murdered another 70 Jews, who were being held in three to five houses in a wooded area to the north of Dobrush. The Security Police, assisted by the local police (Ordnungsdienst), shot the Jews into a ditch.⁹ These were presumably Jews who survived the first Aktion or were captured in the area subsequently and held until a second Aktion could be organized.

Units of the Red Army liberated Dobrush on October 10, 1943. On the same day, the 48th Army counterintelligence unit "Smersh" arrested a group of active collaborators with the German occupiers who had committed crimes against local civilians. The collaborators were tried by a military tribunal.¹⁰

During the years of occupation, the population of the Dobrush raion declined by about 30 percent, from 31,244 inhabitants in 1941 to 21,791 in May 1944. In the town of Dobrush itself, the population fell almost 40 percent, from 13,815 to 8,399.¹¹ The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), which arrived in the town on December 16, 1943, established that 576 civilians (including 199 persons in the town of Dobrush) and 18 prisoners of war (POWs) perished in the Dobrush raion during the German occupation. Opening the mass grave near the MTS revealed 124 bodies buried there: 70 of them had bullet wounds; 10 showed signs of having been struck with a blunt object; and 44 had no visible injury, which suggested that they were buried alive.¹² Of the 124 bodies, 67 were women, 57 were men, 32 were children up to 10 years old, and 49 were elderly persons. Most of the bodies were found in awkward positions, which indicated an agonizing death.¹³

So far, of the 106 ghetto inmates, it has only been possible to establish the family names of 53 victims: 22 men and 31 women.¹⁴

SOURCES Publications relating to the fate of the Jews of Dobrush under German occupation include the following: Pamiat's' Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Knaha, 1995); and Pamiat's' Dobrushskii raion, 2 vols. (Minsk, 1999).

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBGO; GAGOMO (1318-1-8); GAOOGO (144-5-6); GARF (7021-85-38); NARB (4-33a-65); USHMM; and YVA.

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Robert Haney and Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. Pamiat's' Dobrushskii raion, 1:256.
2. From the interrogation of defendant Feodosii Ivanovich Semenchik, April 1, 1945, Grodno. AUKGBRBGO, file 6936, p. 17.
3. GARF, 7021-85-38, pp. 1, 10, 22.
4. From the verdict of "guilty" in the case of accomplices in Nazi crimes in Dobrush, October 29, 1943, AUKGBRBGO, file 15884, vol. 1, pp. 455-460.
5. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen vol. 20 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 588, p. 771.
6. AUKGBRBGO, file 15884, vol. 1, p. 49.
7. Excerpt from the examination record of witness Anna Prof'evna Zhurbenkova-Kotsuba (born 1906), October 16, 1943, Dobrush, ibid., vol. 1, p. 48.
8. Interrogation of Mikhail Nazarovich Lapunov, ibid., vol. 1, p. 106.
9. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 20, Lfd. Nr. 588, p. 771; and vol. 23, (1998) Lfd. Nr. 620, p. 166.
10. The Military Field Court, 73rd Nozybkov Infantry Division, based on a decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, USSR, dated April 19, 1943, sentenced these individuals to death by hanging: Vasilii Nikolaevich Zheldakov, Karp Anatol'evich Amel'chenko, Leonard Boleslavovich Gansvskii, Mikhail Nazarovich Lapunov, and Daniil Fomich Sukalin. Petr Abramovich Levin was sentenced to be shot. Sentenced to 10 years' loss of freedom in a corrective labor camp, confiscation of belongings, and disenfranchisement for 5 years were Elena Vasil'evna Zheldakova, Ivana Eliseevicha Tsubrikova, and Anufria Efimovicha Klimenkova. The sentence was final and not subject to appeal: AUKGBRBGO, file 14884, vol. 2, p. 683.
11. Data regarding the population of Gomel' oblast' on May 1, 1944, GAOOGO, 144-5-6, p. 218.
12. AUKGBRBGO, file 6936, p. 110.
13. Ibid., file 15884, vol. 1, p. 456.
14. According to Pamiat's' Dobrushskii raion, 1:347-350.

DRIBIN

Pre-1941: Dribin, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Drybin, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Dribin is situated 64 kilometers (40 miles) to the northeast of Mogilev. According to the 1939 census, there were 563 Jews living in Dribin, comprising 17.9 percent of the total population.

German armed forces occupied the town on July 14, 1941, about three and a half weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. In the interim period, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were drafted into the Red Army.

During the entire German occupation until October 1, 1943, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) exercised authority in the town. The Ortskommandantur set up a raion authority and a police force composed of local residents.

Shortly after the occupation began, the raion authority, on the orders of the Ortskommandantur, organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews ages 16 to 50 were also required to perform heavy physical labor.

On September 30, 1941, all the Jews of the town were settled into an open ghetto, which consisted of 11 houses. The ghetto in Dribin existed for only one week. On October 6, 1941, the Jews were assembled and instructed to wear their best clothes and bring their prized possessions. German forces of Einsatzkommando 8 then organized the destruction of the ghetto. Assisted by the local police, German forces escorted the Jews into a forest 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) south of the town, where they shot them all, around 400 in total. The Jews were also robbed of all their property by the perpetrators.¹

SOURCES The Dribin ghetto is mentioned in the following publications: Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 138; and Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), pp. 291, 298.

Relevant documentation can be found in GARF (7021-88-37); NARB (861-1-9, pp. 152–153); and USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8; and RG-53.002M, reel 7).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTE

1. GARF, 7021-88-37, pp. 2 reverse and 10; and NARB, 861-1-9, pp. 152–153.

DRISSA

Pre-1941: Drissa, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); 1962: renamed Verkhnedvinsk; post-1991: Verkhniadzvinsk (Drysa), raion center, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Drissa is situated about 60 kilometers (38 miles) northwest of Polotsk. In 1939, 825 Jews lived in the town, making up 30.1 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Drissa raion (without the town of Drissa) included 677 people, the bulk of whom lived in the villages of Volyntsy and Borkovichi, as well as in Borovka, the northern suburb of Drissa.

The 19th Panzer (Armored) Division of the LVII German Army Corps of Panzer Group 3 forced its crossing over the Zapadnaia Dvina River at Dzisna in the Drissa area on July 3, 1941; the town of Drissa was taken on the same day. The fighting at the Dzisna-Drissa bridgehead went on until July 6. On July 10, 1941, the German 14th Panzer Division of the newly formed 4th Panzer Army captured Volyntsy and Borkovichi. The rest of the Drissa raion was captured by the 19th Panzer Division (southern part) and by the XXII Army Corps of the 9th Army by July 13, 1941.

From August 1941 onward, Drissa was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. This area was the realm of the 403rd Security Division; Ortskommandantur 262 was based here. From January to March 1942, Drissa was under the authority of Feldkommandantur 749.

Drissa is situated close to a railway, and many Jews managed to leave the town before the Germans captured it. After the war, 12 or 13 Jewish families returned to Drissa; many others remained in the places to which they had been evacuated.¹

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), in February 1942 the Germans assembled 769 Jews from Drissa in a “special camp” (ghetto). Shortly afterwards, most probably on February 10, they shot them into a mass grave at the local Jewish cemetery in groups of 10 to 15 people. Infants were thrown into the ditch alive or shot in the air. Some people who were only wounded were also buried alive. The murder was perpetrated by a “punitive squad,” most probably a detachment of Einsatzkommando 9, supported by the men of the Ortskommandantur and local policemen (politsais). The victims were brought to the killing site in trucks, which were driven by local drivers.² Everything was done in full view of the local non-Jewish population. After the massacre, the perpetrators burned down the ghetto; thus, those who attempted to hide in the ghetto perished in the flames.

A group of young people succeeded in fleeing from Drissa before the ghetto was established; they crossed the front lines and survived. Some others tried to run away during the Aktion but were captured by the Nazis and killed.³

The estimate of the number of Jewish victims made by the ChGK—769 people—seems to be excessive, taking into account that there was a successful mobilization into the Red Army in Drissa and that some Jews succeeded in evacuating the town. On the other hand, many Jewish refugees from the western areas settled in the Osveia-Drissa area; most probably, the Germans resettled the Jews from Borovka into the ghetto in Drissa.

In Borkovichi, 30 kilometers (19 miles) southeast of Drissa along the Polotsk-Daugavpils railway, no less than 60 Jews were killed; 10 Jews were killed in the village of Iustianovo (7 kilometers [4.4 miles] south of Drissa); and 16 Jews were killed in the village of Ianino, 1 or 2 kilometers (0.6–1.2 miles) north of Drissa. (Information on the fate of the Jews of Volyntsy, also in the Drissa raion, can be found in the entry for that ghetto—see Volyntsy.)⁴

1668 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

SOURCES The documents of the ChGK for the Drissa raion can be found in GARF (7021-92-215) and NARB (861-1-13). Other relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-DH (e.g., ZM 635); BA-MA (RH 26-201/17); and YVA (O-3/5499).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. Testimony by Yona Gildin, YVA, O-3/5499.
2. GARF, 7021-92-215 (see also NARB, 861-1-13, p. 85). Christian Gerlach, referring to documents of the 201st Security Division, writes that “at least” 93 Jews were killed in Drissa; see Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde (Hamburg: HIS, 1999), p. 684.
3. YVA, O-3/5499.
4. GARF, 7021-92-215.

DUBROVNO

Pre-1941: Dubrovno, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Dubrowno, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Dubrouna, raen center, Vîtsebsk voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Dubrovno is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) south-southeast of Vitebsk. In 1939, 2,119 Jews lived in the town, making up 21.4 percent of the population. Another town in the raion with a considerable Jewish population was Liady (897 Jews, or 39.2 percent of the total population in 1939; see Liady). The rest of the Jewish population of the Dubrovno raion (without the town of Dubrovno) constituted 222 people, the bulk of whom lived in the small towns of Baevo and Rossasno (see Rossasno). After World War II, the town of Osintorf (18 kilometers [11 miles] north of Dubrovno) was switched from Orsha raion to Dubrovno raion. The number of Jews in Osintorf is not clear; most probably, they numbered between 10 and 30.

The “Dneprovskaia textile mill” was not evacuated by the authorities (Dubrovno lies rather far from the railway); only some sections of it were blown up. This means that there was no large-scale evacuation of the population from the town (in other towns such as Orsha or Vitebsk, the evacuation of industrial plants helped thousands of Jews to escape the Nazis).

Dubrovno was captured by the German forces (17th Panzer Division of the XLVII Army Corps of the 2nd Panzer Group) on July 16,¹ after which it was in the rear area of the 2nd Army (Infantry). From August 1941, Dubrovno was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. This area was the realm of the 286th Security Division; the Secret Field Police (GFP) Group 723, subordinated to this division, was quartered here. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report mentions an Ortskommandantur in Dubrovno under Kommandant Major Hänschin.

The Germans put together an indigenous local administration in Dubrovno and its Rayon, including a local police force. The mayor of Dubrovno was Skvarchevskii, the former Russians and Jews at forced labor building a bridge in Dubrovno, n.d.

USHMM WS # 81533, COURTESY OF NARA

head of a peat factory. The head of the indigenous police in the volost’ was Kulikovskii. The mayor of Osintorf was I. Trublin.

The town of Osintorf served as the base for forming one of the Russian “armies,” which was to fight on the German side to fulfill police functions: the Russian National People’s Army (Russkaia Natsional’naia Narodnaia Armiiia, RNNA). In 1941, under the aegis of the headquarters of Army Group Center, the “Trial Battalion Graukopf” was formed, mainly from Soviet prisoners of war (POWs). The members of the battalion wore Soviet uniforms and had Soviet weapons but carried German insignia. In the spring of 1942, the Battalion Graukopf was transformed into the RNNA. The local population called its servicemen narodniki.²

Information on the Holocaust in Dubrovno is scanty. A ghetto in Dubrovno was established in the fall of 1941. According to the ChGK, it was located in the area called “the camp ‘zhilkoop’” (which may be interpreted as an abbreviation of “dwelling cooperative”). Eyewitnesses, both those who gave testimonies to the ChGK and those from Gennadii Vinnitsa’s collection, mention physical abuse of the Jewish inmates. A non-Jewish witness says: “I went to the Kommandantur to receive an Ausweis (identity card) and saw politsais [men of the indigenous police] there, who put 10 Jews on the ground and beat them with sticks.”³ In December 1941, the inmates of the ghetto were shot by a German “punitive squad”; the local commandant was also present at the execution site. According to the ChGK, the execution site was an area beyond the Dneprovskaia textile mill, where a mass grave had been prepared beforehand; according to Vinnitsa, it was a sand quarry close to the Jewish cemetery. Witnesses attest that the Nazis employed sadistic methods of killing.

Both the ChGK and Vinnitsa indicate that the Nazis spared artisans and their families from this Aktion. The artisans and their families were killed in February 1942.

The ChGK estimates the number of Jews killed in December 1941 at 1,500 and the number killed in February 1942 at 300. In other individual and group shootings that took place in Dubrovno, the Nazis killed an additional 185 Jews. The total number of Jewish victims in Dubrovno was 1,985. At the same time, the list of victims compiled by the ChGK contains only 330 names of Jews.

The Jews of the town of Osintorf were killed in March 1942. The witnesses who were interrogated by the ChGK in 1945 estimate the number of those killed at 20. The witness Shmuglevskii, who, according to his words, “was under custody” together with these doomed Jews, said that among them there were seven women and five children under 16. The list of victims compiled by the ChGK refers to 10 Jews killed. Of them, the families Ginsburg and Simkin were killed in October 1941 in Osintorf, and the Khanins, in February 1942 in Dubrovno. It is not clear whether the witnesses of the ChGK included these 10 or only some of them (the Ginsburgs and Simkins) among those 20 people on whom they gave information.⁴

In the village of Barsuki, 11 kilometers (7 miles) east-southeast of Dubrovno, two Jewish women married to non-Jews were killed.

SOURCES In the book by historian Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech’ i bol’ (Orsha, 1998), pages 16 to 31 deal with the Holocaust in the Dubrovno raion.

The documents of the ChGK for the Dubrovno raion can be found in GARF (7021-84-6), as can those for Osintorf (7021-84-10).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. Heinz Guderian, Erinnerungen eines Soldaten (Heidelberg, 1951), pp. 154–157.

2. A.M. Litvin, “Antysavetskiia vaenna-palitseiskiia farmiravanni na terytoryi Belarusi w hady Vyalikai Aichyinaï vainy 1941–1944hh.” (Ph.D. diss., Minsk, 2000), pp. 69–70.

3. Vinnitsa, Gorech’ i bol’, p. 18.

4. GARF, 7021-84-6 and 7021-84-10.

ELIZOVO (YELIZOVO)

Pre-1941: Elizovo, town, Osipovichy raion, Mogilev oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Elisowo, Rear Area, Army Group

Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Elizava, Asipovichy raen, Mahiliov voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Elizovo is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) to the northwest of Bobruisk. According to the 1939 census, there were 303 Jews living in Elizovo, accounting for 6.7 percent of the total population. Following the occupation of Poland in September 1939 by German and Soviet forces, a number of Jewish refugees settled in Elizovo, bringing with them information about the Nazi persecution of the Jews.

German armed forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on July 1, 1941, just over a week after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this intervening period, the Germans bombed the town, and a few Jews managed to flee eastward or were conscripted into the Red Army. Probably about two thirds of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Elizovo at the start of the German occupation.

On the first day of the occupation, the Germans collected about 100 people, Jews and non-Jews, and murdered them in an Aktion in reprisal for the killing of a German soldier in the vicinity.¹ Throughout the occupation period (from July 1941 to February 1944), a German military commandant’s office was in charge of Elizovo. The German military administration established a town council and a local police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local residents.

The German authorities soon introduced a series of anti-Jewish measures. For example, Jews were forced to wear yellow circular patches on the back and front of their clothes; they were forbidden to have contact with non-Jews; they were forbidden to keep pets; and young Jewish men and women were taken for forced labor, building a road between Elizovo and Svisloch.²

A few weeks into the occupation, probably in August 1941, the remaining Jews in the town were herded into a ghetto, for which a few buildings were allocated. According to Jewish survivors, the ghetto was not fenced in.³ Some Jews gave their property to non-Jews for safekeeping, but in one instance the peasant Kabanov subsequently handed the items to the German authorities, who demanded the surrender of all Jewish property.

On October 8, 1941, the Germans conducted a second Aktion in Elizovo, in which a dozen or so Jews who had been sent to work on the road were taken to the forest and murdered. On October 14, the Germans conducted a brutal Aktion in the nearby village of Svisloch’, in which a number of Jews were killed. Then in the winter of 1941–1942, probably in early November 1941, the Germans rounded up the Jews of Elizovo, humiliated them by making them sing, and forced them to surrender their warm clothing for the German armed forces before releasing them again.⁴

On January 21 or 22, 1942, Soviet partisans attacked the glass factory building in the town and set it on fire. Then the next day an SS squad arrived and conducted a reprisal Aktion in which they shot most of the remaining Jewish men, about 28 people. Before burying the bodies in two large graves, the Germans removed any gold teeth from the corpses' mouths.⁵

1670 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

The Germans liquidated the ghetto on April 5, 1942, shooting all the remaining Jews. A few Jews managed to evade the roundup and hide in the surrounding countryside or make their way to join the Soviet partisans. In total, at least 100 Jews were murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators in and around Elizovo in 1941–1942.

SOURCES Information on Elizova can be found in Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), pp. 304, 312.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Elizovo can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-82-5); NARB; VHF (# 38244 and 38470); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Sonia Isard
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. VHF, # 38244, testimony of Bella Aronova (born 1924); and # 38470, testimony of Mikhail Barshai.
2. Ibid.
3. Ibid.
4. Ibid., # 38470, testimony of Mikhail Barshai, dates this event on November 3, 1941; # 38244, testimony of Bella Aronova, however, describes a similar incident but dates it in early January 1942.
5. Ibid., # 38470, testimony of Mikhail Barshai, dates the partisan attack on January 21, 1942; # 38244, testimony of Bella Aronova, dates it on January 22, 1942.

EZERISHCHE (YEZERISHCHE)

Pre-1941: Ezerishche, town and center, Mekhovoe raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Jeseritsche, Rayon Mechowoje, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Eziaryshcha, Haradok raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Ezerishche is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) north of Gorodok. The Mekhovoe raion had 235 Jews in 1939, most of whom lived in Ezerishche (estimates range from 60 to 175). The next-largest contingent lived in Mezha (perhaps as many as 86 people). German armed forces of the XXIII Corps of the 9th Army captured Ezerishche on July 17, 1941.

Sometime in October 1941, the Jews were resettled into the building of a former inn: a long, one-story building near the railway station. The building was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded. According to other witnesses, the “ghetto” included two buildings, one wooden, the second made of bricks, and was not surrounded by barbed wire.¹ The discrepancy in the witness accounts may be ascribed to the deterioration of the Ezerishche Jews' situation in the late fall of 1941 and the winter of 1941–1942.

In February 1942 (or perhaps in early December 1941),² all the Jews were escorted from the “ghetto” across the railway to a marsh to the northwest of the village and were shot there near pits that had been dug previously. The shooting was carried out one family at a time; before the killing, the victims were ordered to undress. The killing was somewhat haphazard, and many victims, merely wounded, were buried alive.

The number of Jews killed in Ezerishche is unknown. One of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) records gives an estimate of 200 victims, which is probably an exaggeration; other ChGK records and witnesses state that 150 or 175 were killed; some local witnesses reported 60 dead, which seems to be too low an estimate. According to all the witnesses, a number of professionals (such as pediatrician Frida Bentsman, two other physicians, two pharmacists, and the school principal Khait) were all killed on that day.

Elsewhere in the Mekhovoe raion, a number of Jews, possibly as many as 86,³ were killed in Mezha (36 kilometers [22 miles] northeast of Gorodok) in February 1942; in Bychikha (about halfway between Gorodok and Ezerishche, along the railway), no fewer than 6 Jews were killed near the railway station; there were also other places in the area where Jews were killed.

SOURCES Information can be found in Gennadii Vinnitsa's Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), p. 32.

Documentation on the Ezerishche ghetto can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-84-9); and YVA (O-3/4608).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol', p. 32.
2. GARF, 7021-84-9, ChGK report, dates the massacre as February 1942. Vinnitsa, Gorechi' i bol', also gives this date. However, the ChGK report, undated, deposited at the archive of the Gorodok Museum of Local History (Gorodokskii Kraevedcheskii Muzei), indicates early December 1941, as do the witnesses interviewed in 1985 (YVA, O-3/4608).
3. Eighty-six “peaceful citizens” were shot by the Germans in Mezha during the occupation, according to the estimate of the ChGK. The main shooting took place in February 1942; it is unclear whether all the 86 people counted by the ChGK were killed on that day or whether some of them (who therefore may not have been Jewish) were killed later. See GARF, 7021-84-9, pp. 2–4.

GLUSK

Pre-1941: Glusk, town and raion center, Poles'e oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Gluska, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Hlusk, raen center, Mahilou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Glusk is located 46 kilometers (29 miles) southwest of Bobruisk. In 1939, 1,935 Jews lived in Glusk (37.8 percent of the total population).

According to the testimony of Yankel Gurevich, at the beginning of the German invasion many citizens of Glusk were distraught and did not know what to do.¹ Grigory Brum stated that no one in Glusk knew how long the war would last, but most assumed that if they waited, the war would soon end. It was widely believed that even if Glusk were to be occupied, the Jews would be left unscathed. The majority of Jews in Glusk were unable to evacuate because of the rapid German advance. German forces entered the city on June 27–28, 1941.²

Although during the course of the first month no anti-Jewish Aktions took place, the situation changed quickly. The Germans organized a police force from local citizens, under the command of Makarov. Jews were ordered to wear a yellow six-pointed star on the front and back of their clothing. Some form of ghetto was established (probably an open ghetto), but most Jews continued to live in their own houses, which were also marked with a Star of David. Survivor testimony uses the term “ghetto” explicitly, but it remains unclear if the ghetto area was enclosed by a fence or if it was guarded.³ Jews were forbidden to leave the settlement without permission or trade with non-Jews. They were ordered to report to a labor camp daily, from which they were sent to perform various tasks. At night they were released. The Jews were used for the most arduous forced labor: repairing roads, digging ditches, and clearing forests. Galina Gelfer, who was only 14 at the time, recalls digging the ground, sweeping the streets, cleaning, and washing for the Germans.⁴ Some of those sent to work each day did not return. Those who could not work or walk in the column fast enough were shot. According to Michael Epstein (Epshtein) the policemen insulted and tortured the Jews with more glee than the Germans. According to the account of Juli Aizenshtadt, on November 29–30, 1941, the Nazis put on a show in Glusk. They collected the spectators at the nursery school and forced them to watch as the Jews were made to carry horse manure in their hats. The Nazis laughed and whipped them. They ordered the hairdresser Maizus to climb a large pear tree and jump down: he broke several bones. Avremul Mashnitser was placed backwards on a horse; then they whipped the horse, which galloped off. Avremul, grabbing for the horse’s tail, hit his head against the sharp corner of a roof, fell off, and died. The Nazis laughed. One of them held a goat and stroked it, as if to demonstrate to everyone present that the animal was better than the Jews.

Many predicted the upcoming extermination. In the ghetto, people heard about the extermination of the Jews in Bobruisk and other places. On the morning of December 2, 1941, the Jews were ordered to gather in the square in front of the commandant’s building and to bring their valuables, linen, and a little food. Then the policemen began searching the Jewish houses. People shouted and ran into the streets while the policemen chased after them, caught up with those who fell behind, beat them, and forced them into the square. A small group of Jews hid in the garage of the military commissariat in Glusk, but they were found.

According to Galina Gelfer, who hid in the attic of an empty store overlooking the assembled Jews, the women and children were loaded into three big black trucks, possibly gas vans, and apparently were killed by gassing before their bodies were thrown into the pits at Myslotino Hill, 1 or 2 kilometers (0.6 or 1.2 miles) from Glusk. As the vans were relatively small, a number of trips were necessary. The Germans, with dogs, and local policemen escorted the remaining Jews to the same pits on foot.⁵ These Jews were then shot at Myslotino Hill. Between 1941 and 1943, this place was often used to murder not only Jews but also those who were deemed to be “suspect” in Glusk and in the Glusk raion. In addition, Jews were also shot and buried at the western outpost near the furniture factory and at the Jewish cemetery. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated that the total number of “peaceful citizens” murdered in Glusk was about 3,000;⁶ this figure probably includes more than 1,000 Jewish victims.

Close to 100 Jews escaped owing to special circumstances: expert craftsmen received permission from the Nazis and were allowed to live in their own houses, outside the ghetto area; some left the night before the extermination because they were forewarned by their neighbors; others did not report to the square in front of the commandant’s building on December 2, 1941, but hid and thereby escaped the German trap; and finally, a few wounded Jews even emerged from the pit into which they had been shot.

At the beginning of December 1941, one of the Jewish groups that had escaped from Glusk assembled in the forest and, with the help of local peasants, traveled to the village of Rudobelka, where they hoped to join the partisans. When they arrived, they realized that there were no partisans, but they were also pleasantly surprised to find that there were no Germans either and that the local peasants were willing to share their food with them. In the spring of 1942, more than 20 Jews from Glusk (the Brum family [Chema, Hannah, Girsh, and Tzilia], the brothers Isaac and Boruch Graizel, Michael Epshtein, Alter Epshtein, and others) met in the village of Slavkovichi. There, from local inhabitants and the Soviet soldiers stranded behind German lines in the Glusk raion, the partisan force “Budennyi” was created under the command of Red Army Captain Boris Tzikunkova.

In total, the force consisted of 184 partisans, including more than 20 Jews. Alter Epshtein fled the “ghetto” along with his wife and his 8-year-old son; two of his daughters had been killed during the massacre of the Jews of Glusk. Alter was a tailor for the partisans, while his wife baked bread for them. Several of the Jewish women acted as nurses. Before the war, Markman worked as an arms specialist in the military town of Urech’e, near Starye Dorogi. He repaired the old weapons and created automatic rifles. In April 1944, during the German blockade of the partisan zone, many Jews were killed. Alter, to avoid being captured by the Germans, blew himself up with a grenade.

Another group of Jews from Glusk (Juli and Naum Aizenshtadt; Kasriel, Abraham, Ida, Yankel, and Rachel Gurevich; and others) became partisans in the “Red October” detachment, which combined with the brigade named after “Shchors” under the command of Fyodor Pavlosky (the first Belorussian partisan to be honored with the title “Hero of the Soviet Union”).⁷ Yankel Gurevich became the commander of their Uritskiy machine-gun platoon (under the command of Chavkin). After Belorussia was liberated in July 1944, the Jewish partisans from Glusk were called up to the Soviet army and fought until the end of the war.

1672 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

Glusk was liberated on June 27, 1944.

SOURCES Information about the fate of the Jews of Glusk can be found in David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005).

Documents on the murder of the Jewish population of Glusk can be found in the following archives: GAMO; GARF; NARB (845-1-60); USHMM (RG-22.002M and Acc.1995.A.537); and YVA. The author also has in his personal archive (PALS) letters written after the war by former inhabitants of Glusk.

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Ilya Bourman

NOTES

1. PALS, letter from Yankel Gurevich in Tel Aviv, July 10, 1994. This letter has been published in Leonid Smilovitskii, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii 1941–1944gg. (Tel Aviv: Biblioteka Matveia Chernogo, 2000), pp. 198–199.

2. PALS, letter from Grigory Brum in Ahdod, September 22, 1997.

3. See Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, p. 332; see also the testimony of Olga Shulman in Semen Zolotarev, Liudi i sud'by: Veteranam Vtoroi mirovoi voyny, truzbenikam tyła, uznikam fashistskikh kontslagerei i getto, zhiwym i pavshim povsiashchaetsia (Baltimore, MD: Vestnik Information Agency, 1997), pp. 296–300.

4. USHMM, Acc.1995.A.537, handwritten memoir of Galina Gelfer.

5. Ibid.

6. NARB, 845-1-60, p. 25; GAMO, 2952-2-139, p. 8; GARF, 7021-82-6, p. 21 (USHMM, RG-22.002M).

7. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, p. 333.

GOMEL' (GOMEL' OBLAST')

Pre-1941: Gomel', city, raion and oblast' center, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Gomel, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Homel', raen and voblasts' center, Republic of Belarus

Gomel' is located 300 kilometers (186 miles) southeast of Minsk. In 1939, Jews numbered 40,880 (27.3 percent of the city's total population).

In the first weeks of the war, the population of Gomel' benefited from the fact that German forces only occupied the city about two months after the start of the invasion, and many people managed to evacuate in the interim. By the time the Germans took the city on August 21, 1941, about 80,000 inhabitants had fled, but some 4,000 Jews remained (about 9 percent of the pre-war total).

After occupying Gomel', the Germans set up a temporary military administration. During August and September 1941, they established branches of the Security Police in Gomel' and other towns of the region. During the occupation, security forces in the city included units of the Secret Field Police (Geheime Feldpolizei, or GFP), the Field Gendarmerie (Feldgendarmerie), the Order Police (Schutzpolizei), a local police force, and a guard company subordinated to the military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur).¹

Group portrait of 11 boys and girls from the Stalin School in Gomel', 1941. Among those pictured is Sonya Lishansky, seated second from right in the first row, the only Jewish child in this photograph known to have survived the Holocaust in Gomel'.

USHMM WS #58242, COURTESY OF SONYA LISHANSKY

Local policemen, villagers, and city residents captured, handed over to the Germans, and often themselves killed Jewish soldiers in the Red Army who had avoided encirclement by the enemy or escaped from prisoner-of-war (POW) camps. In July 1941, David Komisarenko fled the POW camp in the Gomel' area. He was subsequently detained by two policemen who identified him as a Jew. Some of the captured Jewish servicemen tried to hide their ethnicity. When they were identified as Jews, they died terrible deaths. In the winter of 1942–1943, the Germans discovered Jews among the POWs in Durchgangslager (Dulag) 121 in Gomel'. The policemen stripped them in the severe cold and poured water on them so that they would freeze to death.

After the German occupation of Gomel', Jews were soon identified with the help of the local population and required to wear special yellow marks on their chests and backs. In September or October 1941, four separate ghettos were created in Gomel'. The resettlement of the Jews lasted about a week. On only half an hour's notice, they were escorted away, carrying with them nothing but bed linen. Later, local policemen and Germans returned to Jewish houses and took everything of value; what remained was put in a warehouse.²

The main ghetto in Gomel' was in the Monastyrsk district. It housed some 800 Jews from the center of the city. The second ghetto was on Novo-Lubenskaia Street. It held about 500 people, including 97 Jews who were brought to Gomel' from Loiev. The third ghetto was on Bikhovskaia Street. The Jews who lived in Novo-Belitsa, on the left bank of the Sozh River, were put into a separate ghetto. In September 1941, 200 ghetto inmates were moved from Novo-Belitsa to Monastyrek. They were tortured, and the beards of the religious Jews were cut off.³

Very cramped quarters, unsanitary conditions, no medical care, and a lack of rudimentary conveniences were typical of all four ghettos. A single room of 20 square meters (215 square feet) was usually shared by seven people or more. They had almost no belongings, making housing them easier. The number of ghetto inmates rapidly declined due to disease, transfers, and killings.

Before the war, the Monastyrek district of Gomel' was populated by workers. It consisted mainly of one-room houses, with several families living in each. When the district became a ghetto, to accommodate more people, all the inner partitions in the houses were demolished, and three-tiered bunks were installed. All the inmates of the ghetto, including infants, were registered, and a list was compiled of specialists and intellectuals. The German authorities promised good jobs and meals, but in return the Jews were required to hand over all their money, furs, and gold and silver articles. After this initial demand was met, the Germans soon came back asking for more.

This procedure took place in all of Gomel's ghettos. Threatening to shoot hostages, the Germans collected wedding rings, gold and silver articles, coins, laundry and toilet soap, bedding, linen, clothing, and other items. German soldiers in groups and individually would go on "excursions" to Jewish houses, where they took all they wanted. Belorussian policemen followed suit.

The food was bad. Ghetto inmates, as well as POWs, were given a gruel made of buckwheat skins, barley bran, or frozen potatoes mixed with water. Later the inmates were given 150 to 200 grams (5.3 to 7 ounces) daily of "ersatz bread" made of acorns—and not even that every day. Not everyone received the gruel because they did not have their own dishes. Sometimes the food was just dumped into hats or cupped hands.

A significant number of Jews in the ghetto had large families or were aged or sick. Most of the inmates were women and children. There were almost no adult men or youths of draft age. Few of the elderly retained their illusions of the Germans as "a cultured nation" that had left the Jews alone in 1918 and even protected them from Russian "pogromists."

The ghettos were guarded vigilantly, and under threat of severe punishment, it was forbidden to leave them without special permission. Schwech, the military commandant of Gomel', issued an order that "all contact with Jews, such as greetings, handshakes, or conversation, must be avoided." It was prohibited to exchange goods and food, to communicate, or to pass on information. Those who violated the rules were beaten, deprived of food, and sent to penal jobs. Often such punishment was carried out in public as a lesson to others. Jews could be killed with impunity for any misdemeanor. Leaving the ghetto was allowed for only two reasons: going to work or transporting the dead to the cemetery. All inhabitants of the ghetto, including family members, were punished and could even be shot for leaving the ghetto without permission.⁴

Ghettos served as places where Jews were assembled and isolated for rapid extermination. Thus there were no long-term programs, health services, or sanitation measures. The inmates had to fend for themselves. Like the ghettos of the entire region, the ghettos in Gomel' resembled concentration camps. Jews were seldom sent to do work vitally needed for the city, the region, or the Wehrmacht. More often they were assigned to odd jobs—cutting firewood, rooting out stumps, sweeping and cleaning streets, emptying garbage pits, burying corpses, and removing unexploded mines, shells, and bombs. At railroad stations, Jews cleaned and washed carriages, loaded and unloaded them, moved sleeping cars, and cleaned spur tracks, roads, and the aerodrome.⁵ At work, they were beaten with canes and whips, and the weak and the sick were shot. Refusal to go to work could end tragically. In Gomel', in September 1941, it was decreed that every fifth inmate would be shot if someone did not report for labor.⁶

Jews were deliberately not assigned professional jobs. Instead, intellectuals, doctors, teachers, engineers, and other professionals were given hard manual labor. Often they were forced to perform deliberately senseless and humiliating tasks—to drag big carts with tubs of water; to carry bricks, firewood, and garbage from one place to another; to dig pits and then fill them up again. Only in dire need did the Germans fall back on the expertise of Jewish "specialists," for whom temporary exceptions were made. An order of September 28, 1941, issued to the SS-Cavalry Brigade, which was operating in the region, read: "It is understood that craftsmen may be spared."⁷

From August through December 1941, the German occupiers systematically carried out the extermination of the Jews in Gomel'. They killed the first group of 10 people on the pretext that they had participated in sabotage shortly after the Germans entered the city. In October 1941, 52 Jews "who had posed as Russians" were executed. On the orders of Kommandant Preis-Müller, Sonderführer Hartman and Kracht murdered more Jews in the woods near Davidovka village on October 7 and 22.⁸ Besides units of Einsatzgruppe B, SS units subordinated to the Reichsführer-SS headquarters staff, units of the Order Police, the Secret Field Police, the Gendarmerie, and other locally based units took part in the execution of Jews.⁹

Some of the Gomel' Jews died in prison and labor camps in the city itself and elsewhere in the Gomel' region. Hundreds of Jews died at the peat extraction site in Kabanovka and at other labor camps to which they had been moved from detention centers and ghettos. Executions were carried out in the prison yard, on the Gomel'-Chernigov highway, and at the third-, sixth-, and ninth-kilometer markers on the Rechitsa highway, among other sites. Most of those killed were shot at kilometer 3 (mile 1.9) of the Rechitsa highway, near the grounds of the machine-tractor repair shop and in the Leshchinets Forest area not far from Davidovka village.¹⁰

Burial of the dead was conducted with mockery. Excrement was dumped into the ditch with the bodies. Beginning in November 1941, crowds of German soldiers and officers would gather at the ditch with the bodies of those shot, laughing merrily and taking photographs. These activities took place almost daily as new German units arrived in the city.¹¹

Early in November 1941, a notice in big letters appeared on the wall of the timber mill. It said that on the following day, under pain of death, no inhabitants were allowed to leave home before 9:00 A.M. By 6:00 A.M. the next morning, all the policemen of the third police district in Gomel' arrived at Monastyrek. Soon, about 100 men under the command of the Security Police showed up as well. Some of the policemen encircled the area of the ghetto. The others, together with the Germans, began driving Jews out of their homes by force. Inhabitants were not allowed to take anything with them. Several members of the eviction party put a bucket on the head of an old man and made him dance while they pounded on the bucket with sticks and laughed. Two mentally retarded youths were shot on the spot in their own house.¹²

By 10:00 A.M. the roundup was over. Six trucks were provided for those who could not walk on their own in the ragged column of those on foot. Children were tossed into the trucks "like heads of cabbage." The column was halted near the machine-tractor repair shop, where there was an antitank ditch. The Jews were forced to lie down in the ditch and then were shot with submachine guns. Many of them were buried alive. Eyewitnesses recounted that "the earth was breathing and steaming."¹³ According to a report of Einsatzgruppe B, 2,365 Jews were "executed" in Gomel' in a special Aktion, which probably took place in November 1941.¹⁴

While Jews were being driven from the Monastyrek ghetto to the site of their execution, Vera Kozlova helped save Lazar Mill, from Gomel', and his friend David, who was from Novo-Belitsa. The young woman hid the pair in the attic of her house and later provided them with women's clothes that they used to escape safely from Gomel' to Novo-Belitsa over the Sozh River bridge. Lazar and David managed to find local partisans and joined their unit.¹⁵

Khana Khoroshina had ended up in the ghetto with her parents and younger brother. In November 1941, she fooled the guards and found shelter with the family of her school friend Ania Dereviashkin. The Dereviashkins hid her in the daytime and at night took her to another friend, Lida Mikhalkina, who at dawn escorted her back to the Dereviashkins. This procedure continued until May 1942, when Khana got the chance to become a guide for a blind woman who was going to the Krasnogorsk raion in Briansk oblast' of the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic (RSFSR). Khana stayed there in a village until the Soviet army arrived.

In March 1942, a number of Jews were captured by the Gendarmerie in the countryside around Gomel' and were taken to the Gomel' prison, where they were subsequently shot by men of the Security Police.¹⁶

During 1942, Heinrich Himmler created special units known as Sonderkommando 1005, led by SS-Standartenführer Paul Blobel. Their task was to reopen graves, exhume and burn the corpses, and take other steps to conceal mass burial sites.¹⁷ A detachment of Sonderkommando 1005 was active in Gomel'. Jews, POWs, and local inhabitants removed bodies from the pits and burned them in piles. Then tractors plowed up the ground, and it was sown with grass. The Red Army drove German forces out of Gomel' on November 26, 1943, in the Gomel'-Rechitsa offensive. During the years of occupation, the population of Gomel' had decreased from 145,217 in 1941 to 47,163 in May 1944, 32.5 percent of the pre-war level.¹⁸

When the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) arrived in Gomel', it determined that during the occupation the Germans and their accomplices had exterminated tens of thousands of people in prisons, four ghettos, and five POW camps.¹⁹ Mass graves were discovered in the following locations: an antitank ditch on the grounds of Brilevsky Garden (2,500 victims); 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) from Gomel' in the woods between the villages of Davidovka and Leshchinets (12,000 victims); in the woods at the 7 kilometer (4.4 mile) marker on the Rechitsa highway beyond Davidovka (1,080 victims); 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) from Gomel' on the other side of Davidovka (5,000 victims); on the grounds of the city jail (126 victims); and on Plekhanov Street (160 victims). Many Jews were among those shot in the antitank ditch on the grounds of the machine-tractor repair shop (6,000 people).²⁰

SOURCES The following publications provide information on the ghettos in Gomel' and the extermination of the city's Jewish population: Gomel' Oblast' (Gomel', 1988); Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Spravochnik o mestakh prinuditel'nogo soderzhanii grazhdanskogo naseleniia na okkupirovannoi territorii BSSR 1941–1944 gg. (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), pp. 28–29; Daniel Romanovsky, "Skol'ko evreev pogiblo v promyshlennykh raionakh Vostochnoi Belorussii v nachale nemetskoï okkupatsii (iul'-dekabr' 1941g.):" Vestnik evreiskogo universiteta 22 (2000); Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaiia Navuka, 2000), pp. 213–214; "Kak eto bylo. Poslednie dni Gomel'skogo getto," Edinstvo (Gomel'), nos. 5–6 (1991); Aron Shneer, Plen, 2 vols. (Jerusalem, 2003); Leonid Smilovitsky, "Ghettos in the Gomel Region: Commonalities and Unique Features, 1941–42," available at www.jewishgen.org/Belarus/newsletter/GomelGhettos.htm. The book Pravedniki narodov mira Belarusi (Minsk, 2004), p. 58, contains information on people from Gomel' honored as Righteous Among the Nations.

Documents regarding the fate of the Jewish population of Gomel' can be found in the following archives: AUKG-BRBGO (file 234, vol. 6); GAGOMO (1345-1-9 and 15); GAOOGO; GARF (7021-85-217, 7021-85-413, 7021-85-415); NARA (N-Doc. NO-5520); NARB (4-33a-65, 861-1-12); RGASPI (69-1-818); USHMM; and YVA.

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Igor Puchkov

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-85-217, p. 14.
2. NARB, 861-1-6, p. 4.
3. GARF, 7021-85-413, p. 15; 7021-85-415, p. 40.
4. GAGOMO, 1345-1-9, pp. 4, 181–203, 226–227.

5. Ibid., 1345-1-15, pp. 3-6.
6. NARB, 861-1-12, p. 25.
7. RGASPI, 69-1-818, p. 142.
8. From information addressed to P.K. Ponomarenko, secretary of the Central Committee, Communist Party (Bolshevik), Belorussian Republic, GAOOGO, 144-5-1, p. 5.
9. YVA, O-53/3.
10. AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 6, p. 105.
11. YVA, M-33/479, p. 12; M-33/480, p. 42.
12. AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 6, testimony of Tamara Kirick (born 1926).
13. Ibid., testimony of Adelia Bel'skaia (born 1904).
14. Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht, no. 8 (December 1-31, 1941), in Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion, 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 268.
15. AUKGBRBGO, file 234, vol. 6, testimony of Vera Kozlova (born 1919).
16. NARA, N-Doc. NO-5520, statement of Wilhelm Förster.
17. Yitzhak Arad, ed., Unichtozhenie evreev SSSR v gody nemetskoj okkupatsii, 1941-1944: Sbornik dokumentov i materialov (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 1991), p. 29.
18. GAOOGO, 144-5-6, pp. 167-168, 218.
19. GAGOMO, 1345-1-12, p. 34.
20. From a report addressed to P.K. Ponomarenko, secretary of the Central Committee, Communist Party (Bolshevik), Belorussian Republic, GAOOGO, 144-5-6, p. 11.

GOMEL' (VITEBSK OBLAST')

Pre-1941: Gomel', village, Vetrino raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Gomel, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Homel', Polatsk raen, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

In the village of Gomel', located 21 kilometers (13 miles) south of Polotsk, the Jewish population in 1920 was 129 (out of a total population of 140).

The area was occupied by the German army in July 1941 and came under the administration of Rear Area, Army Group Center. In October 1941, 18 Jews, most or all of them men, were killed near the village of Sviatitsa, 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) south of Gomel', by a German squad that had arrived from Vetrino. The victims were forced to dig their own grave. Zalman Kurman was forced to bury those killed, after which he was also killed. The rest of the Gomel' Jews, 80 people, were assembled in three houses; they were killed in January 1942, most probably by the same unit that perpetrated the murder of the Jews in Voronichi, close to the nearby village Dvor-Gomel' (1 kilometer [0.6 mile] north of Gomel'). The list of victims of the German occupiers in Gomel' compiled by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) in 1945 contains the names of 93 Jews. One Jewish woman married to a non-Jew survived both massacres.

SOURCES The documents of the ChGK for the Vetrino raion can be found in GARF (7021-92-210).

Daniel Romanovsky

GORKI

Pre-1941: Gorki, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Horki, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Gorki is located 60 kilometers (38 miles) northeast of Mogilev. In 1926, there were 2,343 Jews in Gorki, or 27.8 percent of the total population; in Gory, 14 kilometers (8.7 miles) east of Gorki, there were 355 Jews. In 1939, 2,031 Jews lived in the town, making up 16.3 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Gorki raion (without the town of Gorki) numbered 510 people, the largest number of whom lived in the small town of Gory and the village of Lenino (12 kilometers [7.5 miles] northeast of Gorki).

Gorki is the site of the Belorussian Agricultural Academy. Thus the authorities were most interested in evacuating the academy's equipment, students, and workers, including many Jews among the latter, who were evacuated in advance and in an organized manner. On June 27, Gorki underwent the first air raid, suffering heavy bombing. The authorities called on the population not to panic, which was interpreted as a prohibition on leaving the town without permission, but at the same time they started to organize the evacuation of state property and officials. On July 3 and 6, 1941, respectively, two evacuation trains left the local railway station, taking mainly students and workers from the academy. Then the raion party committee left Gorki. Some of the local Jews who did not work or study at the academy tried to evacuate on their own, mainly on foot.

Although many Jews left the town after July 6, the main flight from Gorki, according to eyewitness accounts, took place on July 12, hours before the town's capture by the Germans. Hundreds of people, both Jews and non-Jews, tried to leave; some of them perished during an aerial bombardment that day, many were intercepted by advancing German forces, and others succeeded in fleeing the town.

The German forces (XLVI Army Corps of the 4th Panzer Army, formerly 2nd Panzer Group) entered Gorki from the south on July 12, 1941. They were followed by units of the IX Army Corps, belonging to the 2nd Army. From August 1941, Gorki was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. This area was the realm of the 286th Security Division; Gorki was under the control of Feldkommandantur 199.

When the Germans were entering Gorki, two young Komsomol members, "carrying out Stalin's order" (regarding scorched-earth tactics), set fire to the town, and part of Gorki burned. One of the arsonists, Faikin, was Jewish. According to a survivor's account, he managed to hide in the countryside but in 1942 was found by the Germans, most probably after some locals denounced him. One witness says that in 1942 she saw Faikin hanging on the gallows, with a board on his chest bearing the inscription: "I am a yid. When the Germans were coming, I carried out Stalin's order to burn down the town."¹

During the first days, the occupiers assembled the Jews on the square in front of the academy, formed them into a line, and announced their new regulations concerning the Jews. At this time, they imposed the wearing of “Jewish Stars” on clothing and established a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Gorki.²

Despite the fact that some witnesses mention a ghetto in Gorki, most probably there was no formal ghetto in the town. However, since much of the town had burned, the Jews were collected together in the area of town known as Mstislavskaiia Hill, or Mstislavka, on Mstislavskaiia and Internatsionalnaia Streets. The Jewish residential area in Mstislavka was not fenced in,³ but Jews were not permitted, or feared, to leave the area. Survivor accounts reflect a degree of fear towards the locals felt by the Jews.

Einsatzkommando 8 organized the mass murder of the Jews in Gorki on October 7, 1941.⁴ In the morning, the Germans and Belorussian police assembled all the Jews at the Mstislavka area and escorted them to the Belyi Ruchei Forest, where they shot them all. Einsatzgruppe B reported that 2,200 Jews had been “liquidated in eight localities” in the Gorki area. It is unclear how many of these Jews were from Gorki. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated the number of Jewish victims in the town at 300 people.⁵

Elsewhere in the raion, no fewer than 34 Jews were killed in Gory, and at least 19 Jews were killed in the suburban kolhoz “3-ia Piatiletka” on the outskirts at Sloboda, most probably in August or September 1941. After an initial killing Aktion, a small ghetto composed of only two houses was established in Lenino for the few surviving Jews and those from nearby villages; they were killed later, in Gorki.⁶ No fewer than 20 Jews were killed in the village of Rudkovshchina, 22 kilometers (14 miles) northwest of Gorki along the P-15 road. Two Jews were killed in nearby Vereshchaki. One Jew was killed in the Sharipy sel’sovet (12 to 13 kilometers [about 8 miles] northwest of Gorki). In the village of Naprasnovka, Maslaki sel’sovet (25 kilometers [15.5 miles] west-northwest of Gorki), according to the interrogations made by the ChGK, on March 22, 1942, German forces killed 250 Jews; before the massacre, they imposed a “contribution” in gold and valuables on the Jews and beat them severely. The victims were buried in eight pits, 200 meters (219 yards) west of Naprasnovka.⁷

SOURCES The book by W.M. Livshyts, Ishlo w byassmertsia Horatskae beta (Orsha, 1995), contains a short description of the Holocaust in Gorki and a list of the victims.

The documents of the ChGK for the Gorki raion can be found in GARF (7021-88-36). Relevant German documentation is located in BA-BL and BA-MA (RH 26-286/6). Witness statements can be found in YVA (O-3/4657-67) and VHF (# 42387).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. YVA, O-3/4660.
2. Ibid., O-3/4659.
3. VHF, # 42387, mentions a “Jewish street” but notes that it was not enclosed by barbed wire.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

4. BA-BL, R 58/219, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 133.
5. GARF, 7021-88-36.
6. Stefan Yevmenenko, YVA O-3/4666. See also Lenino.
7. GARF, 7021-88-36, pp. 9–10. See also Naprasnovka.

GORODETS

Pre-1941: Gorodets, village, Rogachev raion, Gomel’ oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Gorodez, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Haradzets, Rahachou raen, Homel’ voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Gorodets is located about 85 kilometers (53 miles) north-northwest of Gomel’. In 1926, the Jewish population of Gorodets was 607, comprising 69 percent of the total.

German forces occupied the village on July 9, 1941. Many Jews managed to flee east into the Soviet interior. According to the Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust, in September 1941, the Jews in Gorodets, composed of 200 local Jews and 400 refugees from Bobruisk and other settlements, were concentrated within a large building where they were confined for a month under conditions of overcrowding, starvation, and abuse. In October the Jews were brought to the Brogtsev camp, and then on November 6, most of them were executed nearby. Those that escaped this Aktion were murdered in February 1942.

One Soviet source also indicates that the German occupying authorities established a ghetto in Gorodets in September 1941, which existed for about one month before it was liquidated in October.¹

SOURCES Publications mentioning the fate of the Jews of Gorodets during the Holocaust include the following: Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 445; and Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 108; and Leonid Smilovitsky, “Ghettos in the Gomel Region: Commonalities and Unique Features, 1941–42,” available at www.jewishgen.org/Belarus/newsletter/GomelGhettos.htm.

Documentation relating to the ghetto in Gorodets can be found in the following archive: GAGOMO (1345-1-15).

Martin Dean

NOTE

1. GAGOMO, 1345-1-15, p. 55.

GORODOK

Pre-1941: Gorodok, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Haradok, raen center, Vitebsk voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Gorodok is located 38 kilometers (24 miles) north-northwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, 1,584 Jews lived in the town, making up 21.7 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Gorodok raion (without the town of Gorodok) constituted 136 people.

German forces (18th Motorized Division of the LVII Army Corps of the 3rd Panzer Group) occupied Gorodok on July 11, 1941.¹ Before its capture, the Luftwaffe bombed the town heavily on July 4. This early air raid, as well as the fact that Gorodok was situated on a railway, precipitated the evacuation and mass flight of much of the town's population, including many Jews. After the war, Gorodok had a comparatively large Jewish population,² which probably indicates that quite a number of Jews successfully left the town.

Gorodok was administered by Rear Area, Army Group Center; it was situated in the realm of the 403rd Security Division and Ortskommandantur 763, which was subordinated to Feldkommandantur 815. The names of the local collaborators of the Nazis are not well documented. A survivor stated that the registration of the Jews in Gorodok was carried out by someone called Binya Shklyar; it is unclear whether he was the chairman of the Jewish Council (Judenrat).

Shortly after the beginning of the occupation, the German authorities registered all the Jews, and then they introduced the wearing of yellow patches on their clothes and forced labor. Eyewitnesses recollect that some labor tasks were of a purely humiliating character. For example, one day the Jews of Gorodok were forced to pull up grass in the town using their bare hands. On another occasion, according to an eyewitness account, the Germans organized the systematic robbery of the Jews. A witness recalls: "Germans, together with local policemen [politsais] entered the more affluent Jewish houses, dragged out their property, showed the [Belo-] Russians the Jewish belongings, and suggested that people take some of it; but the best things were taken by [the Germans] themselves." According to the witness, some Belorussians took Jewish possessions, but others refused.³ The same witness recalls a pogrom that took place in the town: "A real pogrom, I knew about such things only from books!"⁴ At the same time, according to another witness, the Germans did not close the synagogue in Gorodok initially, and some Jews gathered for prayer there; some others, however, feared that the Germans would take them from the synagogue and gathered for a minyan in a private house on Karl-Marx Street.⁵

From July 20 to the middle of August 1941, a subunit (Teilkommando) of Sonderkommando 7a was based in Gorodok. In charge of the Teilkommando was Obersturmführer Richard Foltis of the SD. During this period the Jewish Council was established. Sonderkommando 7a, under the command of Dr. Walter Blume, organized the first, "partial" shooting of Jews in the town in the first half of August. On the day of the Aktion, the Teilkommando, reinforced by other men from Sonderkommando 7a, assembled 120 to 200 people, healthy men and several young and healthy women, under the pretext of assigning them to construction work. The people were told to report to the assembly place with shovels. The order did not alarm the Jews (since forced labor was a routine occurrence). Once the people had assembled, the Germans escorted them to the village of Berezovka (1.5 kilometers [about 1 mile] south of the town) and shot them there. During the Aktion, a Jewish man was shot while trying to escape.⁶ Only after this first shooting did the Germans establish a ghetto in Gorodok for the remaining Jewish population.

The ghetto was situated in the center of town, on a slope, a steep bank of the Gorozhanka River. It was fenced on three sides with barbed wire, and on the fourth side, the river formed its boundary. According to witnesses, the fence was erected within two weeks of the Jews being resettled into the ghetto area. At the highest point of the ghetto fence, a watchtower was built, and a guard watched over the ghetto. The ghetto consisted of a building belonging to a former technical college (tekhnikum) and several houses. The tekhnikum building was in poor condition: its windowpanes were broken, as were the stoves.

The ghetto prisoners did not receive any food. Some children managed to get through the barbed wire and bring some food into the ghetto. However, contagious diseases soon spread among the ghetto population. Thus there was a high rate of mortality inside the ghetto. The corpses were taken from the rooms to a corridor. From time to time, the Germans took out small groups of Jews and murdered them. For example, several days after the ghetto was established, on one morning, the Germans took 20 Jews out of the ghetto and shot them.

At some stage, the ghetto prisoner Sonya Dobromyslova, "Di Sheine," in an attempt to stop the epidemics, succeeded in persuading the town's authorities to permit the ghetto's Jews to wash themselves in the public bath adjacent to the ghetto perimeter and to cleanse themselves of lice. The Jews washed themselves, but after a few days, local policemen entered the ghetto and took a rather large group of Jews to be shot.

On October 14, 1941, the Gorodok ghetto was liquidated; its remaining 394 inhabitants were shot on the pretext of the danger of epidemics spreading to the non-Jewish population.⁷ On that day at 4:00 A.M., the Germans and the local police escorted the remaining Jews through the Volkov Posad area of the town to the forest at the Vorob'evy Hills. The route was exhausting (the path went uphill), and many ghetto inmates were old, and all were emaciated, so the guards shot some Jews on the way. At the Vorob'evy Hills, members of the SS shot the Jews in pits that had been dug beforehand. After the mass shooting, the ghetto was burned down.

SOURCES A rather small book on non-Jews who rescued Jews in the Vitebsk region, by A. Shulman and M. Ryvkin, Porodnennye voimoi (Vitebsk, 1997), describes, among other things, the Holocaust in Gorodok. The article by A. Shulman, "Evreiskii Gorodok," Mishpokha 4 (1998), also deals with the ghetto of Gorodok.

Documentation on the Holocaust in the Gorodok raion can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/220); GARF (7021-84-5); LG-Ess (29 Ks 2/65); and YVA (TR 10/388 and TR 10/388a; O-3/4602-4607).

Daniel Romanovsky

VOLUME II: PART B

NOTES

1. N.K. Andriushchenko, Na zemle Belorussii letom 1941 goda (Minsk, 1985), pp. 143–144.
2. According to Shulman, in 1980 there were 202 people in Gorodok whose nationality recorded on their passports was “Jew.” See Shulman, “Evreiskii Gorodok,” p. 54.
3. YVA, O-3/4603 (Anna Kuksinskaya).
4. Ibid. Some hints on the pogrom may also be found in Shulman and Ryvkin, Porodnennye voimoi, p. 29.
5. YVA, O-3/4607 (Galina Bukhbinder).
6. Ibid., O-3/4602, 4603, 4605, and 4607; LG-Ess, 29 Ks 2/65, verdict of December 22, 1966. See also Zverstva nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatnikov, vyp. 12, p. 58.
7. BA-BL, R 58/220, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 149.

GRODZIANKA

Pre-1941: Grodzianka, town, Osipovich raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Grodzianka, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Hradzianka, Asipovichy raen, Mahilou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Grodzianka is located 55 kilometers (34 miles) northwest of Bobruisk. According to the 1939 census, there were 150 Jews living in Grodzianka, out of a total population of 1,247.

German forces of Army Group Center occupied the village on July 1, 1941, about 10 days after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. In this intervening period, a small part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were inducted into the Red Army. Following the occupation of the village, the German military commandant appointed a village elder (starosta) named Mukin, the former director of the post office, and organized a Belorussian police force (Ordnungsdienst) consisting of local residents.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Grodzianka. Jews were registered and forced to wear patches in the shape of the Star of David; they had to perform heavy labor without pay; and they were prohibited from leaving the limits of the village.

On August 15, 1941, German security forces conducted a first Aktion in the village. In its course, a few dozen Jews (probably mainly Jewish men) were rounded up and taken to the Christian cemetery. Apparently this site was chosen as a special humiliation for some of the Jews who still observed their religion. Threatening them with automatic weapons, the Germans forced the Jews to dig a long trench in the cemetery. Then the Germans made them lie down in groups in the trench, where they shot them in the back of the head. For several days afterwards, the ground continued to move on top of the mass grave.¹

In the summer or fall of 1941, the Germans ordered the Jews of Grodzianka, together with Jews from the surrounding small villages, to move into a small ghetto. After the Jews were rounded up and resettled into the ghetto, some local inhabitants stole the property that was left behind in the vacated houses, arguing that the Jews would not need these items anymore. The ghetto was located near the railway not far from the post office in the former Vinokur house: a long structure made of wood, which was reminiscent of a barracks. The house was surrounded by a fence and guarded by the local police. Because the available accommodation was insufficient, some Jews had to sleep on the floor or even outside. The German authorities did not provide the Jews with food. The Jews, including some children, had to sneak out of the ghetto at great risk to beg or barter for food from their non-Jewish neighbors. Some people helped them, but others chased them away immediately. It was only through such support in the village that the Jews could stay alive in the ghetto.²

The area around Grodzianka became a center of Soviet partisan resistance during the winter of 1941–1942. Some Jews from the village managed to escape from the ghetto and served with the Soviet partisans. Parents of young children also tried to smuggle them to safety by hiding them with non-Jews in the surrounding countryside. The Germans threatened to kill anyone caught hiding Jews, however, and many people were reluctant to give them shelter. In Grodzianka, the Germans and local police could shoot a Jew with impunity if they were in a bad mood or as a reprisal for the latest partisan attack.³

The ghetto in Grodzianka was liquidated on March 4, 1942, when 86 of the 92 Jews then present in the ghetto were shot. The shooting was carried out on the instructions of the commander of Kampfgruppe Dietrich, Police Captain Karl Dietrich. This Kampfgruppe had been formed in Mogilev in late February 1942 to combat partisans; it consisted of four companies of Ukrainian police, with German SS and police officials playing leadership roles in these companies. In response to several partisan attacks against the German outposts in the area between Klichev and Cherven', Kampfgruppe Dietrich was combing the region from east to west in early March 1942, when it encountered the small ghetto in Grodzianka. The shooting itself was conducted by Ukrainian police of the 2nd Company, commanded by Police Lieutenant Willi Schulz. The Ukrainians escorted the Jews, mostly women, the elderly, and children, under close guard to a large pit that had been dug on the morning of the Aktion on the edge of the forest. The Ukrainians shot the Jews in the pit, using rifles and pistols. After a time, the scene at the mass grave became increasingly chaotic, with the Ukrainians shooting almost randomly at the Jews who had been herded into the pit, with the result that many of the victims may only have been wounded when the pit was covered with earth.⁴

In the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the names of 93 murdered Jews are listed.⁵

For the shooting of Jews in Grodzianka, as well as for other crimes, Willi Schulz was sentenced in 1967 to six years and six months in prison.

SOURCES Publications containing relevant information about the murder of the Jews of Grodzianka include: Justiz und NS-Verbrechen (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), vols. 22 (Lfd. Nr. 604) and 25 (Lfd. Nr. 644); and My ne mozhem molchat': Shkol'niki i studenty o Kholokoste, Vypusk 4: Sbornik, comp. D.V. Prokudin, ed. I.A. Al'tman (Moscow: Tsentr i Fond "Kholokost," 2008), p. 31. The testimony of Ol'ga Lukashenko (Lanevskaia) can be accessed at www.mishpoha.org/library/04/0415.shtml.

Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Grodzianka can be found in the following archives: BA-L; GARF (7021-82-5); NARB; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. Testimony of Ol'ga Lukashenko (Lanevskaia), available at www.mishpoha.org/library/04/0415.shtml.

2. Ibid.; this source seems to imply that the ghetto was established before the August 1941 Aktion. See also, however, V. Zaitseva and V. Novik, "Iz istorii Kholokosta v Osipovichskom raione," in Al'tman, My ne mozhem molchat', p. 31.

3. Testimony of Ol'ga Lukashenko.

4. See the verdict of Landgericht Detmold (2 Ks 1/65), December 22, 1965, against Karl Dietrich, in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 22, Lfd. Nr. 604; and the verdict of Landgericht Detmold (2 Ks 2/66), February 16, 1967, against Willi Schulz, in idem, vol. 25, Lfd. Nr. 644.

5. GARF, 7021-82-5, pp. 170–173.

IANOVICHI

Pre-1941: Ianovichi, town, Surazh raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Janowitschi, Rayon Surasch, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Ianavichy, Vitebsk raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Ianovichi is located about 36 kilometers (22.5 miles) east-northeast of Vitebsk and 13 kilometers (8 miles) south of Surazh. Ianovichi had a more significant Jewish population than the raion center, Surazh. In 1939, according to the last pre-war census, Ianovichi had 709 Jewish residents (34.8 percent of the total population). In the town of Surazh, there were 461 Jews in 1939 (15.4 percent of the population). The rural Jewish population of the Surazh raion (excluding the towns of Surazh and Ianovichi) was fewer than 100 people.

Ianovichi was captured by the Germans most likely on July 12, 1941, the same day as Surazh. According to the witnesses, an avalanche of refugees passed through Ianovichi from Vitebsk on July 9; not many Jews from Ianovichi joined this wave. The survivors blame local physician Dr. Yefim Lifshits, who had studied in Germany and who dissuaded local Jews from evacuating, claiming that the Germans were a "cultured people" and would not harm the Jews.

The mayor of the Ianovichi volost' under the German occupation was Vasilii F. Vysotskii. The Germans established a Jewish Council in Ianovichi; its head was Dr. Lifshits, and his deputy was Labkovskii, the pharmacist.

Jews had to perform forced labor, mainly improving roads and constructing a military airfield. The Jews who had been members of the pre-war kolkhoz "International" continued their agricultural work. At the beginning of August, the Jews were registered, on the orders of the local German commandant, Daum.

In the neighboring town of Surazh, it appears that no ghetto was formed. The murder of the Jews of Surazh was one of the first Aktions in the region in which the Germans annihilated all the Jews in one location. Einsatzkommando 9 carried out the murder of the Jews of Surazh on August 15, in conjunction with an antipartisan operation.¹ The record of the exhumation carried out by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated that 674 persons were killed; some of the victims were not local Jews but Jewish refugees from Vitebsk who failed to leave Surazh before the Germans arrived.²

Sometime in the middle of August, Einsatzkommando 9 also sent a detachment to Ianovichi. This unit carried out the first mass shooting of Jews in the town; an eyewitness states that it was the same group that acted in Surazh: Schneider's detachment. On August 15 (according to other sources, August 17 or even 19), 1941, the detachment selected 149 Jews, mostly young and healthy men, with shovels, for some "forced labor." At the same time, the local police surrounded the town, cordoning off the exits. The SS took the men to a square in the town's center and ordered them to sit down on the ground, to look ahead and not to turn their heads. After all the men were assembled in the square, they were brought to Valki village, 1.5 to 2 kilometers (about 1 mile) southeast of the town, and shot there. The Einsatzkommando described those killed as "NKVD spies and political functionaries."³

Only after this first shooting was a ghetto established in Ianovichi. All non-Jews were resettled from an area adjacent to the Vitebsk road (Unishevskogo Street), and Jews were settled in this area. The ghetto was divided into two parts by the Tadulino road, and non-Jews were permitted to use this road. Jews and non-Jews were prohibited from communicating with one another. The ghetto was not provided with food, but there were some vegetable plots within its area, which helped the inmates sustain themselves. Some youngsters ventured through the barbed wire surrounding the ghetto and exchanged items for bread. Every time the Germans discovered that the barbed-wire fence was damaged, they beat Lifshits.

The ghetto was liquidated on September 10, 1941. On this day, Einsatzkommando 9 appeared once more in Ianovichi, assembled the rest of the ghetto population—women, children, and old people—brought them in trucks to the village of Zaitsevo, around 5 kilometers (about 3 miles) east-northeast of Ianovichi, and shot them there in an antitank ditch. The SS did not even attempt to conceal this Aktion. According to eyewitnesses (peasants of the Zaitsevo village), the first batch of victims that was brought to the execution site from the ghetto consisted of young girls; the Einsatzkommando men raped them and then shot them. Only after this was the rest of the ghetto population brought to the site, some in trucks, others on foot.⁴ The Einsatzgruppe reported that 1,025 Jews of Ianovichi "underwent special treatment" because of the danger of an epidemic.⁵

The Jewish survivors from Ianovichi who were interviewed after the war refer to their wartime non-Jewish neighbors with great bitterness. For example, witness B.E. says that with the coming of the Germans, the attitude of the local population towards the Jews changed drastically: "The locals could come to a Jew and take away whatever they wanted, even a cow. . . . [Belo-]Russian boys turned their backs on the Jewish boys straight away, even those with whom [we] had studied at school. They broke off all communication [with Jews] openly/demonstratively . . . some pointed their finger at us: 'Jew-mug' [zbidovskaia morda]; they might also beat you with a stick."⁶ The non-Jewish witnesses from Ianovichi who were interviewed at the same time express no less acrimony towards their former Jewish neighbors, attesting that they were cowards. All this indicates that relations between Jews and non-Jews during the German occupation were poor. On the other hand, the same B.E. describes a peasant who came to the Tadolino road and threw a parcel of food over the ghetto fence.

SOURCES The documents of the ChGK for the former Surazh raion can be found in GARF (7021-84-13 and 13a). The events in Surazh and Ianovichi are mentioned in the Ereignismeldungen UdSSR nos. 73 and 92 of the SD. They were also discussed at the trial of the former members of Einsatzkommando 9 held in 1961 in Berlin; the materials of the trial can be found, for example, in YVA (TR-10/388 and TR-10/388a), as can eyewitness accounts of the events in Surazh and Ianovichi (O-3/4611-4618).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. YVA, TR-10/388a (Berlin trial of members of Einsatzkommando 9 [Filbert] held in 1961), p. 47; the ChGK dates the mass murder of the Jews in Surazh as July 28 or August 2, 1941.
2. GARF, 7021-84-13, 7021-84-13a; YVA, TR-10/388.
3. BA-BL, R 58/216, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 73; see also YVA, O-3/4613, 4614, and 4615.
4. GARF, 7021-92-220.
5. BA-BL, R 58/217, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 92; also YVA, TR-10/388, p. 69; also YVA, O-3/4614.
6. YVA, O-3/4614.

KHOLOPENICHI

Pre-1941: Kholopenichi, town and raion center, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Cholopenitschi, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Khalopenichy, Krupki raen, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kholopenichi is located about 114 kilometers (71 miles) northeast of Minsk. In 1939, the Jewish population of the town was 500 people. In addition, another 388 Jews resided in the remainder of the Kholopenichi raion. Most of these Jews probably resided in the small village of Shamki (Schamki), about 6 kilometers (4 miles) to the northwest of Kholopenichi, which had been founded as a Jewish agricultural colony in the late nineteenth century and had a population of 310 Jews in 1925.

German forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on July 5, 1941. During the occupation, which lasted until the summer of 1944, a German commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in control of the town. An auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) was recruited from local inhabitants. In early October 1941, the 3rd Battalion of Infantry Regiment 354 was based in Kholopenichi and presumably ran the Ortskommandantur at that time.¹

Very little information is available about the living conditions of the Jews in Kholopenichi and Shamki during the summer of 1941. It is known that a number of refugees from other towns further to the west, including Minsk and Borisov, became trapped there by the German advance and were housed together with the local Jews. In nearby Zembin, the Jews were registered and moved into a ghetto by August 1941, on instructions from SS-Hauptsturmführer Werner Schönmann of Einsatzkommando 8, then based in Borisov. It is possible that a similar procedure was carried out in Kholopenichi, which also lay within Schönmann's area of operations. On the basis of evidence given in the trial of David Egof, the head of the Belorussian police in Borisov in the fall of 1941, and other investigative sources, historian Christian Gerlach and also The Black Book with Red Pages refer to the existence of ghettos in both Kholopenichi and Shamki by September 1941.

In late September 1941, a German punitive detachment of more than 100 men armed with submachine guns arrived in Kholopenichi. The unit was composed of a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 based in Borisov commanded by Schönmann, together with German soldiers of the 12th Company, Infantry Regiment 354,² and members of the local Belorussian police. On the pretext of resettling the Jewish population to another locality, the German soldiers went to all the Jewish houses and gathered the Jews on the premises of a social club. Those who were unable to walk were taken in carts. In total, around 800 people were collected there. Then under heavy guard, they all were escorted from the social club to the "Kamennyi log" (Stone Ravine) 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside of town, where they were shot. On that same day, also at the Kamennyi log, the punitive detachment shot a number of additional Jews who had been brought there from the village of Shamki. The German punitive detachment forced 36 local inhabitants, at gunpoint, to bury the corpses. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission report estimates that altogether the German detachment shot 1,600 "innocent citizens" from Kholopenichi and Shamki.³ However, in light of the 1939 population figures and the likelihood that some Jews had managed to evacuate, the total number of victims was probably just over half this number.

According to the report of the Einsatzgruppen no. 124, dated October 25, 1941, a large Aktion was conducted in Cholopenitschi (Kholopenichi), in which 822 Jews were "liquidated." The alleged reason for the complete liquidation of the Jews there was to prevent them from providing any possible support to the numerous partisans said to be operating in the area.⁴

SOURCES The existence of a “ghetto” in Kholopenichi is mentioned in the following publications: David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), p. 229; and Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 1999), pp. 586–587, which cites a number of German investigative sources. Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 126, however, refer only to a site of destruction of the Jewish population.

Documentation on the murder of the Jews of Kholopenichi and Shamki can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58/218); BA-L; BA-MA (RH 26-221/14b); GARF (7021-87-16); NARB (861-1-8, p. 195); and USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-MA, RH 26-221/14b.
2. The Aktion in Kholopenichi is mentioned in the diary of Richard Heidenreich, as cited by Hannes Heer, “Killing Fields: Die Wehrmacht und der Holocaust,” in Hannes Heer and Klaus Naumann, eds., Vernichtungskrieg: Verbrechen der Wehrmacht 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 1995), p. 61. According to the research of Christian Gerlach (Kalkulierte Morde), however, the Aktion is misdated in this source as taking place in October—other more reliable sources indicate September 25, 1941.
3. GARF, 7021-87-16, p. 4. This source dates the Aktion in early September 1941.
4. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 124, October 25, 1941.

KHOTIMSK

Pre-1941: Khotimsk, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Chotimsk, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Khotsimsk, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Khotimsk is located about 168 kilometers (105 miles) east-southeast of Mogilev. The Jewish population in 1939 was 786 (roughly a quarter of the total).

German forces of Army Group Center occupied Khotimsk on August 15, 1941, less than seven weeks after the German attack on the Soviet Union. During that interval, a number of Jews managed to evacuate to the east, while the local authorities called up eligible men to serve in the Red Army. However, several hundred Jews remained in Khotimsk under the Germans. Throughout the occupation, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed Khotimsk. The Ortskommandantur established an auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local inhabitants.

By order of the military commandant soon after the occupation, the local authorities registered the Jews, required them to wear distinguishing patches, and assigned them to various kinds of forced labor. Jews were also forbidden to leave the town on pain of death.

Little information is available about the living conditions of the remaining Jews in Khotimsk between the summer of 1941 and the summer of 1942. It appears that some Jews from other towns where massacres had already occurred arrived in Khotimsk, warning the inhabitants of their likely fate.

On July 12, 1942, the Germans collected the Jewish population of Khotimsk in the building of a Jewish school under the guise of registration and tortured them in various ways. During this roundup, they shot 24 Jews.¹ The Jews were then held in the school building as a makeshift ghetto for almost two months, under conditions of hunger and overcrowding. During this period some Jews were taken to prepare large pits. Fearing the worst, the pharmacist poisoned himself and his family, rather than submit to being shot by the Germans.² On September 3–5, 1942, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8, subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B, assisted by men of Reserve Police Battalion 91 (which was stationed in Khotimsk from July 1942), shot more than 300 Jews, mostly women, children, and the elderly, at the site of the flax mill.³

A number of Jews were active in the Soviet partisan groups in the Khotimsk region, including Boris Veniaminovich Levvertov, who was decorated with the order of the Red Banner. Soviet partisan detachments disrupted German communications and blew up trains.⁴

SOURCES Relevant publications concerning the fate of the Jews in Khotimsk during the Nazi-German occupation include Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Knih, 1995), p. 471; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 621.

Information concerning the extermination of the Jews in Khotimsk may be found in the following archives: BA-L; GAMO; GARF (7021-88-47 and 532); NARA (T-315, reel 1678); NARB (4683-3-1047); USHMM (RG-22.002M); VHF (# 44385); and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Robert Haney

NOTES

1. NARA, T-315, reel 1678, p. 72, KTB Sich. Div. 221 Ia, July 12, 1942; GARF, 7021-88-532, p. 18. These sources corroborate each other, giving July 12, 1942, as the date of ghettoization. On the existence of a ghetto, see also NARB, 4683-3-1047, p. 58.
2. VHF, # 44385, testimony of Galina Myrkina (born 1923), interviewed in 1998.
3. BA-L, ZStL, V 205 AR 512/63, vol. 1, pp. 90, 155 ff., 213–214, and vol. 8, p. 1023. According to Pamiats': Belarus', p. 471, the ghetto was liquidated on September 4, 1942, with 800 victims. This figure is almost certainly too high. GARF,

VOLUME II: PART B

7021-88-532, gives the figure of 652 Jewish victims, probably for the entire German occupation.

4. David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), pp. 387–389.

KLICHEV

Pre-1941: Klichev, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Klitschew, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Klichau, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus Klichev is located about 75 kilometers (47 miles) southwest of Mogilev. According to the 1939 Soviet census, there were 433 Jews living in Klichev.

German forces of Army Group Center captured the area around Klichev in early July 1941. Some Jews managed to escape in time to the interior of the Soviet Union. According to some sources, the Germans established a ghetto in Klichev in the second half of 1941, which may have contained up to 600 Jews. In early 1942, German forces liquidated the ghetto, shooting 300 Jews at the Jewish cemetery.

In April 1942, German forces reported that Klichev had been captured by Soviet partisans, resulting in the burning of grain storage facilities. German forces recaptured the town shortly afterwards. The Red Army drove out the German occupation forces in the summer of 1944. A small number of Jews managed to survive the German occupation in and around Klichev, either in hiding or by joining the Soviet partisan forces, which were very active in this region.

SOURCES The ghetto in Klichev is mentioned in the following publications: Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Kniha, 1995), p. 442; Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000), pp. 292, 299, 309; and Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2004), 5:108.

Martin Dean

KLIMOVICHI

Pre-1941: Klimovichi, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Klimowitschi, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Klimavichy, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Klimovichi is situated 124 kilometers (77 miles) east-southeast of Mogilev. In 1939, according to the last pre-war census, 1,693 Jews lived in the town, making up 17.7 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Klimovichi raion (without the town of Klimovichi) constituted 706 people, the bulk of whom lived in the town of Rodnia (16 kilometers [10 miles] southeast of Klimovichi) and in the villages of Lazovitsa (6 kilometers [4 miles] southeast of Klimovichi), Miloslavichi (25 kilometers [15.5 miles] northeast of Klimovichi), Khotovizh, and Karpachi (15 kilometers [9 miles] north of Klimovichi).

Klimovichi lies on a railway line. A more or less organized evacuation began on July 5, but it did not involve the whole population. For example, on July 14 all the Communist Party authorities (the raion committee, or raikom) with their families evacuated in 30 trucks;¹ there were some Jews among these party leaders. According to survivors, most of the Jews tried to leave the town independently in August 1941, many of them in horse-drawn carts. Some of the first refugees successfully escaped the Germans; those who left later and those who headed eastward, in the direction of Khotimsk and Roslavl', did not. According to witnesses, many of those who attempted to evacuate were forced to return to their houses, which had been completely plundered by the local population in the meantime.

German forces belonging to the 2nd Panzer Group (commanded by Heinz Guderian) took Klimovichi in the course of the Roslavl' operation. Roslavl', an important railway junction northeast of Klimovichi, fell to the Germans on August 3, 1941, thereby cutting off the main route out of town to the east. On August 9, 1941, the 3rd Panzer Division of the XXIV Army Corps entered Klimovichi. The Germans had captured the entire raion by October 8–10. Klimovichi came under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. The 221st Security Division controlled the area;² Feldkommandantur 549 exerted authority in Klimovichi.

The Germans put together a local administration in Klimovichi in which a man named Ustinovich served; he is described by witnesses as "the chief of the Russian Gestapo." Appointed as Jewish elder was Froim Rodin, the former head of the town's fire brigade. The military authorities ordered Jews to affix "Jewish stars" to their clothes (on the chest and on the back) and to houses owned by Jews. Jews had to perform various types of forced labor and were subjected to many other restrictions on their liberty. The man who supervised Jewish forced labor was Shcherbakov, a former Russian member of the Jewish kolkhoz in Mikhalin.³

In the first days of the occupation, the Germans took 10 or 12 prominent Jewish men and formed a "committee" headed by Shcherbakov, which had to collect gold and any other valuables in the possession of Jews. When these men failed to collect the full sum that the Germans demanded, the latter took them and Rodin as hostages and placed them in the local prison, in the building of a former bank. After having held the hostages in the prison for about 10 days, the Germans and the local police (politsais) shot all of them except one, a bricklayer.

According to one account, the "contribution" that led to these murders was the second one; it was preceded by a first "contribution," which the Jews had collected in full. According to another account, in mid-October the Germans resettled the Jews of Klimovichi on one street, forming an "open ghetto."⁴

On November 6, 1941, the Belorussian police sent younger Jews to work near the alcohol plant. After that, the Germans and the politsais began to round up the rest of the Jews from their houses. The Jews were told to take warm clothes and valuables with them. They were then brought along the Timonovo Road to the area of a former airfield, 500 meters (547 yards) south or southwest of Klimovichi, and placed in unused garages near the town's hospital. From this place, the Jews—who had been told to leave all their belongings in the garage—were taken in batches of 10 or 15 people and shot in a former fuel storage pit near the airfield. Men of the 221st Security Division organized the massacre, aided by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 9.⁵ The witnesses attest that the killers were not the SS in black but “Germans in green uniform.” Some of the killing was perpetrated by the politsais; some children were killed with shovels rather than by guns. According to other accounts, the perpetrators tossed Jewish children into the pit, which contained some water, and the children drowned.⁶ Many were buried alive.

Some of those sent by the Germans to perform labor in the morning managed to survive. The politsais let them go home at 3:00 P.M. Many succeeded in fleeing from Klimovichi. According to some witnesses, it was German soldiers at the alcohol plant who warned the young Jews that their relatives were all being killed at this time.⁷

After the large-scale murder Aktion on November 6, the Germans sold items previously belonging to the Jews in a shop. The Germans kept the specialist workers alive, and together with the politsais they caught many of the Jews who had fled from Klimovichi on the day of the murder and put them into the prison. Witnesses estimate that together with the specialists there were about 80 Jews in the prison (and perhaps also in an adjacent house). After some days, these Jews were also sent to perform forced labor tasks.

Sometime in December (or on November 27–28) 1941, the SS came to Klimovichi and shot those Jews who had fled from the Aktion on November 6. The Jews were taken directly from their working place, led to “Chalk Hill,” the location of a former lime plant, and shot there. Again, some young Jews managed to flee.⁸ According to the survivor Leitus, in the first days of December, the Nazis transferred Jews from the nearby villages of Golovchin, Krugloe, and Pelshichi to Klimovichi, held them several days in a makeshift ghetto, and on December 12, killed them.⁹ It is unclear whether she is describing the same murder Aktion or another one.

The specialists were killed later, maybe in 1943, in the Vydrenka Forest, 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town.

The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated the number of Jews killed in Klimovichi at 900; the same number was inscribed on the monument erected at the site of the large massacre by the victims' relatives in the late 1950s. The relatives reburied those who had been killed at Vydrenka and Chalk Hill at the same place, the site of the large massacre. Most probably, about 700 of these victims were killed on November 6, 1941: Einsatzgruppe B reported that as part of an antipartisan sweep conducted by units of Security Division 221, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 9 shot 786 Jews of both sexes in Klimovichi and Chervikov.¹⁰

In April 1943, some SS men appeared in Klimovichi. With the support of the Belorussian police and the “chief of the Russian Gestapo” Ustinovich, they carried out the extermination of children of mixed origins (those with non-Jewish mothers and Jewish fathers). They assembled seven non-Jewish women married to Jews and put them in the local prison. Then they took away all their children, and on April 12 (or 13), 1943, in the night they killed them at the same prison, according to one witness, “without any of the children making a sound” (most probably, the children were poisoned). The children were buried at Vydrenka Hill. The same squad also carried out the murder of Gypsy women and of Belorussian women ill with certain diseases.¹¹

According to witnesses, Jewish and non-Jewish relations were quite good in Klimovichi both before and under the German occupation. Of those Jews who were in Klimovichi when the Germans entered the town, 15 managed to survive the German occupation—many of them because non-Jews hid them. Raya Shkolnikova was even hidden by a Belorussian policeman. Non-Jews provided Jews with food. At the same time, many Belorussians and Russians volunteered to serve in the police and collaborated with the Gestapo, participating in the denunciation of Jews. Many Jews were denounced by their former non-Jewish neighbors.

Elsewhere in the raion, in Miloslavichi, the Nazis shot no fewer than 115 Jews.¹² In Khotovizh, 40 Jewish and 7 Gypsy families were killed near the Jewish cemetery.¹³ At the kolkhoz “Bliung” (literally meaning “flourishing” in Yiddish; 7 kilometers [4.4 miles] north of Klimovichi), at least 8 Jews were killed, and in Kuleshovka (20 kilometers [12.4 miles] north of Klimovichi), 6 Jews. In the village of Khodun (18 kilometers [11.2 miles] north of Klimovichi), a Jewish woman married to a Belorussian was killed. In Rodnia on December 17 (another version: on the night of December 8–9), 1941, about 50 or 60 Jews were taken from their homes and shot in a depression near the Jewish cemetery.¹⁴ In Dubrovitsa (19 kilometers [11.8 miles] west of Klimovichi), 4 Jews were killed, and in nearby Popkhinka (17 kilometers [10.6 miles] west-southwest of Klimovichi), 1. In Pislitino (25 kilometers [15.5 miles] east of Klimovichi), 5 Jews were killed. In the sel'sovet Semenovka (15 kilometers [9.3 miles] southeast of Klimovichi), 2 Jews were killed.

SOURCES The essay by Sh. Ryvkin, “V Klimovichakh bylo tak,” appeared in Moshe Zhidovetskii, ed., Sbornik statei po evreiskoi istorii i literature (Rehovot, Israel, 1992), pp. 857–876.

The documents of the ChGK for the Klimovichi raion can be found in GARF (7021-84-15 and 7021-88-38); relevant German documentation is located in BA-MA (RH 31-770 and RH 26-221/156); witness statements and other documentation can be found in YVA (O-3/4726–O-3/4736; and M-29. FR/213).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. Ryvkin, “V Klimovichakh bylo tak,” p. 860.
2. BA-MA, RH 26-221/156.
3. Ryvkin, “V Klimovichakh bylo tak,” p. 863. It is unclear whether Shcherbakov was the mayor.

1684 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

4. GARF, 7021-88-38.
5. BA-BL, R 58/219, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 148, December, 19, 1941.
6. GARF, 7021-88-38.
7. Ryvkin, "V Klimovichakh bylo tak," p. 870.
8. Ibid., p. 871; also YVA, O-3/4730.
9. YVA, O-3/4732.
10. BA-BL, R 58/218, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 148, December 19, 1941, p. 9.
11. Witnesses Polina Stelmakova and Tatyana Nemkina, YVA, O-3/4729, O-3/4735.
12. GARF, 7021-84-15.
13. Pamiats': Klimavitskii raion (Minsk: Universitetskoe, 1995), pp. 386–387.
14. GARF, 7021-84-15.

KOKHANOVO

Pre-1941: Kokhanovo, village, Tolochin raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kochanowo, Rayon Tolotschin, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Kokhanau, Talachyn raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kokhanovo is situated about 27 kilometers (19 miles) east-southeast of Orsha. In 1926, the Jewish population of the village was 480.

German forces captured the village in early July 1941. According to Gennadii Vinnitsa, the ghetto was established in September 1941, on Orshanskaia Street; it took up half the street. Apart from the local Jews, Jewish inhabitants from the village of Galoshevo were also brought into the ghetto. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) reported that 300 people were confined within the ghetto, which was surrounded by a fence and barbed wire.¹ Sometime in the fall of 1941, the Germans ordered the shooting of 15 Jewish youths, apparently in reprisal for some real or suspected act of resistance. According to a local witness, the Solovei family, consisting of four people, was also killed by the Germans in punishment for the flight of 15-year-old Meyer Solovei from the ghetto.² Another ghetto inmate named Gil' escaped from the ghetto several times but was forced to return on each occasion, as he received no assistance from the population in the surrounding countryside.³

The mass killing of the ghetto Jews in Kokhanovo took place in January 1942. The killing site was at the Jewish cemetery near the railway; the pit was dug by Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) in advance. One source states that the Germans also had to use explosives because of the frozen ground. Before the killing, local policemen took the best clothes from the victims. After the mass shooting, local inhabitants were made to cover the corpses with earth. The ChGK estimated the number of victims at 228, mostly women, children, and the elderly.⁴

SOURCES The book by historian Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), deals briefly with the Holocaust in Ko-khanovo (pp. 124–126). The documents of the ChGK for Kokhanovo can be found in GARF (7021-84-14).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-84-14, p. 12.
2. Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol', pp. 124–126.
3. Leonid Smilovitsky, Katastrofa evreev v Belorussii 1941–1944 gg. (Tel Aviv: Biblioteka Matveia Chernogo, 2000), p. 183.
4. GARF, 7021-84-14, p. 12.

KOLYSHKI

Pre-1941: Kolyshki, village, Liozno raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kolischki, Rayon Liosno, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Kalyshki, Liozna raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kolyshki is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) east of Vitebsk. Estimating from available census data for 1939, there were roughly 420 Jews living in Kolyshki on the eve of the German invasion of the Soviet Union.

Units of the German V Army Corps, 9th Infantry Army, occupied the Liozno area in mid-July 1941. Rayon Liosno became part of Rear Area, Army Group Center. There was no significant evacuation from Kolyshki, but some Jews managed to leave; at the same time, some refugees from other places, including Vitebsk and Ianovichy, were stranded in the village just at the moment the Germans arrived.

There was no formal ghetto in Kolyshki. Many Jewish houses were burned down during the fighting, and the small Jewish population of the village gathered together in a few intact Jewish houses. According to survivors, the Germans knew which houses were Jewish because non-Jewish boys showed them; Jewish houses were marked with distinctive symbols. The Germans ordered the Jews to wear yellow patches on their clothes; some witnesses state that the order was issued the day after the Germans entered the village,¹ while others date this order in August.² The Germans also confiscated all the cattle from the Jews.

Witnesses recollect the first months of the German occupation as a period of incessant robbery. Both the Germans and the local police (politsais) robbed the Jews. Everything could be taken away: food, clothes, matzot that remained after Passover, even Soviet state loan bonds.³ It was hard to distinguish organized confiscation from primitive robbery.

Some Jews were killed in the first months of the occupation. According to a survivor's account, a rather aged Jew was killed during the first days on the pretext that he was an arsonist who had set some houses in Kolyshki on fire. He was killed in the morning; the Germans who came to his home waited for him to finish his morning prayer, then took him out and killed him. (The witness Sofya Gorelik calls him Daniil Pudovik; according to her, they forced him to dig a pit, then stunned him with a shovel and buried him alive.)⁴ The survivor Raisa Khamaida's father, Abram, was also killed by the Germans. Raisa recalls: "They came to our home and said: 'Give us some tobacco.' . . . But did we have tobacco? They brought my father to the courtyard—it was December 1941—and forced him to run around the house, and they beat him with rifle butts until he dropped dead." The Nazis also killed the mentally ill daughter of the teacher Lazar Shnol, as well as a certain Velvele Merzlyak.⁵ In October, six Jews (according to other versions, four or five) made expeditions from Kolyshki into the countryside to barter items for food and were killed by some Germans they met.⁶

On February 9, 1942, a Soviet reconnaissance unit appeared in Kolyshki, and some days later some of the Jews left Kolyshki. The survivor Sofya Gorelik says: "After several days the reconnaissance men gathered us and said: 'We shall be triumphant, but there will be fighting here.' We asked: 'May we leave with you?' The commander said: 'That is the reason why I called you here.' And he explained that everyone must get packed and leave for Ponizov'e immediately." The majority of Jews left for the Ponizov'e village, which was 15 kilometers (9.3 miles) northeast, in Russia. Those evacuated stayed in Ponizov'e until March and then were evacuated farther to the rear. The same witness said: "We lived several days in Ponizov'e, and the district party committee instructor, or somebody else, gathered us and told us the same things that the scouts in Kolyshki had said: 'We shall be triumphant, but there will be fighting here, and nobody knows who will be here tomorrow,' and so on. 'You must go, and especially persons of Jewish extraction; go, we shall give you transportation.'"⁷

Not all the Jews left with the Red Army in February 1942; unfortunately, some remained in Kolyshki (even Sofya Gorelik recalls that she, her aunt, and her cousin required considerable effort to convince her mother to leave Kolyshki). On March 17, 1942, a mixed German-Belorussian squad appeared in Kolyshki. The men were dressed in white camouflage cloaks; thus they managed to surround the village and enter it unnoticed. The men drove the Jews out of their houses and set the houses on fire. Some Jews were killed during the roundup; according to a survivor, the Nazis burned children of the Rabinovich family alive in a bonfire in the center of the village. The rest were escorted in the direction of Liozno and killed, most probably in the Adamenki Ravine. The number of victims is unclear; the list compiled by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) gives 148 names of Jews killed; it is unclear whether the list is complete. The roundup in Kolyshki was carried out hastily, and some Jews managed to evade it. Thus, the survivor Olga Notkina says that the polit-sais saw them but did not touch them because, most probably, they took them for non-Jewish marauders.⁸

Before the war, in 1938, Kolyshki was the site of one of the most infamous antisemitic incidents in the Belorussian SSR (documents from a journalistic investigation of the incident can be found in the archive of the Belorussian Yiddish newspaper Oktiabr). Nevertheless, some Kolyshki survivors attest that they were rescued by their non-Jewish neighbors. For example, Raisa Khamaida and her mother survived because their neighbors told the Germans that they were not Jews but Russian refugees. There were also other cases of Jews being rescued by local inhabitants.⁹

SOURCES The events in Kolyshki are described in Arkadii Shulman, "Otkuda est' poshli Kolyshki," Mishpokha 8 (2000): 68–78. Relevant witness statements on the events in Kolyshki can be found in YVA (O-3/4718 and O-3/4719).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. Shulman, "Otkuda est' poshli Kolyshki," p. 75.
2. YVA, O-3/4718.
3. See, e.g., ibid., O-3/4719.
4. See ibid.
5. Shulman, "Otkuda est' poshli Kolyshki," pp. 75–76; see also YVA, O-3/4719.
6. Shulman, "Otkuda est' poshli Kolyshki," pp. 75–76; see also GARF, 7021-84-8.
7. YVA, O-3/4719. The detailed account given by Sofya Gorelik contradicts the allegation made by Shulman in his essay ("Otkuda est' poshli Kolyshki," p. 76) that the reconnaissance unit men did not warn the Jews of Kolyshki about the impending danger and did not let them evacuate.
8. GARF, 7021-84-8; YVA, O-3/4718; Shulman, "Otkuda est' poshli Kolyshki," pp. 76–77.
9. Shulman, "Otkuda est' poshli Kolyshki," pp. 76–77.

KOPYS'

Pre-1941: Kopy's, town, Orsha raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kopy's, Rayon Orscha, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Orsha raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kopys' is situated about 22 kilometers (14 miles) south of Orsha. In 1939, the Jewish population of Kopys' was 405, 9.9 percent of the total.

The Germans captured the town on July 11–13, 1941, in the course of very heavy fighting (it was in this sector of the front that the XLVII and XXIV Motorized Army Corps of Panzer Group 2 had to force the crossing of the Dnieper River). Only a few local Jews escaped to the east before the Germans arrived. In the first half of August, a detachment of Einsatzgruppe B "liquidated seven [former Communist] functionaries in Kopys' for alleged arson and plundering."¹ The Jews were required to wear distinguishing armbands and a yellow star on their backs as well.

In December 1941, the German authorities resettled the Jews of Kopys' into a small ghetto consisting of several buildings in the area of a linen factory, about 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town. Local witnesses indicate that the area was fenced and guarded by the local police. In total, at least 250 Jews were confined within the ghetto.² One survivor recalls that there were about 10 people per room in the ghetto and that some had to sleep on the floor. The Jews obtained food by bartering items with the local population. Rumors spread in the ghetto about the murder of Jews in larger towns, but people feared that there was nowhere for them to go. On the eve of the liquidation of the ghetto, a few Jews escaped into the surrounding countryside. For example, Alexander Shmyrkin fled with his school friend after his mother told him to run.³

On January 14, 1942, a German “punitive squad” (in the words of Belorussian eyewitnesses) assisted by local policemen carried out a mass shooting of the town’s Jews. The pits close to the area of the linen factory had been prepared in advance. The murderers picked out groups of 15 people, ordered them to undress, forced them to lie in the pit, and shot them with pistols. According to the estimate of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), around 230 Jews were killed in this way. The majority of the victims were women, children, and the elderly. The list of victims compiled by the ChGK contains the names of 143 Jews. Some Jews were spared from this massacre, most probably “specialists.” For example, the tailor Yewel (Yoel) Melikhan and his two sons were not killed until May 15, 1942.⁴

SOURCES Most of the information on the Kopys’ ghetto is based on interviews conducted by historian Gennadii Vinnitsa with local residents in the 1990s, published in his books Gorech’ i bol’ (Orsha, 1998), pp. 93–95, and Slovo pamiati (Orsha: Orshan. Tip., 1997), pp. 53–54. The Kopys’ ghetto is also mentioned in the following publications: Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaiia Navuka, 2000), p. 177; Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), pp. 657–658; and Wila Orbach, “The Destruction of the Jews in the Nazi-Occupied Territories of the USSR,” Soviet Jewish Affairs 2:6 (1976): 32.

Documentation from the ChGK for the Orsha raion can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-84-10); USHMM; VHF (# 39401); and YVA.

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. Peter Klein, ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 137, Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht Nr. 2 der Einsatzgruppen (July 29 to August 14, 1941).

2. Vinnitsa, Slovo pamiati, p. 53.

3. VHF, # 39401, testimony of Alexander Shmyrkin. Shmyrkin, however, claims that the ghetto was not enclosed or guarded, and he dates the liquidation Aktion in November 1942, which seems unlikely.

4. GARF, 7021-84-10, statement by Khaya Melikhan.

KORMA

Pre-1941: Korma, town and raion center, Gomel’ oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Karma, raen center, Homel’ voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Korma is located about 110 kilometers (68 miles) north of Gomel’. In 1939, there were 981 Jews in Korma (40.3 percent of the population).

Following the German invasion, all men of military age, including many Jews, were called up into the Red Army.

Korma was occupied by German troops on August 15, 1941. During the first weeks of the occupation, the Korma Rayon was administered by military units subordinated to Rear Area, Army Group Center. The Wehrmacht established so-called field and local commandants (Feld- und Ortskommandanturen), which set up local administrations in the towns and surrounding Rayons and appointed local mayors. For a period in 1941, Ortskommandantur 353 was based in Korma. In the area around Korma, the Germans established several military garrisons, the largest being in Korma itself, consisting of more than 200 soldiers.

The military forces supervised a local police unit recruited within 10 days of the German occupation. The chief of police in Korma was Denis Makarenko.¹ A Ukrainian named Nikolay Gurov became chief of police for Rayon Korma, and Mitrofan Blatov was appointed as the head of the Rayon (Rayonchef) because he spoke German.² The military commandant was initially Major Max Rozmaisel, a Czech by nationality; he was subsequently replaced by Fritz Essel. The surname of the local head of the Secret Field Police (Geheime Feldpolizei, or GFP) was Reger. Leutnant Glazer was the chief of the Department of Agriculture, and a person named Schein was in charge of the punitive detachment.³ A curfew was imposed on the civilian population from 9:00 P.M. to 5:00 A.M. Everyone over the age of 16 was obliged to carry a personal identification card, and those found without one could be severely punished.

After the occupation of the town by German forces, shops and private apartments were looted. The Germans ordered the Jews to sew fabric in the shape of yellow stars onto the outside of their clothes.⁴ In September 1941, German soldiers and some younger officers from the military headquarters in Gomel’ arrived in Korma. Together with Makarenko and four policemen, they went to the houses of the Jews and registered every person. After this procedure, the Jews were ordered to stay in their houses and were not permitted to leave their places of residence. Two ghettos were established in Korma: one for the Jews residing in the town, the other for the Jewish population of the surrounding area. Most of the population in both ghettos consisted of women, children, and the elderly. According to different sources, the number of people residing in the two ghettos ranged between 500 and 700 prisoners. One of the ghettos was located in the brick buildings of the Jewish school, which had belonged to the synagogue before, on School Street. The other ghetto was established in the buildings of the former financial department of the town administration of Korma and was located on Abaturov Street. The ghetto areas were surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by police units.⁵ In addition, a prison and a concentration camp for the non-Jewish local population were also set up in Korma. The German authorities placed a Latvian named Aleksandr Stsepuro in charge of both ghettos. Before the war, Stsepuro had been the head of the Health Department in Korma. However, the military commandant and the Feldgendarmarie retained ultimate responsibility for the administration of both ghettos.⁶

The ghettos in Korma were not established primarily for the purpose of exploiting Jews economically. They served only to concentrate the Jews and to prevent them from escaping before the Germans murdered them. For this reason, the German authorities did not concern themselves with the poor sanitary conditions or make provisions for medical help or other social assistance inside the ghettos. The ghetto areas were much too small for the number of inmates, and the Jews faced terrible overcrowding and extremely unhygienic conditions. The food delivered into the ghettos for each person was only half the ration received by non-Jews in Korma. Meat and butter were prohibited to the Jews. A daily ration of 120 grams (4.2 ounces) of bread, 15 grams (0.5 ounces) of flour, and 10 grams (0.4 ounces) of buckwheat was provided for each person per day. The residents of the ghettos tried to alleviate the shortage of food by digging up potatoes and living off their small stocks of groceries. All contact between the Jews and the local population was forbidden. Though the non-Jewish population also suffered from hunger and there was a strict prohibition on illegal trade into the ghettos, some local inhabitants still sold bread to the Jews. Nonetheless, many children in the ghettos died of starvation and weakness.⁷

Every morning the residents of the ghettos were herded into the market square, and from there they were sent to various work assignments. Those Jews unable to work were humiliated by the Germans and publicly beaten by the police. Every morning the Jews left the ghettos in groups; one police guard was in charge of 20 people. The Germans made the Jews perform forced labor all day. Among the main tasks performed were cleaning toilets, clearing garbage, and road construction. This physically demanding work was sometimes too much for people, and the death rate under these conditions was high.⁸

The ghettos in Korma existed for approximately two months. The Aktion to liquidate the two Jewish ghettos was carried out on Saturday, November 8, 1941. On the previous evening, 50 members of a special SS police unit arrived from Gomel', wearing uniforms bearing the emblem of a death's head. The Germans and local police escorted the ghetto inmates to a grave site about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside of town and forced some of the victims to excavate a large pit about 42 meters by 12 meters and 0.5 meters deep (138 by 39 by 1.6 feet). The victims were forced to undress completely before being shot. At this time the Germans and their collaborators beat them with rubber sticks and extracted any gold crowns from their teeth. Members of a punitive squad commanded by the head of the local police, Makarenko, actively participated in this killing Aktion. The Jews were forced to lie facedown on the ground and were shot in the back of the head from behind. Among the victims were many elderly people, women, and children, including Aron Libman (born 1879), Genya Girshon (born 1896), the physician Dora Gordon, and others. The young children were thrown into the pit and buried alive.⁹ After the killing Aktion, the police seized the livestock that had belonged to the Jews. The trade department of the German administration in Korma was responsible for all former Jewish property. The proceeds from the sale of Jewish property were paid into the account of the German administration.¹⁰

The town of Korma was among the first settlements in Belorussia to be liberated. Troops of the Soviet 3rd Army of the Belorussian Front recaptured the town on November 26, 1943. According to Soviet figures from May 1944, the population of the Korma region declined from 45,050 to 34,272 during the period of German occupation (a loss of about 24 percent). In the town of Korma itself, the number of inhabitants fell from 2,434 to 928.¹¹ Members of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) exhumed the mass graves in Korma in November 1944. They discovered that there was no sign of bullet wounds on the corpses of the children under six years of age. It was assumed that these victims had been beaten until they were unconscious and then buried alive. The ChGK concluded that the German occupants killed a total of 1,173 people in the Korma raion. In the town of Korma itself, 728 civilian inhabitants and 132 Soviet prisoners of war had been murdered. The ChGK compiled a list of the names of 634 families that were victims of the German invaders. The main concern of the commission's work was not to establish the nationality of the victims but rather to identify the perpetrators.¹²

SOURCES Information on events in Korma during World War II can be found in the following books: Pamiats': Karmiianski raion. Historyka-dokumental'naia khronika baradou i raionau Belarusi (Minsk, 2003); and Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Knih, 1995), p. 279.

Documentation on the fate of the Jewish community in Korma can be found in the following archives: AUKGBRBGO (case no. 391); GAGOMO (1345-1-5); GARF (7021-85-215); NARB (4-33a-65); and YVA (M-33). In the personal archives of the author (PALS) there is also a letter from Khatskiel Merkhasin in Denver (CO, USA), dated November 9, 2004.

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Katrin Reichelt

NOTES

1. Denis Makarenko was shot by Soviet partisans in May 1942.
2. Protocol of Mitrofan Blatov (1899), March 6, 1944. See AUKGBRBGO, case no. 391, p. 32.
3. YVA, M-33/474, p. 15: list of German-Fascist war criminals on the occupied territory of the USSR for the Korma raion, Gomel oblast', Belorussian SSR.
4. Protocol of Proskov Kortel'chik (1893), November 17, 1941, AUKGBRBGO, case no. 391, p. 380.
5. Ibid.; GARF, 7021-85-215.
6. GAGOMO, 1345-1-5, pp. 4, 9, 220.
7. TsAKGBRB, Minsk.
8. AUKGBRBGO, case no. 391, pp. 30–31.
9. GARF, 7021-85-215, p. 13.
10. AUKGBRBGO, case no. 391, p. 375.
11. According to the figures for the Gomel oblast' for May 1, 1944, see GAOOGO (former Party Archive), 144-5-6, p. 218.
12. GARF, 7021-85-215, pp. 1–2, 9.

KOSTIUKOVICH

Pre-1941: Kostiukovich, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kostjukowitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post 1991: Kas'tsiukovichy, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kostiukovich is located about 130 kilometers (81 miles) east-southeast of Mogilev. According to the 1939 census, there were 1,134 Jews living in Kostiukovich, comprising 18.6 percent of the total population.

German armed forces occupied the town on August 13, 1941, approximately seven weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. In the interim, a large part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army.

During the occupation, which lasted until September 28, 1943, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was established to control the town. On the orders of the German military administration, Jews were required to wear distinguishing marks and were forced to perform heavy physical labor. The Ortskommandantur set up a town administration and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) composed of local residents. The mayor of the town was Mikhail Grigorevich Borisevich, and the chief of police was Nikolay Ivanovich Roslavtsev. The town mayor registered the Jews of the town and handed over the list to the German Security Police. For his collaboration with the Germans, including his participation in the murder of the Jews, Borisevich was sentenced to death by hanging by a Soviet military tribunal at the end of the occupation.¹

Very little information is available regarding the living conditions of those Jews who remained in Kostiukovich under the German occupation. In November 1941, the director of the bank, a Jew, was shot for alleged connections with the partisans. According to two secondary sources, The Black Book with Red Pages and Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, a ghetto existed there from the fall of 1941 until September 1942. It is likely that the Jews lived in some form of open ghetto until the mass shooting of the Jews, dated by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) in September 1942.²

On September 3, 1942, all the Jews were told that they would be traveling to Palestine and were ordered to gather on the road. They were all a short distance outside the town on the way to the Kommunar railway station when the Germans and their collaborators shot them in groups of 50 in pits prepared beforehand. Before being shot, the Jews were forced to undress down to their underwear, and policemen and Germans collected their valuables.³ According to some sources, in March 1943, another 161 Jews were shot near the rope factory. On April 14 and 15, 1943, policemen from Kostiukovich shot another 14 Jews.

A forensic examination of the two main grave sites, conducted by the ChGK in December 1943, revealed that out of 536 corpses examined, 128 were adult males, 265 were adult females, and 143 were infants and children up to the age of 15. The investigation demonstrated that 253 victims had gunfire wounds to the head, chest, or abdomen; 23 had skull injuries made by blunt objects; 87 had wounds in their extremities; and no injuries were found on 173 corpses. These injuries indicated that many people had been killed by shooting from firearms at close distance, but others had been buried alive.⁴

SOURCES Mention of a “ghetto” in Kostiukovich can be found in the following publications: David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), pp. 267–268; and Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), pp. 292, 300, 310. Additional information on the murder of the Jews in Kostiukovich can be found in the following publications: I.M. Shenderovich and Aleksandr Litin, Gibel' mestechek Mogilevschiny: Kholokost v Mogilevskoi oblasti v vospominaniakh i dokumentakh (Mogilev: MGU im. A.A. Kuleshova, 2005); Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2004), 5:171–172; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 665.

Documentation on the murder of the Jews of Kostiukovich can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-88-39); and USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8).

Alexander Kruglov and Sonia Isard
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, p. 267.
2. GARF, 7021-88-39, p. 1.
3. Ibid.; Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Resp. Knih, 1995), p. 431. According to another source, the shooting of the Jews took place in November 1941. The perpetrators were from Einsatzkommando 8.
4. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, pp. 267–268.

KRASNOLUKI

Pre-1941: Krasnoluki, village, Kholopenichi raion, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Krassnoluki, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Krasnaluki, Chashniki raion, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Krasnoluki is located 107 kilometers (66 miles) southwest of Vitebsk. On the eve of the German occupation in June 1941, probably around 300 Jews resided in the village.

German forces of Army Group Center occupied Krasnoluki in early July 1941. During the occupation, which lasted until the summer of 1944, a German commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in control of the town. An auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) was recruited from local inhabitants. In early October 1941, a company of Infantry Regiment 354 was based in Krasnoluki and presumably ran the Ortskommandantur at that time.¹

Very little information is available about the living conditions of the Jews in Krasnoluki during the summer and fall of 1941. It is possible that at some time in the fall of 1941, some form of open ghetto was established in the town, as was the case in the nearby town of Chashniki.

On March 6, 1942, German security forces gathered together in a few houses 305 Jews, composed mainly of women, children, and the elderly, and then escorted them to a pit about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside of town, where they shot them all.²

SOURCES The “ghetto” in Krasnoluki is mentioned in the following publications: David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), p. 229; and Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 97. Other secondary sources, however, including, Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000), and Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, “Epos,” 2004), 5:188, do not mention the existence of a ghetto in Krasnoluki.

Documentation on the murder of the Jews of Krasnoluki can be found in the following archives: BA-MA (RH 26-221/14b); GARF (7021-87-16); and USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 8).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-MA, RH 26-221/14b.
2. GARF, 7021-87-16.

KRASNOPOL’E

Pre-1941: Krasnopol’e, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1943: Krassnopolje, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Krassnapolle, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Krasnopol’e is located about 110 kilometers (69 miles) southeast of Mogilev. According to the census of 1939, there were 1,181 Jews living in Krasnopol’e (33.1 percent of the total population).

German forces occupied the town on August 15, 1941, roughly seven weeks after the German attack on the Soviet Union (June 22). During this period, a large proportion of the Jews in Krasnopol’e managed to evacuate to the east, and the Soviets began to induct eligible men into the Red Army. Probably around 400 Jews remained in the town at the start of the German occupation. Throughout the occupation (from August 15, 1941, until October 1, 1943), the German military Feldkommandantur in Propoisk governed Krasnopol’e. It established a raion administrative council and a police force (Ordnungsdienst), staffed by local citizens. In October 1941, Feldkommandantur 544 was based in Propoisk.¹

Following orders issued by the German military administration, shortly after the start of the occupation, the Rayon council organized the registration of the Jews and required that they wear distinguishing marks on their chests. The German authorities also made Jews ages 14 to 60 perform various forms of heavy labor.

The occupying authorities created a ghetto in Krasnopol’e in September 1941.² Units of Police Battalion 322 liquidated the ghetto in two Aktions on October 22 and 25, 1941. Just prior to this, the German authorities forbade Jews to leave the ghetto.³ In the first Aktion, the 2nd Company of Police Battalion 322 seized and shot 121 Jewish men; in the second Aktion, the 1st Company of the same battalion shot 3 Jewish men and 216 Jewish women. Altogether, the Germans massacred 340 Jews in the two Aktions. The German report gives as the reason for the shootings “incitement to insurrection” (Aufwiegelung) and “support for the partisans.” The Jews were shot and buried about 700 meters (766 yards) to the northwest of the town.⁴ Jewish children left behind were shot about two months later.⁵

SOURCES Information concerning the extermination of the Jews in Krasnopol’e can be found in the following publications: Pamiats’: Historyka-dakumental’naia khronika haradou i raenau Belarusi: Krassnapolle raen (Minsk, 2001), pp. 198–199; and Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Black Book: The Ruthless Murder of Jews by German-Fascist Invaders Throughout the Temporarily-Occupied Regions of the Soviet Union and in the Death Camps of Poland During the War of 1941–1945, trans. John Glad and James S. Levine (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981), p. 236.

Documents relating to the persecution and extermination of the town’s Jewish citizens can be found in the following archives: GAMO; GARF (7021-88-40); NARB (861-1-9); USHMM (RG-48.004M); and VHAP.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Robert Haney

NOTES

1. BA-MH, RH 26-221/14b, map, rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte, as of October 9, 1941.
2. NARB, 861-1-9, pp. 329, 333 reverse side, and 336 reverse side.
3. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 236.
4. Kriegstagebuch des Polizei-Bataillons 322, entry dated October 22, 1941, in USHMM, RG-48.004M, reel 2. Soviet sources estimate the number of victims considerably higher (1,000 to 1,500) and report further anti-Jewish Aktions in 1942 and 1943; e.g., Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000), pp. 292, 300. The evidence for this, however, is unreliable.
5. Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 236.

KRICHEV

Pre-1941: Krichev, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kritschew, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Krychau, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Krichev is situated about 95 kilometers (59 miles) east-southeast of Mogilev. According to the 1939 census, there were 1,362

Jews living in Krichev. They made up 8.5 percent of the total population.

German armed forces occupied the town on July 17, 1941, approximately four weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. In the interim, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army.

During the occupation, which lasted from July 17, 1941, to September 30, 1943, a German commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in control of the town. The Ortskommandantur set up a town authority and a police force composed of a number of local residents. In October 1941, Ortskommandantur (V) 256, subordinated to Security Division 221, was based in Krichev.

Shortly after the occupation began, the town authority, on the orders of the Ortskommandantur, organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were also forced to perform heavy physical labor, such as road repair work.

In August or September 1941, the Germans established an open ghetto in Krichev, moving all the Jews (about 80 families in total) into several houses next to the church. The Jews had to wear patches bearing a Star of David and were forbidden to walk freely about the town.¹

German security forces liquidated the Krichev ghetto in November 1941. According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 130 Jews were shot near a flax-processing mill, and 60 to 80 Jews were killed on the grounds of a cement factory.² However, it is likely that in total more than 300 Jews were murdered in Krichev. The mass shootings were carried out by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8, with the help of the Belorussian local police.

In November 1941, in the Krichev raion, 122 Jews were killed in the village of Moliatichi and 30 Jews in the village of Antonovka.³ According to an Einsatzgruppen report, in November 1941, several Aktions were conducted in Krichev and the surrounding area for reasons of "security and order," which resulted in the shooting of 1,231 Jews of both sexes.⁴

SOURCES Publications mentioning the ghetto in Krichev include the following: David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), pp. 266–267; Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für die Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 140; Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), pp. 300–301; Emanuel Ioffe, Belorusskie evrei: Tragediia i geroizm, 1941–1945 (Minsk: Arti-Feks, 2003), p. 117; and Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2004), 5:208–209.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58); BA-L; BA-MA; GARF (7021-88-41); NARB (861-1-9); USHMM; and YVA.

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Steven Seegel

NOTES

1. "From the testimonies of witnesses Pechkurova, Yakushovka, Kurbako, and Gritova," in Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, pp. 266–267.

2. GARF, 7021-88-41, pp. 3–4; NARB, 861-1-9, p. 239. A list of 34 deceased Jews of the town can be found in GARF, 7021-88-41, pp. 32–33.

3. GARF, 702-88-41, pp. 6–7 (Moliatichi); p. 8 (Antonovka); pp. 34–36 (Moliatichi). The shootings in Antonovka occurred on November 14 and 17, 1941.

4. BA-BL, R 58/219, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 148, December 19, 1941.

KRUCHA

Pre-1941: Krucha, village, Krugloe raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Krutscha, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Krucha, Krublae raen, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Krucha is located 64 kilometers (40 miles) northwest of Mogilev. According to the 1926 census, Krucha had a Jewish population of 297, comprising 52.4 percent of the total. In the 1930s, the number of Jews in the village decreased slightly.

German armed forces occupied the village on July 8, 1941, approximately two weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During those weeks, some of the Jewish population managed to evacuate to the eastern regions of the country, but some remained in Krucha, as they did not want to leave behind elderly relatives. Most men of military age were drafted or volunteered for military service in the Red Army. No more than 120 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

In late September or early October 1941, the German military authorities resettled all the remaining Jews in Krucha on Kozlina Street in a separate part of the village, creating an open ghetto. In October 1941, more than 100 Jews in Krucha were shot by the Germans and Belorussian police, who wore white armbands. German forces of the Wehrmacht liquidated the ghetto on October 10, 1941, by shooting at least 114 people 400 meters (437 yards) south of the village (in 1968, a memorial was placed at the site of the shooting). After the shooting, the bodies of the Jews were thrown into a pit, where a local non-Jew was ordered to arrange them neatly. Some Jews, who feigned death or were only wounded, were buried alive.¹

A number of Jews tried to run away to a nearby forest during the murder Aktion. However, the policeman Ivan Skochek ran after them and caught two of them. These two Jews were then shot by the pursuing Germans. At least two others are known to have survived and subsequently joined the Soviet partisans.²

The shooting was carried out by soldiers of the 3rd Company (company commander: Hauptmann Friedrich Nöll) of the 1st Battalion of the 691st Infantry Regiment of the 339th Infantry Division. The order for the shooting was given by the commander of the 1st Battalion, Major Alfred Commichau, on the grounds that the Jews were allegedly assisting the partisans. After the war, the former commander of the 3rd Company, Friedrich Nöll, and the former first sergeant (Hauptfeldwebel) of the company, Emil Zimmer, were found guilty and sentenced by a court in Darmstadt (Germany) to three and two years of imprisonment, respectively.³

SOURCES Relevant publications concerning the destruction of the Jewish population in Krucha include the following: Ida M. Shenderovich and Aleksandr Litin, eds., Gibel' mestechek Mogilevshchiny: Kholokost v Mogilevskoi oblasti v vospominaniakh i dokumentakh (Mogilev: MGU im. A.A. Kuleshova, 2005), pp. 111–113; Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 12 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 398, pp. 375–378; Pamiats': Krublianskii raion (Minsk: Belaruskaja entsyklopedyia, 1996), pp. 369–370; and Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, ed., Verbrechen der Wehrmacht. Dimensionen des Vernichtungskrieges 1941–1944: Begleitbroschüre zur Ausstellung (Hamburg: HIS, 2004), pp. 28–29.

Relevant documentation can be found in the following archive: GAMO (306-1-10, pp. 117–119).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. “Kruchanskii sel'savet,” in Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Resp. Kniha, 1995), p. 450; GAMO, 306-1-10, pp. 117–119; and Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 12, Lfd. Nr. 398, p. 375. See also Pamiats': Krublianskii raion, pp. 369–370. Shenderovich and Litin, Gibel' mestechek Mogilevshchiny, pp. 111–113, give the number of victims as 156.

2. Shenderovich and Litin, Gibel' mestechek Mogilevshchiny, pp. 111–113.

3. LG-Darm, verdict of May 8, 1954 (2 Ks 2/54), published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 12, Lfd. Nr. 398; LG-Darm, verdict of March 10, 1956 (2 Ks 2/54), in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 13 (1975), Lfd. Nr. 429; Hamburger Institut für Sozialforschung, Verbrechen der Wehrmacht, pp. 28–29.

KRUGLOE

Pre-1941: Krugloe, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Krugloje, Rayon Krutscha (Krucha), Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Krublae, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Krugloe is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) northwest of Mogilev. In 1939, 238 Jews lived in Krugloe, making up 19.5 percent of its population, and 375 Jews lived in the rest of the Krugloe raion, the bulk of them in the village of Krucha, 17 kilometers (10.6 miles) west of Krugloe.

Owing to Krugloe's location, far from major highways and with no easily accessible railway station, only a few Jews were able to leave the village in 1941 before the Germans captured it. Witnesses do not mention any organized evacuation of the population from Krugloe.

Krugloe was captured by German forces (XLVII Army Corps of the 4th Panzer Army, formerly of the 2nd Panzer Group) on July 8, 1941. Ortskommandantur I/532, subordinated to the 9th Infantry Army, was established in Krugloe. From August 1941, the town was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. Most probably, Krugloe, like nearby Tolochin, was subordinated to Feldkommandantur 683 stationed in Orsha.

According to the survivor Yevgenii Elman, in the first days of the occupation the Germans ordered the appointment of a Jewish elder: Meyer Pevzner, a former tailor. His first job was to compile a list of all the Jews residing in Krugloe. The Germans also introduced the wearing of “Jewish Stars.” Some Jews continued to work in the kolkhoz; the Germans also took Jews (only Jews) for forced labor, repairing roads.

On September 15, 1941, the Germans ordered Pevzner to assemble all male Jews ages 15 to 60, with shovels and other work tools, near the Ortskommandantur. According to Elman, a German punitive squad had arrived in Krugloe the previous day. Not all the Jews turned up; as a punishment, the Germans shot Pevzner on the spot. The rest of the male Jews, some 60 to 100 men, were brought to a nearby forest and shot there.¹ Subsequently there were other murders of groups of Jews in Krugloe.

The testimony of Honya Epshtein, who was brought to Krugloe from Shepelevichi on December 12, 1941, together with the other remaining Jews from the Shepelevichi ghetto, provides a description of the Krugloe ghetto. There were about 25 to 30 people living in each house. Other Jews were also brought there from Teterino. Epshtein's family had to sleep on the floor without pillows or mattresses. Water could only be obtained from the “Jewish well” or the Drut River. There was almost no food. People survived on frostbitten potatoes and whatever meager rations were distributed. Leaving the ghetto entailed risking one's life, as all contacts with the local population were forbidden. Jews caught outside the ghetto were publicly executed at regular intervals. The number of ghetto inmates gradually declined, so that in the spring of 1942, those few Jews who remained were relocated into two small houses on the edge of town. This “two-house ghetto” was surrounded with a 3-meter-high (9.8-foot-high) fence and was closely guarded by the local police. Despite the risks, Jews continued to sneak out to obtain food from sympathetic peasants in the villages of Ostrov, Pavlovo, and Ogloblia, who gave them bread. The police took a roll call every day, and if anyone was missing, they would search for them and cruelly beat everyone.²

The remaining Jews in the Krugloe ghetto, about 200 people, including the resettled Jews, were murdered by the German occupants using gas vans in June 1942. Eyewitnesses interrogated by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) mention the German officer whom they call Nikodemus as the main perpetrator of the mass murder.³ Epshtein managed to hide successfully under the floorboards for several days after the Aktion, despite repeated searches. He escaped at night to the village of Ogloblia, where the Shevchik family fed and clothed him, before he fled further away from Krugloe, as he knew the local police were still searching for him.⁴

A monument was erected at the killing site by the victims' relatives in 1962, which states that 515 Jews were killed at this spot. Among the victims were also Jews from the villages of Teterino (12 kilometers [7.5 miles] south of Krugloe), Khatkovo (16 kilometers [9.9 miles] east-northeast of Krugloe, now in the Shklov raion), and Shepelevichi (about 20 kilometers [12.4 miles] to the southwest).

Nineteen Jews were killed in the village of Golovchin (22 kilometers [13.8 miles] south-southeast of Krugloe along the P-26 road) in early October 1941. Kh. Zelikova and her five children were shot and killed in Novoprud'e (5 kilometers [3.1 miles] north of Krugloe).

SOURCES The testimony of Honya Epshtein has been published in David Meltser and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), pp. 295–298.

The documents of the ChGK for the Krugloe raion can be found in GARF (7021-88-42); and in GAMO (306-1-10). An eyewitness account can be found in YVA (O-3/4674).

Daniel Romanovsky and Martin Dean

NOTES

1. YVA, O-3/4674.
2. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, pp. 295–298.
3. GARF, 7021-88-42.
4. Meltser and Levin, The Black Book with Red Pages, pp. 297–298.

KRUPKI

Pre-1941: Krupki, town and raion center, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: raion center, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Krupki is located 118 kilometers (73.3 miles) northeast of Minsk.

In 1939, there were 870 Jews out of 3,455 inhabitants (25.2 percent) in Krupki. German forces occupied the town on June 26, 1941. Only a few of Krupki's Jews managed to flee either by road or by rail at the start of the invasion; the majority found themselves trapped under German occupation, together with some refugees from western Belorussia.

The Germans organized a police force consisting of local inhabitants, which was led by Timofei Svitkovskii, a former officer in the Red Army. A man named Baranovskii became head of the Rayon, and successively, Karon', Pavkovets, and Evtishevskii served as town mayor. The commander of the local punitive detachment was Ivanov. The military commandant was a German officer named Gebel (or Goebel). Belorussians Ivan Dranitsa, Vladimir Khvashchevskii, Mikhail Titovets, Vasilii Koran', Daria Urgulevskaia, Dmitrii Molosai,

Fedor Kondratenko, Vasilii Balbas, Vasilii Asipovets, and Ul'ian Keyzo served in the local police.¹

In July 1941, the Germans organized one of the first ghettos on occupied Belorussian soil in Krupki. The Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto without written permission from the mayor. All Jews were obliged to wear distinguishing marks on their clothing and had to perform forced labor. No detailed information is available on whether the ghetto was guarded or on the existence of a fence enclosing it. However, about 1,000 Jews lived within the ghetto. It appears that the Germans did not make long-term plans for the ghetto and its inhabitants; instead, they used it only as a place to collect and hold Jews temporarily until their extermination. There was also a prison in Krupki for people suspected of concealing Jews or those viewed as disloyal or hostile to German rule.²

The Germans conducted a series of initial killing Aktions against the Jews in Krupki between July and mid-September 1941. The largest Aktion took place at the cemetery, half a kilometer (about a third of a mile) outside Krupki. The Germans murdered more than 100 people, including the elderly, women, and children.³

On September 16, 1941, the German occupying authorities separated the Jewish men from their families and other ghetto inmates, and they threatened to kill them if their relatives failed to produce a ransom in the form of fur clothing.

The Germans conducted the main liquidation Aktion against the ghetto on September 18, 1941. At 7:00 A.M., the Germans gathered all the Jews on the market square near the town council building and declared that they would be sent to Germany for work. The Jews were ordered to take with them only their money and other valuables. They were also told to keep their doors unlocked and to hand the keys to the mayor. All the Jews were checked according to a list. Then the German forces escorted them along Sovetskaia Street in the direction of the village of Lebedevo, leading them off to the swampy bank of the Strazhnitsa River on the other side of the Minsk-Moscow highway. Along the way, many Jews began to suspect their fate once the column passed the railway line and continued on towards the swamp. During the march, everyone was prohibited from stopping or talking; those who disobeyed were beaten with sticks.⁴

The column stopped near Panskoe village, at the First of May kolkhoz in the Shatski sel'sovet, where before the war there had been a quarry and now two large pits had been prepared.⁵ The Jews were ordered to sit down on the ground 50 meters (164 feet) from the pits. The guards ordered some of the prisoners to carry a few wide planks, which were then thrown across the trenches. Then 10 people were chosen, including a woman with two children. The mother carried her baby, 10 or 11 months old, in her arms, while the other child held her hand. The prisoners were escorted to the trench and were ordered to strip down to their underclothing. The Germans put the clothes on trucks and wrenched the children away from their mothers. The Germans ordered the Jews, now undressed, to walk across the planks. Panic began to envelop the crowd, and heartrending screams were heard.

Doomed to die, the Jews turned around and were shot in the head by the guards. A volley of rounds was fired, and 9 Jews fell into the trench. An old man who remained standing was shot again to finish him off. Another officer grabbed a child by his legs and smashed him head first into the ground, then let him fall “like a chick” into the trench.⁶

The Aktion in Krupki was carried out by a section of Einsatzkommando 8 based in Borisov under the command of Werner Schönemann, assisted by the locally based unit of the Wehrmacht. Obergefreiter Richard Heidenreich of the 12th Company, 354th Regiment, made a note in his “diary” about the Aktion in Krupki. The evening before, the senior lieutenant selected 15 men with “strong nerves.” Once they had been informed of their task, they marched to the nearest swamp. The victims were ordered to get into the ditch, and the shooting detail stood over the victims. As Heidenreich describes it: “10 shots were heard and 10 Jews fell down. It continued like this until we had killed them all. Only a few people kept a stiff upper lip. Children clung to their mothers, and women to their husbands. I won’t forget this image for a very long time.”⁷ A large part of the Belorussian police was also present at the Aktion. Commander of the police Svitskovskii, military commandant Gebel, commander of the punitive detachment Ivanov, commander of the Rayon Baranovskii, and policeman Broneslav Zakrevskii all actively participated in the Aktion. According to Maria Shpunt, at first the killing site was surrounded by several hundred guards, but later, once many Jews had been killed, some policemen were permitted to go to the mess hall for dinner.⁸

According to the report of Einsatzgruppe B dated October 25, 1941, 912 Jews were murdered in Krupki that day.⁹ After the shooting, local Belorussians were ordered to bury the corpses. According to Anton Krukovskii (born 1883), the bodies of the dead were placed in rows in two pits: one 60 meters long and 3 meters wide (197 by 9.8 feet), the other 15 meters by 3 meters (49 by 9.8 feet) and just over 1 meter (3.3 feet) deep. The corpses were packed almost to the top of the pits. When the Germans came to bury the people, they killed a man, a woman, and a little boy who were still alive. After covering the pits, the Belorussians were allowed to go home. Individual Jews caught subsequently were also shot.¹⁰

In March 1942, men of Einsatzkommando 8 also shot the Jews in two villages, one north and one south of Krupki. In each case, 15 Jews were shot.¹¹ In 1943, the Germans, with the help of Soviet prisoners of war (POWs), exhumed the mass grave and burned the corpses. Afterwards, the Soviet POWs were murdered.

Some Jews survived the Aktion. Among them were Sofia Shalaumova (born 1920), Maria Shpunt, and her younger son. After counting all those who had been killed, the Germans ordered men from the surrounding villages to cover the mass grave. The work was not finished, however, because some Belorussians noticed that the trench was “breathing” and that they needed to wait. After hearing the shots, Sofia, for example, fell into the trench at the proper time without being wounded. Among the peasants who were burying the bodies, she recognized her acquaintance Nikolai Bogdanov and asked him not to cover her with earth. He did as she asked.¹²

Maria Shpunt tried to persuade the Germans to let her live by claiming that she was not Jewish. While she pleaded for her life, 11 people from her group were killed, and Maria, with her baby, was placed on a pile of breathing bodies as the German soldiers went to get a new group of Jews. The woman took advantage of this pause, crawled out of the pit, and ran into the brush; though the Germans shot at her, she got away unscathed.¹³

SOURCES Information on the Krupki ghetto and the fate of the Jews of Krupki can be found in the following publications: Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech’ i bol’ (Orsha, 1998); “Esli by zemlia mogla govorit’,” Novosti nedeli (Tel Aviv), April 13, 2000; Hannes Heer, Christian Reuther, and Johannes Bacher, eds., “Vernichtungskrieg. Verbrechen der Wehrmacht 1941 bis 1944”: Visuelle Konzeption und Gestaltung der Ausstellung (Hamburg: HIS, 1996). Further details on the war period can be found in the local history publications Pamiats’: Belarus’ (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Kniha, 1995); and Pamiats’: Historyka-dakumental’naia khronika Krupskaho raiona (Minsk, 1999). On the dating of the murder of the Jews in Krupki, see Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 2000), pp. 586–588.

Documentation concerning the murder of the Jews in Krupki under German occupation can be found in the following archives: BA-L; GAMINO (634-1-4, 7, 8, 9, 12; and 686-1-5, 10, 19); GARF; NARA; NARB (861-1-8); YVA (M-33/425); and in the personal archive of the author (PALS) (letters from Petr Antonovich Bulakh and Lubov [Mosinoy] Koichu).

Leonid Smilovitsky
trans. Ilya Bourtman

NOTES

1. YVA, M-33/425, p. 4.
2. GAMINO, 634-1-4, 7-9, 12; and 686-1-5, 10, 19.
3. NARB, 861-1-8, p. 222-a, testimony of Nina Dashkevich (born 1927).
4. YVA, M-33/425, pp. 9–12.
5. “Esli by zemlia mogla govorit’.”
6. PALS, letter from Petr Antonovich Bulakh.
7. Heidenreich diary, Sta. Dortmund, 45 Js 9/64, Verfügung vom Sept. 9, 1969, pp. 3 f., cited in Heer, Reuther, and Bacher, “Vernichtungskrieg,” p. 114.
8. GARF, 7021-87-7.
9. NARA, T-175, reel 234, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 124, October 25, 1941; Heidenreich diary, Sta. Dortmund, 45 Js 9/64, Verfügung vom September 9, 1969, pp. 3 f.; NARB, 861-1-8, p. 222a. See also Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 20 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1979), Lfd. Nr. 573, LG-Köl, 24 Ks 1/63, verdict of May 12, 1964, p. 178.
10. YVA, M-33/425, p. 714.
11. LG-Bonn, 8 Ks 2/62, verdict of February 19, 1964 (published in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 19, (1978) p. 564).
12. PAGV, letter from Sofia Yakovlevna Shalaumova, July 7, 1998.
13. YVA, M-33/425, pp. 8–9.

KUBLICHI

Pre-1941: Kublichy, village, Ushachi raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Kublitschi, Rayon Ushchatschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Kublichy, Ushachy raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Kublichy is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) southwest of Polotsk. Before September 1939, it lay close to the border with Poland. In 1926, it had 546 Jews, according to the population census. The Jewish population of the Ushachi raion (without Ushachi) consisted of 306 people, the bulk of whom lived in Kublichy. Extrapolating from the rate of population decline in the raion in the period 1926–1939, the Jewish population of Kublichy was probably somewhere between 230 and 300 in 1939.

German forces of Army Group Center captured Kublichy on July 3, 1941. There was no organized evacuation. According to survivors, the authorities (among them some Jews) abandoned Kublichy by car after the local unit of the Red Army had left the village. Only a few Jews, mainly men and party or Komsomol members, tried to flee before the Germans entered the village, but almost nobody succeeded.

There was an “interregnum” in Kublichy between the departure of the Soviets and the arrival of the German army. During this period, peasants rushed into Kublichy to rob the abandoned shops and warehouses. According to the survivor Vera Gilman, the peasants tried to prevent the Jews from joining in the plunder. They cried: “Yids, you’ve got riches enough, soon the end will come for you too.”¹

The occupiers appointed local authorities and ordered Jews to register. The registration of Jews was conducted in the square before the Kommandantur and was accompanied by a selection of those fit for work (starting at age 13). There were various kinds of forced labor in Kublichy. Jews were subjected to different forms of abuse; some were killed. For example, according to Gilman, a Jew named Shneiderman appeared at work one day without the yellow patch on his clothing. The Nazis told him to undress and carved a six-pointed star on his back with a knife; when he tried to resist, they killed him (by setting their dogs on him). The Nazis also killed other Jews in Kublichy.

In the fall, most probably in September 1941, the Jews were resettled to Lepelskaia Street; this was the first “ghetto” in Kublichy. The witnesses differ on whether the street was fenced in with barbed wire. The ghetto was not guarded, but there was a high mortality rate among the ghetto inmates.

In the winter of 1941–1942, there was a resettlement of Kublichy Jews to Ushachi. It is unclear from the witness accounts when this resettlement took place. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the Jews of Kublichy were brought to Ushachi together with the Jews of Usaia and Bobynichi in December 1941. Gilman dates this event on December 10, 1941. Nonetheless, both Kublichy survivors Vera Gilman and Nikolai (Kolia) Gilman attest that when they arrived in the ghetto of Ushachi, it was empty, because all the Jews of Ushachi had been killed. This could only mean that the Kublichy Jews arrived in Ushachi in January 1942. So a more probable date for the resettlement is January 1942, maybe even January 12, when the Jews of Ushachi were shot.

Before the resettlement to Ushachi, some Jewish “specialists” were separated and spared in Kublichy for a while. The eyewitnesses, both Jewish and non-Jewish, give varying information on the names and even on the number of those who were spared. Vera Gilman claims that 15 families of specialists (such as carpenters, tailors, and shoemakers) were singled out and placed in a separate house as early as November 1941; at the same time, the rest of the Jews were resettled into the building of the former maternity hospital. The building was guarded by the local police. Some people from the “maternity hospital” were used for labor too. Gilman attests that there was some cleavage between the specialists (who lived under somewhat better conditions than the rest of the Kublichy Jews) and the maternity hospital dwellers. When the latter came to the specialists asking for some bread for their children, the specialists refused, saying: “You will be killed in any case, and we are permitted to live.”

So, according to Gilman, on the day of the resettlement from Kublichy to Ushachi, at 6:00 A.M., the residents of the maternity hospital in Kublichy were driven out of the building and ordered to leave all their warm coats, valenki (warm felt boots), and good clothing behind. Half undressed, they were taken on horse sleds and brought to the Ushachi ghetto. Some people died of exposure on the way. After the deportation of the Jews from Kublichy, a local shop sold Jewish belongings to the Belorussian population.

The new arrivals were settled in the houses of the former Ushachi ghetto; they found the ghetto abandoned by its former inmates. The ghetto was guarded. According to the survivors, the resettled people found graffiti in Yiddish in one of the houses: “They are bringing us to be shot. If somebody survives, let him avenge us” (Undz firt men shisn. Ver vet zikh rateven un bleibn lebn, nemt nekome far undz). Old people put on their talles (prayer shawls) and prayed.

Some days later, the Jews of Kublichy were killed too. On the morning of the day when the Nazis began to drive the Kublichy Jews out of the Ushachi ghetto, somebody set the ghetto on fire. Some of the Kublichy Jews were killed on the spot, and the rest were brought to the same pits on Doletskaia Street where the Ushachi Jews had been killed, and they were shot there. It is unclear when and how the specialist Jews from Kublichy were killed.

The ChGK estimated the total number of Jews killed in Ushachi at 925. This number is almost certainly too high, taking into account that there were only 893 Jews living in Ushachi and its raion in 1939.

SOURCES Relevant publications include Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000).

The documents of the ChGK for the Ushachi raion can be found in GARF (7021-92-223). Eyewitness testimonies can be found in YVA (O-3/2244 and O-3/4708-4717).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTE

1. YVA, O-3/2244.

LAPICHI

Pre-1941: Lapichi, village, Osipovich raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Lapitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Lapichy, Asipovichy raen, Mahilou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Lapichi is located about 60 kilometers (37 miles) northwest of Bobruisk. According to the census of 1926, there were 709 Jews living in the village. By mid-1941, emigration had considerably reduced the Jewish population.

German forces captured the village in early July 1941, two weeks after their invasion of the USSR. During this intervening period, a few Jews managed to evacuate to the east, but many who tried to leave were forced to return by the rapid advance of the German forces.¹ About 300 Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

Throughout the German occupation, from July 1941 to June 1944, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the village. The German commandant established a village authority and an auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. Soon after the occupation, the German commandant ordered the village authority to register and mark the Jews and organize their exploitation for various types of forced labor.

On August 18, 1941, the first Aktion took place, in which a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 shot 107 Jews who were accused of engaging in sabotage and supporting the partisans.² Survivor Inna Viktorovna Voinova, who stayed in Lapichi after her attempt to flee from Minsk was blocked by German forces, recalled that on August 18 (Aviation Day in the Soviet Union) rumors spread that the Red Army would come and save them. Instead, Germans and local police (politsai) surrounded the town and escorted all the Jewish men into the woods and shot them. After this first Aktion, mostly women, children, and the elderly remained in Lapichi, living in constant fear as news of further executions in the region arrived daily.³

Information on whether a ghetto existed in Lapichi is very sparse. According to Voinova, the Germans did not permit Russians and Jews to live together, but otherwise her testimony seems to indicate that most Jews continued to live in their own homes. In January 1942, the Germans and local police surrounded part of the town and gathered all the Jews there into three houses. Everyone expected that this was the end, but most Jews were sent home and ordered to pack up their warm clothing (presumably for donation to the German army). However, 10 or 12 people—some old men and a few teenagers—were kept behind and then shot next to the village fence.⁴

The women and children remained alive until April 1942. Then, in a single day, Germans and local police from Osipovich surrounded the village, gathered all the Jews together, and shot them in a large ditch. More than 140 people were murdered in this Aktion.

Voinova recalls that her survival was due to a fortunate circumstance: "When the Germans came to take everyone away, my Aunt Tonia told them that there was a Russian girl whose parents had been arrested and that she lived in the house. The German ordered me to go to the other half of the house, where a Russian family lived. And so I continued to live."⁵

Different relatives of the famous Yiddish poet Moshe Kulbak died in all three of the Aktions conducted against the Jews of Lapichi, which meant that they were buried in three separate graves.

SOURCES Inna Viktorovna Voinova's recollections of her experiences in Lapichi during the war were published in Sovetish Heymland, no. 8 (1990), and are available in English translation on the Web at www.eilatgordinlevitan.com/kurenets/k_pages/kulbak.html. Other relevant publications include V. Zaitsev and V. Novik, "Iz istorii Kholokosta v Osipovichskom raione," in D.V. Prokudin and Il'ia Al'tman, eds., My ne mozhem molchat'. Shkol'niki i studenty o Kholokoste. Vyp. 4: Sbornik (Moscow: Tsentr i Fond "Kholokost," 2008); Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 1999), p. 568; "Lapichi," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 5: 263-264 (Moscow: Rossiiskaia Akademiia Estestvennykh Nauk, Nauchnyi Fond "Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia," "Epos," 2004); Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 705; and Marat Botvinnik, in Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000).

Documentation on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Lapichi can be found in the following archives: GAMO; GARF (7021-82-5); and NARB.

Alexander Kruglov and Martin Dean
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. See "War Survivors," available at www.levins.info/history/SurvivedWar.html.
2. See the report of the 252nd Infantry Division for August 18, 1941: "Of the total of 179 prisoners, the SD shot: 107 Jews and three partisans," cited in Hannes Heer, "Die Logik des Vernichtungskrieges. Wehrmacht und Partisanenkampf," in Hannes Heer and Klaus Naumann, eds., Vernichtungskrieg. Verbrechen der Wehrmacht 1941–1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 1997), p. 117. According to Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi, 75 Jewish males were shot in a forest near the village in August 1941. In 1993, their remains were reburied in the Jewish cemetery in Osipovich.
3. Testimony of Inna Viktorovna Voinova, born in Minsk in 1931, available at www.eilatgordinlevitan.com/kurenets/k_pages/kulbak.html.
4. Ibid.
5. Ibid.

LENINO

Pre-1941: Lenino (until 1918, Romanovo), village, Gorki raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Gorki, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Lenina, Horki raen, Mahilou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Lenino is located about 75 kilometers (47 miles) to the northeast of Mogilev. In 1923, under the Soviets, the Jewish population of Lenino was 498, of whom 41 worked as artisans, while most others were engaged in agriculture.

German forces of Army Group Center captured the village in the second week of July 1941. According to one witness, about 70 Jews were murdered by the Germans and the politsais (local police) shortly after the arrival of German forces. The Jews who managed to flee from Lenino, as well as some who lived in nearby villages, were then assembled in Lenino (about 60 Jews altogether) and confined in two houses, as a form of small ghetto; they were subsequently transferred to Gorki, probably in the fall of 1941, and murdered there together with the local Jews. Three Jewish “specialists” continued to work for the Germans in Lenino until the summer of 1942, when they were also killed.¹ During the occupation, probably about 140 Jews from Lenino and the surrounding villages were murdered by the German occupying forces and their collaborators.

SOURCES Information on Lenino can be found in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 722; and in Uladzimir M. Liushyts, Isblo u byassmertse Haradotskae Heta (Orsha, 1995) pp. 7–8.

There is a testimony regarding the fate of the Jews in Lenino at YVA (O-3/4666).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTE

1. Stefan Yevmenenko, YVA, O-3/4666.

LEPEL'

Pre-1941: Lepel', town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Lepel, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Lepel', raen center, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Lepel' is located 101 kilometers (63 miles) west-southwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, 1,919 Jews lived in the town, comprising 13.9 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Lepel' raion (without the town of Lepel') was 289 people, the bulk of whom lived in the small town of Kamen'.

German forces (XXXIX Army Corps, Panzer Group 3) entered Lepel' on July 3, 1941. From August 1941, Lepel' was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center, being situated on its western edge, close to the area under “civil administration” (Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien). From August 1941 until July 1942, the Lepel' area lay in the realm of the 403rd Security Division; from July 1942 it fell under the 201st Security Division, with its headquarters in the village of Borovka, northeast of Lepel'. The town of Lepel' was the site of Feldkommandantur 181. In 1941–1942, Ortskommandantur I/851 was based in Lepel'.

The German military authorities appointed Yu.N. Nedelko, a former schoolteacher of physical training, as the mayor of Lepel', and Voitekhovich became head of the Belorussian police.¹

Survivors Roza Fishkina and Semyon Feigelman give good accounts of the situation of the Jews in Lepel' under German occupation. From the start, the Germans shot those whom they suspected were Communists and provoked local people into robbing and murdering Jews.

Both survivors attest that some days after the arrival of the Germans the new authorities introduced the first anti-Jewish measures. One day, early in the morning, they woke up the Jews of Lepel' and assembled them on a boulevard in the town's center for a meeting. All Jews, including small children, old people, and the sick “who had been unable to get up from their beds for several years,” in the words of Fishkina, were told to come to the assembly place. The assembly was accompanied by beatings and other kinds of violence; the boulevard was guarded by German soldiers, so some Jews thought that it was a deportation or mass execution. But once there, the Jews simply had to listen to an officer read out new regulations restricting Jewish life. Among other things, forced labor was introduced. A Jewish committee was appointed with the Jewish elder Gordon at its head.²

A ghetto was established in Lepel' at the end of July 1941. It included the streets Leninskaia, Volodarskaia, Vokzal'naia, and Bannyi Lane (according to another account, Leninskaia, Vokzal'naia, and Kanal'naia Streets). According to Fishkina, the houses in this district of the town were wretched: some of them had neither doors nor windows nor wooden floors. Jews were crammed 30 to 40 people to a house. The ghetto inmates were forbidden to switch on the light, to go out of their houses “without any business,” and to look out of the windows. In winter they were forbidden to take water from wells; they could only melt snow instead. The ghetto inmates did not receive any food.

Every day, the ghetto Jews were escorted to forced labor. On the way they had to sing a song, of which the only words were “Juden kaputt” (the Jews are finished). Fishkina does not mention the Jews being used for any vital or systematic tasks; their work included cleaning the streets of snow, cleaning cesspools without any tools, cutting firewood, transporting bricks, and doing other menial tasks. During the work, “traitors” (local collaborators, most probably, local police) beat the Jews with sticks, trying not to miss anybody.

Germans and politsais (local police) robbed the ghetto Jews of their belongings. As can be inferred from Fishkina's account, Mayor Nedelko imposed a “contribution” of gold and valuables on the ghetto Jews. Raising the contribution proved difficult, and many Jews were killed during the course of its collection. Nedelko may also have tried to extort money from the Jews for protecting them from mass killing. In any case, it is clear that the population, Jewish and non-Jewish, had some knowledge of the forthcoming liquidation of the ghetto.

The ghetto was liquidated on February 28, 1942.³ On the morning of this sunny but very frosty day, the local police, headed by the deputy commander of the Belorussian police in Lepel', Pavel Sorokin, surrounded the ghetto and began to assemble its inhabitants. Later the SS appeared. Some Jews were killed on the spot, which may mean that they put up some resistance. The rest, who, despite the heavy frost, were dressed only in light clothing, were taken in trucks to the killing site: pits near the village of Chernoruch'e, about 5 kilometers (3 miles) south of the town. The initiator of the killing was Obersturmbannführer Wilhelm Wiebens, the head of Einsatzkommando 9. Immediately after the mass murders of Jews in Beshenkovichi and Chashniki, Wiebens turned to the Lepel' Kommandantur with a request to hand over the Jews of Lepel' to him for liquidation. The deputy commandant, Major Hirschberg, tried to object, claiming that he needed these Jews as manpower for constructing a major road (Rollbahn). As a result, two weeks later Wiebens's representative appeared in Lepel' once more with a new order, and the killing took place.⁴ It is unclear what other units, apart from Wiebens's men, took part. Fishkina mentions also that narodniki, or men of the Russian National People's Army (RNNA), participated in the Aktion.

The Vitebsk Regional Commission for Assistance to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated the number of victims as 1,000 or (another estimate) 980 people.⁵ The trial of Einsatzkommando 9 (the main defendant being Wiebens) held in West Berlin in 1966 estimated the number of victims of the Lepel' ghetto at 1,100.⁶

In the village of Kamen', 20 kilometers (12.4 miles) northwest of Lepel', in 1926 there were 426 Jews living in the town (80 percent of the population). There was no formal ghetto in Kamen'. Jews were forbidden to leave the town but continued to live in their own houses. The wearing of yellow stars was introduced. Jews continued to perform agricultural labor at the local kolkhoz.

According to the ChGK, 158 Jews of Kamen' were killed on September 17, 1941. On the day before, the Nazis assembled all the Jews in a building where there had been a wool factory before the war. On September 17, all the male Jews of the town were loaded onto trucks and taken in a northwesterly direction to the cemetery of Borki to dig a mass grave, after which they were killed. Then the Nazis came to the town to take women and children to the massacre site. Before the women were taken to Borki, the teacher Dora Baselovich cried to the others: "Don't believe the Germans! They took the men not for working but for digging pits for us!" The women and children were killed at the same place.⁷ According to the only survivor, Meise (Moisei) Aksentsov, a German officer from the local garrison informed Jews some days before the murder that they would be killed, but nobody ran from the town. On September 17, when he was brought with the other Jewish men of Kamen' to dig the mass grave, Aksentsov shouted, "Run away," attacked a nearby policeman, and hit him on the head with a shovel. The crowd of Jews scattered, but all were mowed down by machine-gunners except for Aksentsov himself, who ran in the direction of the nearby boggy lake, where he succeeded in hiding among the rushes. On this day his wife and four children were killed.⁸

In February 1942, 26 Jews of the village of Pyshno, 16 kilometers (10 miles) northwest of Lepel', were transferred to Lepel' and shot there, together with the local Jews, on February 28.⁹

Elsewhere in the raion, the nine members of the Jewish Fishman and Klibanov families were killed in the Poliany sel'sovet, about 15 kilometers (9.3 miles) east of Lepel'. Six Jews were killed in the village of Zateklias'e, some 12 kilometers (7.5 miles) west of Lepel'. A one-year-old child of mixed parentage was killed in the area of the village Zabolot'e, 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) southeast of Lepel'.

SOURCES In the book by Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), several pages (pp. 35–40, 45–54) deal with the Holocaust in the Lepel' raion. The events in Lepel' were discussed at the trial of members of Einsatzkommando 9 held in West Berlin in 1966, so a description can be found in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 23 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1998).

The documents of the ChGK for the Lepel' raion can be found in GARF (7021-84-104) and GAVO (2088-2-3). Copies can be found also in BA-L (ZStL, Ordn. 423, pp. 280–380) and in YVA (O-53/23). The only extant oral account of the events in Kamen' (although not by an eyewitness) can be found in YVA (O-3/4682).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. GARF, 7021-84-104.
2. Testimony of Roza Fishkina; see ibid. For Feigelman's account, see Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol', pp. 46–48.
3. Both survivors, S. Feigelman and Roza Fishkina, name this day as the date of the last Aktion.
4. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, 23:517. This source erroneously dates the killing on April 28.
5. GARF, 7021-84-104; GAVO, 2088-2-3.
6. Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, 23:517.
7. GAVO, 2088-2-3, pp. 192, 199; Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol', pp. 35–40.
8. YVA, O-3/4682. Aksentsov died in 1955; his story was retold by his nephew Grigorii Raikhelson from Vitebsk, who claims that he heard this story from Aksentsov many times.
9. GAVO, 2088-2-3, p. 190.

LIADY

Pre-1941: Liady, town, Dubrovno raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Ljady, Dubrowno Rayon, Rear Area,

VOLUME II: PART B

Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Liady, Dobrouna raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Liady is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) east-northeast of Orsha. In 1939, 897 Jews lived in Liady, making up 39.2 percent of the population.

Liady was captured by the Germans on July 18, 1941. According to the survivor Vyacheslav (Betsalel) Tamarkin, an evacuation from the town, started by the local authorities on July 14, failed because the Germans advanced rapidly, and the evacuees found themselves caught in the Germans' rear area.¹

Liady suffered greatly in the fighting, and most of its houses were destroyed. The Nazis resettled most of the Jews into a special quarter of the town (a form of "open ghetto"), which was not fenced in; the houses of the area were crammed full of people. A Jewish Council was established. The mayor of the volost' (administrative district) of Liady was Ostapenko.

The occupiers did not disband the "Jewish" kolkhoz, and in the words of Tamarkin, a survivor and a former kolkhoznik, "[f]ormer members of the kolkhoz 'Nayer Lebn' toiled now as slaves for the [German] police chief."² Moreover, the Nazis did not force the Jewish kolkhozniks to wear the patch in the form of the Star of David on the chest and on the back, which they forced on the rest of the Liady Jews. Thus the Jewish kolkhozniks were perceived as "privileged" Jews, and it was rumored that all the Jews of Liady would be killed, but the agricultural workers would be spared.³ Sometime later, at the end of the summer, however, the Jewish kolkhozniks were also resettled into the Jewish area of the town.

There was a flour mill in Liady, and the Germans let the old Jewish millers stay there. The millers, Bogorad and Minkin, were allowed to ask the Jewish Council for whatever number of Jewish workers they "needed" to load the flour for the Germans. Although the Jews were forbidden to mill rye for themselves, and the Belorussian police and narodniki (Russian National People's Army [RNNA] men) kept an eye on this, the mill workers managed to provide the Jews of Liady with grain.⁴

Later in the fall of 1941, the Germans drove groups of Jews, including former kolkhozniks, to forced labor: cobbling the main street of Liady with bricks. During this work, the Jews were forbidden to carry bricks in barrows; to work in gloves; to use such tools as picks, shovels, and crowbars; or even to stand up straight.⁵

Sometime in the fall of 1941, the Germans carried out their first killing Aktion; the survivor Faina Kogan (née Velikovskaia) dates it on September 27, 1941. Some days prior to this, they caught several Jewish youths (Sara Malkina, Tanya Kalner, Isaak Kuznetsov, Izya Yukhvich, and three people who were not from Liady) who had left the ghetto and gone east—according to one version, to form a partisan unit, according to another, to cross the front line. The Germans gathered the young Jewish people of the town and abused them. They forced a group of young men to crawl along the main street without using their arms and legs. Another group was sent to a nearby hollow to dig a pit there. Then they gathered all the Jews of Liady at this hollow and brought the seven Jews who had been arrested and publicly shot them in the pit.

The next morning, the Germans once more assembled all the Jews at the local Jewish cemetery. Tamarkin writes:

[T]he Nazis started sorting out people into women, men, and children. They separated the young boys from the girls, forming two columns, and brought them to the benches. They would put a girl on one bench and a boy on the other one; then they whipped them with rods. After the whipping they threw everyone into a barn. . . . The men of the punitive squad announced that they would free the youngsters if the Jews collected a certain amount of gold and silver valuables by the morning. They picked 29 "intellectuals" from the men's group, took them away and shot them behind the new Jewish cemetery.⁶

In March 1942 the local police and narodniki resettled the Jews of Liady into a school building that had been prepared in advance: the windows were boarded up with planks, and the building was surrounded with barbed wire; in the corners of this fence, watchtowers were erected. The prisoners of this new "ghetto" received neither food nor water; according to an eyewitness, the people were crammed together so densely inside the building that it was impossible to lie down. Sometimes the Nazis took some people from the ghetto for work; this allowed the Jews to get some food. Typhus epidemics broke out in the ghetto, and many prisoners died.⁷

At the end of March, it was rumored in the ghetto that the Germans had driven local peasants to deepen antitank ditches on the eastern, Russian side of the Mereia River. This rumor compelled some people to flee the ghetto. On April 2, 1942, the Jews of the Liady ghetto were brought across the Mereia to the Russian side and shot there.⁸

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 1,860 Jews were killed in Liady; this is probably an exaggeration, even taking into account that some Jews were brought to Liady or came there by themselves from nearby villages and that some Jewish refugees from Poland remained in the town under the occupation.

The village of Baevo is situated 28 kilometers (17.4 miles) southeast of Dubrovno, or 13 kilometers (8.1 miles) south of Liady at the border with Russia. No ghetto was established there; the local Jews were mainly agricultural workers. In early October 1941 a "punitive squad" arrived in Baevo from Gorki (Mogilev oblast'). The squad assembled all the Jews from the village, escorted them to the Mereia River (the border with Russia), and shot them in an antitank ditch near the village of Pakhomovo.⁹ According to the ChGK, 115 Jews were killed here. The ChGK compiled a list of 34 Jewish households annihilated by the Nazis in Baevo.

A mixed Russian-Jewish family, the Bruevs, was hidden in the village. In March 1942, the Jewish mother and her three daughters of mixed parentage were transferred to the ghetto of Liady; the Russian father was left behind. Remarkably, the latter, Boris Mefodievich Bruev, managed to ransom his daughters from the Liady police and bring them back to Baevo. In another mixed family, the punitive squad murdered the Jewish mother in October 1941, but her fair-haired children were spared. In March 1942 they were also transferred to Liady.¹⁰

In Rossasno, the Jews were first assembled in the building of a local school, which was guarded by the indigenous police. On April 2, 1942, they were brought in horse-drawn sledges to Liady and killed together with the local Jews.¹¹ According to the records compiled by the ChGK, 74 Jews were killed.

SOURCES The book of memoirs by V.L. Tamarkin, Eto bylo ne vo sne (Moscow, 1998), deals with the Holocaust in Liady. A short essay by Gennadii Vinnitsa, “Liadniaskoe getto,” appeared in Evrei Belarusi: Istoriia i kul'tura 1 (1997): 128–133. In the book by the same author, G. Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), several pages (pp. 16–31) deal with the Holocaust in the Dubrovno raion.

German documentation concerning Liady may be found in BA-MA (RH 26-707/15). In the 1980s, an amateur historian, a school principal from Liady named Lev Erenburg, collected witness accounts and newspaper clippings pertaining to the Holocaust in Liady. Parts of this archive were copied and brought to YVA (O-3/4670). The papers of Vyacheslav Tamarkin are located in USHMM (RG-10.094). Documents of the ChGK can be found in GARF (7021-84-6); a video testimony can be found at VHF.

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. Tamarkin, Eto bylo ne vo sne, p. 62; see also YVA, O-3/4670.
2. Tamarkin, Eto bylo ne vo sne, p. 99.
3. Ibid., p. 87.
4. Ibid., p. 104.
5. Ibid., p. 102.
6. Ibid., pp. 113–114; see also YVA O-3/4670. According to Kogan (Velikovskaia), whose father Zalman Velikovskii was also among the “intellectuals” shot by the Nazis, they selected 27 people.
7. Tamarkin, Eto bylo ne vo sne, pp. 116–118.
8. GARF, 7021-84-6; Krasnoarmeiskaia Pravda, October 31, 1943.
9. Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol', p. 16.
10. Ibid., pp. 16–17.
11. Ibid., p. 29. See also Rossasno.

LIOZNO

Pre-1941: Liozno, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Liosno, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Liozna, raen center, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Liozno is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) east-southeast of Vitebsk. In 1939, according to the last pre-war census, 711 Jews lived in the town, making up 17.3 percent of the population.

The Jewish population of the Liozno raion (without the town of Liozno) constituted 691 people, the bulk of whom lived in the villages of Kolyshki, Babinovichi, and Dobromysli. Based on the Jewish population of these towns in 1930 (951 in Kolyshki, 262 in Babinovichi, and 204 in Dobromysli), there were probably around 420 Jews in Kolyshki, 115 in Babinovichi, and 85 in Dobromysli at the start of the war.

Liozno was captured by German units of the V Army Corps, 9th Infantry Army, on July 16, 1941; Dobromysli was the site of heavy fighting, and it was captured on July 19.

The Liosno Rayon became part of Rear Area, Army Group Center. An Ortskommandantur was established in Liozno, with Hildebrant as the commandant.¹ The chief of the local police in Liozno was Chepik, later Piskunov. Another officer of the local police, Konstantin Turkov, played an instrumental role in the murder of the Jews in Rayon Liosno, as did his subordinates Liarskii, Savitskii, Karavaev, Popov, Seleznev, and others. Some Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) witnesses describe Turkov as a sadist who boasted of killing 500 people with his own hands. The starosta (village elder) of Kolyshki was Roman Korotkii; a survivor characterizes

The Vinogradov family poses in a garden with Polina, the Jewish girl from Liozno whom they saved and adopted (after 1945). Mother Yuliana and daughter Iraida (later Savelieva) were recognized as Righteous Among the Nations in 1997 by Yad Vashem.

USHMM WS #57695, COURTESY OF JFR

1700 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

him as a man with a measure of conscience who had some compassion for the Jews.

On December 5, 1941, the Soviet counteroffensive from Moscow began. In January 1942, the Soviet 4th Shock Army (under the command of Colonel General A. Eremenko) struck a blow at the junction of German Army Groups Center and North, one of the weakest points of the German front, aiming to recapture Vitebsk. After a number of successful advances, in the first days of February, units of the 4th Shock Army broke through to the approaches of Vitebsk and stopped 5 kilometers (3.1 miles) outside the city. A corridor (the so-called Surazh gate) emerged between Usviaty and Velizh, on the Belorussian-Russian border. On February 6, the Soviet 358th Infantry Division reached Ponizov'e (Russia), close to Liozno and Ianovich. In February, a Soviet reconnaissance unit appeared in Kolyshki.² Some days later, in the course of their counteroffensive, the Germans regained Kolyshki and drove back the advanced Soviet units 30 kilometers (18.6 miles) away from Vitebsk.

Liozno is situated on the highway between Vitebsk and Smolensk; thus many Jewish refugees from Vitebsk, Minsk, Bobruisk, and Orsha were there when the Germans captured it. The refugees swelled the town's Jewish population. During the fighting, some of the town's dwellings were burned. The occupiers ordered Jews to wear armbands bearing a Star of David and resettled them into a ghetto. The ghetto consisted of 30 to 40 houses along one street; the survivor B. Chernyakov estimates its population at 600. In winter the situation in the ghetto deteriorated considerably. Chernyakov writes:

The police burst into ghetto houses in the winter at any time of the day or night. They broke the windows, beat the Jews with sticks and whips, and chased them out into the freezing cold. Not a single pane remained in one of the houses where there had formerly been a cobbler's shop, even though 40 people lived in that house in -40° Centigrade [-40° Fahrenheit] weather. Infested with lice, the people slept on rotten, wormy straw. A typhoid [sic., typhus] epidemic began. Several people died every day.

According to the same eyewitness, in the fall of 1941 the Germans arrested, abused, and shot six aged Jewish men.³ In addition, sometime during the winter, Vulf Grinshtein, a Jew married to a non-Jew, was killed. The politsai (local policeman) Yevgenii Lyarskii came to Grinshtein's wife and demanded "gold and a gold watch." When she refused, Lyarskii threatened to kill her or her husband. Some days later, Lyarskii came into Grinshtein's house with several other policemen and once more demanded gold. When the Grinshteins refused, the policemen beat up Grinshtein and shot him.⁴

At the end of February 1942, at the request of the local Ortskommandantur, the ghetto in Liozno was liquidated. Some days before (various accounts date it on February 23, 24, or 27), a six-man German squad from Einsatzkommando 9, accompanied by a detachment of the Liozno auxiliary police headed by Turkov, appeared in the town. In the night, the town was surrounded by the police, some of whom assembled the ghetto Jews in a big barn on Komsomolskaia Street. During the night, 20 people froze to death in the barn. On February 24 (or 25 or 28), the police started moving the people from the barn to the Adamenki Ravine (2 or 3 kilometers [about 1.5 miles] northwest of Liozno) and shooting them there. The Jews of Liozno were killed together with the Jews of the surrounding villages. The killing was conducted mainly by the local police. Before the killing, the police ordered the Jews to undress. According to a situation report of Einsatzgruppe B, 361 people were killed at that time. After the liquidation of the Liozno Jews, their belongings were sold in a local shop to the non-Jewish population.⁵

Taking into account that some Liozno Jews were killed before the last Aktion and that, according to Chernyakov, the mortality from disease in the ghetto was high in the winter months, we can assume that many more than 361 Jews perished in Liozno. Chernyakov may be close to the real number of victims when he estimates that 600 Jews were concentrated in the Liozno ghetto and met their deaths in 1941–1942.

On February 25 or 27 (according to various sources), a police unit headed by Turkov appeared in Babinovich (27 kilometers [16.8 miles] southwest of Liozno). The squad took "more than 20" Jews from the village and escorted them on horse sledges to Adamenki; however, the politsais shot most of them on the way. The list compiled by the ChGK gives 26 names of Jews killed; it is unclear whether the list is complete.⁶

The roughly 40 (36 according to the ChGK) Jews of the village of Dobromysli (15 kilometers [9.3 miles] southwest of Liozno) were assembled into one house and then shot at the end of February 1942 in the Adamenki Ravine by a Belorussian police unit that came from Liozno. See also Kolyshki for information on the fate of the Jews in that village.

Elsewhere in the Liozno raion, no fewer than 15 Jews were killed in the village of Ryzhiki, Babinovich sel'sovet (26 kilometers [16 miles] southwest of Liozno); at least 9 Jews were killed in the Sutoki sel'sovet (8 kilometers [5 miles] southwest of Liozno); in the Zamsheno sel'sovet (15 kilometers [9.3 miles] north of Liozno), 6 Jews were killed, members of the Altman family. In Emelianovo, 18 kilometers (11.2 miles) north of Liozno, 20 people were killed in the winter of 1942; it is unclear whether they were Jews. There are some indications that in Veleshkovichi (12 kilometers [7.5 miles] north of Liozno, Zamsheno sel'sovet) a number of Jews were killed by local inhabitants or at least with their assistance.⁷

SOURCES The events in Liozno are mentioned in I. Ehrenburg and V. Grossman, eds., The Black Book (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981), pp. 240–241. On the military operations in this region during the winter of 1941–1942, see A.I. Eremenko, V nachale voiny (Moscow, 1964), pp. 434–440.

The documents of the ChGK for the Liozno raion can be found in GARF (7021-84-8); relevant German documents can be found in BStU (ZUV 9, Bd. XXXI); and BA-MA (RW 46/499).

Daniel Romanovsky

NOTES

1. The ChGK documents identify it as OK I/991.
2. GARF, 7021-84-8.
3. B. Chernyakov's letter, in Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 240.
4. GARF, 7021-84-8, witness Kulagina.
5. The majority of the witnesses interrogated by the ChGK date the Aktion on February 23–28. According to them, some of the Liozno Jews were killed on February 24 or 25, the others, on the following days; see ibid. Contrary to that, Einsatzgruppe B's Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht (BStU, ZUV 9, Bd. XXXI, pp. 176ff), as well as Chernyakov's letter, date the whole action on February 28.
6. GARF, 7021-84-8; Ehrenburg and Grossman, The Black Book, p. 240.
7. Rumors about a killing of Jews in Veleshkovichi circulated in Vitebsk in 1941; see YVA, O-3/4720.

LIPEN'

Pre-1941: Lipen' (formerly Kholui), village, Osipovich raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Lipen, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Lipen', Asipovichy raen, Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Lipen' is located 40 kilometers (25 miles) northwest of Bobruisk. According to the 1926 census, Lipen' had a Jewish population of 441. By 1941, migration had slightly reduced that number.

Units of Army Group Center captured the village in early July 1941, two weeks after Germany's invasion of the USSR. During this intervening period, some of the Jews managed to evacuate to the east, while men eligible for military service were drafted into the Red Army. Slightly more than 200 Jews remained in the village at the start of the German occupation.

During the entire occupation period, from July 1941 to June 1944, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the village. The German military administration appointed a village head and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from among local residents.

Soon after the occupation of Lipen', the Ortskommandantur ordered the registration of the Jews, who were made to wear yellow stars. They were also required to perform various kinds of forced labor. In August 1941, all the Jews in the village were moved into a ghetto consisting of several houses.

Descriptions of the ghetto by two Jewish survivors present certain inconsistencies. According to Vladimir Kasperskii, the ghetto was on one street that ran from the club to the river. It was surrounded by a fence and guarded by the local police.¹ Sarra Kossperskaia, on the other hand, who was married to a Russian with whom she continued to live, maintains that the whole village was a ghetto and that it was not fenced in. She states that there was no heat, little food, and no ration cards. There were also a few Jewish refugees in the ghetto from places farther to the west. Local policemen entered the ghetto and robbed the Jews.²

The ghetto in Lipen' existed for about two months. German forces liquidated the ghetto in October 1941 by shooting all the Jews, a total of more than 200 people. Some Jews tried to hide at the time of the roundup, but most were uncovered with the help of the local police. The Jews were shot close to the Svisloch' River.

SOURCES Publications regarding the fate of the Jews of Lipen' during the Holocaust include the following: Shmuel Spec-tor and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 734; Marat Botvin-nik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belarускаia Navuka, 2000), p. 304; "Lipen'," in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia, vol. 5 (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2004).

Documentation on the persecution and murder of the Jews of Lipen' can be found in these archives: GAMO; GARF (7021-82-5); NARB; RTKIDNI (69-9-14); USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 24); and VHF (# 32020 and 44150).

Alexander Kruglov
trans. Kathleen Luft

NOTES

1. VHF, # 32020, testimony of Vladimir Kasperskii.
2. Ibid., # 44150, testimony of Sarra Kossperskaia.

LIUBAN'

Pre-1941: Liuban', town and raion center, Liuban' raion, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Ljuban, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Liuban', raen center, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Liuban' is situated 152 kilometers (94 miles) south-southeast of Minsk. In 1939, the Jewish population of the town was 1,077. In addition, 214 Jews lived in the villages of the Liuban' raion.

Liuban' was occupied by units of the German army on July 8, 1941. On August 2, 1941, an unknown German military unit arrived in Liuban' and gathered the adult males of the town in the courtyard of the kolkhoz. The Germans then selected all the Jews, some 150 to 200 men, loaded them onto trucks, and drove them off in the direction of the village of Kostuki. Later that day, it became known that the Germans had shot the men in gravel pits between Kostuki and Dub-niki, about 7 kilometers (4.4 miles) from Liuban'. Among those murdered were Giler Retschin, Alter Levin, and Aron Kustanovich. Following this first Aktion, many of the remaining Jewish men went into hiding.¹

The head of the local police in Liuban' was Aleksandr Gi-dronovich. The Germans shot him in 1943, apparently for aiding the Soviet partisans.²

At the beginning of September 1941, the German authori-ties concentrated the Jews of Liuban' and the surrounding area into a ghetto on the west side of town. The ghetto was in a sepa-rate quarter behind the market square around Pervomaiskaia

1702 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

Street and was surrounded by barbed wire. About 1,000 people were confined within the ghetto. Each house contained three or four families. German soldiers from the Ortskommandantur and local policemen guarded the ghetto.³ On German orders, all inhabitants of the ghetto had to wear a yellow star on the front and back of their clothing. Jews could not leave the ghetto without an escort, not even to buy food. Every day the Germans forced adult Jews to work cleaning the streets, repairing roads, digging military defenses, and performing other tasks. The German authorities also spread virulent propaganda against the Jews.

In the fall of 1941, German forces repeatedly entered the ghetto to conduct pogroms, beating Jews without reason and stealing their property. Germans from the local commandant's office demanded "contributions" in gold from the Jewish elder, Boris Molina, threatening to shoot the Jews if their demands were not met. On several occasions, gold was collected and handed in to the commandant's office. The Germans also arrested and shot some non-Jewish Soviet activists, as reported by a certain Mayevski, who was only wounded and managed to escape.⁴

On November 8, 1941, after an attack on Liuban' by Soviet partisans during the night of November 6–7 (in honor of the day of the October Revolution), the German garrison, reinforced by German troops from Urech'e, together with the local police arrested up to 50 Jewish men and shot them the same day. Among the innocent people murdered in this reprisal Aktion were Josef Levin, Samuel Gurevich, David Epstein, and Hayim Lvovitch.⁵

Fanya Lvovitch described the desperate predicament of those who remained just prior to the liquidation of the ghetto: "Escaping from Liuban' was impossible. First, there was nowhere to run to. Jews had no safe haven. Second, for every Jew who escaped they murdered 100 others."⁶

At the beginning of December 1941, a German punitive unit consisting of more than 100 SS men arrived in Liuban'. It was rumored that they came from Glusk, where they had just killed all the Jews. For three days, together with soldiers of the commandant's office, they plundered the ghetto, beating the Jews and demanding their valuables. Then on December 4, 1941, the German forces surrounded the ghetto, together with the local police, and began to drive all the ghetto inmates out onto Pervomaiskaia Street.

Survivors of the massacre, Mot Kustanovich and part of his family, managed to hide in a bunker they had prepared. During the remainder of the day and the next two days, they heard shots from rifles and machine pistols, as well as victims pleading for their lives. More than 1,000 residents of the ghetto, mostly women, children, and the elderly, were murdered on December 4. Most were escorted out of town in a large column and were murdered near the Machine Tractor Station (MTS) on the edge of town. The graves were dug and filled in by local residents, who saw children's clothing strewn by the wayside on the road back to town. Over the following days Jews uncovered in hiding were either shot inside the ghetto or taken to the mill by the peat marsh on the west of town and murdered there. The Kustanovich family is known to have hidden successfully until the night of December 9–10, when they fled under cover of darkness to join the Soviet partisans.⁷

SOURCES The yizkor book for Slutsk, N. Chinitz and Sh. Nachmani, eds., Pinkas Slutsk u-benoteba (Tel Aviv: Yizkor Book Committee, 1962), contains some information regarding the Jewish community of Liuban', including a letter by Fanya [Lvovitch] concerning the events of the Holocaust. Information regarding memorial sites in the town can be found in Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaia Navuka, 2000), p. 70.

Information on the destruction of the Jews of Liuban' can be found in the following archives: BA-L (ZStL/II 202 AR-Z 56/75); and GARF (7021-87-5).

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-L, II 202 AR-Z 56/75, Bd. I, pp. 28–31, statement of Mot S. Kustanovich on May 5, 1969, pp. 32–35, and statement of Nikolay Lagun on May 8, 1969. Chinitz and Nachmani, Pinkas Slutsk u-benoteba, pp. 456–457, Fanya [Lvovitch], "A letter from Lyuban" (translated from Yiddish by Paul Pascal), gives the figure of 200 for this first Aktion.

2. BA-L, II 202 AR-Z 56/75, Bd. I, pp. 22–27, statement by Makar Suchan on April 29, 1969. Suchan served in the local police from the end of November 1941 to the summer of 1944.

3. On August 9, 1941, the Ortskommandantur in Liuban' was OK I/685 (BA-MA, RH/26/221-17), but especially during the initial German advance, the military commandant's offices changed location quite frequently.

4. BA-L, II 202 AR-Z 56/75, Bd. I, pp. 22–44.

5. Ibid.; Fanya [Lvovitch] ("A letter from Lyuban"), who lost her father in this Aktion, dates it on November 8.

6. Fanya [Lvovitch], "A letter from Lyuban."

7. BA-L, II 202 AR-Z 56/75, Bd. I, pp. 22–44.

MAR'INA GORKA

Pre-1941: Mar'ina Gorka, town and center, Pukhovichi raion, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Marjina Gorka, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Mar'ina Horka, center, Pukhavichy raen, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Mar'ina Gorka is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) southeast of Minsk. According to the 1939 census, there were 786 Jews living in Mar'ina Gorka.

Mar'ina Gorka was occupied by units of the German army at the beginning of July 1941. As the Red Army was retreating, local inhabitants killed 11 Soviet soldiers. Sometime in August 1941, about 70 or 80 inhabitants of Mar'ina Gorka (mostly Jewish men) were arrested and taken to the police courtyard where they were held captive and systematically abused for one week. The Germans cut off their beards, cut stars into their heads, forced them to crawl, and beat them with rifle butts, whips, and sticks. Among those held was a Jew named Isaak Fried, who with the others was forced to eat grass and jump from a roof. After about a week, the captives were driven to the cemetery and shot.¹

At the end of August or in early September 1941, the German authorities established a ghetto in Mar'ina Gorka in the area of Gorky Street, May 1 Street, and Soviet Street. Some 600 people were confined within the ghetto, mainly women, children, and the elderly. The local population was forbidden to enter the ghetto, and Jews were forbidden all contact with their former neighbors.²

In the second half of September 1941, Gendarmerie Wachtmeister Bruno Mittmann drove to Mar'ina Gorka from Minsk together with some 20 Gendarmes and 27 Schutzpolizei (Schupo) to carry out an Aktion against the local Jewish population. In charge of the Aktion was SS-Brigadeführer Carl Zenner, as well as Gendarmerie Leutnant Karl Kalla. The Aktion had been ordered personally by the newly appointed Generalkommissar in Weissruthenien, Wilhelm Kube.³

Early in the morning, the Germans and local policemen surrounded the ghetto and forced the Jews to assemble on Lenin Square. The people were beaten severely, and children cried and screamed; those who could not walk were dragged along by the others. The Jews were then loaded onto trucks and conveyed to the Blon' Collective Farm just north of Mar'ina Gorka. One woman, Goda Kogan, called out to a non-Jewish friend as she was driven away: "Live well! We won't see each other again!" Another Jewish woman sprang from the moving truck into the river and was shot by the German guards.⁴

At Blon', the Jews were made to undress in a pigsty and then taken up the hill of Popova Gorka in groups of 10 to be shot with machine guns. The Jews from the nearby Pukhovichi ghetto were also escorted to Blon' on foot that day and were shot together with those from Mar'ina Gorka. Children were thrown into the grave and buried alive. According to one account, some women were raped before they were shot. The shootings lasted nearly all day. The Germans attempted to drown out the noise of the shooting by running tractor engines.

The Rayon mayor, Leonid Derban, was present at the killing site. Clothing and other valuables taken from the victims were loaded onto trucks and taken to Mar'ina Gorka. These items were subsequently sold at the communal shop or stolen by the police. Some 67 Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) were also taken to the killing site on trucks later in the day, and the Germans shot them in a separate mass grave next to the Jews.⁵

The German Einsatzgruppen report states that the Aktion against the Jews in Mar'ina Gorka "became necessary because the Jews were sabotaging all the instructions issued by the occupying authorities. The work assigned to them was done with great reluctance. Nine hundred and ninety-six Jewish men and women were given 'special treatment' in order to break this spirit of resistance."⁶ Of these, probably some 500 came from the Mar'ina Gorka ghetto and the rest from nearby Pukhovichi. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report estimates 970 bodies in one grave and 67 in another nearby.⁷

Bruno Mittmann (born 1901) was tried in Minsk in 1946 for the murder of the Jews in Mar'ina Gorka and Pukhovichi, among other crimes. The Soviet authorities sentenced him to death and hanged him.⁸ Local policeman Nikifor L. Moshenok was convicted in 1946 for service in the German police. In his interrogations, he admitted guarding the Jews during their roundup and execution but denied having personally taken part in the shooting.⁹ In the records examined for this entry, no mention of Jewish survivors could be found.

SOURCES Documentation on the destruction of the Jewish population of Mar'ina Gorka can be found in the following archives: BA-BL; BA-L (II 202 179/67 and 202 AR-Z 60/70); GAMINO (15-3-457); GARF (7021-87-12); NARA; NARB; USHMM (e.g., RG-53.002M, reel 12); and YVA.

Martin Dean

NOTES

1. BA-L, ZStL, II 202 179/67, Dok. Bd. I, statements of Olga Androsik, on March 25, 1968, and Sinaida Bartasevich, on December 18, 1945.

2. Ibid.

3. BA-L, ZStL, II 202 179/67, pp. 132–133: Bruno Mittmann at the Minsk trial in January 1946 dated the Aktion on September 28, 1941; Dok. Bd. I, p. 120, Nina Sinoveyna, a local inhabitant of Mar'ina Gorka, dated it on September 24. The ChGK report of September 28, 1944 (USHMM, RG-53.002M, reel 12 [GAMINO, 15-3-457]), gives the date of September 17, 1941; USHMM, RG-30, Accession 1999.A.0196 (NARA, RG-242, T-175), reel 234, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 124, October 25, 1941. The reason for this intervention by Kube may be related to a previous Einsatzgruppen report about the Jews of the Marina Borka [sic] district fleeing to the woods, joining with the partisans and plundering the area; see Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 108, October 9, 1941.

4. BA-L, ZStL, II 202 179/67, pp. 87–94, statements of Sinaida Bartasevich and Valentina Cherepko in December 1945.

5. Ibid., Dok. Bd. II, statements of Mikhail A. Koreny and Sinaida K. Bartasevich in September 1944.

6. USHMM, RG-30, Accession 1999.A.0196, reel 234, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 124, October 25, 1941.

7. USHMM, RG-53.002M, reel 12 (GAMINO), 15-3-457. The report includes a sketch of the grave site near Blon'.

8. Records from the Minsk trial can be found in USHMM, RG-06.025 (Selected Records of the FSB concerning war crimes investigations and trials in the Soviet Union).

9. BA-L, ZStL, II 202 179/67, Dok. Bd. I, p. 126, statement of Nikifor L. Moshenok, July 11, 1946.

MOGILEV

Pre-1941: Mogilev, city, raion, and oblast' center, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Mogilew, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Mahiliou, raen and voblasts' center, Republic of Belarus

Mogilev is located about 200 kilometers (124 miles) east of Minsk. According to the census of 1939, Mogilev's 19,715 Jews made up 19.8 percent of the city's population.

The German invasion of the Soviet Union prompted the evacuation to the east of a considerable number of Jews and the conscription of part of the male Jewish population into the Red Army. The exact number of Jews remaining in Mogilev at the start of the occupation is not known.

Units of the Wehrmacht entered Mogilev on July 26, 1941. Occupied Mogilev was at first located in Panzer Group 2's zone of operations and then came under Rear Area, Army Group Center. Authority in the city was divided between the local commandant's office (Ortskommandantur I/292 under Major Krantz) and the field commandant's office (Feldkommandantur 191 under Oberst Jatschwitz), with the former subordinated to the latter. Later, they were replaced by Ortskommandantur I/843 (1942–1943), Ortskommandantur I/906 (1943), and Feldkommandantur 813 (April 1942–1943).

In the very first days of the occupation, the Germans imposed a number of restrictions on the Jews in Mogilev, including a curfew, markings on their clothes, and forced labor. The creation of a Judenrat by the Nazis further isolated the Jews.

In early August 1941 the Germans registered the city's Jewish population, which, according to the witness testimony of N.G. Sorkin, documented 14,000 Jewish residents.¹ The Judenrat was forced to take an active part in implementing this measure. The occupiers then used this information to prepare the lists of persons for execution.

The Jews were divided into three categories. In the first group were those considered capable of heading up a resistance movement or becoming active participants in the anti-Fascist struggle. They were executed first, with 80 Jews being killed in August 1941 by Einsatzkommando 8 under Dr. Otto Bradfisch.² Among the victims were party workers Astrov and Khavkin and business manager Rozenberg.

The second category included the bulk of the Jewish population, which initially had been subjected to confinement in an isolated area. On August 13, 1941, a notice appeared, Jewish women carrying bundles walk towards an assembly point in Mogilev, 1941.

USHMM WS #68378, COURTESY OF GFH

signed by the head of the city authority, Felitsin: "By order of the Herr Kommandant of the city of Mogilev, all persons of Jewish nationality, both genders, are to leave the city limits within 24 hours and relocate to the Ghetto zone. All persons failing to comply with the stated order in the stated period of time will be forcibly moved by the police and the property of those people will be confiscated."³

Mogilev's Jews, or a great many of them, were herded into the ghetto on Grazhdanskaia Street in the Podnikol'e quarter. Jews from Kniashitsy and the Vorotyn' area were also relocated here.⁴ In September 1941, the ghetto was moved to the bank of the Dubrovenka River, with borders running from Bykhovskii Market to Vilenskaia Street (later Lazarenko Street). Mayor Felitsin selected the territory for the ghetto. A small number of Jews left Mogilev upon hearing of the relocation to the ghetto.

Bada Iudina went to Mstislavl', where she soon found herself among prisoners of the ghetto there. To save herself, she claimed to be a Belarussian woman and was sent to work in Germany.⁵ A student from the Mogilev Pedagogical Institute, Inessa Parkhovnikova, set out for the village of Polykovichi, where she hid with a friend's family.

Confinement to the ghetto was accompanied by the killing of Jews as well. People were shot on the doorstep of their own homes. According to a German Security Police report, "[I]n Mogilev, the Jews also tried to sabotage their resettlement into the ghetto. One hundred and thirteen Jews were liquidated."⁶

Between 40 and 60 people were forced into each house in the ghetto on the Dubrovenka. Foodstuffs were not provided. Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto. The ghetto was a "closed ghetto" and was guarded by the Feldgendarmarie and Belorussian policemen. All those who were capable of work were sent to do hard physical labor. Young people were regularly beaten, while old men were mocked and their beards and mustaches were shorn. The shooting was almost continuous. Accused of impertinent behavior, 337 Jewish women were executed.⁷ Two Jews were killed because they were not wearing the yellow patch. Another 2 were shot as alleged agents of the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD). Three Jews were shot after being discovered with explosive material, and 4 for refusing to work. Eight Jews were accused of incitement and propaganda and then shot.

According to several sources, besides the ghetto on the Dubrovenka River, there were other places for concentrating Mogilev's Jews, which appeared in September–October 1941 somewhere on Vilenskaia Street and in an enclosed part of a field next to where the Hotel Mogilev stands today.⁸ These should be classified as holding places for victims before execution. A longer period of confinement is connected with the Dimitrov Factory (Strommashina).

In October 1941, the occupiers carried out two Aktions aimed at the destruction of the ghetto on the Dubrovenka River. The first mass killing took place on October 2 and 3, 1941. The executioners were from Einsatzkommando 8, Police Battalions 316 and 322, Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft Battalion 51, and a police detachment called “Waldenburg.” In all, 2,073 Jews were shot. The first 65 Jews were killed right in the ghetto on October 2. The remaining 2,008 people were first driven into the Dimitrov Factory and then shot on October 3, 1941, in the Mashekovskii Jewish cemetery.⁹

The second Aktion was carried out on October 19, 1941. Einsatzkommando 8, Police Battalion 316, and Ukrainian Schutzmannschaft Battalion 51 all participated in the Aktion. This mass shooting, which claimed the lives of 3,726 Jews, took place predominantly in the villages of Kazimirovka and Novoe Pashkovo.¹⁰ The annihilation of the ghetto inmates followed approximately the same scenario in both cases: “Fall of 1941. When it was already very cold, the Germans arrived in the ghetto in many vehicles, and began to force the Jews from their homes and load them onto the motor vehicles. Screams, noise, crying arose from the ghetto. Those who were not able to walk were shot on the spot. I saw this with my own eyes. All the vehicles were covered with a tarpaulin.”¹¹ The exact date on which the 4,800 Jews reportedly murdered in Polykovichi took place remains unresolved.

In Mogilev, the Germans used “mobile gas chambers” or “gas vans” to kill some of their victims. This instrument of death looked like a large, black-colored enclosed truck. They killed people by feeding the vehicle’s own exhaust fumes into the hermetically sealed chamber where the victims were held.¹²

After the liquidation of the ghetto on the Dubrovenka River, remaining Jewish property there was plundered. The deserted homes were combed in the search for valuables, high-quality clothing, and household objects.

The destruction of the ghetto on the Dubrovenka River marks the end of what is conventionally seen as the first phase in the history of the Holocaust in Mogilev. It should be noted that the second period is less clear and more problematic in terms of reconstructing the events. This second phase is connected to a large extent with the fate of the Jews relegated to the third category drawn up by the Nazis after the census. At issue here are the specialist workers and craftsmen whom the Nazis needed and therefore spared from liquidation until later. The saddlers, shoemakers, locksmiths, blacksmiths, carpenters, tailors, tinsmiths, tanners, glaziers, and painters who were thus selected were confined on the premises of the Dimitrov Factory. At the end of September 1941, around 1,000 Jews were driven into the forced labor camp established there.¹³

At the beginning of its existence, the camp probably was filled only with Jews and was a kind of closed ghetto for hard labor, which also had its own 15-man Jewish police force. It was guarded externally by local police, and the Jews were forbidden to leave its premises. According to the testimony of L.M. Naimark, after the liquidation of the ghetto on the Dubrovenka, a considerable number of Jews were taken to the Dimitrov Factory and killed there.

Work for the camp’s Jewish inmates consisted of hard physical tasks. These could have something or nothing at all to do with an inmate’s vocation. The inhabitants of the forced labor camp were also fed poorly. Every Sunday, the Germans carried out a purge.¹⁴ The corpses were buried in two pits, right where they were shot. A typhus epidemic also broke out as a result of overcrowding and unsanitary conditions.

According to Sorkin’s testimony, the camp contained not only Jews. The ratio of Jews to non-Jews, however, has not been determined. After a visit by Heinrich Himmler on October 23, 1941, the camp was expanded. On the basis of witness testimony, it is estimated that the capacity of the camp was about 2,000 people, and during its existence between the fall of 1941 and the fall of 1943, up to 4,000 people probably passed through the camp, most of whom were killed.¹⁵

Sometimes contingents of Jews from elsewhere were sent to Mogilev. For example, approximately 400 Jews were brought to the camp from Slonim on May 26, 1942. Available testimony indicates that up to 4,000 Jews were liquidated in the camp in a single Aktion in 1942 (the exact date is not known).¹⁶

To cover up the evidence of their crimes, the Germans in the fall of 1943 exhumed their victims’ remains from the mass graves in Polykovichi, Novoe Pashkovo, and Kazimirovka and burned them.

A small number of Jews survived. As for losses, the report of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) of October 8, 1944, gives an overall figure of 10,000 Jews murdered.¹⁷ However, the aforementioned document says nothing of the shootings in the camp at the Dimitrov Factory. The total number of Jews who perished in Mogilev, therefore, may be as high as 14,000 people.

SOURCES One of the first attempts to describe the Holocaust in Mogilev was the essay by Ida Shenderovich, “Zabytoe getto,” published in the collection Historyia Mabiliou: Minulae i suchasnasts’ (Mogilev, 2003), pp. 92–101. Another key source of information is the detailed monograph by Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: Hamburger Edition, 1999), in which the author examines the murder of Mogilev’s Jews, citing many archival collections. Other relevant publications include the following: Andrej Angrick et al., “‘Da hätte man schon ein Tagebuch führen müssen.’ Das Polizeibataillon 322 und die Judenmorde im Bereich der Heeresgruppe Mitte während des Sommers und Herbstes 1941,” in Helge Grabitz et al., eds., Die Normalität des Verbrechens. Festschrift für Wolfgang Scheffler zum 65. Geburtstag (Berlin: Hentrich, 1994), pp. 32–85; Pamiats’: Mabiliou (Minsk, 1998); Ida Markovich Shenderovich, Martirolog: Spiski evreev, pogibshikh vo vremia vtoroi mirovoi voyny: Mogilev (Mogilev: “Dzhoint,” 2001); Ida M. Shenderovich and Aleksandr Litin, eds., Gibel’ mestechek Mogilevshchiny: Kholokost v Mogilevskoi oblasti v vospominaniakh i dokumentakh (Mogilev: MGU im. A.A. Kuleshova, 2005); Inna Gerasimova and Arkadii Shul’man, eds., Pravedniki narodov mira Belarusi (Minsk: Tonpik, 2004); and DDR-Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 2 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2002), Lfd. Nr. 1044, pp. 284–286.

Relevant documentation on the destruction of the Jews of Mogilev during the Holocaust can be found in the following archives: BA-BL (R 58); BA-L (e.g., B 162/3337); BA-MA (e.g., RH 26-286/10); BLH (video testimony of N.G. Sorkin); GAMO (260-1-15); GARF (7021-88-43); NARA; NARB (e.g.,

1706 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

570-1-1 and 4683-3- 943); PAGV; PAIMSh; RGVA; USHMM (e.g., RG-53.006M, RG-48.004M, and RG-53.002M); VHAP; VHF (e.g., # 31372 and 43212); and YVA.

Gennadii Vinnitsa
trans. Ray Brandon

NOTES

1. BLH, video testimony of N.G. Sorkin.
2. Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht, no. 3 (August 15–31, 1941), in Peter Klein et al., ed., Die Einsatzgruppen in der besetzten Sowjetunion, 1941/42 (Berlin: Hentrich, 1997), p. 159.
3. GAMO, 260-1-15, p. 14.
4. GARF, 7021-88-43, p. 111, testimony of K.P. Bazylenko.
5. PAGV, testimony of B.G. Iudina.
6. Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht, no. 6 (October 1–31, 1941), in Klein, Einsatzgruppen, p. 230.
7. Ibid.
8. Material in PAIMSh.
9. USHMM, RG-48.004M (VHAP), reel 1, KTB of Pol. Btn. 322, October 2–3, 1941, and report of 9. Company, Pol. Rgt. Mitte, October 15, 1941.
10. BA-BL, R 58/219, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 133, November 14, 1941; and Tätigkeits- und Lagebericht, no. 7 (November 1–30, 1941), in Klein, Einsatzgruppen, p. 253.
11. TsAKGBRB, t. 1, gr. 7, op. 7, por. 4, arkh. no. 1277.
12. GARF, 7021-88-43, p. 113, testimony of V.V. Kurochkin.
13. NARB, 570-1-1, p. 137 reverse; BA-MA, RH 26-286/10.
14. BLH, video testimony of N.G. Sorkin.
15. BA-L, B 162/3337 (202 AR-Z 52/59, vol. 4), p. 637.
16. Ibid., pp. 453, 634, 637, 641–642, as cited by Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde, pp. 771–772.
17. GARF, 7021-88-43, p. 120, ChGK report, October 8, 1944.

MSTISLAVL'

Pre-1941: Mstislavl', town and raion center; Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Mstislavl', Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Mstislau, raen center; Mahiliou voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Mstislavl' is located 80 kilometers (50 miles) east-northeast of Mogilev. In 1939, 2,067 Jews lived in Mstislavl' (19.7 percent of the population).

Soon after the German invasion on June 22, 1941, refugees from western Belorussia began arriving in Mstislavl'. No organized evacuation from the town was undertaken. Young adult males were mobilized into the Red Army. Most women, the elderly, and children were unable to escape on foot, and it was difficult to get a place on the few available trains. Many families decided not to leave their property behind unprotected. On July 14, 1941, the Germans entered Mstislavl'.

During the battles, some Jewish homes were burned, and people had to move to other houses. Soon after their arrival, the German forces arrested Communist activists, officials of the local administration, and some Jews. A local police force was established under the command of police chief Kureshev. The local police assisted the German authorities in controlling the Jews: all Jewish houses were marked with six-pointed stars, and all Jews were registered. Every day the Jews had to report to the marketplace to be assigned to forced labor; those unable to work were beaten. Compulsory labor tasks included the cleaning of cesspools and lavatories.

Probably in September 1941, Egon Noack, commander of Vorauskommando Moskau of Einsatzgruppe B, arrived in Mstislavl'; after consulting with the mayor and the head of the local Russian police, he ordered the creation of a ghetto in the "Sloboda" section of town. All Jews were ordered to move into the ghetto, while local Belorussians were evacuated from this area. During this visit, the Security Police under Noack ordered the collection of fur coats from the Jews, and after the ghetto was established, the German Security Police shot about 30 male Jews.¹

Some testimonies, however, indicate that there was no formal ghetto in Mstislavl' and that the Jews were taken from their own houses to be shot. Only the Jews from the collective farm in Kazemirovka were taken to town the day before the mass shooting and were held on Leninskaia Street, which used to be the "Jewish street" before the war. At the beginning of the occupation, some Jews from the western part of town had also moved there after their houses burned. Therefore, it appears that the area around Leninskaia Street, which came to be heavily populated by Jews, was some form of "open ghetto" and apparently was not enclosed.²

On October 14, 1941, a punitive unit commanded by Field Marshal Krause and consisting of Germans and some Ukrainians arrived in Mstislavl'. Krause ordered an Aktion against the Jews to be carried out the next morning. At 7:00 A.M., the Jews were driven from their homes, and 30 older men were transported to the Leshenskii ditch, where the Germans shot them, leaving the bodies unburied. Young women were forced into shops and sexually abused; if they tried to defend themselves, they were shot on the square. The rest of the Jews were gathered in the yard of the pedagogic school. Among them were also Jews from Zarech'e, on the opposite bank of the Vikhra. In early October, the Germans had announced through loudspeakers that the Jews of Zarech'e should prepare for resettlement to Palestine. On October 15, 1941, the Germans and local residents escorted the Jews of Zarech'e to Mstislavl' in columns.

At the school, the guards took the Jews into classrooms, forced them to undress, took their valuables, and sent them back half-dressed to the yard. Among the Jews, rumors soon spread about the killings. At 3:00 P.M., the Jews (at least 700 people) were separated into two columns, one for men and one for women.³ Then the Germans and local policemen escorted them out of town.

The Germans and local policemen escorted the Jews to the west of Mstislavl' to the Kagalny Ravine between the Zamkovaia and Troitskaia hillocks (near the Inovskii sel'sovet, 2 kilometers [1.2 miles] from town). First they selected 50

Jews to dig the pits, then they killed them. Then the others were forced to undress completely and to lie down in the pits, where they were shot from behind in groups of 10.⁴ Some witnesses claim that the local police conducted the shootings while the Germans guarded the site.

The schoolteacher Minkina begged to save the life of her six-year old son, whose father (Orlovski) was Russian. In reply, the Germans stabbed her child with a bayonet and threw him into the pit.⁵ When the shooting was over, the local police checked the dead bodies, and recognizing that two women were still alive, they finished them off.⁶

The report of the Einsatzgruppen recorded that "900 Jews were executed in Mstislavl' as they had [allegedly] provided food, clothing, and shelter to partisans passing through the area."⁷ Another source indicates that the Germans and their collaborators murdered some 700 citizens of Mstislavl' at the mass grave site, most of whom were Jews but including 35 Roma (Gypsies) and 168 Belorussians, shot there subsequently.⁸

Some Jews who had the opportunity to escape decided to die with their relatives. Rusya Zhits was hidden by her friend Nadezhda Lipitskaia, but when the shooting began, she gave herself up because she could not abandon her sick mother. Fanya Eselevich was not taken with the convoy because she was married to a Russian, and the Germans did not recognize her as being Jewish, but when she saw that her relatives, including her eight-month-old son, had been killed, she decided she had no reason to live.⁹

After the shootings, remaining Jewish property was looted. On December 18, 1941, Ortskommandantur I (V)/256 reported the transfer of jewelry and other valuables, which had been secured by the town administration as the property of Jews who had been "finished off" before the unit's arrival in Mstislavl'.¹⁰

Only a few Jews managed to escape the roundup on October 15. When the Germans and police came for the photographer Eselevich, he and his wife, with three daughters (Fania, Mina, and Khaia) and the grandchildren, were at home. Mina and Khaia managed to escape through the backyard of their neighbors Valentina and Ada Vasil'evy. The twin sisters Vasil'evy gave Mina and Khaya their birth certificates and smuggled them out of town at night. In the village of Kazimirovo, the Germans took the two refugee girls for Belorussians and sent them to Germany as forced laborers (Ostarbeiter). After the war, Mina lived in France, and Khaia returned to Belorussia.¹¹

At the time of the mass shooting, Boris Mikhlin (13 years old) hid in the creek that led to the Vikhra River, and nobody found him. Liubov Basnoi was also rescued from the column of Jews.¹² A German looked at her and said: "You don't look like a Jew." She understood this as a sign and, without hesitating, escaped from the column and hid in the town. Ilya Josifovich Malkin lost his children in the massacre on October 15. He managed to escape on his own and joined the Soviet partisans. He survived until the liberation by the Red Army, swearing to avenge his family and bring Nazi criminals to justice. The partisan group "Kazankov" was established by Semen Leibovich Sheinin and Iakov Moiseevich Malkov, who escaped from the mass shootings at the very last moment.¹³

