The town was liberated on September 29, 1943, by units of the 344th Rifle Division (Colonel Strakhov) and the 196th Tank Division (Lt. Colonel Dukhovny). No Jews were left in Mstislavl' on their arrival. The 49th Army conducted the first investigation into the murder of the Jews on October 4, 1943,¹⁴ estimating that 1,300 people had been murdered, including children and adults. On November 1, 1943, the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission found a concealed mass grave near Mstislavl'. In Kagal'nyi Rov, they discovered at least 20 pits full of bodies. After conducting a forensic examination and interviewing witnesses, they established the identities of about 650 people.¹⁵

Naprasnovka is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) north-northeast of Mogilev. In 1930, the Jewish population was 248.

German forces of Army Group Center captured the village in July 1941. Evidence regarding the treatment of the Jews under German occupation is sparse, but in the view of the Belarusian historian Marat Botvinnik, a form of ghetto or concentration camp was probably created for the Jews in Naprasnovka at some date before the mass shooting in March 1942. Prior to the killing Aktion, the German occupying forces imposed a "contribution" in gold and valuables on the Jews and beat them severely. According to the interrogations conducted by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission in December 1944, on March 22, 1942, German forces and local police killed 250 Jews, including many women, children, and elderly people. The victims were buried in eight pits in a wood 200 meters (219 yards) west of Naprasnovka.¹

Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Abchuba, village Krupki raen, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Obchuga is located about 140 kilometers (87 miles) northeast of Minsk. In 1923, there were 272 Jews, who mostly lived in the center of the town. Between the German attack on the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, and the arrival of German forces in early July, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east.

Soon after the start of the German occupation, the German authorities imposed the wearing of a yellow Star of David on their clothes and an evening curfew on the Jewish population. The German military administration also ordered the recruitment of a local police force (Ordnungsdienst) and placed a man named Pogorelskii at its head. It is not clear exactly when the ghetto was established in Obchuga, but at some time before the summer of 1942 all the Jews were moved into 10 houses on Logovskaia Street. The area was enclosed by barbed wire, and the Germans placed a sign at the entrance of the ghetto that read: "Anyone entering will be shot; anyone bringing food will be shot."¹

On May 5, 1942, Germans and local policemen surrounded the ghetto and shot most of the Jews (about 440 people). The few survivors of this Aktion were shot in June 1942.² Forces of the Red Army recaptured Obchuga from the Germans in June 1944. After the war, partly owing to the loss of its Jewish population, the Soviet authorities downgraded the town of Obchuga to the status of a village settlement.

SOURCES Publications regarding the Holocaust in Obchuga include the following: Gennadii Vinnitsa, Listy istorii (Vitebsk, 1999), pp. 169–175; Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 2000), p. 685; and Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 918. David Meltzer and Vladimir Levin, eds., The Black Book with Red Pages (Tragedy and Heroism of Belorussian Jews) (Cockeysville, MD: VIA Press, 2005), p. 229, implicate the head of the police in Borisov, David Egor, in the murder of the Jews of Obchuga, citing materials presented at his trial in 1947.

Additional documentation, including the statements of local witnesses, can be found in PAGV. There are statements by local witnesses from Obchuga in the records of the East German trial of Georg Frenzel conducted by Sta. Karl-Marx-Stadt (Chemnitz) in 1970. Some relevant information may also be found in the trial record of David Egor in AUKGBRMO.

Obol' is located 35 kilometers (22 miles) southeast of Polotsk. On the eve of Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, Obol' had a Jewish population of several dozen people.

German armed forces captured the village on July 8, 1941, about three weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. During this intervening period, some Jews managed to evacuate to the east, while men eligible for military service were drafted into the Red Army. About 10 or 15 Jews remained in the village at the onset of the German occupation.

During the entire occupation period, from July 1941 to June 1944, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the village. The German military administration created a village authority and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) made up of local residents.

Soon after the occupation of Obol', the Ortskommandantur ordered the village authority to conduct the registration and marking of the Jews and required them to perform forced labor. In the fall of 1941, all the remaining Jews in the village were placed in a ghetto, for which one small house was allocated. The ghetto was in existence for about seven months; during that time, several Jews died. On June 2, 1942, the Germans and local police liquidated the ghetto, shooting all six of its Jewish inmates at the cemetery.

OBOL'TSY

Pre-1941: Obol'tsy, village, Tolochin raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Obolz, Rayon Tolotschin, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Abol'tsy, Talachyn raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Obol'tsy is located 40 kilometers (25 miles) west-northwest of Orsha. In 1923 the Jewish population was 353 out of a total of 382 residents.

German forces of Army Group Center occupied the village in early July 1941. The Germans established a ghetto there on August 14. About 150 people (25 families) were moved into two single-story buildings of a school.¹ The ghetto was guarded by the local police; the chief of the guard unit was Pavel Kuntsevich.² The inmates wore armbands with a yellow star; forced labor was imposed. Boris Etin became the Jewish elder.

According to survivors' accounts, Jewish youth from Obol'tsy collected arms abandoned by the retreating Soviet forces. On March 5, 1942, news of the murder of the Jews in Smoliany, Orsha raion, reached the ghetto. The survivor Anna Iofik recalls: "The decision to flee came immediately. We waited until midnight. Then some 60 Jews, headed by Semion Iakovlevich Iofik [the pre-war chairman of a Jewish kolkhoz in Obol'tsy], escaped from the school and suggested to the local policeman Linich that he let us go, and when we had reached the forest, he should shoot over our heads. Otherwise, Semion Iakovlevich said, we will use our weapons against you. Iakov Iofik and Aron Levin had rifles."³ Leonid Kogan, 16 years old, even succeeded in getting his 4-year-old sister Raisa out of the ghetto.

The number of 60 escapees, as well as certain other details of these accounts, may be an exaggeration, but the fact is that a number of young Jews from Obol'tsy later fought in Soviet partisan units, including the Zaslonov brigade.

The ghetto was liquidated on June 4, 1942; the Aktion began at 5:00 or 6:00 A.M. The remaining approximately 100 Jews of Obol'tsy were shot in a pit close to the site of the ghetto.⁴ The list of victims compiled by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) contains 37 names.⁵

ORSHA

Pre-1941: Orsha, city and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Orscha, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army

1710 EASTERN BELORUSSIA REGION

Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Orsha, raen center, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Orsha is located 82 kilometers (51 miles) south-southeast of Vitebsk. In 1939, 7,992 Jews lived in the city of Orsha (21.3 percent of the total), and 589 Jews (3.6 percent of the total) lived in the neighboring district of Orshanskii zheleznodorozhnyi poselok (Orsha Railway Settlement, in the census of 1939 referred to as Orshanskii zh.d.). After 1938, in the Orsha raion, there were also the towns of Kopys', Orekhi-Vydritsa (now Orekhovsk, 123 Jews, or 3.35 percent of the total population in 1939); and Baran'. The rest of the Jewish population of the Orsha raion (excluding the towns of Orsha, Baran', and Kopys') included 627 people, the bulk of whom lived in the small towns of Smoliany (950 Jews lived here in 1926) and Osintorf. After the war, the borders of the Orsha raion were changed, and Osintorf was included in the Dubrovno raion. (See also Baran'; Dubrovno; Kopys'; and Smoliany.)

Before World War II, Orsha was one of the most important railway junctions in the western part of the Soviet Union. The Germans bombed Orsha on the first day of the invasion, June 22, 1941, and a further heavy bombing raid followed on the night of June 24–25, when the city center was severely damaged. This event impelled many Jews to leave Orsha, which, with its railway tracks, depots, and industrial plants, seemed to be a dangerous place.

Orsha was captured by units of the German 2nd Panzer Group in the course of the Smolensk operation between July 10 and July 20, after heavy fighting.

Ortskommandantur I/906 was initially responsible for Orsha's administration. From August 1941 onward, Orsha was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. The area was in the realm of the 286th Security Division, with its headquarters based in Orsha. The city was under the control of Feldkommandantur 683, and of Ortskommandantur I/842, subordinated to it.

A key role in the genocide of Orsha's Jews was played by the commandant of Ortskommandantur I/842, Baron von Ascheberg, and his deputy, Paul Karl Eick, who appeared in the city at the end of July. Eick was attached to the Ortskommandantur as an officer for special tasks and was subordinated directly to the 286th Security Division. Before his arrival, the Ortskommandantur had registered the Jewish population and ordered the Jews to wear a black armband with a yellow star on it. Some witnesses recollect that, apart from this, the Orsha Jews wore star-shaped patches on their backs. A witness at the Minsk trial in 1946 related that the "[Belo-]russian population was allowed to remain outdoors until 7:00 p.m., the Jews, until

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF CAMPS AND GHETTOS, 1933–1945

6:00 P.M. Food was scarce, and when it was sold at the market, according to a commandant's order, two separate queues were formed: one for the [Belo]russian population and one for the Jewish population. Food products were allotted to the Jewish population only if something remained after the [Belo-]russian population had finished their purchases."¹ It is not clear whether the Judenrat in Orsha was formed before Eick's arrival or after it (witness accounts diverge on this point). The chairman of the Jewish Council was Kazhdan, a former bookkeeper. Only one survivor refers to a Jewish police force, which helped to guard the ghetto in Orsha.²

Upon his arrival, Eick imposed a "contribution" on the Jews, amounting to 150,000 rubles. According to Eick's testimony at the Minsk trial, the Jews were able to pay 125,000 rubles in valuables and cash, of which the cash was left for Orsha's city authority, and the valuables (silver and gold, according to the testimonies at the Minsk trial) were transferred to the Reichsbank in Berlin.³ Forced labor was imposed on the Jews; it consisted mainly of clearing the city of the ruins left after the bombings.

In early September, Eick, following a decision made at a meeting in the office of the Ortskommandantur, established a ghetto. It consisted of 39 houses on Engels Street (also known previously as Gorodnianskaia),⁴ where about 2,000 people were to be concentrated. The Jews were given three days to move into the ghetto. On one side, the ghetto was bordered by the Orshitsa River, and on the other sides it was surrounded with barbed wire and guarded. The ghetto also bordered the Krasnyi Borets ("Red Fighter") Iron Foundry. The Jewish cemetery was included in the ghetto area.⁵

The ghetto inmates were crammed together under severely overcrowded conditions; in some houses, according to one survivor's account, they even divided rooms with planks horizontally, thus creating more space for sleeping.⁶ The Germans provided inadequate food (a witness at the Minsk trial speaks of 10 to 15 grams (0.4 to 0.6 ounce) of flour and some potato per person per day). Typhus epidemics broke out in the ghetto.⁷ According to witnesses, some younger Jews managed to leave the ghetto and exchanged various possessions for food with the local non-Jewish population. Despite the barbed-wire fence, ghetto inmates suffered from intrusions by people whom the witnesses at the Minsk trial called "German soldiers." Most probably they were locals, perhaps men of the local police. Whoever they were, the intruders robbed Jews of their belongings and sometimes raped women. Ghetto inmates tried to complain about this to Eick, but to no effect.

The first mass shooting of Jews in Orsha was carried out by Einsatzkommando 9 (commanded by Dr. Alfred Filbert) of Einsatzgruppe B, in August 1941. In this month, a group of Jews, 43 people, were killed.⁸ A large mass shooting of Jews in Orsha took place in September 1941 when Einsatzkommando 8 (commanded by Dr. Otto Bradfisch) and part of Einsatzgruppe B, on its way to Mogilev, shot an unknown number of Jews of both genders.⁹

The liquidation of the Orsha ghetto was carried out by the forces of the local SD with the participation of the Ortskommandantur, primarily von Ascheberg and Eick. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), it took place on November 27, 1941. In the evening of November 26, the ghetto was surrounded by members of the Feldgendarmarie, commanded by Eick. The mass shooting began at 7:00 A.M. The Jews were brought from the ghetto in groups to the Jewish cemetery, where Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) had dug pits. The victims were ordered to undress and made to lie down in the pits; then they were shot with automatic rifles. In this one-day Aktion, 1,873 people were murdered.¹⁰

In April 1942, several Jewish families, 53 people in total, were murdered. It is unclear whether these were "specialists" or Jews discovered in the countryside.

In September 1943, the Nazis attempted to erase the traces of the mass murder. Using a labor force of Soviet POWs, they exhumed and burned the bodies of those who had been killed in 1941–1942; the operation continued for five days. Nevertheless, in 1944 the ChGK was able to estimate that the total number of bodies buried in Orsha was 6,000 (not all of them were Jews).

The town of Orekhi-Vydritsa is located about 20 kilometers (12 miles) north of Orsha. According to the witnesses interrogated by the ChGK, in December 1941, 7 Jewish men were brought to the nearby village of Briukhovo and killed there. The rest of the Jews, mainly women and children, were killed in April 1943. Estimates by witnesses of the number of Jews killed during the last Aktion range from 30 to 50. Such a late (for eastern Belorussia) killing of Jews appears unusual; it may actually have occurred in 1942. The list of victims prepared by the ChGK contains 14 names, 6 of which sound Russian, and suggesting, perhaps, that the victims may have been Jews passing as "Aryans."

Elsewhere in the Orsha raion, a Jew named Finkelshtein, who had worked as a driver in a local kolkhoz, and his two sons were killed in the village of Krashino (about 10 kilometers [6.2 miles] southeast of Orsha). Fourteen Jews were killed in the Krasnyi Bereg kolkhoz in a northern suburb of Orsha. Three Jews, the Vingrover family, were killed in the village of Mezhevo and nine in the village of Shemberevo (5 and 13 kilometers [3.1 and 8.1 miles] northwest of Orsha, respectively). A Jewish blacksmith was killed in the village of Ozerok (22 kilometers [13.7 miles] from Orsha along the Lepel' railway). A Jewish woman married to a Belorussian was killed in the Tuminichi sel'sovet (about 15 kilometers [9.3 miles] west-southwest of Orsha). A Jewish woman was killed in the village of Solov'e (5 kilometers [3.1 miles] northeast of Orsha).

SOURCES The events in Orsha are described in the trial of Nazi war criminals held in Minsk in January 1946; the proceedings of the trial were published as Sudebnyi protsess po delu o zlodeiianiiakh, sovershennykh nemetsko-fashistskimi zakhvatchikami v Belorusskoi SSR (15–29 ianvaria 1946 goda) (Minsk, 1947). With some precautions, the information found in this book can be useful. In the book by a local historian from Orsha, Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), considerable attention is devoted to the Holocaust in the city. There is also a short survivor testimony published in Rima Dulkanieni and Kerry Keys, eds., With a Needle in the Heart: Memoirs of Former Prisoners of Ghettos and Concentration Camps (Vilnius: Garnelis, 2003), pp. 81–82.

Christian Gerlach concludes that there were one or two massacres perpetrated by Einsatzkommando 8 in Orsha, with 600 to 800 Jews killed in each of them; in one of the massacres, he suggests that as many as 3,000 Jews may have been killed. See Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 2000), p. 600.

7. An eyewitness, Basia Pikman, wrote to Ilya Ehrenburg: "Twenty old Jewish carpenters . . . gathered at the home of Eli Gofshtein on Pushkin Street, poured kerosene on the house, and burned themselves alive." See Ilya Ehrenburg and Vasily Grossman, eds., The Black Book (New York: Holocaust Library, 1981), p. 205. The story told by Pikman evokes doubts. The eyewitnesses at the Minsk trial in 1946 did not mention this extraordinary incident. Further, why was it that fire did not lead to a greater fire in the surrounding area? And what a dreadful method for a group suicide. Perhaps Pikman, who was not a local inhabitant (she had come to Orsha from Minsk), retold some gossip, which possibly distorted a real tragic event.
8. BA-BL, R 58/216, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 67, August 29, 1941. "In Orsha, 43 Jews were found, some of whom were actively spreading atrocity stories, while others acted as snipers. Among them there were two Party officials." Most probably, all were shot, although the report does not state this directly.
9. Neither the published protocols of the Minsk trial nor the documents of the ChGK in 1944 mention this mass shooting. The murder (or two murders) is (are) discussed in the trial of members of Einsatzkommando 8 held in Munich in 1961. OSIPOVICHY

Pre-1941: Osipovichy, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Ossipowitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Asipovichy, raen center, Mahilieu voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Osipovichy is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) northwest of Bobruisk. According to the 1939 census, there were 1,694 Jews living in Osipovichy (12.3 percent of the total population).

German forces occupied the town on June 30, 1941, just over one week after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this intervening period, the Germans bombed the town, and a small part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army. Around 1,200 to 1,300 Jews remained in Osipovichy at the start of the German occupation.

During the entire occupation, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town, setting up a town administration and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) composed of local residents. Immediately after the town's occupation, the Ortskommandantur ordered the town administration to register and mark the entire Jewish population and imposed a program of forced labor on the Jews. At the end of July or at the start of August 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 carried out the first Aktion in the town. A group of Jews was shot as Soviet activists.¹

In August or September 1941, a ghetto was created in the town.² It included the following streets from Rosa Luxemburg to Vera Khoruzhaia: Kommunisticheskaia, Chumakova, Oktiabr'skaia, Gorky, Raboche-Krest'ianskaia, Polevaia, Kalinin, and Serov; and these streets in their entirety: Karl Liebknecht, Krasnoarmeiskaia, Sotsialisticheskaia, Revoliutsionnaia, Karl Marx, Promyshlennaia, and Protasevichskaia. Jews who lived in the northern part of town and in other places were resettled into this area, on Oktiabr'skaia and Promyshlennaia (now Golanta) Streets. Non-Jewish inhabitants were not evicted from their homes. The Jews living in the ghetto were still able to exchange possessions for food. A ration card system was introduced in the town, and a daily ration of 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread was issued to each Jewish cardholder. On the left side of the chest and on the back, Jews were required to wear large circular yellow patches. They were forbidden to go to public places such as the markets and the movie theater; to teach children in schools; to greet and engage in conversation with the Belorussian population; to walk on sidewalks; to go outside the boundaries of the ghetto; and to gather on the streets in groups of more than three persons. For failure to comply with any of these restrictions, there was only one punishment: death by shooting. Every morning all able-bodied Jews over the age of 14, including most women (only those with infants were exempted), were taken out of the ghetto to perform forced labor, tearing down ruined barracks and other buildings and working at the railroad station and other sites.

A Jewish Council (Judenrat) was organized in the ghetto. One of its three members was Afroim Khavkin, who before the war had been the chief accountant of the voentorg (military store). The members of the Judenrat were appointed by the German Ortskommandantur on the recommendation of the town's mayor, a man named Goranin. Before the war, Goranin had been a construction technician for Military Construction Administration no. 76 in Osipovichi. It is known that, as directed by the Ortskommandantur, the members of the Judenrat registered the Jewish population.³

On October 11, 1941, the Germans conducted a second Aktion in the town. A combined force of SS, Wehrmacht, and local police entered the ghetto and seized at least 300 Jewish men, women, and youths, all of working age. The Jews were brought to a barracks, where all their valuables were confiscated. Then they were shot by an execution squad made up of men from the 7th Company of the 339th Infantry Division, which was based in Osipovichi until November 1941.⁴ The remaining women, children, and elderly were left in the ghetto. The ghetto was liquidated on February 5, 1942, when an SS detachment arrived and shot all the remaining Jews at the Jewish cemetery.⁵

OSTROVNO

Pre-1941: Ostrovno, village, Beshenkovichi raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Ostrovno, Rayon Beschenkowitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Astrouna, Beshankovichy raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Ostrovno is located 20 kilometers (12 miles) northeast of Beshenkovichi. In 1939, fewer than 300 Jews lived in the village of Ostrovno.

The XXXIX Corps of the 3rd Panzer Group captured Ostrovno in early July 1941. Before their arrival, about half of the Jewish population of the village managed to evacuate or flee to the east. From August 1941 onward, the village came under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center.

On July 19, 1941, the Germans ordered the establishment of an open ghetto in Ostrovno. The ghetto consisted of 10 wooden houses on one side of the main street; it was not fenced. On the day of the resettlement, a young Jew who refused to move into the ghetto was shot and killed. On September 30, 1941, the Jews of Ostrovno were killed for "hostile behavior and insubordination to orders." Einsatzgruppe B, which reported this, indicated having shot 169 people. Immediately after the mass shooting, the Germans organized the sale of Jewish belongings to local peasants for food.¹ According to a survivor, after the liquidation of the ghetto, the authorities organized a feast in the town: "People drank [liquor], ate, danced and kissed one another."² The same survivor stated that Jewish/non-Jewish relations deteriorated under the occupation; for example, a Belorussian family denounced a Jew who came to them and asked to be hidden. She herself narrowly escaped being denounced by a former kolkhoz chairman in a nearby village, to which she fled after the mass shooting in Ostrovno.

OSVEIA

Pre-1941: Osveia, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Osweja, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Groups North, then Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord/Mitte); post-1991: Asveia, Verkhniadzvinsk raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Osveia is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) northwest of Polotsk. In 1939, 350 Jews lived in the town, making up 15.1 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Osveia raion (without the town of Osveia) was fewer than 100 people.

The Osveia raion, including the town of Osveia, was taken over by the forces of Army Group North (not Army Group Center, like the rest of the Vitebsk region). On July 5, 1941, the Red Army abandoned all the area west of the Sarianka River. The forces of the II Army Corps of the 16th Army took over the area to the north of the Zapadnaia Dvina bend, including the town of Osveia, mainly on July 12, 1941.

From August until December 1941, the Osveia raion was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group North; it was within the area controlled by the 281st Security Division, stationed mainly in Latvia. At the beginning of December 1941, the raion was transferred to the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center, and became part of the realm of the 403rd Security Division.

At the start of the occupation, the German authorities did not resettle the Jews into a ghetto. They introduced the wearing of yellow Magen Davids (Jewish Stars) and forced labor, initially making the Jews clear the debris that remained after the heavy bombing and conduct repair work on the roads.¹

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), in February or March 1942 the Germans assembled the Jews of Osveia in a “camp” (ghetto), and five days later they shot them in pits that had been dug in a town park. According to one survivor, a Belorussian policeman whose mother worked at the Kommandantur warned him and some other Jews about the impending Aktion, and several young people succeeded in fleeing from the ghetto.²

The witnesses interrogated by the ChGK give the number of Jews killed as 650, which seems to be an exaggeration. A list of the victims compiled by the ChGK contains the names of 149 Jews.³ The book Pamiats': Verkhniadzvinski raion, volume 1, gives a different number of Jews killed in the Osveia park: 459. A list of the victims of the Osveia ghetto given in the book contains 178 names, “assembled from all extant documents”;⁴ 25 of them share the surname of Gelfand.

Elsewhere in the raion, no fewer than 37 Jews, members of the Karl Marx kolkhoz, were killed in Kokhanovichi, 16 kilometers (10 miles) south of Osveia (or 16 kilometers [10 miles] northeast of Drissa).⁵

SOURCES The ghetto in Osveia is mentioned in V.I. Adamushko et al., eds., Handbuch der Haftstätten für Zivilbevölkerung auf dem besetzten Territorium von Belarus 1941–1944 (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 99.

OZARICHI

Pre-1941: Ozarichi, town, Domanovichi raion, Poles'e oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Osaritschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Azarychy, Kalinkavichy raen, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Ozarichi is located 120 kilometers (75 miles) west of Gomel'. The 1939 census indicated that 1,059 Jews lived in Ozarichi, or 46.9 percent of the total population.

German armed forces occupied the settlement in the second half of August 1941. In the weeks following the German invasion on June 22, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were called into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Probably around one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Ozarichi at the start of the German occupation.

During the entire course of the occupation, a German military administration was in charge of the settlement. The local commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) created a local administration and an auxiliary police force recruited from local residents. In the summer and fall of 1941, the German military administration imposed a series of anti-Jewish measures in Ozarichi. Jews were forced to wear yellow patches in the shape of a star, they were obliged to perform forced labor, and they were forbidden to trade or speak with non-Jews.

By October 1941, the German authorities had established a ghetto on a part of one street in Ozarichi, which (according to historian Marat Botvinnik) was surrounded with barbed wire. The Jews in the ghetto were unable to buy food and suffered from hunger. Belorussians sometimes came at night and brought food, such as potatoes or bread, for the Jews. Some Jews from other places were also incarcerated in the Ozarichi ghetto. Forced labor included cleaning the Germans' vehicles; if they were not spotless, some of the workers might be shot immediately. Some children from the ghetto were taken to a nearby hospital in order to give blood for use, presumably, by the German army. Jews in the ghetto tried to help each other as best they could, and some of those who died were buried secretly according to Jewish ritual.¹

In the winter of 1941–1942, the Jews suffered from the cold. By this time, Jews were aware of the mass shootings in other places, and some planned to escape. Jewish survivors recall that the local policemen were brutal, robbing them and beating anyone who tried to escape. The cruelest policeman was known as Senka. “He was ready to kill anybody for moonshine and tried to gain as much favor with the Germans as he could.”² In February 1942, Abram Volfson and his sister fled the ghetto, encouraged by a resistance fighter named Taras, who came periodically to the ghetto. Efim Golod, who was nearly blown up by a mine when collecting weapons for the local police, managed to escape by running away as he was being escorted to the site of the mass shooting in March 1942.³

The Germans liquidated the ghetto on March 3, 1942, when all the Jewish inmates were shot near the Jewish cemetery.⁴ The shooting was apparently carried out by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8. The precise number of Jewish victims is unknown, but it was probably several hundred. Based on the list of names prepared by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), at least 263 people were murdered.⁵ In February 1942, there were also shootings of Jews in nearby villages. In the village of Davydovka, 74 Jews were shot, and 12 Jews were shot in the village of Semenovich.⁶ Another source indicates that some Jews from Ozarichi were among 133 Jews murdered in Karpilovka in late March or early April 1942 by members of Infantry Regiment 727, following an antipartisan sweep through the region.⁷

Estimates of the number of Jewish victims in Ozarichi may have been complicated by the existence of three Wehrmacht internment camps for evacuated civilians there in March 1944, in which the appalling conditions resulted in the rapid deaths of several thousand people, including many women and children.

PARICHI

Pre-1941: Parichi, town and raion center, Poles’e oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Paritschi, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Parychy, Svetlaborsk raen, Homel’ voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Parichi is located 115 kilometers (72 miles) west-northwest of Gomel’. In 1939, there were 1,881 Jews out of 3,736 inhabitants of Parichi (50.4 percent of the total) and another 1,750 Jews (3.29 percent of the rural population) living in the villages of the Parichi raion.

There was no organized evacuation from Parichi after the German invasion began on June 22, 1941. Attempting to leave the town on foot was a hazardous choice in view of the rapidly advancing German forces and the danger of punishment by the Soviet authorities. The only other option was to get a ride aboard a barge on the Berezina River, which would then proceed slowly down the Dnieper River towards Ukraine. Older people recalled the relatively good behavior of the Germans in 1918. Relying on this assessment, many people stayed in Parichi to protect their homes and property. It is estimated that more than half of the Jewish population remained in Parichi at the start of the German occupation.¹

By June 30, 1941, German tanks had forced their way across the Berezina to the north, and on July 5 they entered Parichi for the first time. Initially, the German forces were thrown back by Soviet resistance on July 11, but on July 21 the Germans occupied the town. Resistance within the Parichi raion continued a few days longer; the 4th Soviet Army abandoned the line of the Berezina only on August 13, 1941.

By mid-August, the Parichi raion was completely occupied by German forces. A German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) assumed control over the local administration (in the fall of 1941, it was OK I(V)324). Parichi lay within the jurisdiction of the 203rd Security Division based in Bobruisk. Military commandant's offices were also established in the villages of Shatilki and Chernin. Officials of the Ortskommandantur in Parichi put those arrested into a local school building as a makeshift prison, and they requisitioned bread and other agricultural products for the German army.²

The mayor, Nekrashevich, was in charge of the local administration. The administration had separate departments for political affairs, agriculture, finance, commerce, industry, road construction and transportation, medicine, and veterinary matters. Yakov Mishutin headed the general administration in Parichi, while also taking charge of the department of commerce. The sel'sovets were transformed into military districts and governed by local village headmen (starshiny). Each headman had at his disposal a clerk and a police detachment of between 20 and 50 men. Village elders (starosty) were appointed in the villages, each with 2 to 5 policemen for assistance. Nekrashevich himself organized the police in Parichi, and in August 1941, there were 15 people who signed up as the first volunteers. Ivan Krik, a former accountant, became the chief of police. The policemen helped the Feldgendarmarie of the German army in searches for former Soviet activists, party workers, and members of the combat battalion. They also conducted the registration of the Jewish population.³

Among the policemen, there were former neighbors, acquaintances, and relatives of the Jews. These people did not always help the victims. Before he joined the police squad, for example, Ivan Ments killed his Jewish wife, Fridl Nisman, and their two children. Then there was the Jewish teacher Masha Papernaia and two of her children, who hid with relatives in the nearby village of Davydovka. She was denounced to the Germans by her own mother-in-law.⁴

Until September 1941, the Jews lived in their own homes and were required to perform labor, but there were no large-scale killings. According to the report of the investigative commission of the Red Army, "in order to separate the Jews from the rest of the population the Germans made them wear a six-pointed Star [of David]." At the end of September 1941, the Ortskommandantur ordered all the Jews to be resettled on Bobruiskaia Street, which was surrounded by barbed wire and guarded by local policemen. Estimates of the number of Jews confined within the ghetto range from 1,100 to 1,500.⁵

Jews were taken out each day for forced labor, and when there was no work to be done, the authorities made them move sand around on the bank of the Berezina River. The Germans did not feed the Jews, and according to survivor accounts, famine was an even greater torment than fear, because one could never get used to starvation. People dreamed of being able to eat. The most valuable products were flour and fat. There were no livestock, poultry, and other domesticated animals in the ghetto. No one ate meat or fruit; occasionally there were some carrots, potatoes, or cabbages, which enabled the ghetto prisoners to cook vegetable soup. Bones were warmed up after they had been salvaged from the trash in the German mess hall, and Jews extracted any fat they could find to prepare a jellied broth, which they ate or used for barter.⁶

According to a report by Ortskommandantur I(V)324: "on October 18, 1941, a security command of the SD in Bobruisk appeared in Parichi and liquidated the Jews living here."⁷ The German security forces appeared in the streets, armed with rifles and whips and accompanied by the local police. They rounded up all the Jews in the ghetto and assembled them under close guard at the former hotel, where the Ortskommandantur was based. The chief of the local police Krik directed his men to "fish out" the Jews.⁸

The prisoners were then loaded onto trucks and transported in groups to the vicinity of Bol'shaia Luzha, 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) from Parichi between the villages of Vysokii Polk and Belitsa. Some of the Jewish men were ordered to dig a ditch. When they had finished, they had to undress and climb down into the mass grave, where they were shot. After them came a line of women, children, and the elderly. At first, the murderers lined the people up in rows in the ditch and shot them using automatic fire. Then they put them on the ground and shot them, finishing off the wounded with shovels. The mass shooting began at 7:00 A.M. and continued until the evening. The report of Einsatzgruppe B stated that a "special Aktion" was conducted against the Jews of Parichi, as they displayed a hostile attitude towards the Germans and had close links to the partisans. In the course of the Aktion, 1,013 male and female Jews were shot.⁹

The Germans spared the boot maker M.V. Kaplan and his family from the mass shooting, as he was a master craftsman. He spoke fluent German and thus also functioned as a translator. The Germans shot him and his family in 1943. All the belongings of the Jews were confiscated. The Feldgendarmarie and officials from the Ortskommandantur searched the empty houses of the Jews and collected some 7,000 rubles in cash and more than 18,000 rubles in bonds, which were to be forwarded on to the Reich Treasury War Booty Office in Berlin.¹⁰ The department of commerce in the Parichi town administration assumed responsibility for the distribution of less valuable materials such as clothes, which were sold for the benefit of the Rayon Paritschi administration.¹¹

In February and March 1942, the 40 men of the punitive detachment shot Jews in the various settlements of Rayon Paritschi, principally: in Kovchitsy (318 people), Shatilki (351 people), Pechishche (82 people), and Davydovtsy (129 people). The remaining possessions of these Jews were also looted.¹²

In March 1944, the Germans attempted to cover up the crimes. They ordered the exhumation of the corpses, then poured tar and flammable material on them and burned them in bonfires.¹³

Only a handful of Parichi's Jews were able to survive the German occupation. On October 18, 1941, as the Jews were being transported to the killing site, the neighboring Belorussians began shouting that 12-year-old Boris Gorelik was Russian, because his father was married to a non-Jewish woman. Availing herself of the opportunity, Musia Papernaia, the grandmother of Boris, snatched her grandson from the line. He then ran into the forest.¹⁴

Also on that day, 11-year-old Emma Igol'nikova and her mother could find no room in an overcrowded truck. The policemen ordered them to wait for the next convoy. The mother helped her daughter climb over a fence. At that moment, a submachine gun round was fired, killing the mother. Emma ran away and hid in the village with friends of her parents until January 1942. Then she encountered partisans who were foraging, and she joined the partisan detachment.¹⁵ In the Parichi raion, two families—those of N. Gaishun from the village of Kovchitsy and Mariia Chaplinskaia from Parichi—have been recognized by Yad Vashem for saving Jews.

Elka Steinbuk ended up in the last line of prisoners being taken to their deaths. At the pits, she was only lightly wounded in the arm and pretended to be dead. When the executioners left, she escaped from under the corpses and made her way to the hamlet of Sakirits. Then she lived with the peasants, passing as an "Aryan" until eventually she was denounced.¹⁶

The Soviet army liberated Parichi on June 26, 1944. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) determined in April 1945 that during the occupation of Parichi and the Parichi raion (which included the towns Kopchitsy, Shatilki, Shchedrin, and Pechishche and the villages Krupki, Ala, Shupeika, and Malmomy), there were 3,271 people murdered, including 1,728 women and 862 children.¹⁷ In the ChGK documents, the nationality of the victims was not specified.

POLOTSK

Pre-1941: Polotsk, city and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Polozk, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Polatsk, raen center, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Polotsk is located about 110 kilometers (68 miles) west-northwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, 6,464 Jews lived in the city (21.9 percent of the total). The Jewish population of the Polotsk raion (without the city of Polotsk) consisted of 621 people, who lived in the nearby “military settlement” Borovukha 1-ia (the First), in the village of Trudy, and in some other places. (See also Borovukha 1-ia and Trudy.)

After July 15, 1941, Polotsk and its raion found themselves in the Rear Area, 9th Army, administered by Ortskommandantur 930. Later in the summer of 1941, Polotsk came under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. Ortskommandantur 262 and, from the end of 1941, Feldkommandantur 815 of the 403rd Security Division were both based in the city. In July 1942, Feldkommandantur 815 was transferred to Vitebsk, and Polotsk became the site of the 201st Security Division's headquarters. There were Ortskommandanturen also in Dretun and Trudy.

The mayor of Polotsk was Kichko, and later Dmitrii Petrovskii; his deputy in charge of Rayon Polozk was Bubnov. The chief of police was Albert M. Abukhovich (or Obukhovich). The Belorussian police numbered 50 men, all of them volunteers. Numerous local policemen actively participated in the mass murder of Jews, among them Shastitko, N. Oguretskii, Avlasenko, V. Pravilo, and others.

Abram Sherman, a former carpenter, was appointed Jewish elder (starosta) in the city of Polotsk; the deputy elder, according to witnesses, was Apkin, a former bicycle repair mechanic. Sherman's main function was assigning ghetto inmates to forced labor; some witnesses describe him as a brutal man who punished those guilty of any “violation” with a lashing.

With the occupation came registration, markings, forced labor, and the killing of some Jews whom the Germans accused of being Communists.

The first ghetto was established on the initiative of the local Ortskommandantur in early August 1941. It was situated in the city center, not far from the railway station, and had a total area of some 135,000 square meters (161,459 square yards). The ghetto extended from Kommunisticheskaiia Street in the south to Internatsional'naia Street (formerly Evreiskaia; the street does not exist now) in the north, and from Sakko i Vantsetti Street in the west to Gogolevskaia in the east, thus enclosing 13 blocks of buildings, although some of the houses were wrecked. The ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire but not guarded. Ten families lived in each house. Jews were forbidden to leave the ghetto. The entrance to the ghetto was from Gogolevskaia Street, where there was a sign saying “Ghetto.” Non-Jews from this area were resettled in former Jewish apartments. During the resettlement of the Jews to the ghetto, the Nazis confiscated valuables and other belongings; many Jews were beaten in the process.

In the middle of August, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 9 (commanded by Dr. Alfred Filbert) was sent to Polotsk,¹ and this unit carried out an Aktion. The victims were Jewish men (maybe also some women). According to a survivor, removing the men from the city did not greatly frighten the rest of the ghetto population; those who stayed in the ghetto believed the Germans' story that the men had been taken for forced labor: harvesting or something else. The number of victims and the date of the first Aktion remain unclear.²

Witnesses interrogated by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) mention some Jews killed in the fall of 1941 on the outskirts of Polotsk. One witness mentions a killing of 22 to 25 Jews who lived in Zapolot'e (northwest of the city center, across the Polota River); other witnesses mention “around 25 Jews” killed, who lived on Lepel'skaia and Krasnoznamennaia Streets (south of the city center, on the left bank of the Zapadnaia Dvina River). It is not clear whether these Jews were killed within the framework of the Aktion carried out in August or in a separate Aktion.

In mid-September the ghetto was transferred to a former brick factory in Lozovka (now a northern suburb of Polotsk).³ This resettlement was accompanied by the confiscation of valuables and other belongings from the Jews. The new ghetto consisted of 10 barracks and maybe also some other premises. Some of the Jews had to live outdoors. The new ghetto was surrounded by a fence and guarded by the local police. Forced labor was imposed, and food was rationed, limited to 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per person each day. Some young people managed to escape from the ghetto and exchange clothes, household utensils, and other items for food. A survivor recalls that sometimes Germans would come to the ghetto to rob Jews, even forcing women to strip naked to be searched. Some people died of starvation and disease. According to a non-Jewish witness, more than 500 corpses were removed from the ghetto and buried.⁴

On November 21, 1941, the majority of the Jews of Polotsk were shot in the area of a former firing range in the military settlement Borovukha 2-ia (the Second), close to Lozovka. According to the survivor Mikhail Minkovich, four pits had been prepared at this place beforehand; about 15 Germans and no fewer than 30 local police (politsais) participated in the murder of 2,300 Jews. Before the shooting, the victims were ordered to undress. Witnesses attest that the perpetrators tossed small children alive into the pits. Some Jews succeeded in fleeing from the killing site; only 2 of them survived until the end of the war.

Some relatively small-scale murders of Jews in Polotsk must have taken place in December 1941. Forces of Einsatzgruppe B killed, most probably, more than 200 Jews “for sabotaging German orders.”⁵

On February 3, 1942, the last 615 Jews of Polotsk were killed. The killing site is described by the witnesses interrogated by the ChGK as “in Lozovka, in a grove near the railway crossing.” The perpetrators were most probably members of Einsatzkommando 9, with some participation by men of the 201st Security Brigade.⁶ According to the ChGK, three “specialists,” among them a tailor, were spared for the time being. Some individual Jews, most probably including the specialists, were killed after February 1942.

The extant data do not permit an exact determination of the number of Jews who were killed in Polotsk by the Nazis. The ChGK’s witnesses estimate the number of Jews killed at between 2,500 and 8,000. Some Jews fled the city or were drafted into the Red Army; others took refuge there. For these reasons, there may have been as many as 7,000 or 8,000 Jews in the city when the Germans arrived. Nonetheless, Minkovich’s estimate that 2,300 people were killed by the Nazis in Borovukha 2-ia during the great Aktion of November 1941 seems reliable. By adding to this 250 people killed in December 1941, 615 people killed on February 3, and then 500 people who, according to a witness, died in the second ghetto and were buried, we obtain a total number of victims of the second ghetto: 3,665. To this must be added an uncertain number of Jewish men (and maybe some women) killed by the Nazis in August 1941; taking into account that in other ghettos of the area the number of victims of the “men’s” Aktion generally was no more than one quarter of the entire Jewish population, a maximum estimate for the number of victims probably lies in the range of 4,800 to 4,900. By adding the victims of individual killings in 1941 and “specialists” killed in 1942, we can say that probably around 5,000 Jews in total perished in Polotsk under the German occupation.⁷

Elsewhere in the Polotsk raion, in the Domniki sel’sovet, to the east of Polotsk, 4 Jews were killed in Kotliany, and 8 Jews in another village. According to witnesses interrogated by the ChGK, in the village of Zamozh’e (20 kilometers [12.4 miles] east of Polotsk), of the same sel’sovet, three Jewish families, 17 people, refugees from Polotsk, lived in the bathhouse during the winter of 1941–1942. Sometime in the winter, a German unit arrived from Polotsk, beat the Jews, and then burned them in the same house. According to the account, the Jews who rushed to the windows to get out of the burning house were met with bullets and killed. According to other witnesses interrogated by the ChGK, in March 1942, on the order of the local Kommandant named Schulz, 21 Jews of the village of Kazimirovo (22 kilometers [13.7 miles] northeast of Polotsk), Iurovichi sel’sovet, 4 Jews from Iurovichi, 3 Jews from the nearby village of Sitenets, and probably some more Jews who were found in the territory of the sel’sovet were assembled and locked up in a barn in Kazimirovo. Then the Germans put them in trucks, brought them to a nearby forest, and shot them there. According to another source, the murder took place on February 13 or 16, 1941, and 70 Jews were killed.⁸ In Bel’skii sel’sovet, 8 Jews were killed in the sovkhos “Pobeda” (later Sel’tso-Beloe, to the northwest of Polotsk) in December 1941 by a squad that arrived from Borovukha 1-ia. Four Jews were killed in Zales’e, east-southeast of Polotsk, and 14 Jews in Novye Goriany, 18 kilometers (11.2 miles) southeast along the Vitebsk highway.

PROPOISK (SLAVGOROD)

Pre-1941: Propoisk, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Propoisk, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); 1945: renamed Slavgorod; post-1991: Slauharad, raen center, Mahiliou voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Propoisk is located about 112 kilometers (70 miles) north of Gomel’. According to the 1939 census, 1,038 Jews were living in Propoisk (22 percent of the total population).¹

German armed forces occupied the town on July 30, 1941, approximately five weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this period, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army. Around 150 Jews remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

During the entire occupation, the town was controlled by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). The Ortskommandantur set up a town authority and a police force consisting of local residents.

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the town authority, on the orders of the Ortskommandantur, organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were also forced to perform various kinds of heavy labor.

In August 1941, Sonderkommando 7b arrived in the town and carried out the first anti-Jewish Aktion. The Security Police officers arrested 19 Jews accused of being "instigators and Communist agitators" and shot them.²

In August 1941, an open ghetto was established in the town. German security forces and local police collaborators liquidated the ghetto in November 1941. First, on November 5, the Germans gathered all the Jewish men, took them out of town, and shot them. Then on November 14, they assembled all the Jewish women, on the pretense that they would harvest potatoes, but again they shot them all, close to the pit in which the men were buried. After this, only the children remained in the ghetto. On November 28, 1941, a woman warned the remaining children that the execution squad was on its way, but most were unable to escape or hide. Policemen rounded up the children and threw them onto a truck. Reportedly the children were then drowned in the lake.³ One source estimates the total number of Jewish victims in November as 117.⁴ The killings were apparently carried out by the SD, probably assisted by men of the 1st Company, 317th Police Battalion, which was stationed in Propoisk from November 1941 to March 1942.⁵

During the roundup, 11-year-old Vladimir Smolitskii managed to hide and subsequently survived by wandering among the villages, where various people gave him temporary food and shelter, probably assisted by the circumstance that he did not appear to be Jewish. In the fall of 1943, he was liberated by the Red Army, and despite his youth, he became the "son of a field-engineer battalion," serving as a messenger with the troops in Romania, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia.⁶

PUKHOVICH

Pre-1941: Pukhovichi, town, Pukhovichi raion, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Puchowitschi, Rayon Marina Gorka, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Pukhavichy, Pukhavichy raen, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Pukhovichi is located about 60 kilometers (37 miles) southeast of Minsk. According to the 1939 census, there were 976 Jews living in the Pukhovichi raion (without the raion center, Mar'ina Gorka), most of them in Pukhovichi. A number of Jews worked on two kolkhozy, one Jewish and the other mixed, not far from Pukhovichi.

Pukhovichi was occupied by units of German Army Group Center at the beginning of July 1941. The head of the local police in Pukhovichi was Alexander Goncharik. During the second half of August 1941, a German punitive unit arrived in Pukhovichi. On instructions from the Rayon mayor, Derban, and with the aid of the local police, the German unit rounded up more than 90 Jewish men. These men were interrogated by the Germans in turn and beaten cruelly before being sent back to the group. They were then loaded onto trucks and transported to a site behind the Jewish cemetery in Pukhovichi, where they all were shot. Two Russian women who had worked for the Soviet administration were shot together with the Jews.¹

At the end of August or in early September 1941, the Germans assembled all the Jews of Pukhovichi in the courtyard of a barracks and told them they were going to be sent to Palestine. In preparation for this they had to move into the former postal service sanatorium, which formed a makeshift ghetto.

In the second half of September 1941, Gendarmerie Wachtmeister Bruno Mittmann drove to the area of Mar'ina Gorka and Pukhovichi from Minsk together with some 20 Gendarmes and 27 men of the Schutzpolizei to carry out an Aktion against the local Jewish population. In charge of the Aktion was SS-Brigadeführer Zenner, as well as Gendarmerie Leutnant Karl Kalla. The Aktion was carried out on orders issued by the newly appointed Generalkommissar in Weissruthenien, Wilhelm Kube.²

In Pukhovichi, the Rayon mayor, Derban, instructed the local police to surround the Jewish “ghetto,” as a German police unit had arrived. Among the local police who participated in the Aktion were the leader Goncharik, Alexander Mayevskiy, and Fedor Mayko. The Jews were instructed to put on their best clothes and to take their most valuable belongings with them. When the column was ready, the Germans and their collaborators escorted the Jews to the Blon’ kolkhoz near Mar’ina Gorka.

At Blon’, the Jews were made to undress in a pigsty and then taken up the hill of Popova Gorka in groups of 10 to be shot by German police with machine guns. The Jews from the nearby Mar’ina Gorka ghetto were also taken on foot to Blon’ on the same day and were shot together with those from Pukhovichi. Children were thrown into the grave and buried alive. According to one account, some women were raped before they were shot. The shootings lasted nearly all day, and the Germans tried to drown out the noise from the local inhabitants by running tractor engines.³

RIASNO

Pre-1941: Riasno, village, Dribin raion, Mogilev oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rjassno, Rayon Dribin, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Rasna, Drybin raen, Mahiliou voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Riasno is located about 55 kilometers (34 miles) east-northeast of Mogilev. According to figures from the 1939 census, there were approximately 350 Jews living in Riasno.

The village was occupied on July 14, 1941, about three weeks after the German attack on the USSR on June 22. At that time, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army. Many Jewish refugees also arrived and settled in the village, adding to the population. Following the occupation of the village, the German military commandant appointed a village elder (starosta) and organized a Belorussian police force (Ordnungsdienst) consisting of local residents, including Fedor Hot’man and Fedor Terent’ev.¹

In the summer and fall of 1941, a series of anti-Jewish measures were implemented in Riasno. Jews were registered and forced to wear patches in the shape of the Star of David; they had to perform heavy labor without pay, were prohibited from leaving the limits of the village, and were subjected to systematic beatings and robbery by the local police.

In September 1941, the German authorities established some form of ghetto for the Jews in the center of the village. According to historian Marat Botvinnik, it existed for about six months. The ghetto was liquidated on March 3, 1942, when a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 from Krichev numbering 30 or 40 men arrived in Riasno. With the help of the local police, they collected the entire Jewish population (men, women, children, and old people) and escorted them to a killing site about 1.5 kilometers (1 mile) to the east of Riasno. Here the Germans ordered the Jews to remove their clothes down to their underwear. Then the Jews were ordered to get into the prepared ditches, and the Germans and their collaborators shot them with machine guns. At least 410 persons, including Jews from the village and Jewish refugees, were murdered.² On March 18, 1942, Landeschützen Battalion 285, which formed the Ortskommandantur in Riasno, reported that money had been found in the clothes of Jews who had been “liquidated” (erledigt) that month by a German punitive unit assisted by the local police.³

In April 1942, only a few weeks after the liquidation of the ghetto, the mayor of Mogilev sent several hundred civilian evacuees who had just arrived from the Russian town of Gzhatsk from Mogilev to Riasno, where they were accommodated in the former ghetto.⁴

ROGACHEV

Pre-1941: Rogachev, city and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Rogatschew, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Rahachou, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Rogachev is located 121 kilometers (76 miles) north-northwest of Gomel'. In 1939, the Jewish population was 4,601 (30.3 percent of the total).

Shortly after the German invasion of the Soviet Union, a great many refugees started to arrive in Rogachev from Minsk, Bobruisk, and other places in western Belorussia. As the tide of refugees increased, schools and other buildings were taken over to accommodate them. Some refugees continued moving east across the Dnieper River, but many remained in Rogachev. Fewer than half of the Jews managed to leave, either as members of labor collectives of enterprises and organizations or on their own initiative by foot in the direction of Gomel' before Soviet forces destroyed the bridges across the Dnieper.¹

German forces entered Rogachev on July 3, but resistance continued. Rogachev finally surrendered on August 19, 1941, as Army Group Center swung south towards Gomel' and Kiev, outflanking the city.

The territory of the Rogachev raion was administered by the German Rear Area, Army Group Center. In Rogachev, a local commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) and a field commandant's office (Feldkommandantur 528 (V)) were established. In the building of the former Machine Tractor Station (MTS), an office of the Secret Field Police (Geheime Feldpolizei, GFP-724) was established, and units of the military Feldgendarmarie and the Security Police and SD all operated in the city. According to Soviet sources, in the Rogachev raion, Major Marlo and his deputy, Major Diller, were in charge of the Feldkommandantur; Captain Zipke headed the agricultural commandant's office (Landwirtschaftsführer); Oberleutnant Rudolf headed the Ortskommandantur; Oberleutnant

Mentrop (or Matron) was the head of the Security Police (Gestapo) branch; Kresse headed the punitive squad; and Lobikov became head of the local Belorussian police. The German authorities established camps for Soviet prisoners of war (POWs) at Gadilovich and Dvoretz near Rogachev, as well as in Novyi and Saryi Dovsk, about 30 kilometers (18.6 miles) to the northeast.²

The first victims of the Nazis were Soviet activists and Jews. German security forces conducted mass shootings near the timber mill, in the basements, and around the building of the central warehouse in Rogachev. Among those shot were Pribylskii, the former chairman of the timber mill executive committee; Frumenkov, a member of the raion party executive committee (raiiispolkom); and Admiralov, the kolkhoz chairman.³

Initially, under the German occupation the Jews continued to live in their own homes. They were not permitted to go out into public spaces, walk along the main streets of the city, or engage in relations with non-Jews. In September 1941, the Nazis introduced measures for their complete isolation from the Belorussians and Russians. On September 9, the Rogachev administration began implementing an order for the resettlement of the Jews into the building of the city's heating and power plant. Then the process of selection began. Able-bodied men were taken away to a labor camp and quartered in the basement of a former military warehouse. In the course of the resettlement, Jews had to leave behind all their belongings at their old place of residence, leave their doors unlocked, and leave the keys in a visible place. The police watchmen guarded the ghetto around the clock. They used rubber batons to beat prisoners for their own "amusement." Since the Germans did not entirely trust the local police in Rogachev, only those men were armed who were given the task of guarding the Jews.⁴ The Germans led away groups of Jews to perform the most grueling and dirty labor, using methods that amounted to torture. The Jews had to clear stone and brick rubble and carry sand and water without proper tools. Often the labor was very degrading. They made women and young teenage girls clean up feces with their hands in lavatories that were designated "Only for Germans." There were many similar incidents.⁵

To survive, Jews had to rely on their own modest reserves of food, barter, or gain the assistance of the local Belorussians. The Belorussians provided some buckwheat, frozen turnips, cabbage, and a small amount of bread. As a rule, the local residents helped out their "own" Jews free of charge. Those who were married to Belorussians or Jews from nearby villages were assisted by former neighbors and fellow villagers. These more integrated Jews were only a small minority of those in the ghetto. Most Jews had to barter goods for food, which was forbidden. They did so anyway, despite the risk to their lives. The barter trade required careful organization and mutual trust, and in many cases, Jews worked with local policemen who looked the other way. Escape from the ghetto was impossible. Sometimes the Belorussian policemen and the Germans would beat Jews they caught bartering, to teach them a lesson.⁶

The first Aktion was organized by a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 based in Gomel', under the command of Wilhelm Schulz, on November 6, 1941. The chosen site for the mass shooting was a very large antitank ditch about 120 meters by 10 meters, and 5 meters deep (394 by 33 by 16 feet), behind the cardboard factory and the bread-making plant on the banks of the Drut' River.⁷ The German Security Police and their helpers selected several hundred Jews from among ghetto inhabitants in Rogachev and drove them in groups towards the river in trucks, where they ordered them to undress. With the assistance of local policemen, the SS men lined up their victims at the bottom of the ravine in groups of 10, then shot them in the back of the head with their automatic weapons and rifles. They finished off the wounded with the butts of their firearms and with shovels. They seized young children by the legs, smashed their heads on the frozen ground, and threw them into the ditch. According to the German Einsatzgruppen report, 2,365 male and female Jews were murdered for their alleged support of the partisans in the course of an Aktion in Gomel', Rogachev, and Korma.⁸

The second Aktion was conducted on December 1, 1941. Under the guise of escorting them out for a work assignment, the Germans took 72 Jews from the ghetto and used them for clearing roads near the villages of Novyi and Staryi Krivsk. Afterwards they shot all of these people.

The third Aktion was carried out on January 1, 1942, at Starina, near the village of Khatovnia. The Germans shot 172 Jews there.

The fourth Aktion took place on February 12 (or according to another source, in March), 1942, in an antitank ditch 70 meters (230 feet) from the Drut' River. This time, the Jewish victims included the children from mixed marriages, who were gathered from the surrounding villages. They also included the Jewish special laborers who had been set apart during the first Aktion. According to witnesses, six Roma (Gypsy) families were shot together with the Jews.⁹

On December 27, 1941, 260 Jews from the village of Sverzhen', in the Rogachev raion, were shot.¹⁰

The Nazi German occupiers carried out the killings at a Russian cemetery that came to be called "the valley of death" (dolina smerti). Around 1,000 people were killed there. Later, 10 mass graves were unearthed; they were 3 meters in length, 6 meters in width, and 3 meters deep (almost 10 by 20 by 10 feet).

In the spring of 1942, the Drut' River flooded, and the water washed away the soil, revealing a few hundred Jewish corpses. According to the testimony of Nina Barantseva, several bodies were recognizable. There were some adults who held children in their arms as they died, not wanting to let them go. The German authorities ordered the local residents of Rogachev to rebury the exposed corpses.¹¹

In November and December 1943, part of Sonderkommando 7a arrived in Rogachev to carry out Operation "Wettermeldung" ("Weather Report") under the command of SS-Hauptscharführer Stertzinger. They removed 20 Soviet POWs from the SD prison in Rogachev for work as slave laborers to burn the corpses. The unit cordoned off the site of the Jewish graves so that no local residents could witness the events. They informed the POWs that they would be leaving for work in Germany, giving them vodka and cigarettes. Five of the men passed out from the stench of rotting corpses. The corpses were removed from the graves with iron hooks and placed in stacks, covered with tar, and cremated. The remaining ash was transported away in trucks.¹²

During the liquidation of the ghetto in Rogachev, some people managed to escape. Tat'iana Duktovskaia saved the life of Liuda Mazheiko. In May 1941, Tat'iana arrived in Rogachev from the city of Chita but did not manage to evacuate in time. After the liquidation of the ghetto, Liuda's father Vladimir spoke with 18-year-old Tat'iana and persuaded her to pass off his 5-year-old daughter as her own. The German authorities required a medical certificate, and a Doctor Zubets issued a statement saying that the time of "birth" could not be determined. For 3 years, Tat'iana hid Liuda in the countryside, moving her from one village to another.¹³

A German army officer took in eight-year-old Alevtina Igol'nikova, who lost both her parents in the fighting on July 3, 1941. For several months, he kept her in his home, then sent her away to be raised by a woman named Anastasia Tristenetskaia.¹⁴

On February 24, 1944, forces of the 1st Belorussian Front liberated Rogachev. In November 1944, the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) ascertained that 3,700 people were murdered by the German occupants in Rogachev, and 6,353 perished in the raion. The surnames of 2,233 victims (about 35 percent) were established.¹⁵

The national affiliation of the victims could not be determined precisely by the commission. Overall, during the occupation the population of the Rogachev raion decreased from 57,115 in 1941 to 28,000 in 1944 (49 percent of the pre-war population level).¹⁶

ROSSASNO

Pre-1941: Rossasno, village, Dubrovno raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Dubrowno, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Rossasna, Dubrouna raen, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Rossasno is located a few kilometers to the northeast of Dubrovno on the southern bank of the Dnieper River. In 1939, the Jewish population of the Dubrovno raion (without the town of Dubrovno) consisted of 222 people, most of whom lived in the villages of Baevo and Rossasno. There were probably around 100 Jews living in Rossasno at the beginning of June 1941. Only part of the Jewish population remained in Rossasno at the start of the German occupation in mid-July 1941.

At first the German occupiers did not resettle the Jews into a ghetto, and the Jews continued to live in their own homes. They were forbidden to leave the limits of the village, and for this reason at least one person, a woman named Khaia, was shot by the local police in the village of Goncharovo.¹

Approximately one month before the murder of the Jews of Rossasno, in early March 1942, the Jews were gathered together in the local school building, where they were held until the start of April. These were predominantly children, old people, and women. Few details are available about this confinement, but historian Gennadii Vinnitsa conjectures that the school served as a form of ghetto, as they were held there for almost one month and during that period they were guarded by the local police. Thus the ghetto served as a collection point until the Germans were ready to consign them to their deaths. On April 2, 1942, the inmates of the small ghetto in Rossasno were loaded onto sleighs and taken to Liady.² On that day, the Jews of the Liady ghetto together with those from Rossasno were brought across the Mereia River to the Russian side, where the Germans shot them and buried them in a mass grave.³

Information from the Zonal State Archive (ZGAGO) in Orsha reveals the names of 58 of the Jews from Rossasno who were murdered. It is likely that the number of Jews killed was higher than this. The Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia indicates that 74 Jews from Rossasno were murdered in total.

SOURCES A short section on the Rossasno ghetto, including the 58 victims' names, can be found in the work by Gennadii Vinnitsa: Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), pp. 28–31. Of use also is the entry for "Rossasno" in Rossiiskaia Evreiskaia Entsiklopediia (Moscow: Russian Academy of Natural Sciences, Jewish Encyclopedia Research Center, "Epos," 2007), 6:376–377.

ROSSONY

Pre-1941: Rossony (until 1939, Stanislavovo), village and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Rasony, raen center, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Rossony is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) north of Polotsk. According to the census of 1939, the Jewish population of the Rossony raion consisted of 419 people, 49 of whom lived in Rossony.

Units of the German XXIII Army Corps of the 9th Army, supported by the LVII Army Corps of the 3rd Panzer Group, initially captured the Rossony raion. The western part of the raion (west of the line Iukhovichi-Kliastitsy) was taken by these two Army Corps on July 14, 1941. On July 15, the Germans advanced quickly to the east, overrunning Rossony, and by July 16, they were close to the shores of Lake Neshcherdo. By July 17 the entire raion was in German hands. From August 1941 onward, Rossony was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center, being situated on its western edge, near the area under "civil administration" (Generalkommis-sariat Weissruthenien). This area was the realm of the 403rd Security Division; Rossony was under the control of Ortskommandantur 262.

In the fall of 1941, the local commandant in Rossony, Otto Lenz, ordered the Jews of the raion to be resettled to the village of Rossony, where a ghetto was established. The ghetto was fenced with barbed wire and guarded. A sign was erected near the ghetto gate, announcing that any inmate who crossed the fence and left the ghetto would be shot. The Nazis confiscated all the belongings of the ghetto Jews, including clothes and even food supplies. In 1945, the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated the number of Rossony ghetto inmates at 488. The inmates received no food, and many of them died before the ghetto was liquidated. In January 1942, the Germans and the local police escorted the Jews out of the village to the northeast, where they shot them near the Osinniki road, in three pits that had been dug beforehand. Before being murdered, the victims were instructed to undress. The mass grave remained open until April 1942, when it was closed on the orders of Mayor Iazutov.

The number of Jewish victims in Rossony named by the witnesses interrogated by the ChGK seems to be exaggerated, taking into consideration that the whole Jewish population of the raion prior to the war was only 419 people. It should be noted that the raion was situated close to the Polotsk fortified area (Polotskii ukrepraion), part of the pre-war fortifications of the old Soviet-Polish border line, and therefore it may have attracted dozens of refugees from western, formerly Polish, areas.

Jews of the Starye Dvory sel'sovet (later Krasnopol'e sel'sovet) were killed mainly by the German staff of the prisoner-of-war (POW) camp in Demekh that was situated 2 or 3 kilometers (about 1.5 miles) east of Krasnopol'e, on the northern side of the Drysa River, close to the camp. According to the depositions made for the ChGK in 1945, the men of the Demekh garrison were engaged in cleansing the vicinity of Jews; the Jews were first collected in the camp and then killed. For example, in August or September 1941, five Jewish families (about 15 people) from the village of Karpino, 2 to 3 kilometers (about 1.5 miles) north of Krasnopol'e, were shot near the Demekh camp. According to a witness interrogated by the ChGK, 12 Jews (four families) from the Krasnopol'e village were assembled in September 1941 under the pretext of their registration and the issuing of new personal documents, then murdered in the same place; according to another witness, 7 Jews from Krasnopol'e were killed near Demekh, and 2 others managed to flee; it is unclear whether this refers to one and the same Aktion or two different ones.

Elsewhere in the raion, 36 Jews from the Maxim Gorky kolkhoz (most probably the village of Albrekhtovo) were killed in the Albrekhtovo sel'sovet (later Biriuzovo sel'sovet).¹ Eight Jews from the village of Vladimirovka were shot near the road to Trodovichi (3 or 4 kilometers [about 2 miles] northwest of Krasnopol'e). On September 21, 1941, a squad of three German soldiers from the Krasnopol'e garrison arrived at the village of Shuliatino (later a part of the Amosenki village, 6 kilometers [4 miles] west of Krasnopol'e along the Rossony road). The squad arrested 6 Jewish peasants when they were working in the fields and shot them on the spot. According to a witness in the village of Berezovka near Krasnopol'e, partisans executed the starosta, who had denounced a local Jewish woman to the Germans. In January 1944, in the village of Shalashniki, Germans shot a Jew named Hirsh Gilevich.

SOURCES Information can be found in Pamiats': Historyka-dakumental'naia kbronika Rasonskaba raiona (Minsk, 1994). The documents of the ChGK for the Rossony raion can be found in GARF (7021-92-222).

SENNO

Pre-1941: Senno, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwartiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Sianno, raen center, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Senno is located about 60 kilometers (37.3 miles) southwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, the last pre-war census recorded a total of 1,056 Jews living in the town, 24.5 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Senno raion (without the town of Senno) was 165. In 1939, there were 569 Jews living in the nearby raion center of Bogushevsk (32 kilometers, or 20 miles, east of Senno).

The XLVII Motorized Army Corps of the 2nd Panzer Group entered Senno on July 6, 1941. However, the battle for this town between the German motorized corps and the Soviet 14th and 18th Tank Divisions went on until the evening of July 8. Bogushevsk was taken on July 10, 1941; on July 14, it was in the operational area of the V Army Corps of the 9th Army.

From August 1941 onward, Senno was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. In 1941, the Senno raion was the realm of Feldkommandantur 815 of the 403rd Security Division. Later, until mid-February 1942, Senno was under the authority of Feldkommandantur 181 of the 286th Security Division, with Ortskommandantur 846 located in the town. From mid-February 1942, Senno was returned to the authority of Feldkommandantur 815.

In Senno, the Germans appointed former school principal Samuil Davidovich Svoiskii as the Jewish elder. The Germans resettled the Jews of Senno at least twice, most likely several times. At each new place the Jews were settled more densely, and the regime was stricter than at the previous one. For example, initially the Germans turned a blind eye to communication between Jews and non-Jews; later they punished such communication. In the fall of 1941, most probably in October, the Germans established a formal ghetto in the town's upper area, Golyinka, mainly on Voroshilov Street. The Jews were crammed 45 to 50 people to a house; Belorussian policemen guarded the ghetto. According to a witness interviewed by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the ghetto Jews received 50 grams (less than 2 ounces) of bread per person per day.

On October 16, 12 Jews were shot for “showing up late for work.” At the end of December 1941, the ghetto of Senno was liquidated. On December 29, a punitive squad appeared in Senno. The SS and the local police surrounded the ghetto. The next day the SS drove Jews from their houses and declared that they were to be moved to Orsha. Instead, the Jews were brought from Golyinka to the village of Kozlovka, about 1.5 kilometers (1 mile) east of the town, on a hill, and ordered to dig pits. On the sunny and frosty day of December 30 (according to other accounts, December 31), all the Senno Jews were shot. The Aktion lasted from 8:00 A.M. to 2:00 P.M. that day. According to all accounts, the Belorussian police played a crucial role in the massacre.¹

The ChGK documents vary in their estimates of the number of victims, ranging from 850 to 965. The inscription on the monument erected in Senno says there were 850 victims of the massacre.

Apart from the town of Senno, a Jewish family by the name of Bekker—11 people, among them six children—was killed in the village of Zabor’e, 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) south of Senno.

The nearby raion center of Bogushevsk was the site of one of the earliest wholesale massacres of Jews in the Vitebsk area. Although witnesses date the Aktion differently,² the killing most probably took place in early September 1941.

According to both the ChGK and the witness Sofya M., the execution in Bogushevsk was a reprisal Aktion for an abortive attempt on the life of a German officer. Indeed, on September 4, 1941, a skirmish took place between partisans and the German garrison of Bogushevsk. Its details, minus the exaggerations made by Soviet official historiography, roughly correspond to the description made by both Sofya M. and the ChGK. According to these witnesses, an SS squad arrived in town following this skirmish and, with the assistance of the Belorussian police, assembled all the population of this small town in the square in front of the raion party committee (raikom) building. Then the Germans and politsais (local police) began to check the identification documents, sending the Russians and Belorussians to one side of the square, the Jews to the other side. According to the ChGK, they released the non-Jewish women and children and told the rest of the people that their fate would be decided by the Orsha commandant. The commandant arrived and ordered the shooting of all the Jews and several non-Jewish men. The people were machine-gunned on the spot; 20 non-Jewish men were ordered to bury the bodies.³

An inscription on the monument erected in Bogushevsk after the war states that 86 Jews were killed in the town on the day of the massacre. The ChGK documents give a different figure: 64 Jewish victims. The eyewitnesses in the town are divided between these estimates concerning the number of victims.

The ChGK report of March 29, 1945, dated the mass murder of the Jews in Bogushevsk in October 1941; another ChGK document, dated June 26, 1944, gave a date of September 5, 1941; see Zverstva nemetsko-fashistskikh zakhvatnikov: Dokumenty, vyp. 14 (Moscow, 1945), p. 42. According to the survivor Sofya M., the killing took place on August 9, 1941. The survivor describes the day as a warm one; she says that the Jews had not been registered, marked by patches, stripped of their property, or resettled up to that day. The Belorussian witnesses interviewed by Vinnitsa also point to August as the month of the mass murder; see Vinnitsa, Gorech’ i bol’, pp. 118–119.

SHCHEDRIN

Pre-1941: Shchedrin (Yiddish: Seliba), town, Poles’e oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Schtschedrin, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Shchadryn, Zlobin raen, Homel’ voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Shchedrin is located 48 kilometers (30 miles) west of Zhlobin. In 1926, there were 1,759 Jews living in Shchedrin.

After the German invasion on June 22, 1941, most men of military age in Shchedrin were mobilized for service in the Red Army. As the town was some distance from the railroad, it did not suffer from aerial bombardment, and because there was no organized evacuation, only a small part of the population managed to leave the town. Those who left expected to return soon. A number of Communists and sel’sovet activists stayed behind to conduct underground work in Shchedrin.

German armed forces occupied Shchedrin in July 1941, and within 10 days a local police force was recruited, made up of Belorussians and Poles who were natives of Shchedrin and the neighboring villages. Adam Rudinskii became the town’s mayor, and his deputy was a man named Kuchinskii. The senior police officials were Vladislav Semashko and Antanas Trizno. The local administration helped the Germans search for Communists and Jews and also registered the Jews.

Relations between the Jews and the Belorussians changed with the arrival of the Germans. The Jews lost their civil rights, and anyone could take their property with impunity. The keeper of the kolkhoz granary, a man named Rubinshtein, was shot for refusing to give a policeman his leather boots. Zimel' Kimmel'man, his wife Malka, and his young daughter were hidden in the village of Solotin in the home of a peasant they knew, a man named Anan, in return for a sum of money. Anan took the money, but then at night he informed the Germans, who shot the Jews.

The Jews, 1,560 in total, remained in their homes in Shchedrin until early August 1941, when the Germans forced them all to move onto two small streets, "Sair gas" and "Bod gas," where a ghetto was created. It was partially enclosed by barbed wire, and policemen were posted at the ghetto gates. The Germans appointed Antanas Trizno to be in charge of the ghetto. The Jews were strictly forbidden to go into the center of Shchedrin without special permission. When the blacksmith Berl inadvertently violated this ban, he was shot on the spot.¹ Several families had to share each apartment. There was no synagogue within the ghetto, so the Jews would gather to pray in their apartments.²

The most attractive girls were rounded up and taken to a brothel for the German soldiers. The Jews were ordered to wear yellow six-pointed stars on the front and back of their clothing. Not everyone had fabric of that color, and feverish searching began because the Nazis threatened to kill anyone who failed to comply with the order by a certain date. The police forced those who had committed offenses to eat sand.

The Jews had to organize their own supplies of food. They bartered with the local residents for potatoes and vegetables, and some received help from relatives and Belorussian neighbors. Each day, under escort, the Jews were led out of the ghetto to perform forced labor from dawn until dusk. They were made to work in workshops, in the gristmill, and in the sawmill; to clean cesspools and toilets; to repair roads; and to collect garbage. For performing work, a Jew received a daily ration of only 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread, in contrast to 1 kilogram (2.2 pounds) of bread for a non-Jew, even though the output quota for Jews was three times greater.³

Jews were among the Nazis' first victims in Shchedrin, well before a large-scale Aktion took place. In July 1941, the Germans shot two men named Pishchalo and Khort, who had secretly taken cheese and dairy products from the Shchedrin creamery to the village of Shatilki, where there were still Soviet troops. Pishchalo was killed in the yard of the Kommandantur in Shchedrin, and he left behind five orphaned children. Khort was taken into a tea shop and severely lashed; then he was blindfolded and taken to the Jewish cemetery, where he was made to dig his own grave and then shot. After this, Trizno drove two Germans to the village of Uspalishche, where they murdered Khort's wife and raped his 15-year-old daughter Sasha. Sonia Asovskaia was hanged in the yard of the creamery just after her 5-year-old son was shot before her eyes. Permission to remove her body was denied for a long time, as the authorities wanted to remind the Jews daily of the severe punishments they faced. Before the arrival of fall in Shchedrin, 17 Communists had been shot.

The son of Boris Porton came to Shchedrin in the summer of 1941 on vacation from Vitebsk, where he was studying. He was among 11 Jewish men who were forced into a shop that sold kerosene and were beaten there. Porton's son and the shop manager, a man named Zverev, were the first to be handed spades and taken to the cemetery. When Boris Porton was told that his son had been taken away to be shot, he ran after them, crying, "Spare my son, kill me!" The Nazis killed Boris, and next they shot his son and Zverev.

Iosel' Samardin took two grandchildren to the village of Kitin, 7 kilometers (4.4 miles) from Shchedrin, and asked friends to hide them. After the ghetto was established, the Germans announced that they would kill anyone found to be hiding Jews. Acting on a report to the authorities, the policeman Semashko discovered Samardin's grandchildren and shot them.⁴

In December 1941, there were rumors that a German punitive detachment would be sent to Shchedrin, and people began to go into hiding. The cobbler Wol'fson was found in a haystack and stabbed with bayonets. The pharmacy manager Arkadii Kheifets, who had leg problems, was taken to the fire station and harnessed to a wagon with a barrel of water. When Kheifets fainted, they sent for his wife Sonia. She grabbed a vial of liquid and ran to her husband. They both poisoned themselves and died on the spot.⁵

The Germans planned the destruction of the ghetto for March 8, 1942. In the days before the mass shooting, the police surrounded the ghetto and began to force the Jews out of the houses. According to the testimony of eyewitnesses, the prisoners were beaten with whips, people were screaming and sobbing, and parents shielded their children with their own bodies to protect them from the blows. The Jews were herded into groups, and then, under the guard of policemen on horseback and Germans on motorcycles, they were driven into the school building. Many mothers carried their children in their arms. The cemetery grounds were cordoned off, and no Belorussians were allowed to enter.⁶ The chief of police, Mikhail Govor, and three Germans met the prisoners at the school gates and questioned them.⁷

Simultaneously, the German authorities mobilized peasants from the neighboring villages, who were ordered to dig a pit in the Jewish cemetery about 30 meters long and 5 meters wide (98 by 16 feet). On the morning of March 8, 1942, the Jews were taken in groups of 90 to 100 from the school to the cemetery, guarded by local policemen and four German soldiers.⁸ They were led to the edge of the pit, then had to undress and lie facedown in the pit in groups of 10. A German officer then killed the people with a submachine gun, firing single shots. Policemen from Parichi also participated in shooting the Jews. The Aktion ended late in the evening.

Estimates of the total number of Jewish victims murdered in Shchedrin on March 8, 1942, range from around 1,000 up to 2,000.⁹ Among the victims were a number of Jews brought to Shchedrin from neighboring villages and some refugees. After the mass shooting, the Nazis checked the registration lists of the Jews and found that 17 were missing, including Girsh and Tsilia Erenburg, Grigorii Ol'shanskii, and Sara Livshits. After two or three days, the German security forces that conducted the Aktion left Shchedrin and went to the village of Kitin. For a week, with local assistance, the police continued to hunt for escaped Jews in hiding. Tolik and Tsezik Kuchinskii rode on horseback from village to village, looking for Jews in exchange for a reward. The police arrested about 10 people, whom they killed in a common grave.¹⁰ The Germans gave most of the Jews' clothing to Rudinskii, the town's mayor, who sold some of the things and distributed the rest to the local policemen.¹¹

Not all of the survivors of the Aktion on March 8, 1942, escaped with their lives. Two Jewish girls froze to death near the village of Pekalichi, 7 kilometers (4.4 miles) from Shchedrin, after local residents denied them shelter. Luba was caught by 20-year-old Pavlik Prokopovich, who had been a school classmate of hers in Shchedrin and who served in the local police in Parichi. Prokopovich also killed the physics teacher from his school, Isaak Galerkin. (After the arrival of the Red Army, Prokopovich was sentenced to 20 years in corrective labor camps.) Only a few Jews who escaped from the ghetto managed to join Soviet partisan units and take part in the resistance against the Germans.

Soviet forces recaptured Shchedrin in the second half of June 1944. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) of the USSR uncovered, at a distance of 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) from Shchedrin, a mass burial site measuring 20 by 10 meters and 1.2 meters deep (66 by 33 by 4 feet). There they discovered 1,100 corpses, arranged haphazardly. On most of the victims, there was no clothing of any kind.¹² The ChGK established that in all more than 9,000 civilians, including more than 1,000 Jews, had died at the hands of the Nazis in Shchedrin and the surrounding villages during the years of German occupation.¹³

SHEPELEVICH

Pre-1941: Shepelevichi, village, Krugloe raion, Mogilev oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Schepelewitschi, Rayon Kruttscha, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Shapialevichy, Krublae raen, Mabilion voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Shepelevichi is located 55 kilometers (34 miles) west-northwest of Mogilev. German forces occupied the village on July 8, 1941, slightly more than two weeks after their invasion of the USSR. During those two weeks a few of the Jews in the village managed to evacuate eastward. Several dozen Jews remained in the village at the start of the occupation.

On their arrival, the Germans immediately appointed a local police force. Among the local inhabitants who served in the police were Semion Vladkyo, Makar Golovkov, and a man named Petrok. The Jews were registered by the new authorities. The local policemen frequently entered Jewish homes and robbed the Jews of anything they wanted, threatening that they would shoot them. The Germans also imposed a series of anti-Jewish measures. Jews were required to sew yellow stars on their clothes. They were forbidden to buy foodstuffs, use the sidewalks, or speak with Belorussians.¹

Soon after the start of the occupation, the Germans arrested 3 Jewish men in Shepelevichi and shot them near the Mokrov cemetery, not far from Belynichi, after forcing them to dig their own graves. In mid-October, news arrived of the murder of 81 Jews in the nearby village of Es'mony, 8 kilometers (5 miles) to the south; the perpetrators may have used gas vans or may have shot their victims. The pretense for the killings may have been a report by Infantry Regiment 691 that the local Jews there were supporting the partisans.² Then on October 29, 1941, a truck with Gendarmes arrested the father and uncle of Honya Epshtein and shot them in the neighboring village of Stai. The German Gendarmes (probably Feldgendarmerie of the Wehrmacht) were assisted by the local police, who also took the clothes and boots of the victims.³

On November 15, 1941, all the Jews of Shepelevichi were driven out of their houses and escorted by local police carrying spades to a quarry about 500 meters (547 yards) outside the village. Here a military unit with machine guns was awaiting them. The Germans conducted a selection, according to principles that remained unclear. Then they shot about 30 or 40 people, including women, babies, old men, and teenage boys. The bodies were buried in a mass grave that had been prepared in advance. The screams of those who were shot could be heard some 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) away.⁴

After the shooting, the remaining Jews were put into several houses, in what Honya Epshtein has described as a small remnant ghetto. At first the ghetto was very overcrowded. Germans or policemen came regularly to the houses, however, to take people out and shoot them. On December 12, 1941, the few remaining Jews were transferred to the Krugloe ghetto, where they shared the fate of the other Jews gathered there, most of whom were shot in the first half of 1942, except for a few who managed to escape.⁵

According to one account in the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report, 144 people from Shepelevichi were shot in 1941, including 57 women and 52 children. This account by Alexander Tikhonovich Dasevich does not mention whether all the victims were Jewish.⁶

SHKLOV

Pre-1941: Shklov, town and raion center, Mogilev oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Schklow, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Shklov, raen center, Mahiliov voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Shklov is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) north of Mogilev. According to the 1939 census, 2,132 Jews lived in Shklov, comprising 26.7 percent of the total population. In addition, there were some 457 Jews living in the Shklov raion, most in the village of Starosel’e (about 200).

The German attack on the Soviet Union forced many Jews to evacuate to the east. In addition, some Jewish men were called up to the Red Army. Therefore, it is not known exactly how many Jews remained in Shklov under the German occupation.

Units of the German XLVI Panzer Corps, subordinated to Panzer Group 2, captured the town on July 11, 1941. The region of Shklov was administered by Rear Area, Army Group Center. The town was controlled by the local commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur), which reported to the 286th Security Division based in Orsha. According to one German report, about four fifths of Shklov was destroyed in the fighting, which together with the supposed threat of disease provided an incentive for relocating the Jews to ghettos.¹

By the end of July 1941, the city council, consisting of eight local non-Jews, forced the Jewish population of Shklov and the towns of Zarech’e and Ryzhkovichi, located in the southern suburbs, into two ghettos.

The first was located in an area near the Orthodox church in Ryzhkovichi, which was fenced off by barbed wire and guarded by Belorussian policemen. Some Jews were able to remain in their own houses within this area,² but others had to sleep in the open. The Jews were able to leave the ghetto and trade their property for food. The German officers and soldiers, exploiting the absolute lawlessness, robbed the ghetto inhabitants, taking everything that was at all valuable. According to the testimony of B.M. Galperin, the Taruch family was thrown into a well, and one Jew, after having his gold teeth knocked out, was murdered.³

It appears that in August 1941 some of the Jews were herded into a second ghetto, this time a closed ghetto, located in Shklov on L’nozavodskaya Street. The inhabitants of the ghetto were forced to live in horribly cramped conditions. Each house held between 100 and 150 people. The ghetto inmates were not allowed to leave their houses after 6:00 p.m. The Jews were regularly beaten. In order to transmit its instructions to the Jews, the Germans created a Jewish Council (Judenrat), but very little is known about its activities in Shklov.

Galperin recalls “how they buried the wife of the Shklov rabbi. They allowed her to be buried at the cemetery and even provided a horse. I carried her torn jacket on the street and was horrified to see that it was covered in lice. My mother said quietly, ‘My child, the lice ate her.’”⁴

From the first days of the occupation, the German forces spread their propaganda, which exploited and inflamed inter-ethnic hatred. For example, they distributed leaflets proclaiming that the “the days of Judeo-Bolshevik commissars in Russia are over” and that “the biggest enemy of society are the kikes [Jews].” In Shklov a newspaper was published by Loshakov that included antisemitic articles.

The first Aktion or mass shooting was conducted in Shklov at the beginning of August 1941, when Sonderkommando 7b of Einsatzgruppe B murdered 84 Jews. According to the Einsatzgruppen report, the victims “comprised 22 arsonists, 25 looters, 22 terrorists, 11 functionaries and franc-tireurs and 4 people who had spread malicious rumors.”⁵

It is possible that this initial Aktion was a response to some actual displays of resistance, but it may also have been merely a pretext used by the Germans to justify their preemptive measures against the Jewish “intelligentsia.” Participation in sabotage was the reason alleged for the shooting of 627 Jews living in “Schidow” (in or near Shklov) in October 1941, as well as the murder of 812 men and women (presumably in Shklov itself) by units of Einsatzkommando 8.⁶ It is possible that the 627 Jews were the inhabitants of the Ryzhkovichi ghetto, and the 812 Jews were from the ghetto in Shklov.⁷

According to local testimony, in October 1941, the Germans transported the prisoners from the ghetto in Ryzhkovichi across the Dnieper River on boats to Zarech’e. In the center of the village, the Jews were forced to the ground and searched, with all their valuables being taken. Then they were organized into a column and were herded by German soldiers towards the village of Putniki.⁸ The Jews were shot in an antitank ditch.

The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report dated December 18, 1944, mentions that near the village of Putniki, 2,700 people were executed or buried alive, but the report does not state whether those killed were all Jews.⁹

The inhabitants of the second ghetto, located in Shklov, were taken by the occupiers in motorized vehicles and driven to the ditches around the villages of Zarech’e and Ryzhkovichi. They were made to undress down to their underwear, forced to lie on the ground, and were shot. Many were beaten beforehand, and children were thrown into the ditch alive. The number of victims estimated by the ChGK is approximately 3,000 people.¹⁰ In light of the pre-war Jewish population, however, it seems unlikely that the total number of Jewish victims in Shklov was much over 2,000.

According to the testimony of S.M. Petrovskoy, the Germans conducted the shootings in the autumn of 1941 and in December 1941. Furthermore, according to R.A. Sher, an eyewitness of the events, Rogner, senior lieutenant of the “secret police” (probably the Geheime Feldpolizei), played an active role in these executions, as did his assistants Julius Ewald and Obergefreiter Emil Eger.

Before the war, a Jewish cemetery was located in the village of Ryzhkovichi (in the southern suburb of Shklov), but during the war it was completely destroyed. The tombstones were leveled to the ground, and local citizens took the stones and bricks for their own building purposes.

Aleksandra Shuminaia and Liza Ratsevskaja both survived the war, serving in the “Chekist” partisan brigade. Tatiana Pushilina, who ran away during the shootings, became a fighter in the “Kerpicha” brigade. The Soviet partisans did not initially believe Iakov Shumin, who also fled from the site of the massacre, and he was forced to prove to them that he was not a traitor to his homeland.

In the village of Ganchvichi, Maria Dubovskaia protected Clara Altshuler, even against the wishes of her husband and son. For saving Asia Tzelinina and Anastasiia Dereviago, Nadezhda and Efim Shutikov were awarded the honor of “Righteous Among the Nations” by Yad Vashem.¹¹

According to the wishes of the relatives, in Shklov in 1955 the bodies of the murdered Jews were exhumed and moved to the Jewish cemetery in Ryzhkovichi, where a memorial was placed.¹²

On the Iskra kolkhoz, near Ryzhkovichi, the Germans herded 96 Jews into a large barn near the judicial hall. At the end of September or the beginning of October 1941, they were shot. Among those murdered were 30 men, 40 women, and 26 children.¹³

Starosel’e is a village about 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) to the northwest of Shklov. The exact date of the massacre of the village’s Jewish population is not known. The few survivors state that it occurred in August or September 1941, while the memorial to the victims states that it occurred in 1942 (without a more specific date or month). The night before the killing, all the Jews were herded into a school. In the morning, the Jews were formed into a column and ordered to march to the Brinkov Forest, located 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) south of the village. There, in two predug ditches, the Jews were shot.¹⁴ Approximately 200 people were killed. Maria and Iosef Tsukerman survived and later joined the partisans. Braina Surina also avoided being killed by crossing the front line into Soviet-controlled territory.

SHUMILINO

Pre-1941: Shumilino, town and raion center, Sirotino raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Schumulino, Rayon Sirotino, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Shumilina, raen center, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Shumilino is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) northwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, 376 Jews lived in the town, making up 16.4 percent of the population.

German armed forces of the 3rd Panzer Group captured Shumilino on or about July 10, 1941. Shumilino was included within the Rear Area, Army Group Center, in the realm of the 403rd Security Division, and its Ortskommandantur 262 was established in Shumilino. Only a few Jewish families succeeded in fleeing the advancing German forces.

Jews were ordered to wear yellow patches on their clothes. The ghetto was established on Pionerskaia Street sometime in August 1941. A Jewish survivor recalls:

During the first weeks [of the German occupation] nobody touched us. . . . After something like a month . . . they set aside about 10 houses inside the town limits, where there is a cemetery now, resettled the [Belo-]Russians out of the area, and drove all the town's Jews together into this place. So a ghetto appeared. It was surrounded with barbed wire. Old cans and bottles were hung on the wire, and if somebody touched it, they rang. A guard with a machine gun sat on a watchtower, and he opened fire on everybody who came close to the wire.¹

Several Jewish families were settled into each house.

According to a commission report prepared by the Red Army, all the Jews of Shumilino were herded into a ghetto, which Russians were forbidden to enter and the Jews were forbidden to leave. The Jews were given nothing to eat. The Germans hanged the town elder and put a sign on his corpse, "This is how the Russian people treat saboteurs."²

There was, however, a natural exchange through the barbed wire: Jews exchanged their belongings and valuables for bread and potatoes. The guards—local police—turned a blind eye to the exchanges but demanded their share of the valuables and items bartered. Some children succeeded in crawling under the wire and went to the villages to barter. Forced labor at the local railway station was imposed on the Jews.³ The survivor Yakov Magelnitzkii stated that there were Jewish policemen in the ghetto and that the Germans very rarely entered the ghetto.⁴

Forced labor was introduced for the Jewish men. According to the same witness, one day the men did not return from their work, so it was clear to the other ghetto inmates that they had been murdered by the Nazis.⁵ In November 1941, rumors spread that all the Jews would be killed. It was probably the local policemen (politsais) who started these rumors. Two old men hanged themselves in the ghetto.

The ghetto was liquidated on November 19, 1941. Germans and local police took the Jews from the ghetto to the site of the former peat-cutting facility "Dobeevskii Mokh" and shot them there. The number of people killed is unclear.⁶

The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) report of March 12, 1945, states that 493 "Soviet citizens, predominantly from the Jewish population," were killed in the Sirotino raion.⁷ It is estimated that probably around 300 Jews were killed in Shumilino.

Yakov Magelnitzkii managed to escape at the time of the liquidation and wandered from one hiding place to another; though local inhabitants were generally helpful, they would not allow him to stay for long periods. After staying for a while with the Pyatnitskoye family, he joined the Soviet partisans in the fall of 1942.⁸

SIROTINO

Pre-1941: Sirofino, village, Sirofino raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Sirofino, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Sirotsina, Shumilina raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Sirofino is located about 45 kilometers (28 miles) northwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, the Jewish population of the Sirofino raion (without the town of Shumilino) consisted of 332 people, the bulk of whom lived in Sirofino.

On June 28, 1941, the Germans bombed Sirofino from the air. Nevertheless, there was no mass evacuation from the town. Units of the German 18th Motorized Division, 3rd Panzer Group, captured Sirofino after heavy fighting on July 10, 1941, on their advance from Polotsk to Gorodok. The town and its area were defended by the 19th Army of the Soviet Western Front. In the severe fighting, much of the town was burned.

Sirofino was included in the Rear Area, Army Group Center; it was situated in the realm of the 403rd Security Division, and Ortskommandantur 262 was established in nearby Shumilino.

Under the German occupation, the former technician Borodulin became the head of the Sirofino Rayon, and the former bookkeeper Koroshkov became Sirofino's mayor.¹

After taking over Sirofino, the Germans turned the local synagogue into a stable; they forced old Jews to burn the Torah scrolls and other religious literature in the presence of the rest of the Jews. The Jews were ordered to wear round yellow patches on their clothes.² The Germans also introduced forced labor for Sirofino's Jews. Some Jewish men did roadwork, including repaving a central road with cobblestones. Those Jews who were members of the former Jewish kolkhoz continued to work in the fields.

In September 1941, the Germans conducted the first Aktion in Sirofino. A unit of Einsatzkommando 9 arrived, arrested about 30 or 40 males, taking many of them from their work in the fields, and informed them that they would be sent immediately to Vitebsk for forced labor. Then the SS and the indigenous police loaded the Jewish men into two or three trucks and transported them in the direction of Vitebsk. All these men were shot; according to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the place of their murder was Gniloi Most, halfway between Sirofino and Shumilino.³

Most probably, it was after this first Aktion that a ghetto was established in Sirofino. The ghetto consisted of four or five ramshackle houses close to the Jewish cemetery. The Jews were densely packed into these houses. The ghetto was not surrounded with barbed wire.

The ghetto was liquidated late in the fall of 1941. On November 18, 1941 (the date is marked on the monument erected in Sirofino after the war), the Germans and indigenous police surrounded the ghetto and brought the Jews to the killing site, a ravine 2 kilometers (1.2 miles) outside the town, and shot them there. Rumors that the Jews of Sirofino would be killed began to spread in advance. Some young people, among them Ester Lupilova, managed to leave the ghetto a few days before the Aktion. Some others, among them Grigorii Skoblov, fled on the day of the massacre. According to the ChGK, the number of Jews killed in Sirofino in the two Aktions was 178.⁴

As evident from the survivors' accounts, Jewish relations with non-Jews in wartime Sirofino were rather bad. The survivor Skoblov claims that "all the people in Sirofino were traitors," meaning that many local men volunteered to serve the Germans, and he ascribes that to the impact of collectivization: in 1930 the Jews had supported the kolkhoz, while the Belorussians had not. The survivor Lupilova, in her account, dwells on cases of robbery and abuse of Jews by local non-Jews.⁵

SOURCES Sirofino ghetto survivor Grigorii Skoblov published a short article titled "Zabyt' nel'zia" in Mishpokha 9 (2001). SLAVNOE

Pre-1941: Slavnoe, village, Tolochin raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Slawnoje, Rayon Tolotschin, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Slaunae, Talachyn raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Slavnoe is a railway station located 65 kilometers (41 miles) southwest of Orsha. The census of 1939 does not give precise information for the Jewish population of Slavnoe, but there were about 200 Jewish inhabitants who resided in the village mainly on three "Jewish streets."¹

The Germans bombed Slavnoe from the air during the first days of the invasion. According to a witness, Jews made an attempt to leave the town (they went, with horses and carts, in the direction of Krucha, to the southeast) but were intercepted by the Germans, who landed an airborne unit in their path. The Germans captured the town on July 6, 1941.

According to survivors, a ghetto was established on July 9, 1941, on Tolochinskaia Street. Its population was 143; the people were crammed together, with three families in each house. Jews were forced to wear armbands with a “yellow star.” The ghetto was fenced on one side with barbed wire and was guarded by the indigenous police. All Jews aged 10 and older were made to perform forced labor: road construction, cleaning military barracks, and similar tasks. The survivor Vera Pogorelaia describes the forced labor: “Men were engaged in hard work. . . . Children collected pine and fir cones in the forest for them to be sent to Germany. The quota was high, so they worked from [morning] dark to [evening] dark. In winter people were sent to clear snow from the Moscow-Minsk railway.”²

The Germans did not allot any food to the ghetto inmates. Some young people, however, managed to leave the guarded compound and exchange belongings for food. Sometimes Jewish refugees from other ghettos appeared in Slavnoe. An epidemic of typhus broke out in the ghetto. Reportedly Belorussian medical workers, at the risk of their lives, entered the ghetto in Slavnoe to treat people suffering from typhus.³

The ghetto of Slavnoe was liquidated on March 16, 1942. Pogorelaia recalls this day:

On March 16, 1942, in the morning, I and some other girls washed the floor in the military barracks. As soon as we heard shots, we put on our coats and went outside. Right away we saw two trucks full of SS men beyond the railway; they went in the direction of the ghetto. The shots became more frequent. . . . When the rest of the soldiers entered the barracks, an elderly [German] soldier came close to us and said: “Run away from here. They are killing the Jews in Slavnoe.”⁴

The ghetto’s inmates were shot near the village of Gliniki, about 1 or 2 kilometers (about 1 mile) east of Slavnoe. Who the perpetrators were is not clear; witnesses call them Feldgendarmarie. Taking into account the date of the Aktion, most probably it was the same unit that carried out the murders in Tolochin; that is, it was a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 that came from Orsha. The monument erected on this site in 1959 mentions 106 victims. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated the number of Jews killed in Slavnoe at 150; Pogorelaia stated the number was 143. The list of victims compiled by the ChGK contains 118 names.

Some ghetto Jews succeeded in saving themselves from being killed, among them S. Shpunt, Moisei Gutkin, the sisters Lyubov’ Belenkaia (née Fridliand) and Vera Fridliand (Pogorelaia), and some others. Many others who fled from the killing site were subsequently denounced by local peasants; for example, a neighbor denounced the two-year-old daughter of the survivor Lyubov’ Belenkaia, hidden by a peasant woman, and the girl was killed immediately.

Slaveni is a village 14 kilometers (9 miles) west-southwest of Tolochin, or 6 kilometers (4 miles) northeast of Slavnoe. In this village, 120 Jews were killed on March 16, 1942 (the same day as in Slavnoe). The corpses were burned over several days. The list of victims compiled by the ChGK contains 96 names.⁵

SLOBODA

Pre-1941: Sloboda, village, Beshenkovichi raion, Vitebsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Ssloboda, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Slabada, Beshankovichy raen, Vitsebsk voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Sloboda is located about 65 kilometers (41 miles) northwest of Vitebsk.

German forces occupied the village on July 6, 1941, about two weeks after the German attack on the USSR on June 22. In this period, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were inducted into the Red Army. Following the occupation of the village, the German military commandant appointed a village elder (starosta) and organized a Belorussian police force (Ordnungsdienst) consisting of local residents.

In the summer and autumn of 1941, the Germans implemented a series of anti-Jewish measures in Sloboda. Jews were registered and forced to wear patches in the shape of the Star of David; they had to perform heavy labor; they were prohibited from leaving the limits of the village; and they were subjected to systematic beating and robbery by the local police.

In early August 1941, all the Jews remaining in the village were forced to move into a few houses. Jews from neighboring villages—Bortniki, Sokorovo, and others—also were placed in this ghetto. The ghetto was in existence for more than a year, until October 1942, when it was liquidated by shooting all the Jews, some 350 in number, in two ditches in a nearby forest.

On the day of the liquidation, a few individuals were saved. Reportedly, the physician Zarogatskaia and Anna Gurevich hid Ivan and Anastasiia Zhernosek. Two children, a boy and a girl, also were hidden and saved from the violence, but their surnames are not known.

SMOLIANY

Pre-1941: Smoliany, town, Orsha raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Ssmoljani, Rayon Orscha, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Smaliany, Orsha raen, Vitsebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Smoliany is located 24 kilometers (15 miles) west-northwest of Orsha. In 1926, 950 Jews lived in the town (52.8 percent of the total).

German forces of Army Group Center captured the town on July 9, 1941. At the start of the occupation, the Jews were permitted to remain in their own houses. It seems that the situation in Smoliany was less harsh than in Orsha. The eyewitness Zinaida Suvorov stated that she brought food from Smoliany to her relatives in the Orsha ghetto. Later some Jews managed to flee from Orsha and found refuge in Smoliany.¹

The Germans established a ghetto in Smoliany, which consisted of some 30 houses on Shkol'naia Street, with the synagogue at the end of the street. According to one source, between 700 and 840 Jews resided there. The ghetto was not enclosed, and the Jews were still able to leave it to exchange their remaining possessions for food with local non-Jews. It would have been possible for many of the Jews to escape, but most did not want to abandon their families.² Some sources date the establishment of the ghetto in the fall of 1941, just before the first snow, and others in March 1942.³ According to Sarra Leyenson, it was only sealed off just before the liquidation in early April 1942, when Jews were brought in from the surrounding villages.

Suvorov stated that one day before the mass shooting the Germans distributed some flour to the Jews "to bake matzot for Passover." They did it, most probably, to calm the Jews, because the Jews of Smoliany were well aware of the liquidation of the Orsha ghetto. Nobody had time to use this flour, because the next morning the Germans conducted a mass shooting of the local Jews.⁴

The Germans liquidated the ghetto in Smoliany on April 5, 1942, on the second day of Passover. They prepared the ditches on the day before the Aktion in the forest at Gubinskaia Dacha, about 3 kilometers (2 miles) east of the town, using explosives. A force consisting of 15 Germans in uniform, four officers, and local police escorted the Jews to the ditch and shot them there.⁵ A number of Jews tried to hide and escape, but most were found by the local police. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) laid the responsibility for the massacre on the local commandant Kregel, or Kroegel. The ChGK estimated the number of victims at 610 people. The list of victims compiled by the ChGK contains the names of 254 Jews.⁶

SOURCES In the book by Gennadii Vinnitsa, Slovo pamiaty (Orsha: Orshan. Tip., 1997), there is a short section on the Smoliany ghetto (pp. 51-53). STARYE DOROGI

Pre-1941: Starye Dorogi, town and raion center, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Staryje Dorogi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Staryia Darohi, raen center, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

StarYE Dorogi is located 107 kilometers (67 miles) south-southeast of Minsk. In 1939, there were 1,085 Jews living there, representing 28.6 percent of the population.¹

In the summer of 1941, slightly more than 1,000 Jews were living in StarYE Dorogi. The populace largely believed the official propaganda claiming that in the event of war the enemy would be defeated on foreign territory. According to the testimony of Liubov' Bukengol'ts, the residents heard about the approaching war, but only the arrival of refugees from Poland put them on guard.² The declaration of war was not followed by an organized evacuation. All men of military age were called up to the Red Army, and their families were left to survive on their own. Part of the population tried to flee the town independently, while another part remained, not suspecting the danger that threatened. Those who decided not to leave were motivated chiefly by a desire not to be parted from their property, concerns about health or old age, and the expectation of a rapid victory by the Red Army.

Those who managed to get to the nearest railroad station, just outside of Starye Dorogi in the direction of Osipovichy, before June 26, 1941, succeeded in escaping. They were among the refugees sent to Central Asia, the Urals, and Siberia. Other Jews left on foot or used motorized or horse-drawn transport (carts). Mania Ansolis was saved because she was studying at the Belorussian State University in Minsk and was unable to return to her parents in Starye Dorogi. She walked to Gomel' and from there traveled to Kirgizia. Elena Kuptsova, with her mother and grandmother, walked to Rogachev and from there traveled by various means to Syzran' in the Kuibyshev oblast'. Basia Dubina traveled to her mother in Starye Dorogi from Moscow in December 1940, on maternity leave. On May 19, 1941, she gave birth to a son. On June 24, with her baby in her arms, and together with her parents and relatives of her husband, she set out for Bobruisk. The family managed to board a train only in Orsha, and from there they were evacuated to Kazakhstan. Some Jews found that they were encircled and were forced to return home.³

Starye Dorogi was captured by the Germans on June 28, 1941. German authority was exercised by a series of local military commandants. In October 1941, units of the 1st Battalion, Infantry Regiment 691, were quartered in the town, which at that time was in the operational area of the 339th Infantry Division.⁴ A local police force was established during the summer, based in the building of the former militia district branch on Pervomaiskaia Street. Among those recruited were people who were dissatisfied with the Soviet authorities. The head of the police was a man named Subtsel'nyi.

The ghetto was established on the grounds of the former Jewish school on Kirov Street. Along with the school, several houses were fenced in and guarded. There were approximately 750 people in the ghetto. The Jews were ordered to wear yellow armbands and forbidden to interact with non-Jewish Belorussians or Russians.⁵

With the arrival of the Germans, the attitude of local inhabitants of Starye Dorogi towards the Jews changed. Some no longer hid their antisemitism and stole from the Jews, while others felt sorry for them and even attempted to help them. The Nazis cruelly persecuted anyone attempting to help or rescue the Jews. Doctor Shapelko concealed two Jewish women in the hospital, but when it became known, the women were shot and the doctor was hanged. The agronomist Kunbin and Anna Koroleva were killed for concealing Jews and supporting the partisans.⁶

Before the mass slaughter, there were only individual murders of Jews, Komsomol members, and Soviet activists in Starye Dorogi.⁷ Among the first victims were Dr. Livshits and his sons. According to the testimony of the prisoner of war Sipnov (a Russian), who had escaped from Starye Dorogi, a group of Jews, including women and children, were driven into the river by the Nazis, who cried out, "Swim, you dirty kikes!" But when they tried to reach the other side of the river, the Germans opened fire. No one returned from the river alive.⁸ Scores of Jews in Starye Dorogi were shot on August 6, 1941.⁹

A major Aktion was carried out in Starye Dorogi on January 19, 1942. A punitive detachment, with police assistance, drove the remaining Jews from the ghetto along the Bobruisk-Slutsk highway to a sand quarry near Kasharka. The victims were made to undress in the bitter cold and then were shot at a previously prepared site. On the same day, Jewish families and individuals were shot in the nearby villages of Verkhutino, Gorki, Paskova Gorka, and Iazyl', in the Starye Dorogi raion.¹⁰ A German report in early February stated that as of February 1, 1942, there were still 239 Jews in Rayon Staryje Dorogi, but it is not clear if this reflected the number still alive before or after the above-mentioned Aktions.¹¹

The survivors from Starye Dorogi consisted only of a few dozen young Jews, who managed for a variety of reasons to escape the town before the liquidation of the ghetto and joined the partisans.¹² Among those joining the partisans was Samuil Gol'dberg. He was accepted into the Kirov detachment on the recommendation of Aleksei Ivanov, who had been a doctor before the war, a native of Podares'e in the Starye Dorogi raion, and a former lodger of Gol'dberg's.¹³

Starye Dorogi was liberated on June 28, 1944. A number of Jews returned to the town from their places of evacuation. It was decided to put them into surviving houses and return to them any belongings they could prove had been theirs.

STRESHIN

Pre-1941: Streshin, town and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Streschin, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-2001: Streshyn, Zhlobin raen, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Streshin is located 105 kilometers (65 miles) northwest of Gomel'. In 1939, the Jewish population was 531, about one third of the total.

On the outbreak of war, men of eligible age were drafted into the Red Army. Despite the absence of an organized evacuation, part of the population managed to leave Streshin in time. They embarked on boats and barges on the Dnieper or left on foot. On August 13, 1941, the 145th Infantry Division of the Red Army, which was defending Streshin, received the order to withdraw. The next day, the German XLIII Corps crossed the Dnieper and, not encountering serious resistance, pushed on towards Buda-Koshelevo and Uvarovichy.¹ German forces captured Streshin on August 14, 1941. The Germans established new organs of authority in the village. Verbitskii became mayor of the Rayon; his deputy was Migai. Vasilii Kashparov became chief of a new police force; his deputy was a man named Gerasimov. Among the policemen were Savellii Bodilovskii, Anton Kurganov, Grigorii Genov, Bodrunov, Drozdov, Foma Gritskov, and Ponomarev. These men volunteered for service, assisting the Germans to find Soviet activists and Communists, and they also organized the registration of the Jews in Streshin.²

In September 1941, the Germans and their Belorussian collaborators established a ghetto in Streshin, which initially contained some 480 Jews.³ On the orders of the mayor Verbitskii, the chief of police Kashparov assembled the Jews at a site on Kul'mashevka Street, which was closely guarded. The new local authorities forbade the inmates all contact with local Belorussians and made them wear a yellow cloth patch on the left side of the chest as a distinguishing mark. Leaving the area of Kul'mashevka Street, and especially the limits of Streshin, was strictly prohibited. Breaking the rules resulted in fines and exposure to further punishment. Chief Kashparov's deputy,

Gerasimov, kept an eye on the inmates to spot any infraction of the restrictions placed on the Jews. The local authorities named Zalman Melamed as head of the ghetto. They required him to report daily to the police that all Jews were present. In February 1942, the police shot a Jewish woman who had left the limits of Streshin without permission. At about the same time, the police arrested a Jewish soldier who had been hiding behind the German lines. They killed him on the bank of the Dnieper.⁴

The ghetto had no major economic significance, and the Germans and their Belorussian collaborators paid no heed to the unsanitary conditions in which the inmates had to live. The occupiers' overriding goal was the concentration of the Jews and the prevention of escape before their extermination. The prisoners had to take care of their own subsistence. Forced labor tasks included collecting trash, clearing obstructions, loading and unloading fuel, and performing other menial tasks. Kashparov himself beat those Jews who did not follow orders, and he instructed the Belorussian police to follow his example. In mid-September 1941, the police beat Berko Rabinovich, Yosef' Khasin, and Zil'bert for failing to remove firewood from the police quarters.⁵ Some individual killings of Jews took place in the fall and winter of 1941. L.P. Khodorenko witnessed the shooting of two young children whose father, Klebanov, was serving in the Red Army.

According to a German report, on February 1, 1942, 394 Jews remained alive in the Streshin Rayon, presumably most, if not all, in the Streshin ghetto.⁶ On March 30, 1942, the German authorities moved them all to Zhlobin, where they were housed on Tovarnaia Street and in the barracks of a poultry farm. On April 1, 1942, Kashparov, the mayor Verbitskii, and the latter's deputy, Migai, traveled to Zhlobin. The Zhlobin chief of police had requested that Kashparov personally witness the killing of "his Jews."

The mass killing Aktion began on April 14, 1942, in a field at the village of Lebedevka, about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) from Zhlobin. At that same place, on April 12, the Nazis and their collaborators had already killed around 1,000 Jews from Zhlobin. On April 14, the police brought the Streshin Jews to two large pits dug at the site. The Zhlobin policemen were posted as guards. Soon several vehicles arrived, carrying about 8 or 10 Germans. Some 20 Jews—elderly men and women and children—were unloaded from the truck, and Kashparov checked them off a roster. The German translator ordered the Jews to undress and lie facedown on the ground. Then members of the German killing squad opened fire with submachine guns. The Germans threw the children into the grave still alive; people were screaming; mothers clung to their children and begged for mercy. A younger man, perhaps 25 years old, who had served in the Red Army and lived for a while behind German lines before his capture, managed to shout, "You will pay for spilling our blood! For all this you will answer with your own black blood!" Several times an enclosed, black gas van pulled up to the pit, and the police extracted Jewish corpses from inside. A German officer, noticing the "curiosity" of the Belorussian police, explained that this was a special vehicle in which the victims were killed with carbon monoxide gas.⁷

Among the victims were some half-Jews: Sonia Kalinovskaia-Pesina (born 1904) and her children; Raia Malashkova-Elkina (born 1919) and one child; Basia Rudnitskaia-Shapiro (born 1915) and two children; and Sara Makei-Nekhamkina and her two children. Having refused to leave the ghetto, Sara's non-Jewish husband, Nikola Makei (born 1908), died with her. The Germans also shot three young Babitskii children (two brothers and a sister), who had some Jewish grandparents.⁸

The Aktion lasted about five hours. Streshin chief of police Kashparov, mayor Verbitskii, and his deputy Migai all played an active role. Kashparov shot seven people with a revolver.⁹ When the shooting was over, around 5:00 P.M., the large pit had been filled with bodies. According to eyewitnesses, this mass "was moaning and stirring." Nevertheless, the punitive authorities ordered it to be covered with earth. It is possible that Jews from the neighboring villages of Krasnii Bereg, Pirevichi, Staraia Rudnia, and Kazimirovo perished together with those from Streshin.¹⁰ Gel'shtein, a teacher, somehow escaped the mass killing of April 14, 1942. When Commandant Horn became aware of this, he gave the order that Gel'shtein be found and shot, which was duly carried out.¹¹

When the Germans had arrived in Streshin, Jewish property was considered "ownerless" and thus subject to plunder. Taking Jewish belongings was not considered a crime. At the beginning of 1942, Kashparov ordered the arrest of the Kaganovich family, whom the Germans sent to Zhlobin, where they were shot. The Streshin authorities gave the Kaganoviches' house and belongings to Degtyarev, a policeman related to Kashparov. The police tore down the Kaganovich house for firewood. Policeman Genov took for himself two beds, a sewing machine, and a bicycle. After the liquidation of the ghetto and the mass shooting, the remaining belongings of the Jews were auctioned off.¹²

Red Army troops of the 1st Belorussian Front liberated Streshin on November 21, 1943. A number of Nazi collaborators were arrested and brought to trial at the end of the occupation, among them Kashparov, Bodilovskii, Kurganov, and Genov.¹³

TAL'KA

Pre-1941: Tal'ka, village, Pukhovichi raion, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Talka, Rayon Marina Gorka, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Tal'ka, Pukhavichy raen, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Tal'ka is located about 75 kilometers (47 miles) southeast of Minsk. According to the 1939 census, there were 976 Jews living in the Pukhovichi raion (without the raion center, Mar'ina Gorka). Most of these Jews lived in Pukhovichi, but about 200 lived in Tal'ka, to the southeast, and a few more lived in other neighboring villages.

Units of German Army Group Center occupied the village in early July 1941. In early September, several hundred Jews from Tal'ka and the surrounding villages were concentrated in a former Soviet pioneer camp about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside the village, forming a makeshift ghetto. Those who were too slow in moving into the ghetto were beaten. No food was provided to the Jews, and they were made to perform forced labor, such as road construction, tasks sometimes beyond their physical capacity. The local police who guarded the ghetto cursed the Jews. When Jewish elder Meyer Rabinovich protested about the treatment of his community, he was shot together with two other Jews.¹

In mid-September 1941, units of the German Gendarmerie arrived in Tal'ka and together with the local police surrounded the ghetto. They escorted all the Jews into a forest about 500 meters (547 yards) away and shot them into a ditch in groups of about 15. Before the shooting, the German officer made a speech condemning the Jewish population and praising the German race.

During the shooting, Raisa Surbayeva pleaded for the life of her infant, but a German Gendarme shot both her and her child. Another woman attempted to bribe the head of the local police, Kulobizian, with 300 rubles, but he took the money and shot her anyway. The property of the Jews was taken to Pukhovichi by the Gendarmerie, but the local police also stole part of it.²

According to a German Einsatzgruppen report, 222 Jews were “liquidated” in Tal’ka for “persistently spreading anti-German propaganda and terrorizing the local inhabitants with price gouging.” From Tal’ka, the same German police force went on to carry out a similar mass shooting of the Jews from the neighboring Mar’ina Gorka and Pukhovichi ghettos.³

In the records examined for this article, no mention of Jewish survivors of Tal’ka could be found.

TOLOCHIN

Pre-1941: Tolochin, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast’, Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Tolotschin, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Talachyn, Talachyn raen, Vitebsk voblasts’, Republic of Belarus

Tolochin is located about 94 kilometers (58 miles) south-southwest of Vitebsk. In 1939, 1,292 Jews lived in the town, making up 21.2 percent of the population. The Jewish population of the Tolochin raion (excluding the town of Tolochin) consisted of 978 people; they lived in the town of Kokhanovo (480 Jews in 1926; the 1939 census does not give the Jewish population of the town) as well as in the villages of Slaveni, Slavnoe, Obol’tsy, Drutsk, and several other places.

German forces of Army Group Center (18th Panzer Division of the XLVII Army Corps, Panzer Group 2) captured Tolochin on July 6–7, 1941. In the second half of July 1941, this area came under the control of the 286th Security Division; on July 18, Ortskommandantur II/650 assumed authority in Tolochin; it was subordinated to Feldkommandantur 683, stationed in Orsha.¹

Only a few Jews succeeded in leaving the town before the Germans arrived.² The Germans established a ghetto in Tolochin in September or October 1941. According to historian Gennadii Vinnitsa, it consisted of 15 houses on Nikol’skaia Street and had 2,000 inmates. It was not fenced with barbed wire but was guarded by the local police. Jews were forced to wear a yellow patch in the shape of the Star of David on their clothes. The Jews were made to perform various forced labor tasks, including road construction. In October, 3 (or 4) men were hanged in the central square “for their refusal to report for work.” A Jewish youth who pilfered a can of food from a starch mill was hanged from the gate of the factory.

There were some cases of people fleeing the ghetto. For example, the blond-haired Mariya Shapiro, assisted by a local policeman she knew, left the ghetto, went to Orsha, and with forged documents volunteered as an “eastern worker” (Ostarbeiter) and was sent to Germany.³

The ghetto was liquidated on March 12 (or 13), 1942.⁴ Its inmates were killed near the town in the field of the kolkhoz Rekonstruktor (now Raitsy, a northwestern suburb of Tolochin).⁵ According to witnesses, the victims were led to the pits in batches of 30 and killed there. A group of Jews tried to run away while being escorted to the killing site, and some were successful. However, a number of those who fled were found by the Nazis and killed the next day. The perpetrators were most probably a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8, subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B.⁶

The number of victims is not clear. The estimate of 2,000, made by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) and used also by Vinnitsa, seems too high. The town had only around 1,300 Jews before the war, and some of them were drafted into the Red Army or succeeded in evacuating. It seems unlikely that this unimportant railway station would have attracted many Jewish refugees coming from the west. Einsatzkommando 8 reported that it had murdered 1,551 Jews in March, and there is reason to assume that the victims were Jews from the Tolochin raion. Estimating the number of those killed in March 1942 in Slavnoe at 150, and in Slaveni at 120, one can infer that the number of Jewish victims in Tolochin was no greater than 1,280.

Drutsk is a village 8 kilometers (5 miles) southeast of Tolochin. The ChGK mentions six Jews (the Dardyk family) killed there. Documents and witness accounts give conflicting impressions of the relations between Jews and non-Jews in the area. After the liberation, an investigating commission set up by the Soviet authorities confiscated cows from local people who had “acquired them in an illegal way” during the occupation: had taken them from Jews.⁷ This means that the robbery of Jewish property under German rule was rather widespread. However, despite some denunciations, other local Belorussians risked their lives to assist Jews.

SOURCES Publications regarding the Holocaust in Tolochin include the book by Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech’ i bol’ (Orsha, 1998), pp. 124–143, which deals with the Holocaust in Tolochin and the Tolochin raion.

Logistically, it was easier for a unit of Einsatzkommando 8 to reach Tolochin from Polotsk. Besides, only this command reported a large number of Jews killed in March 1942.

TRUDY

Pre-1941: Trudy, village, Polotsk raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Rayon Polozk, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Polatsk raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Trudy is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) east-northeast of Polotsk. In 1926, the Jewish population was 126 (out of a total of 1,463).

Nine Jewish families were living in the village prior to the war; and in the summer and fall of 1941, 46 refugees, most probably all of them Jewish, arrived in Trudy from Polotsk. The Germans occupied the village in July. The village was run by a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur), which introduced forced labor for the Jews but did not provide them with any food. The military commandant recruited a local police force (Ordnungsdienst) made up of volunteers recruited from the local population. Yuhan Ivanovich Leiburg (an Estonian) became the head of the police in Trudy, and his deputy was Stepan Lopukhov. The local police took an active part in the persecution and murder of the Jews.

In November 1941, the Germans established a kind of ghetto in three houses.¹ A non-Jewish witness Z. states that in November the mayor of the local volostnaia uprava (village authority), Kirill Kosoryga, and two leaders of the local police, Leiburg and Lopukhov, came to his house and demanded that he abandon it because Jews were to be settled there; 17 Jews were moved into Z.'s house. The witnesses interviewed by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) state that on February 4, 1942, the Germans (according to some accounts, local Kommandant Ernst Schuldes) assembled all the Jews in one house and demanded that they surrender all their valuables, promising that in return they would receive food—according to some accounts, that they would also be set free. The Jews gave up the valuables they had and received some bread from the Germans, but on February 6 they were assembled in this house again. A punitive squad, most probably not German but either local or manned by some other collaborators, arrived from Polotsk in the night, and its members got drunk in Trudy. The next morning they brought the Jews to the Riabinovka Forest, 700 meters (766 yards) south of the village of Zheltsy, and shot 76 Jews. Four non-Jews were murdered at the same time. The shooting Aktion lasted two or three hours, because the men of the squad were armed only with rifles. According to the witnesses, the perpetrators killed small children by hitting them with rifle butts or tossed them up and tried to hit them while in the air. In the evening of that day, the Germans sent local peasants to bury the bodies.²

In December 1943, the local Investigation Commission exhumed 60 corpses (of 80 buried) from the pit in the Riabinovka Forest, including the bodies of 19 children, 27 women, and 14 men.

SOURCES The existence of an informal ghetto in Trudy is mentioned in Vladimir Adamushko et al., eds., Spravochnik o mestakh prinuditel'nogo sodержaniia grazhdanskogo nasele-niia na okkupirovannoi territorii BSSR 1941–1944 gg. (Minsk: State Committee for Archives and Documentary Collections of the Republic of Belarus, 2001), p. 101; and in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1336.

UKHVALA

Ukhvala is located 118 kilometers (73 miles) north-northeast of Minsk. German armed forces occupied Ukhvala in early July 1941, two weeks after their invasion of the USSR. During that time, some Jews were able to evacuate eastward, and men of suitable age were inducted into the Red Army. About 200 Jews remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

Throughout the occupation up until June 1944, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the village. The German military administration formed a village authority and police force (Ordnungsdienst) made up of local residents.

In about mid-July 1941, German security forces conducted a first Aktion in the village in which around 80 Jewish males were arrested and shot in the nearby forest. The women, children, and old people remaining in Ukhvala were forced to move into a ghetto, for which five houses were set aside; around 30 people lived in each house. All Jews from the age of seven up were required to wear a yellow armband. The women were forced to perform various types of work in support of the German garrison: they did the German soldiers' laundry, washed the floors in the school used to house the German garrison, and peeled potatoes for the German soldiers. The Jews themselves lived on rotten potatoes, bran, and grass. On May 4, 1942, the ghetto in the village was liquidated, and all the Jews were shot.

ULLA

Pre-1941: Ulla, town, Beshenkovichi raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Rayon Beschenkowitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Ula, Beshankovichy raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Ulla is located 62 kilometers (39 miles) west of Vitebsk. In 1939, Ulla had a Jewish population of 516 (20.4 percent of the total).

On July 5, 1941, units of the German XXXIX Army Corps, 3rd Panzer Group, captured Ulla. From August 1941 onward, Ulla came under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. About half of the Jewish population managed to evacuate the town or flee to the east ahead of the advancing German forces. In the summer of 1941, the local German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) established a local administration in Ulla and organized an auxiliary police force of local inhabitants.

In December 1941, the German authorities resettled the remaining 200 or so Jews into a large administrative building (one witness calls it a kazarma—"military barracks"), establishing a "ghetto" in the town, which was fenced with barbed wire. The local Belorussian police guarded the building. Jews were permitted to leave the building to exchange their possessions for food as long as they returned by the evening.¹

According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), 204 (or 206, according to another document) Jews from Ulla were killed by the Nazis on January 17, 1942, at the area of a former "military settlement," half a kilometer (0.3 mile) southeast of Ulla. Non-Jewish witnesses interviewed by

Gennadii Vinnitsa state that on the day of the mass murder the Germans forced those locals who had horse carts to bring old people from the ghetto to the place of the mass killing at the military settlement.²

According to the ChGK, no fewer than 70 Jews were killed at the Lenin kolkhoz of the Khotino sel'sovet (12 kilometers [7.5 miles] southwest of Ulla); 2 of those killed were young people (one of them, a student) who had come back from other places to see their parents over the summer.

SOURCES Information on the ghetto in Ulla can be found in the book by Gennadii Vinnitsa, Gorech' i bol' (Orsha, 1998), pp. 144-147. The existence of a ghetto in Ulla is also mentioned in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1360.

USHACHI

Pre-1941: Ushachi, town and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Uschatschi, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Ushachy, raen center, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Ushachi is located 101 kilometers (63 miles) west of Vitebsk. In 1939, 487 Jews lived in the town, making up 23.8 percent of the total population. The Jewish population of the Ushachi raion (without the town of Ushachi) constituted 306 people, the bulk of whom lived in the small town of Kublichy.

There was no organized evacuation from Ushachi because the town had no significant factories. Some Jews who held senior positions in the administration managed to flee, but the majority remained in the town. Ushachi did not suffer much damage from the fighting.

Ushachi was captured by units of the XXXIX Corps of the 3rd Panzer Group on July 3, 1941. On July 15, 1941, when the 3rd Panzer Group moved east, the area was occupied by the XX Corps of the 9th Army. From this time on, Rayon Uschatschi belonged to the Rear Area, 9th Army. Later in the summer of 1941, Ushachi came under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center, being situated on its western edge, close to the area under "civil administration" (Generalkommissariat Weissruthenien). There was a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) in Ushachi.

The Germans imposed forced labor on the Jews. For example, the Jews had to haul out the timber that remained in the Ushacha River, a tributary of the Zapadnaia Dvina, when timber rafting was stopped because of the war. Some work tasks were senseless and purely humiliating: for example, they forced girls to pull water in big barrels for the horses of the German cavalry. According to a witness, during the first days of the occupation the Germans pulled down a Lenin statue using a tractor, then forced Jewish youngsters to break up its pedestal with hammers.¹

Eyewitnesses (non-Jewish) mention a certain Azril Nemtsov, who most probably was the Jewish elder in Ushachi. Before the war, Nemtsov was an employee (possibly a manager) of the Administration for Leather Procurement (Zagotkhoz). According to Anna Shnitko, he had to collect gold and valuables from the Jews and was beaten for the small quantity of gold he was able to gather for the Germans.

A ghetto was established in Ushachi in October 1941 on Oktiabr'skaia Street. It was fenced with barbed wire, most probably in November 1941, and guarded by a sentinel. According to various witnesses, it consisted of 10 to 15 houses. Barter between Jews and non-Jews continued, at least in the initial stages of ghettoization. Non-Jewish witnesses attest that Belorussians came to the ghetto to exchange food for fabric and clothing; sometimes Jews also left the ghetto to conduct barter transactions.

In December 1941 or, more probably, in January 1942, the Nazis resettled Jews from nearby Usaia (29 kilometers [18 miles] east of Ushachi), from the Kublichy ghetto (18 kilometers [11.2 miles] to the west), and perhaps also from Bobynichi (17 kilometers [10.6 miles] northwest of Ushachi) into the ghetto of Ushachi.² The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) estimated the number of people resettled at 500; this may be an exaggerated number.

Judging from the interviews with non-Jewish witnesses conducted in the 1980s, Jewish/non-Jewish relations under the German occupation were tense but not hostile. All the witnesses stated that they deplored the passivity and cowardice they saw in the Jews. Soon after the ghetto was established, the stove maker Mikhail Grokholskii came to the ghetto and told the Jews that things looked bad for them and advised them to flee to the forests. However, one Jew denounced Grokholskii to the Germans. As a result, Grokholskii, his denouncer, and two other Jews were arrested by the German police and interrogated; the two arrested Jews testified that it was not the stove maker Grokholskii who came to the ghetto, and Grokholskii was released.³

The Ushachi Jews in the ghetto were murdered on January 12, 1942. Two weeks prior to that, local residents were drafted to dig pits near the Russian Orthodox cemetery on Dolet'skaia Street, to the south of the town's center, ostensibly "for potatoes"; the labor took much time because the ground was frozen. Rumors circulated immediately that in fact the pits were "for the Jews." Panic spread in the ghetto, but a German officer who came to the ghetto succeeded in calming the Jews, saying that the pits were indeed for potatoes and that the Jews would be resettled to Polotsk. In any case, before the mass shooting took place, the people of Ushachi already had some foreknowledge of what was to come. In spite of this, very few Jews attempted to flee the ghetto. There are no records of Jews from the Ushachi ghetto having survived the war.

On the day of the ghetto liquidation, the Belorussian police went down the streets through which the Jews were to be led to the killing site and ordered all the residents to lock their doors and not to let in any Jews. The Jews were told that they would be moved to Polotsk. People took food and clothing with them, and while they were being formed into a column, four abreast, they remained relatively calm; some were even greeting Belorussian acquaintances who happened to pass by. The column was escorted mainly by the Belorussian police; only a few Germans were present. When the column turned south towards Dolet'skaia Street, the Jews realized where they were being led and, according to non-Jewish witnesses, began to throw their photographs, letters, clothing, valuables, and other things away on their way to the killing site.

According to the non-Jewish witnesses, the main perpetrators of the killing were indigenous local police (politsais). The victims were brought to the pits in groups of four; near the pits they were told to undress. Witnesses attest that many people were still alive when they were thrown into the pits.

According to Kublichy survivors Vera Gilman and Nikolai (Folya) Gilman, when they arrived in the Ushachi ghetto under guard, it was empty because all the Jews of Ushachi had been killed. The new arrivals found graffiti in Yiddish in one of the houses: "They are bringing us to be shot. If somebody survives, let him avenge us" (Undz firt men shisn. Ver vet zikh rateven un bleibn lebn, nemt nekome far undz). Old people put on their talles (prayer shawls) and prayed.

Some days later, the Jews of Kublichy were killed too. On the morning of the day when the Nazis began to drive the Kublichy Jews out of the Ushachi ghetto, somebody set the ghetto on fire. Some of the Kublichy Jews were killed on the spot; the rest were brought to the same pits where the Ushachi Jews were killed and were shot there.

After the ghetto liquidation, the Germans distributed the belongings of the Jews among the population. In addition, some local people dug up the mass graves looking for gold and valuables, sometimes also for clothing.⁴

The ChGK estimated the total number of Jews killed in Ushachi as 925 people. This number is almost certainly exaggerated, taking into account that there were only 893 Jews living in Ushachi and its raion in 1939.

UVAROVICHI

Pre-1941: Uvarovich, town, Buda-Koshelevo raion, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941-1944: Uwarowitschi, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Uvarovichy, Buda-Kashaleva raen, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Uvarovich is located some 26 kilometers (16 miles) northwest of Gomel'. In 1939, there were 517 Jews living in the town (11.3 percent of the total population).

After military operations started in June 1941, all men of eligible age were called up to serve in the Red Army. In July 1941, a combat battalion of 588 men under the command of Klimenok was organized in Uvarovich, which defended the town and punished deserters.¹ Uvarovich was not located directly on the railroad and therefore was not subjected to German aerial bombardment. Many refugees who arrived in Uvarovich from the former Polish areas and other western regions of Belorussia reported on the Nazi treatment of Jews. While some residents fled or were evacuated before the rapid German advance, others remained until it was too late, reassured by official Soviet propaganda asserting that the enemy would soon be defeated. Overall, less than half of the Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the German occupation, primarily families and the elderly who were unable to leave.

On August 16, 1941, German forces arrived in Uvarovich and quickly organized a new local administration. Fedor Makarenko, an accountant under the Soviets, was appointed mayor of the town. He served in this position until November 1941, when he was replaced by Lev Revnovskii (mayor until September 1943). Makarenko remained as his deputy and simultaneously presided as a local judge. Makarenko and Revnovskii organized an administration with departments for agriculture, finance, public services and utilities, education, police, and other functions. They oversaw the administration of the agrarian communes and assisted in the appointment of village elders. Radchenko became the head of the Uvarovich Rayon; Anton Dzvinskii, the chief of police; Leonid Antipov, the superintendent of police. Koksekov and Titorenko served as police detectives.²

An "open ghetto" existed in Uvarovich by the fall of 1941. Jews were not permitted to leave their separate residential area, which was guarded by the local police. The Jews remained in their own homes and were prohibited from using the town's main street or having any contact with local non-Jews. They were required to perform forced labor as demanded by the German army and the local administration.

At the end of October 1941, the German military commandant in Gomel' issued instructions for all the Jews of Rayon Uwarowitschi to be rounded up by November 10, 1941.

Revnovskii and Makarenko also signed this order and transmitted it to the headmen (elders) of the villages where the Jews were living. The Jews from the surrounding area were then all sent to Uvarovich with their cattle and other property and were resettled on Naberezhnaia Street. Only the Jews from the village of Gut did not appear as instructed. Makarenko issued new orders for their transfer and gave them only 24 hours to comply. On the next day, 47 people, mostly women, the elderly, and children, were conveyed to Uvarovich by wagon, with a police escort.³ In total, 17 Jewish families (about 250 people) were brought to Uvarovich.⁴

On November 15, 1941 (according to another source, on November 18), an SS punitive detachment under the command of four German officers arrived from Gomel' (probably a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8). With the help of the local police, German security forces assembled the Jews they could find in the former courthouse building. Then they escorted them in a column to a killing site prepared in advance. They selected a grain warehouse located on a kolkhoz not far from the cemetery on the outskirts of Uvarovich (about 500 meters [547 yards] to the southwest of the town, near a windmill). There were three silage pits (silosnye) there, each 8 meters long, 4 meters wide, and 3 meters deep (26 by 13 by 10 feet). The Germans made the Jews kneel down under guard and then escorted them into the ditches in groups of five. The Jews were made to lay facedown, and the security forces then shot them in the back of the head.

Among those who actively participated in the mass murder were Hoffmann, the German agricultural commandant (Landwirtschaftsführer) in Uvarovich, and his deputy, Drescher; the Sonderführer Steinmeyer and Ronfleisch [phonetic]; Anton Dzvinskii, the chief of the Uvarovich district police; Grigorii Novikov and Mikhail Titorenko, the heads of the first and second police departments; Mayor Lev Revnovskii; the policemen Kirpichev, Zhurov, and Baranchukov; and Trusov, the headman (elder) of the village of Ivanovka. After the mass shooting, Makarenko handed over Jewish cattle and property to the Germans, who had collected all the personal belongings of those killed. The Germans took the most valuable items and then rewarded the local policemen from the spoils. Whatever remained after that, Mayor Revnovskii distributed among the local Belorussian population.⁵

On November 27, 1943, the 4th Infantry Division and the 231st Tank Unit of the 48th Army of the Belorussian Front liberated Uvarovich. It was one of the first Belorussian settlements to be recaptured. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) arrived in Uvarovich in February 1944. It ascertained that 633 residents of the Uvarovich raion (including 290 people of the town itself) had been killed by the German occupying forces. The villages of Goleevka, Alekseevka, Zadorovka, Zesel'e, Klenovitsa, and Reshetniki were completely destroyed.⁶ Between 1941 and 1943, the population of the Uvarovich raion declined from 48,563 to 35,906 (74 percent of its pre-war level). The population of Uvarovich itself fell from 3,887 to 2,544 (65.4 percent of the 1941 total).⁷ The Soviet authorities arrested and tried several local collaborators, among them Fedor D. Makarenko, who was initially sentenced by a military tribunal to 15 years, which was subsequently commuted to 10.⁸

The book Pamiats': Belarus' (Minsk: Respublikanskaia Knih, 1995) contains information on Uvarovich during World War II but mistakenly states that the mass shooting took place in 1942.

VETKA

Pre-1941: Vetka, town and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Vetka, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Vetka, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Vetka is located 19 kilometers (12 miles) north-northeast of Gomel' on the Sozh River. In 1926, the Jewish population was 2,094 (35.5 percent), and in 1939, 944 (15.7 percent).

Following the German invasion on June 22, 1941, men of military age were mobilized into the Red Army. Vetka was some distance from the nearest railroad station and therefore was not subjected to aerial bombardment. Despite the absence of an organized evacuation, part of the population succeeded in fleeing. Some left on foot, taking with them the elderly and children on carts, hoping they would soon be able to return.

Vetka was occupied by German forces on August 18, 1941. Within 10 days, a local police force was established, commanded by Vasily Samsonov. In September 1941, on direct orders from the military commandant in Gomel', the local police registered the entire Jewish population. The Jews continued to live in their own houses.¹ According to the book

Pamiats': Vetkauski raen, however, the German authorities ordered that the Jewish population of the entire Rayon be herded into Vetka (probably in September), establishing an open ghetto there that held more than 400 people. The Jews were ordered to stay within this residential area and were made to wear distinguishing marks in the form of the Star of David. Living conditions in the open ghetto were inhumane, and the Jews were regularly compelled to perform hard labor for 12 to 14 hours at a time.²

On December 1, 1941, six officers from the Gomel' Gestapo arrived in Vetka. They ordered the commandant in Vetka to assemble all the Jews regardless of age, gender, or health for a registration at 8:00 A.M. on December 2. Furthermore, it was stressed that those Jews who disobeyed the order would be shot on the spot. By 10:00 A.M. the following day, the registration of the Jews had been completed on the main square. The keys to every household were confiscated. Then the police searched the Jews' homes and brought out all those who had not registered. Subsequently, 360 Jews were herded into a stable and imprisoned there—among them were adolescent youths and infants in their mothers' arms. According to the testimony of eyewitnesses, the Jews screamed: "What are you going to kill us for?"³

The same day that the Jews were isolated, the theft of their belongings began. According to German instructions, all valuable items were taken from the Jews' homes, placed in eight trucks, and driven to Gomel'. On the evening of December 2, "Max," the officer in charge, ordered Samsonov, the commander of the police, to assemble all his men on December 3 to assist in the "resettlement" of the Jews.⁴

The first Aktion in Vetka took place in December 1941 on the orders of Kauman, the acting commandant of Rayon Wetka; Fritz Zhano, the police chief of Rayon Wetka; and Leutnant Max. On the morning of December 3, 1941, all the Jews were formed into a column and led 400 meters (437 yards) from the center of Vetka to a ditch on the southern edge of town close to a large grain elevator. Among the assembled Jews were many women, children, and the elderly. The policemen ordered groups of 10 people to lie down in the ditch. Three Germans standing on the edge of the ditch then shot them with automatic weapons. After the mass shooting, the policemen ordered local citizens to cover the bodies in the mass grave.⁵ When the German murderers left, the former neighbors of the Jews—policemen, local citizens, and peasants from local villages—divided up whatever belongings remained.

The second Aktion took place in September 1942. Orders from Gomel' led to 61 Jews and Gypsies being shot about 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) outside Vetka. According to the findings of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (MVD) of the Gomel' oblast', in total during the years of German occupation, the Nazis and their accomplices murdered 631 "peaceful citizens" in the Vetka raion.⁶

According to incomplete data, in the two main Aktions and in other killing operations, more than 500 Jews died; however, until recently only 217 surnames of the victims could be established, including those of 134 women (62 percent) and 69

children (32 percent) of up to 15 years of age of both genders. Among the deceased, people aged between 50 and 60 years old made up 8.3 percent, and those older than 60 constituted 18.4 percent.⁷

Among the few Jews who were able to escape and avoid the shootings was Isaac Pevzner, who was not called up to the army, owing to his nearsightedness, and was unable to evacuate Vetka because of his elderly parents. During the two years of occupation, his wife, Anastasia Nabokina, hid Pevzner in Vetka (first in the cellar of their house and later in a ditch in the garden). Because she refused to betray the hiding place of her husband, their one-and-a-half-year-old daughter was killed in Anastasia's arms.⁸

Another known survivor was Elena Markovich-Shanovich. The Germans murdered her father David in the autumn of 1941. Elena's mother was told that David had committed the crimes of being born a Jew and of serving in the Red Army. Thanks to neighbors who decided to help her, the girl was saved. They drove her to the town of Soboli, and when the Germans arrived there, they took her to another town from which Elena ran into the woods and joined the partisans.⁹

The Survivors Registry of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum has information on more than 15 survivors from Vetka. Of these Isaak Gutin (born 1924) and Semin Starin (born 1933) apparently remained in or around Vetka during the German occupation. Most of the others were evacuated to the east in time or were in other cities during the German occupation.¹⁰

Vetka was liberated on September 28, 1943. Some of the Jews (about 30 families) returned from their evacuation to the east, but most soon moved to Gomel'.

VETRINO

Pre-1941: Vetrino, village and raion center, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Wetrino, Rayon center, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Vetryna, Polatsk raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Vetrino is located about 24 kilometers (15 miles) southwest of Polotsk. Neither the 1926 population census nor that of 1939 provided a separate listing for the population of the town of Vetrino. According to the census of 1926, 737 Jews lived in the Vetrino "agricultural raion" (not congruent with the Vetrino raion of 1938). According to the 1939 census, the Jewish population of the Vetrino raion was 395 people.

Before World War II, Vetrino (with its railway station on the Polotsk-Grodno line) was a border checkpoint on the frontier with Poland. The area was well fortified. These circumstances made Vetrino a point where many refugees from the "western regions," the areas annexed by the USSR from Poland in 1939, assembled. Judging from the partial list of victims compiled by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) in 1945, the town's Jewish population had almost doubled, owing to the influx of refugees from the western regions before the Wehrmacht captured Vetrino.

The western part of the Vetrino raion, including the village of Vetrino, was captured by the Germans in the course of their operation to seize Polotsk between July 6 and July 11, 1941; the village of Vetrino was taken over on July 11, 1941. It was the LVII Corps of the 3rd Panzer Group that captured the area: the same corps that entered Polotsk at this time. The eastern part of the raion was captured by July 15, after the fall of Vitebsk.

Vetrino was heavily bombed from the air, mainly on June 26 and 27, 1941. However, the evacuation of the population from Vetrino failed: most of those Jews who left the village were forced to return.

Like nearby Polotsk, the Vetrino raion was in the rear area of the German 9th Army; later in the summer of 1941 it came under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. It was under the authority of the Feldkommandantur 815 of the 403rd Security Division.

The ChGK names the German commandant of Vetrino as Geiger; according to this source, he was responsible for ordering the mass killing of the Jews in the village.

In the first days of the occupation, the Germans registered the Jews in Vetrino and confiscated their property, including food supplies. Forced labor was introduced for the Jews. Two weeks after the Germans arrived in Vetrino, the local mayor, Sinkevich, issued an order for the resettlement of the Jews to Polotsk. After staying in Polotsk for three days, the Jews from Vetrino were allowed to return to their homes. Most probably, the German authorities had planned to resettle the Vetrino Jews in the Polotsk ghetto, but they then abandoned this plan.

In September 1941, the Vetrino Jews were resettled into a ghetto in Vetrino, which consisted of three houses on Chkalova Street. The ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire and guarded. Locals were prohibited from having any contacts with the Jews and from giving any parcels to them, on pain of death.

On January 11, 1942, a German punitive squad came from Polotsk in two cars. The Germans and the local police formed the ghetto Jews into a column of about 30 people, escorted them to a nearby boggy area, and shot them. The pits had been dug beforehand; the bodies were buried three days later. A group of 13 Jews (the Kantor and Rabinovich families, and two unmarried women) hid in a potato cellar. They were found after the massacre of the ghetto inmates, interned in a local prison, and some days later killed in a nearby forest. According to one account given to the ChGK, it was Mayor Petrov who found and interned them.¹

In 1945, the ChGK opened the mass grave; 59 names are recorded on the list of those killed compiled by the commission, among them 14 children aged 1 to 14. Among the 59 Jews killed in 1941–1942 in Vetrino, 27 were refugees from the western regions.

SOURCES The documents of the ChGK for the Vetrino raion can be found in GARF (7021-92-210).

VITEBSK

Pre-1941: Vitebsk, city, raion center, center of Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Witebsk, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Vitsebsk, raen and voblasts' center, Republic of Belarus

Vitebsk is located 221 kilometers (137 miles) northeast of Minsk. In 1939, according to the last pre-war census, 37,095 Jews lived in the city, comprising 22.2 percent of the population. Between the census of 1939 and June 22, 1941, 3,820 Jewish refugees from Poland settled in the Vitebsk region, of whom, most probably, between 1,800 and 2,000 settled in the city of Vitebsk.¹ The Jewish population of the Vitebsk raion within its pre-war borders (without the city of Vitebsk) numbered 538.

In early July 1941, with the approach of German forces, Soviet authorities began to evacuate the most important industrial enterprises along with their workers, including many Jews. Thousands of Jews left Vitebsk between June 22 and July 8; at the same time, many Jewish refugees from northwestern Belorussia entered the city, swelling its Jewish population; not all of them succeeded in continuing their trek eastward. According to eyewitness accounts, the number of Jewish refugees in Vitebsk under the German occupation was significant.

The city fell to units of German Panzer Group 3 on July 11, after two days of fighting, during which the city suffered considerable damage, partly because of large fires that the retreating Soviets set. Sonderkommando 7a of Einsatzgruppe B, which entered the city that month, reported that Vitebsk was much more devastated than even Minsk.

Vitebsk became the headquarters of the 9th Army, coming under the authority of its rear area command (Korück 582). From August 1941 onward, Vitebsk fell under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center. The 403rd Security Division had its headquarters there, along with those of its subordinate commands, Feldkommandantur 815 and Ortskommandantur 282.

The first mayor of Vitebsk was Vsevolod F. Rod'ko from western (formerly Polish) Belorussia, who had been known as a Belorussian nationalist leader in the interwar period. Lev G. Brandt, a local ethnic German (Volksdeutscher), was appointed as his deputy. A Belorussian police force was formed, headed by P.A. Shostak, also from western Belorussia. Formally the police was subordinated to the uprava (local authority); in fact, it acted on the orders of the Feldgendarmarie.²

The German military authorities set up a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in Vitebsk; the Germans demanded that only local Jews, not refugees, should make up the council. It included D.S. Blen, a former director of the House of Children's Artistic Education; Kagan, a former schoolteacher of German;

Leitman, a former bookkeeper in a chemical artel; Beizerman, a schoolteacher; and also V.T. Tsadikman, I.O. Glezerman, and D.Kh. Ginzburg.³ With the assistance of the Jewish Council, the authorities registered the Jewish population. An announcement on July 17 stated that the registration of the Jews would be conducted on July 18–20; those liable for registration included not only Jews but also Mischlinge (half-Jews) of the first and second degrees, as well as everybody cohabiting with a Jew.⁴ The registration did not cause a panic among the Jews, but it took a long time; on July 26, Sonderkommando 7b reported that only 3,000 Jews had been registered. It is unclear how many Jews were registered in total; estimates vary from 10,000 to 16,000.

The Germans shot several groups of Jews between July and September 1941. On July 20, they ordered all Jewish men ages 15 to 50 to assemble at the Lenin Park. They formed the Jews into several rows, arbitrarily selected 30 men from each row, and then shot them as a punishment for the failure of some Jews to affix yellow badges to their clothes.⁵ At the end of July, some Jews were shot publicly for “failure to report for work.”⁶ At about this time, the second Aktion took place: 300 Jewish men, mainly the younger and stronger ones, were taken for “hard labor” on the outskirts of Vitebsk; they were even given picks and shovels. All of them were shot in the vicinity of Mazurino and Ulanovichi (northern suburbs of Vitebsk); a notice posted by the commandant the next day informed people that they had been “executed” for committing arson in the city.⁷ Witnesses interrogated by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) mention a mass shooting of members of the Jewish intelligentsia near Tulovo on August 26, 1941. In early September, the military authorities permitted Einsatzkommando 9 to select 397 Jewish prisoners from the civilian internment camp (Zivilgefangenenlager) whom they regarded as terrorists, and the Einsatzkommando shot them. On September 4, Einsatzkommando 9 reported shooting 149 Jews from the “NKVD leadership, political functionaries, as well as persons evading forced labor.”⁸ There were also some other shootings of groups of Jews in this period, albeit on a smaller scale.

On July 25, the Feldkommandantur ordered the Jews to move to the right (in Vitebsk this means the western) bank of the Dvina by July 28. Soviet forces had blown up the bridge across the Dvina before their retreat, and the Germans prohibited the civil population from using the pontoon bridge they had constructed, so the only way to get across was by boat. Many of the locals who lived close to the river had boats; they offered to take Jews across the river in return for payment. Some Jews made primitive rafts.

The Germans turned the river crossing into a slaughter of the Jews. German soldiers in boats in the middle of the Dvina overturned boats and rafts that were carrying Jews and their belongings; Jews who could not swim were left to drown. Other soldiers, who remained on the right bank, did not let the Jews disembark onto the bank; some even shot at the boats. According to various estimates, some 200 to 300 Jews perished during the crossing.⁹

The Nazis established an area of Jewish residence in the northern part of the right bank along the Il'inskii Embankment (former Nizhne-Naberezhnaia). The city's inhabitants dubbed this area the “pale of Jewish settlement.” This “pale” consisted of several sites of Jewish residence. Some of the city's Jews were crammed into a former vegetable store, others into the yeast plant, the former flyers' club, the tobacco factory, a house at 30 Komsomol'skaia Street, and other places.¹⁰ This pale of settlement can be regarded as the first ghetto of Vitebsk. Einsatzkommando 9 (under Filbert), which entered Vitebsk either in the last days of July or on August 1–2, found the ghetto already in existence, “fenced and guarded by Jewish orderlies.”

The second, much smaller “ghetto” was established at the metalworkers' club (Dom metallistov) and in the surrounding area. It was set up sometime in September; the exact date is unclear. On September 16, 1941, the uprava issued an order forbidding the citizens “of non-yid origin” (mezhidovskogo proiskhozhdenia) to remain in the ghetto area, as well as forbidding “all yids” to leave the ghetto area, which gives a rough indication of the date of the second resettlement. All the Jews from the previous ghetto area were crammed into the metalworkers' club. Because of the shortage of medical workers in Vitebsk (only 29 “Aryan” doctors remained in the city), some Jewish doctors were allowed to stay outside the ghetto fence.

The second ghetto was enclosed by the Il'inskii Embankment, Engels Street, Komsomol'skaia Street, and Kirov Street. At both corners of the embankment, barriers were established. The ghetto was fenced. There was a narrow passageway from the ghetto to the river near one of the barriers, and the inmates were able to collect water from the Dvina. The passageway was also fenced; later it was closed. The main entrance to the ghetto was on Engels Street. After the great fire, the right bank, where Jews had been made to resettle, was an area of scorched, charred ruins, according to an eyewitness; there were almost no buildings fit for habitation. People created makeshift dwellings from bricks, planks, and old beds. Having no firewood, the inmates broke window frames from wrecked houses and burned them for cooking and heating.¹¹

In the period of existence of the larger ghetto, some Jews were made to perform forced labor, mainly clearing the city of ruins and rubble left after the fighting and the fire and performing services for the local garrison. Work columns were escorted in the morning across the pontoon bridge to their workplaces, and in the evening they were led back to the ghetto.

Neither in the first, larger ghetto nor at the metalworkers' club did the Germans provide the inmates with food, except on rare occasions. The Jews soon exhausted the food supplies they had brought with them; non-Jews came up to the ghetto fence and exchanged food for clothing. The rate of exchange was very unfavorable for the ghetto Jews, because famine prevailed throughout the city. There was no water supply in the second ghetto other than one pipe from which water poured constantly. There was a permanent queue of inmates at this pipe. All the witnesses attest that the mortality rate from starvation in the ghettos of Vitebsk was very high.

The number of Jews who perished from hunger and disease is not clear. Soviet witnesses who gave their testimony to the ChGK estimated the rate of “natural deaths” in the Vitebsk ghetto variously: from between 30 people a day in September to 70 people a day in early October, which adds up to between 1,100 and 2,600 deaths from September 1 to October 8. It was not until September that the deaths began in the ghetto of Vitebsk. Historian Christian Gerlach estimates the total number of deaths at between 5,000 and 10,000, which would mean that a majority of the Jews who remained in Vitebsk starved to death or perished from typhus, rather than being shot by Filbert’s Einsatzkommando.

The Vitebsk ghetto was liquidated on October 8 and 10, 1941, under the pretext of the “danger of an epidemic” (Seuchengefahr). Einsatzkommando 9, quartered in Vitebsk at this time, with the assistance of the Belorussian police, brought the last Jews of the Vitebsk ghetto to the Tulovskii (Ilovskii) ravine near the village of Sebiakhi, east of Vitebsk, and shot them.

A survivor, a man of mixed Jewish-Belorussian parentage, says that when he came to the ghetto fence on October 10 to find his mother, the ghetto site was empty; all its inmates were gone.¹²

The number of Jews killed by Filbert’s unit has been a matter of dispute. Ereignismeldung 124 of October 25, 1941, reports a figure of around 3,000 Jews killed; however, Ereignismeldung 148 of December 19, 1941, mentions 4,090 Jews killed in Vitebsk. Some scholars are inclined to think that these reports deal with two different mass murders—one in October, the other in December 1941—and therefore they add these numbers together (thus arriving at the estimate of 7,000 or even 8,000 victims). Christian Gerlach questions whether the Einsatzgruppen reports deal with one or two Aktionen. Both reports mention the same Aktion on October 8 and 10, 1941; the second total simply is more accurate than the previous one. The witnesses who gave testimonies to the ChGK may have exaggerated the numbers of victims, but it is unlikely that they would completely forget the second mass shooting of Jews in Vitebsk. No survivors mention a second Aktion, either.

Mikhail Ryvkin and Arkadii Shulman interpret the accounts collected by the ChGK to mean that the mass murder continued until October 12, rather than until October 8. On the basis of several witness accounts, they maintain that some group shootings of Jews (and prisoners of war) also took place in Vitebsk during the second half of October. The number of victims in this subsequent October Aktion was 800.¹³ According to Ryvkin and Shulman, in early November another relatively small group of Jews was shot.¹⁴ The precise fate of the Vitebsk Jews in late 1941 is still a subject of debate among scholars.

The Jewish doctors and artisans who were left in the city were killed at about the same time. They may have been included in the report of December 19, 1941. Some Jews continued to live clandestinely in Vitebsk even after this; thus the list of prisoners arrested between July and September 1942 and detained in the city’s SD prison contains more than 120 Jews.¹⁵

The number of Jews who perished in Vitebsk in 1941 may be estimated at between 6,500 and 13,000. The most probable estimate is 7,500, which constitutes 20 percent of the pre-war population of Vitebsk; this means that 80 percent of the Jews evacuated or fled from this industrial city. If there were indeed two separate mass shootings of Jews (probably separated by a very short interval, and they might have been conflated in the memories of the witnesses into a single event), the most probable estimate of the number of victims is 10,500.¹⁶

It is not clear in which villages of the Vitebsk raion Jews were killed. Some sel’sovets (Dolzha, Borovliany, Nikolaevo) are notable for the large number of people killed in them by the Nazis. It is unclear whether there were Jews among these victims.

Jewish/non-Jewish relations in Vitebsk in 1941 were not uniform. On the one hand, some survivors attest that in the first weeks of the occupation some “shady characters” were trying to break into their houses and rob Jewish belongings.¹⁷ On the other hand, the partisan Yevdokiya Spiridonova in 1941 escorted many Jews from Vitebsk to a partisan base at the former peat-cutting facility “20 let Oktiabria” (20th Anniversary of the October Revolution), and from there they were taken across the front line to the Soviet side in 1942.¹⁸

SOURCES In the late 1940s, a short memoir by Iv. Ivanov (a pseudonym), “Iz nedavnego proshlogo: Vitebskoe getto,” appeared in Sotsialisticheskii vestnik [a leftist journal in Russian, which was published in New York and Paris] 32:1–3. An essay by Ph. Friedman, “Umkum fun vitebsker yidn,” appeared in the collection Vitebsk amol, ed. I. Trunk (New York, 1956). A book of memoirs written by a wartime German soldier with leftist leanings, Paul Koerner-Schrader, Ostlandreiter ([East] Berlin: Dt. Militärverlag, 1961), devotes much attention to the ghetto of Vitebsk. The fictionalized story of the extermination of Vitebsk Jews, the novel by Aleksandr Tverskoi, Turetskii marsh (Moscow, 1983), must not be neglected, either, despite its numerous historical mistakes. A. Zeltser and D. Romanovsky have published an account of the fate of the Jews of Vitebsk in: Vestnik Evreiskogo Universiteta v Moskve 4 (1994): 198–228. This essay also includes published versions of some eyewitness accounts now located at Yad Vashem. In 2004, the book by Mikhail Ryvkin and Arkadii Shulman, Khronika strashnykh dnei: Tragediia Vitebskogo getto, was published in Vitebsk. Despite its journalistic, nonacademic style, this book represents the first history of the Holocaust in the city. Christian Gerlach’s Kalkulierte Morde: Die deutsche Wirtschafts- und Vernichtungspolitik in Weissrussland 1941 bis 1944 (Hamburg: HIS, 1999) also includes a detailed analysis of the murder of the Jews of the Vitebsk ghetto.

VOLYNTSY

Pre-1941: Volyntsy, village, Drissa raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Wolynzy, Rayon Drissa, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Valyntsy, Verkhniadzvinsk raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Volyntsy is located about 40 kilometers (25 miles) northwest of Polotsk. On July 10, 1941, the German 14th Panzer Division of the newly formed 4th Panzer Army captured the villages of Volyntsy and Borkovichi. From August 1941 onward, the Drissa raion, including the village of Volyntsy, was under the authority of Rear Area, Army Group Center.

In January 1942, the remaining 84 Jews in Volyntsy were assembled “behind a fence” (that is, in a ghetto surrounded with barbed wire). About one month later, a punitive squad of about 20 men arrived in Volyntsy from Drissa in two cars; they drove the Jews from the ghetto, forming them into a column, 4 abreast, and escorted them to a nearby forest, where a pit 8 meters by 2 meters (26 by 7 feet) had been dug beforehand, and shot them. Members of the local population could observe the massacre with their own eyes, as the killers conducted the Aktion close to the town's marketplace. After the massacre, the Germans sold part of the Jews' belongings to the locals and took away the most valuable objects.¹

SOURCES According to Marat Botvinnik, Pamiatniki genotsida evreev Belarusi (Minsk: Belaruskaja Navuka, 2000), pp. 170, 189, the Aktion in Volyntsy took place on February 2, 1942. The mass shooting of the Jews of Volyntsy is also mentioned in Pamiatniki Belarusi (Minsk: Respublikanskaja Knih, 1995), p. 132.

VORONICHI

Pre-1941: Voronichi, village, Vetrino raion, Vitebsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Woronitschi, Rayon Wetrino, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Varonichy, Polatsk raen, Vitebsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Voronichi is located 25 kilometers (16 miles) southwest of Polotsk. In 1920, there were 65 Jews living in the village out of a total population of 163.

Forces of German Army Group Center captured Voronichi during the first days of July 1941. It appears that very few Jews fled the village before their arrival. According to witness accounts collected for the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), in early November 1941, an SS unit arrived in three cars. They arrested 6 Jewish men, told them to take shovels, and escorted them to the Ostivki Forest, where the SS told the Jews to undress and then shot them. A local policeman, Semen Rumakov, who took part in the Aktion, was rewarded with a coat that had belonged to one of the victims. At the end of November, the authorities, including the village elder (starosta) Konstantin Harbuk (or Gorbuk), assembled the Jews of Voronichi, 62 people in total, in a ghetto, which consisted of two houses and was surrounded with barbed wire and guarded. During the ghetto's existence, some men came from time to time to Voronichi from the Vetrino authority; they interrogated Jews, beat them, and took their belongings. According to another account, before the ghetto was established, Harbuk regularly came to the Jewish houses and extorted valuables and good-quality belongings from them, promising that those who gave things to him would not be resettled to the ghetto in Polotsk.

On January 16, 1942, a Belorussian police squad from Polotsk, 12 men, headed by two Germans, arrived from Bobynichi. Supported by Harbuk and the local policeman Rumakov, they began to assemble the Jews from the ghetto. Some Jews attempted to flee; they were shot at and wounded. The men of the squad beat the wounded with rifle butts. According to one account, they put out the eyes of 17-year-old Sonia Vaiman, who had attempted to flee, and then killed her. A Jewish woman, Malka Rubin, tried to hide with her 3-year-old son, but Harbuk found them. The rest of the Jews from the ghetto were led to an old cemetery and shot. In all, 62 people were killed on that day, among them 28 children ages 1 to 14 years. The men of the police squad collected the clothing of the victims.

A total of 68 Jews were killed in Voronichi.

ZEMBIN

Pre-1941: Zembin, village, Borisov raion, Minsk oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Sembin, Rayon Borissov, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Zembin, Borisau raen, Minsk voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Zembin is located about 70 kilometers (43 miles) northeast of Minsk. In 1926, there were 838 Jews out of 1,199 inhabitants of the village (69.9 percent).

German armed forces occupied Zembin on June 30, 1941. With the exception of the Shifrin family (with many children), who traveled to the east a few days before the Germans arrived, most Jews found themselves under German occupation. Some families with more than 20 carts fled to the Beresina River but became encircled by the rapidly advancing German spearheads and were all forced to return to Zembin. Because there was shooting on the streets that night, some of the inhabitants decided to hide near the swamp, but two days later they also returned to the village. One week after the Germans arrived, the Jews were ordered to wear distinguishing marks on their chests and back: a yellow circle 10 centimeters (4 inches) in diameter. They were also forbidden to communicate with non-Jews.¹ A police force was formed in Zembin, headed by Vasiliy Kharitonovich (chief of police) and Feofil Kabakov, his deputy.²

In mid-July 1941, houses on Gatskaia and Raboche-Krestianskaia Streets, not far from the Jewish cemetery, were enclosed with barbed wire, and a ghetto was formed. More than 900 people were confined in the ghetto. The Jews were compelled to perform a variety of jobs meticulously, without pay and without questioning the orders given to them. They were used for collecting garbage, cleaning the area, loading and unloading fuel, and doing other menial tasks. The Germans had no long-term plans for the ghetto in Zembin but simply used it as a place to gather and contain the Jews before exterminating them. In mid-August, the German authorities chose 18 of the strongest men to dig a pit 800 meters (about half a mile) outside Zembin at a place called Zagornoe, ostensibly as a dump for useless military equipment. The pit was 46 meters long and 3 meters wide (about 151 by 10 feet). This task took several days to complete; however, the earthen stairs leading down into the pits aroused suspicion.³

In the early morning of August 18, 1941, policemen Gnot and Golub went through the ghetto and declared that according to a German order all the Jews were to gather at the marketplace. This was done under the pretense of checking documents and resettling the people from Zembin. When the Jews had gathered at the predetermined place, Gendarmes with dogs encircled them. Policemen organized the prisoners into columns and led them into the forest. The guards demanded order and shouted and hit those who stepped out of line. Not far from the forest, behind which was the pit, the column stopped, and people were ordered to kneel; after that, they were permitted to sit down to “rest.” At first, 20 of the healthiest men were led away. There were few men in the ghetto, because the majority had been mobilized into the Red Army. Shots were heard. Then one by one, groups of 15 to 20 people were taken away and led to the pit. A young teacher shouted: “Don’t cry, these are fascists! Either way they will have to pay, our people will avenge us!” She was among the first killed. Families sat together in small groups, planning to die together. People were ordered to undress and lie down in the pit in line, then were shot. Among the victims was a cadet from the Military Aviation College who came to Zembin before the war to visit relatives.⁴

According to the testimony of Rema Asinovskaya-Khodasevich, people instinctively crept away from the edge of the field where they were sitting and waiting for execution, hoping to avoid being the next group selected to die. The German translator Lutske shouted: “Ten people! Not everyone will be killed, examinations are conducted there, don’t panic!” A sick old man named Shenderov, who was brought with the help of his relatives, died from a heart attack due to anxiety before his turn came.⁵

Only two children, both Khasia Khodasevich’s, were spared, supposedly because they came from a mixed marriage. Following her mother’s advice, the elder child took her four-year-old brother by the hand and approached the German officer who was in charge of the execution. The girl said that she was in the crowd of Jews by accident. The officer consulted David Ehof, an ethnic German (Volksdeutscher) who was formerly a teacher of German in Zembin and later became the chief of police in Borisov, and demanded that he confirm what the child was saying. Ehof answered in the affirmative, and the children were sent to a car. One boy, a classmate of theirs, ran behind them and begged: “Remka, tell them that I’m your brother, that I’m Russian!” But he was seized and thrown into the pit. According to the testimony of Stanislav Turchinovich, afterwards the guards ordered local Belorussians to bury the corpses and fill in the grave. When the work was almost completed, an old Jewish woman who had been missed initially was brought in and executed. The pit was dug out again, and she was placed inside. The Belorussians feared that the Germans would kill them because they were witnesses, but the Germans let them go home.⁶

That day more than 750 people were murdered, including more than 250 children.⁷ The Aktion was conducted by the chief of the Borisov SD, Hauptsturmführer Werner Schöne-mann, Gestapo men Berg and Walther, the commandant in Borisov, Scherer, and the commandant in Zembin, Ilek. The policemen Rabetski, Kursevich, Golub, Glot, Deshkovich, Orehov, and Kontur, as well as the Oniskevich brothers—who received copious amounts of alcohol—also took an active role in the massacre.⁸

In its own report, Einsatzgruppe B claimed that it had received “repeated complaints . . . that all the Jews there were working against German instructions” and that many had recently arrived from elsewhere. In postwar testimony, however, a member of the Einsatzgruppe, Willy Kremers, noted that in Zembin there were no attempts by the Jews to flee. Nevertheless, the Einsatzgruppe report concluded: “in order to prevent any further opposition, a number of Jews were rendered harmless.”⁹

Zembin was liberated on June 30, 1944. In August, the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) for the Borisov raion was able to confirm the murder of only 5 Jews in Zembin: Gil and Liba Beneson, Meer and Haia Kats, and Fania Harik. By the late 1980s and early 1990s, through the efforts of the historical-educational society Svet Menory, 222 surnames of Jews who were killed in Zembin were established.

ZHLOBIN

Pre-1941: Zhlobin, town and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1944: Shlobin, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Zhlobin, raen center, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Zhlobin is located 83 kilometers (52 miles) northwest of Gomel'. In 1939, 3,709 Jews (19.2 percent of the total) resided in Zhlobin.

When the war began, several hundred men eligible for military service were conscripted into the Red Army. Due to German air raids, few people managed to evacuate by train, but more than half of Zhlobin's Jews escaped on foot towards Gomel' before Soviet troops blew up the bridges over the Dnieper River on August 13, 1941.¹

A combat detachment of 500 men, including many Jews, defended Zhlobin tenaciously. German forces captured the town on July 3, 1941, but were driven out again 10 days later by the Soviet 63rd Infantry Corps. Only on August 14, 1941, did the Germans secure Zhlobin.²

Under German occupation, the mayor was Nikolai Zabelin, and Ivan Dombrovskii volunteered to head the town guard, selecting his 30 subordinates. Chernousov was head of the town police; Turchanovich headed the Secret Field Police (GFP); Stolytko was head of the Political Section; and Kozhemiakin headed the Investigation Section. The Shlobin Rayon police was headed by Mikhail Kashin, who commanded 150 men.³

The murder of Jews in Zhlobin began in the late summer or fall of 1941. A detachment of Einsatzgruppe B shot 31 Jews in the town in September 1941, as alleged saboteurs or plunderers.⁴

At first the Jews lived in their own homes, but they were forbidden to go to public places, use the main streets in the town, and associate with non-Jews. Ol'ga Sorkina was arrested for speaking with Russians. In October 1941, two ghettos were set up on the southern outskirts of town. The first was in the dormitory of a school for training factory and mill workers. The second was in three converted huts on the other side of the railway and a hut near the bakery. The elder of the first ghetto was an old man named Zalman; the elder of the second ghetto was Bizur, assisted by a man named Samchen. Dombrovskii registered a total of 1,145 Jews. Adults able to work were used for forced labor.⁵

Jews from surrounding towns and villages also were brought to Zhlobin. Ermolenko, the assistant mayor of Zhlobin, ordered the Rayon police under Kashin to round up the 300 Jews of Karpilovka. Initially, the Jews could take their property with them (cattle, food, and clothing), but later the cattle were taken away. The local police guarded the ghetto around the clock, in shifts.⁶

The food that people brought with them, obtained by barter or given by Belorussians, was their only means of subsistence. Generally the local population helped, without payment, "their own" Jews who were married to Belorussians, and village Jews were helped by former neighbors, but people in these categories formed only a small part of the ghetto population. Most people had to rely on illegal barter, which required great organization and trust. Sometimes it was necessary to bribe the police to turn a blind eye.⁷

The guards beat the Jews with rubber batons. It was impossible to escape from the ghetto, and sometimes the Germans and policemen beat Jews for "amusement." During the night of December 31, 1941, and January 1, 1942, Kashin publicly shot two Jews, Ginzburg and Garelik, for attempting to escape.⁸ On February 10, 1942, Feldkommandantur 581 in Bobruisk reported that 739 Jews were residing in the Shlobin Rayon.⁹

The plan to liquidate the ghetto of Zhlobin was kept secret. There were rumors about a mass shooting, but not everybody believed them. The evening before April 11, 1942, policeman Trofim Tomkov and police chief Kashin, on the pretext of road repair work, assembled about 40 men from the village of Lebedevka with shovels. But the peasants were sent into a field, to an old antitank ditch, and ordered to dig pits. On April 12, 1941, Kashin ordered Zhlobin policemen to go at 7:00 A.M. in trucks to the ghetto, where German forces were already at work.¹⁰

Germans and local police herded the Jews out of their houses, counted them, and then "loaded" them into 30 closed trucks, 40 persons per vehicle. The column left the town and came to a halt 1 kilometer (0.6 mile) from the village of Lebedevka. The Jews were herded out of the trucks and led to the killing site, the antitank ditch. Then 20 meters (66 feet) from the ditch, the Jews were ordered to undress. Some 20 policemen cordoned off the area, while the others forced the people to remove their clothing. The shooting was directed by the assistant mayor, Ermolenko, and the chief of police, Kashin. The first to be shot were the 30 most able-bodied Jewish men. The police brought the victims to the edge of the pit, where a plank lay. The adults had to stand on the plank, and Mikhailovskii hit them with a stick on the back of the neck; as each one fell forward, the other policemen opened fire with submachine guns. The last to be killed were small children.¹¹

By 3:00 P.M. the massacre was over, and it was "suggested" that the peasants of Lebedevka cover the pit (containing around 800 corpses).¹²

The killing of the Jews of Zhlobin continued from April 12 to April 15, 1942. In the field between Zhlobin and Lebedevka, it is estimated that at least 1,200 people were shot, primarily elderly people, women, and children. According to the statement of Artem Vasil'chenkov, as the burial was in progress, a 10- to 12-year-old girl raised herself from the pit, resting on her arms, and screamed, "Finish me off or let me go!" A German noticed this, took his pistol from its holster, and killed the child with two shots. On April 14, 1942, the Jews of the village of Streshin (480 people) were killed at the same location.¹³

During the occupation, the Nazis and their collaborators killed more than 10 Jewish mothers with children from mixed marriages whose non-Jewish husbands were serving at the front. Nikolai Makei, a Belorussian, chose to die with his Jewish wife, Sara Nekhamkina, and their children, seven-year-old Vladimir and six-year-old Tamara. The Babitskii brothers and their young sister were killed, though their Jewish origin was three generations in the past.¹⁴

Quite probably, the pits near Lebedevka contain, along with the inmates of the Zhlobin and Streshin ghettos, some Jews from the neighboring villages of Krasnyi Bereg, Pirevichi, Dobrogoshcha, Staraia Rudnia, and Kazimirovo.

Few survived the liquidation of the Zhlobin ghetto. The witness Basia Palei (born 1906) was searching for food in the countryside during the shooting. When she returned, her husband and three children had been killed. El'ka Sorkina (born 1925) jumped from a truck on the way to the killing site, hid, and managed to find the partisans.¹⁵ Aleksandra Kushner helped save Nadezhda Gorevaia and her son by her Jewish husband, who was in the Red Army. She hid them in her home and later helped them reach the partisans. Boris Glakovskii (born 1941) was saved by Tina Makovskaia and her mother, Aleksandra Reviakova. The father of Boris, Semen Isaakovich, a militia officer, perished in the defense of Zhlobin in 1941. Semen's wife, Tsilia Shaevna, and their four children (ages 1, 4, 6, and 10) were put into the ghetto. On April 12, 1942, during transport to the execution site, Tsilia managed to hand Boris to Tina, who saved him.¹⁶

On June 26, 1944, Zhlobin was liberated by troops of the 1st Belorussian Front. At the end of the occupation of Zhlobin, only about 20 percent of the pre-war population of 20,909 people remained.¹⁷ Representatives of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), visiting Zhlobin, ascertained that a total of 3,091 people were murdered in Zhlobin and the Zhlobin raion by the Nazis, without specifying whether they were Jews or non-Jews. The ChGK established 548 names of the murdered Jews from Zhlobin.¹⁸

ZHURAVICH

Pre-1941: Zhuravichi, village and raion center, Gomel' oblast', Belorussian SSR; 1941–1943: Shurawitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Zhuravichy, Rohachou raen, Homel' voblasts', Republic of Belarus

Zhuravichi is located 94 kilometers (58 miles) north-northwest of Gomel'. In 1939, the Jewish population was 616, 25.7 percent of the total.

When hostilities began, all the males eligible for military service joined the Red Army. In late June 1941, a local combat battalion of 180 men was formed, commanded by a man named Gerasimov, which performed security tasks in Zhuravichi.¹ As Zhuravichi was not on the railroad, it did not suffer from aerial bombardment, nor did many refugees from places further west arrive there, who might spread news about the Nazis' treatment of the Jews. Soviet officials did not order an official evacuation, and only a small part of the Jewish population managed to leave the town in time. They left on foot, dragging along the elderly and children in carts, hoping for a speedy return.

German forces entered Zhuravichi on August 14, 1941, and the German military administration appointed new local officials during the first 10 days of the occupation. A man named Filipchenko became the Rayon head (Rayonchef). The first chief of police, Vakhnaley (September–December 1941), was later replaced by Grigorii Alesiuk (December 1941–February 1943), a former district militia officer in the Zhuravichi People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs (NKVD).² A number of local residents were recruited to serve in the police.

In the summer of 1942, in connection with the strengthening of the partisan movement, Alesiuk called on the youth to join the Zhuravichi police, increasing police manpower from about 100 up to 500 men.³

Until September 1941, the Jews remained in their own homes. They were forbidden to appear in public places and to converse or trade with Belorussians and Russians. The Jews were required to perform forced labor for the German military authorities and the local administration.

A ghetto was set up in the town in September 1941. The Germans ordered Vakhnaley, assisted by the police force, to round up all the Jews of Zhuravichi and the village of Novye Zhuravichi,⁴ a total of 170 people, and herd them into the garden of the kolkhoz named for the "Twelfth Anniversary of the October Revolution." They were quartered in six buildings, some of which had previously served as a school. The ghetto, which was guarded by local police, remained in existence for about four months. Food was scarce, the buildings were not heated, and no medical assistance was provided. The Jews presumed what their fate would likely be, but they did not escape because they were bound to each other by mutual responsibilities. The Germans appointed Jewish "elders," who maintained order, received demands for forced labor, and were made personally responsible for ensuring that no Jew escaped or hid.⁵

In the final days of December 1941, the German military administration (Ortskommandantur) in Zhuravichi ordered a pit to be prepared for the mass killing of the Jews. Alesiuk allocated 40 policemen, 10 of whom were sent to dig the pit, while the rest were posted in a circle around the ghetto as guards. The Jews were locked in the barn and kept there until the Germans arrived. Then 12 Germans, probably of the Security Police, drove up to the barn in a covered truck and began loading the prisoners for transport to the pit. They brought out 30 people at a time, loaded them in the truck, and drove them beyond the Zhuravichi hospital into a pine forest.

Most of the victims were old people, women, and children. Among others, they included Iankel' Aleshinskii (70 years of age), his wife, his son, and daughter-in-law, and a man named Bogorad (38–40 years old) with his sister (26). Among the victims were also the kolkhoznik Mikhail Mazurov and the barber Moisei Starovoitov, who were both married to Russian women and had taken their surnames. Five or six trips in total were made that day. The doomed prisoners were led to the edge of the pit and shot with rifles and submachine guns in the presence of the policemen. The police buried the corpses. A number of local policemen assisted the Germans in carrying out the mass shooting of Jews in Zhuravichi.⁶

Alesiuk arranged for victims' belongings to be guarded, and two days later the Jewish possessions were taken to the Rayon authority. The best items were appropriated by the Germans, and the others were sold at a store, with the profits going into the coffers of the Rayon authority.⁷

Soviet forces liberated Zhuravichi on November 25, 1943. It was one of the first populated localities in Belorussia to be liberated. The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), which reached Zhuravichi in March 1944, determined that during the occupation of the town and the raion of the same name, the Nazis and their accomplices had killed 2,477 civilians, including 144 people in Zhuravichi itself. The population of the Zhuravichi raion decreased from 42,298 in May 1941 to 28,100 in May 1944: 66.4 percent of the pre-war level.⁸ Some of the Nazis' accomplices, including G.V. Alesiuk, were arrested and tried.⁹

EASTERN UKRAINE AND CRIMEA REGION

Two Jewish men are forced by German troops with the 6th Army to hang three other Jews in a village outside of Khar'kov. All five of the Jewish men were eventually hanged as suspected members of the resistance, 1942.

EASTERN UKRAINE AND CRIMEA REGION

Pre-1941: eastern part of the Ukrainian SSR and Crimean ASSR, RSFSR; 1941–1943: (Crimea occupied 1941–1944), initially Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd), then 1942–1943: Rear Area, Army Group B (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet B); 1943: eastern part of the Ukrainian SSR and Crimean ASSR (from 1945, Crimean oblast', RSFSR, from 1954, Ukrainian SSR); post-1991: eastern part of Ukraine and Autonomous Republic of Crimea, Ukraine

Between the fall of 1941 and the summer of 1942, the Germans established around 19 ghettos in the military-occupied territory of eastern Ukraine and Crimea; as many as 19,000 Jews may have been confined within these ghettos. Most of these ghettos existed for only a few weeks, prior to the rapid extermination of the Jewish population. With reference to the Soviet administrative divisions as of 1939, the ghettos were distributed as follows: six in the Chernigov oblast'; two in the Sumy oblast'; four in the Stalino oblast'; and three (possibly four) in the Khar'kov oblast'. In addition, there were four ghettos (or camps mainly for Jews) in German-occupied Crimea.

German forces penetrated into eastern Ukraine following the Battle of Kiev in August and September 1941, reaching, for example, the town of Priluki, Chernigov oblast', on September 18. German forces captured Belopol'e in the Sumy oblast' and Artemovsk in the Stalino oblast' on October 7 and 14, respectively. Units of the German 6th Army occupied Khar'kov on October 24, 1941. Kramatorsk and Stalino were also occupied in late October. The greater part of the Crimean peninsula was captured by units of the German 11th Army in the second half of October 1941.

Due to the passage of several months after the start of the invasion before these regions were occupied, a considerable portion of the Jewish population was evacuated or able to flee. German registration statistics for the number of Jews encountered have survived for several locations. For example, in Khar'kov, just over 10,000 Jews were registered from a 1939 Jewish population of 130,250. Even allowing for considerable underregistration, probably less than 10 percent of the Jewish population remained. In Dzhankoi, Crimea, on their arrival, the Germans discovered only 44 Jews out of a pre-war population of 1,397 (less than 4 percent). In some smaller locations, such as Voikovshtadt and Alushta in Crimea, or Shchors (Chernigov oblast'), about one third of the Jews came under German occupation. Regarding Yalta, on the southern tip of the Crimean peninsula, Soviet documentation indicates that at least 1,120 Jews were evacuated from the city in an organized fashion. However, other Jews fleeing before the German advance became trapped there, such that the number of Jews killed in Yalta probably exceeded 50 percent of the city's pre-war Jewish population of 2,109.¹

The two largest ghettos established by the Germans in eastern Ukraine and Crimea were those in Khar'kov, holding about 10,000 Jews, and in Stalino, which held up to 3,000 Jews. Three other ghettos had populations in excess of 1,000:

those in Priluki, Artemovsk, and Yalta. Of the remaining ghettos, only those in Dzhankoi, Enakievo, and Shchors had populations of around 500 Jews—all the others containing less than 150. The two ghettos in the Sumy oblast' and the two (or three) smaller ghettos in the Khar'kov oblast' all probably held less than 40 Jews each.

In many large cities of eastern Ukraine and Crimea, however, as well as in many towns in these regions, no ghettos were established. Instead, the remaining Jews were killed in mass-shooting Aktions or by other means without formal ghettoization. In Mariupol', for example, after introducing the wearing of the Star of David and establishing a Jewish Council (Judenrat) to register the Jews in mid-October 1941, the German authorities initiated the murder of 8,000 Jews on October 18. The Jews were assembled briefly in a barracks on the edge of town for a few days before being taken in groups to be shot and buried in an antitank ditch on the Maxim-Gorki Kolkhoz, a few kilometers outside the city. The mass shootings conducted here by Sonderkommando 10a of Einsatzgruppe D went on for several days, with most Jews being murdered on October 20–21.²

The Wehrmacht was responsible for imposing a series of anti-Jewish measures following its arrival in eastern Ukraine and Crimea. In addition to the registration of the Jews and the introduction of distinctive markers, Jews were also required to perform forced labor. In Yalta, Sonderkommando 11a was mainly responsible for introducing the anti-Jewish measures, including the formation of a Jewish Council and the introduction of a six-pointed star, to be worn by the Jews on their chests and backs. All money and valuables had to be surrendered to the Germans via the Jewish Council.³

The process of ghettoization is documented for only a few of the ghetto locations. In Khar'kov and Stalino the local Ukrainian administration played an active role in its implementation. According to the testimony of the deputy mayor, Eichmann, on orders from Einsatzkommando 6, the mayors of the city districts and the police chiefs in Stalino organized the transfer of the Jews into the ghetto.⁴ In Khar'kov, probably prompted by Sonderkommando 4a under the command of Paul Blobel, the city administration issued a resolution on November 22 excluding Jews from working in public institutions and ordering that they be resettled into one district. The city administration also registered the Jews in early December, prior to their resettlement on December 16. The Wehrmacht commandant in the city signed the placards, which ordered the Jews to move into the ghetto or be shot.⁵

A variety of different structures were used as ghetto sites. In Khar'kov, for example, the ghetto was established in the barracks of a factory district on the outskirts of town. In Yenakievo, four large barracks were also used for the ghetto. In Stalino, the ghetto was located in a settlement named "Belyi Kar'er" (White Pit) at a former quarry on the outskirts of the city. The cottages in this settlement were virtually destroyed before the Jews moved in. In Artemovsk, the Jews were confined within the cellars of the town's administrative headquarters. In Priluki, two school buildings were used for the ghetto, which was surrounded by barbed wire.

Five open ghettos are known to have been established in Borzna, Gorodnia, Korop, Semenovka, and Shchors, all in the Chernigov oblast'. In Gorodnia, the ghetto was established several weeks after the town was first combed by a detachment of Sonderkommando 7b in late September 1941, which had resulted, according to an Einsatzgruppen report, in the shooting of 21 allegedly "thieving Jewish terrorists."⁶ The "Jewish residential district" consisted of only one street and was liquidated in December after only about a month. In some of these open ghettos, individual specialist Jews, such as a dentist, were left alive for a while longer after the main shooting Aktion, as their services were still required. These open ghettos reflect a pattern similar to the open ghettos established by the military authorities further to the west, for example, in areas that were subsequently incorporated into Generalkommissariat Zhitomir.

Since most of the ghettos were improvised and several served primarily as holding pens until the Jews could be murdered, the living conditions were deplorable. A detailed description has been given by a survivor of the Khar'kov ghetto: "Hundreds of people were settled in barracks intended for 60 to 70 people. In the ghetto the Germans starved people and prevented them from going out to get water and food. At night people were prevented from going outside even for the needs of nature. Anyone spotted violating the established regime was immediately shot. Many people became sick and died. The corpses of the dead remained in the barracks."⁷ The Jews were robbed and plundered by the German and Ukrainian police; and local people plundered their vacated apartments. Jews attempting to leave the ghetto were shot by men of the German police battalion on guard. The Khar'kov ghetto existed for only about three weeks before all the inmates were shot.⁸

Little is known about the Jewish Councils in these ghettos, as there is little to no information available on them. Such councils were definitely established, for example, in the ghettos in Priluki and Yalta. In Yalta, the Jewish Council was made responsible for organizing the transfer of the Jews into the ghetto and also organized workshops, a hospital, and a Jewish police force inside the ghetto.

The exploitation of forced labor was not a significant factor in the establishment of most of these ghettos, but it occurred in several, including the ghettos in Stalino and Dzhankoi. To the northwest of Khar'kov, in both Dmitrovka and Bogodukhov, small groups of Jews were confined within a single building and taken out daily to perform forced labor—in the case of Bogodukhov, for several months before the Germans shot them. There is a report of a third small ghetto, in Danilovka, not far from Bogodukhov, but it was not possible to locate this site with certainty using available maps.⁹ In the open ghettos of the Chernigov oblast', forced labor for Jews was introduced prior to ghettoization and presumably continued up until just before the liquidation Aktions. The ghetto in Belopol'e, established in 1942 for the remaining Jews found there, was intended as a means to exploit them as forced laborers.¹⁰

There is little detailed evidence of organized resistance in these short-lived ghettos other than attempts to evade registration and ghettoization and some escape attempts that often cost Jews their lives. In the enclosed ghetto of Priluki, tunnels were dug to enable young Jews to sneak out and scavenge for food. Those who did escape successfully from the ghettos often received some assistance from, or managed to pass as, non-Jews. Those from mixed marriages had better chances for these reasons. Jews also had more success if they moved away from their former place of residence, to reduce the danger of their being recognized and denounced.

A few of the ghettos or camps in these regions also included some non-Jewish prisoners. In Dzhankoi, non-Jewish peasants who had assisted the Jews were confined with them. Available sources indicate that the ghetto or camp in Kramatorsk may also have contained non-Jews, either alongside the Jews or possibly after the Jews had been murdered. In Alushta, Crimea, Gypsies were confined with the Jews in a single building closely guarded by the Tartar militia.

Places of temporary confinement for Jews, or destruction ghettos, which existed for only a few days, were established at several locations in Crimea, most notably in Feodosiia and Evpatoriia. These locations have not been given separate entries in this volume because the Jews were confined for only a week or less.¹¹ For example, in Feodosiia, about 800 Jews were held in a prison "ghetto" for a few days as an integral part of the killing Aktion there in early December 1941.¹² In Evpatoriia, around 750 Jews were confined from November 21, 1941, in a former military school building. Exactly how long they were held there is uncertain. However, contemporary German documentation suggests it was only hours, or a few days, before the men of Sonderkommando 11a shot them all. The town was declared to be free of Jews by December 15.¹³ In Simferopol', the Germans established a Judenrat and subjected the Jews to making large monetary contributions and forced labor, but no formal ghetto was established. From December 9, 1941, Sonderkommando 11b ordered the Krimchaks and Jews to assemble at several collection points; then they shot them successively over the following four days, implying some temporary confinement during the course of the Aktion. In the weeks that followed, additional Jews were found and shot, bringing the total number of Jews murdered in Simferopol' to around 10,000, in addition to 1,500 Krimchaks. The children of mixed marriages involving Jews were murdered here using a gas van in July 1942.¹⁴

In the winter of 1941–1942, the advance of the Red Army successfully liberated one ghetto in Crimea. After capturing the village of Voikovshtadt in November 1941, the German authorities established a small ghetto in one building on the outskirts of the village for the less than 100 Jews who remained. The ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire and guarded by Romanian troops. The landing of Soviet forces on the Kerch' peninsula on December 26, 1941, forced the Germans to retreat, enabling the Red Army to liberate the remaining Jews in the Voikovshadt ghetto. They were then evacuated, together with the Soviet forces, before the Germans reoccupied the village in May 1942.¹⁵

Nearly all the ghettos in this region existed for only a few weeks. Most of the mass shootings conducted to liquidate the ghettos were organized by the respective detachments of Einsatzgruppen C and D, assisted by locally based units of the Waffen-SS, the Wehrmacht, the Order Police, and Ukrainian, Tartar, or other native auxiliaries. Some of the smaller Aktions, however, were conducted without the participation of the Einsatzgruppen. Large ditches or ravines were used in most cases for the mass shootings, but in Artemovsk the Jews were shot in an alabaster mine, which was sealed afterwards, once the task was completed. By July 1942, all of these ghettos had been liquidated.

The last occupying German forces were driven from the region with the conquest of the Crimea by the Red Army during the course of April and May 1944. Precise figures are not available, but it seems likely that of the Jews trapped by the German occupation in this region, only a few hundred managed to survive. The postwar populations in these towns and cities were composed overwhelmingly of Jews who had returned (or arrived) from the Soviet interior or the Red Army.

AKHTYRKA

Pre-1941: Akhtyrka, town and raion center, Sumy oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Akhtyrka, Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Okhtyrka, Sumy oblast', Ukraine

Akhtyrka is located about 70 kilometers (44 miles) south of Sumy. Records from the 1939 census reveal that 277 Jews lived in Akhtyrka (almost 1 percent of the town's population). The town was occupied by German troops on October 14, 1941, about 16 weeks after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. Before the arrival of German troops, about 90 percent of the local Jews managed to escape to the east. There were many Jewish men who were recruited into the Red Army, while others joined voluntarily.

During the entire period of the German occupation of Akhtyrka, from October 1941 to September 1943, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was responsible for the administration of the town. The German military authorities established a local government and also an auxiliary police force recruited from the local Ukrainian population.

A short time after the German occupation of the town, the German military authorities issued an order that the Jews had to register and wear armbands on their sleeves. In addition, they were forced to conduct various kinds of physically demanding work. In November 1941, Feldkommandantur 198 counted 29 Jews in Akhtyrka.¹ In December 1941, all the Jews of the town were "gathered at one place," which meant that they were resettled into a form of ghetto. During December three Jewish women died.² Between the end of January and the beginning of February 1942, all the Jews of the ghetto were murdered in a series of shooting Aktions.

SOURCES Documentation regarding the destruction of the Jews in Akhtyrka can be found in the following archives: DASO; GARF (7021-74-487); and NARA.

ALUSHTA

Pre-1941: Alushta, town and raion center in the Crimean ASSR, RSFSR; 1941–1944: Alushta, (in 1941–1942) Rear Area, 11th Army; post-1991: Autonomous Republic of Crimea, Ukraine

Alushta is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) southeast of Simferopol' on the coast of the Black Sea. According to the 1939 census, there were 251 Jews living in Alushta, comprising 2.6 percent of the town's total population. Another 277 Jews lived in the settlements of the Alushta raion, comprising about 1 percent of the raion's total population, excluding the town of Alushta itself.¹

Units of the German 11th Army occupied the town on November 2, 1941, four and a half months after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this interim period, according to a report compiled by the statistical office of the town authority of Simferopol' in February 1942, 120 Jews managed to evacuate eastward,² while men eligible for military service were inducted into the Red Army. Around 100 Jews remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

Throughout the period of occupation—from November 1941 to April 1944—a German military administration was in charge of the area around Alushta. The German occupying forces operating in the town included a detachment of Sonderkommando 11b, subordinated to Einsatzgruppe D. This detachment was sent to the town immediately following its occupation and was active there until the summer of 1942; it was primarily this detachment that conducted the mass shootings of Jews. Its commander, until February 1942, was SS-Obersturmführer Hans Stamm, who simultaneously performed the duties of town commandant. Stamm consulted almost daily with the local mayor and the "militia" recruited from local Tartars.

Soon after the occupation of Alushta, the German commandant ordered the town authority to organize the registration and marking of the Jews, who were required to wear white armbands bearing a yellow six-pointed star. Then the Jews were gathered together in a single building, which was sealed from the outside and guarded by a Tatar militia; Gypsies were also placed in this building along with the Jews.³ This building served as a prison-style ghetto.

On November 24, 1941, units subordinated to Einsatzgruppe D conducted the first Aktion against the Jews of Alushta. On that day, in retribution for a partisan attack on a German column of vehicles (three Germans were killed, and six were wounded), 32 Communists and 30 Jewish men from the village of Bium-Lambat and from Alushta were shot.⁴

In early December 1941, German security forces conducted a second Aktion in Alushta, in which all the Jews and Gypsies were shot in a ravine in the park of Sanatorium no. 7.⁵ At the beginning of January 1942, Einsatzgruppe D reported that Alushta and the area around it had been rendered judenrein (cleansed of Jews).⁶

ARTEMOVSK

Pre-1941: Artemovsk (until 1924 known as Bakhmut), city, Stalino oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Artemovsk, Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Artemovsk, Donetsk oblast', Ukraine

Artemovsk is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) north of Donetsk. The 1939 census reported 5,299 Jews in the city (9.56 percent of the total population).

Troops of the German 17th Army occupied the city on October 31, 1941, more than four months after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. The majority of the Jews were able to evacuate to the east. However, approximately one quarter of the pre-war Jewish population remained under German occupation.

From the start of the occupation until its end in September 1943, a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the city. The German military authorities set up a city administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force, which took an active part in the persecution and murder of the Jews. The man appointed to be in charge of the city administration was Golovnya, a former German-language teacher.

Sonderkommando 4b, a detachment of Einsatzgruppe C, was stationed in the city from mid-November 1941 until the summer of 1942. SS-Untersturmführer Hans-Joachim Sommerfeld was its commander.¹ It was this unit in particular that organized the murder of the remaining Jews in Artemovsk.

On November 18, 1941, the Ortskommandantur ordered all Jews to be registered and to wear “a white armband three fingers wide” on their right sleeves. The Jewish population was also conscripted to perform different forms of heavy labor.²

In the middle of December 1941, Sonderkommando 4b planned to carry out a “cleansing Aktion” in Artemovsk. However, this operation was halted on orders from the chief of staff of the 17th Army, “to await clarification from the front.”³ When the go-ahead was finally given, the Sonderkommando made preparations to murder all the Jews of Artemovsk.

On January 7, 1942, the newspaper Bakhmuts'kii vestnik (Bakhmut Herald) published an article titled “The Treatment of the Jews in the City of Bakhmut” in which the Jews were ordered to assemble “in the park where the former NKVD railway was located” with “the aim of [establishing their] isolated accommodation.” Every Jew could bring along up to 10 kilograms (22 pounds) of luggage and food supplies for eight days.⁴ Upon their arrival at the meeting point, the Jews were then resettled into the cellars of the city's administrative headquarters, where they remained until the middle of February 1942.⁵ From these cellars they were taken on February 15, 1942,⁶ to a deserted alabaster quarry where members of Sonderkommando 4b shot them. There were 1,224 Jewish victims of this Aktion.⁷

On January 12, 1973, in the criminal case against former members of Sonderkommando 4b for their participation in the murder of the Jews in Artemovsk, the court in Düsseldorf declared:

At a later point during their visit to Artemovsk, the defendant [Fritz] Braune—who was then commander of Sonderkommando 4b—informed the defendant Sommerfeld—who was then in the city with the detachment—about the order of the former commander for murdering all the Jews in Artemovsk, and at the same time delivering instructions to put together lists of all the Jews living there for the sake of their future liquidation. The defendant Sommerfeld then ordered the local police to put together the lists. After that was done, the defendant Sommerfeld took the results to the defendant Braune. A few days later, the defendant Braune again came to Artemovsk, where he supervised the rounding up of all the Jews and preparations for their mass execution. Both of the defendants consulted with an officer from the intelligence section who was on the staff of the XLIV Army Corps, which was then functioning as part of the German 17th Army. Together they inspected the situation in the city and selected a site for the execution, in the quarry of a former alabaster production facility.

The rounding-up of the Jews went on for one or two days, and was carried out by the local police. The Jews were taken into a large building in the city, and placed under guard. Altogether there were at least 300 Jewish men, women, and children. The cleansing Aktion was carried out sometime between the end of January and early February 1942. On an unspecified day, the defendant Braune, his deputy at the time, Thiemann, and some of the members of the Sonderkommando came to Artemovsk to take part in the operation. At night the victims were taken in large trucks . . . to the alabaster mining area. . . . Upon their arrival, the trucks headed off about 80 to 100 meters [262 to 328 feet] and into the mining gallery [shtol'nia]. There the victims had to lie down in groups in the large cavern, which had been carved out of the stone. The cavern was located 30 or 40 meters [about 98 to 131 feet] from the parking lot, next to the mining gallery. Near the entrance door to the cavern from the mining gallery, there was an entrance in the rock, which measured less in length and width than the doors. Floodlights were set up in the car parking area and in the cavern where the shootings would take place. After the victims entered the cavern, the members of the Sonderkommando unit killed them with shots to the back of the head. . . . The shooting went on for a few hours, and when it was over, the entrance to the cavern was sealed from the outside.⁸

Despite the threat of being killed, some local residents hid Jews in their own homes. For around 19 months, the family of Dr. D.V. Plygunovaia hid a Jewish girl. Sofia Skibina and Ksenya Chistiakova, the residents of the house at 8 Tsiolkovskaia Street, gave shelter to a young Jewish boy, Tolia Wainshtein. A doctor named Ionov handed out passports of dead ethnic Russians to the Jews. A doctor named Balashova gave false testimony about some deaths in order to save the lives of the captured Jews. Aleksandra Smirennomudrenskaia and her son Nikolai hid a 12-year-old girl named Pana Olykus, but they were caught and murdered together.⁹

BELOPOL'E

Pre-1941: Belopol'e, town and raion center, Sumy oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Belopolje, Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgruppe Süd); post-1991: Bilopillia, Sumy oblast', Ukraine

Belopol'e is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) northwest of Sumy. According to the 1939 census, there were 125 Jews living in Belopol'e (about 0.72 percent of the town's population).¹ In the 1930s, the town was located close to a railway junction and had an electricity-generating plant and a tractor station. Local industries included machine construction and metalworking factories, a flour mill, and a sugar plant.

The town was occupied by German troops of Army Group South on October 7, 1941, about four months after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. Before the arrival of German troops, a number of local Jews managed to escape to the east, and some Jewish men were recruited into the Red Army. During the entire period of the German occupation of Belopol'e, between October 1941 and September 1943, a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) was in control of the town.

In the fall or winter of 1941, German authorities sent the remaining Jews they could find in Belopol'e to work cutting peat. Subsequently these people were transferred to Konotop, where they were shot by members of the 1st SS-Infantry Brigade or other German occupation forces.²

According to a report by Feldkommandantur (V) 200, based in Konotop, dated June 1942:

The Jewish question in this area was taken care of in the months of October and November 1941 by the 1st SS-Infantry Brigade, which was deployed here. In May 1942, a further 24 Jews were discovered in the town of Bilopillia [Belopol'e], whose housing in mass accommodations and their subsequent sending away to forced labor was authorized.³

In the view of historian Ilya Altman, the concentration of these 24 Jews in an unguarded building and their subjection to forced labor there prior to redeployment for forced labor elsewhere can be viewed as a form of “open ghetto.”⁴

Bogodukhov is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) west-northwest of Khar’kov. In 1920, the Jewish population was 288, and by 1939, it had declined to 136.

German armed forces of the 6th Army occupied the town in mid-October 1941. Soon after this date, all the Jews remaining in Bogodukhov were rounded up and forced to live together in one building, creating a de facto ghetto. The Jews suffered from starvation and only received 40 grams (1.4 ounces) of bread per day. They were obliged to wear armbands, and those Jews fit for work were taken to perform forced labor.

On June 23, 1942, the Germans escorted the remaining Jews (34 or 35 people) into a nearby forest and shot them. Among those killed were a number of children.¹

BORZNA

Pre-1941: Borzna, town and raion center, Chernigov oblast’, Ukraine; 1941–1943: Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgruppe Süd); 1943: Chernigov oblast’; post-1991: Chernihiv oblast’, Ukraine

Borzna is located 85 kilometers (53 miles) southeast of Chernigov. In 1939, a total of 326 Jews were registered in the town (3.1 percent of the total population).

On September 11, 1941, about 10 weeks after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union, German troops occupied Borzna. By this date, two thirds of the Jewish population had escaped to the east. All the available men of military age were drafted into or voluntarily joined the Red Army. Only about one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town.

During the entire period of German occupation between September 11, 1941, and September 8, 1943, the local German military commandant (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town of Borzna. The German military administration established a local administration for the Borzna Rayon and an auxiliary police force recruited from local inhabitants.

A short time after the occupation of the town, the German military commandant responsible for the Borzna Rayon ordered the registration of the Jews. They were also obliged to wear distinguishing marks in the form of armbands on their sleeves. In addition, the Jewish population was forced to carry out hard physical work of various kinds. In November 1941, all the Jews of the town were settled into a “Jewish residential area” or open ghetto. The ghetto area consisted of one street. In February 1942, German forces liquidated the ghetto and shot its residents. The shooting Aktion was carried out close to the village of Shapovalovka, and all the Jews of the ghetto, a total of 108 persons, were murdered there.¹ Throughout the entire German occupation of Borzna, according to Soviet sources, altogether 126 civilians were murdered.² Therefore, the Jewish population formed 85.7 percent of the civilian victims in the town.

Dmitrovka is located about 7 kilometers (4 miles) northwest of Bogodukhov. German armed forces of the 6th Army occupied the village on October 16, 1941. Soon after this date, over the course of three or four days, all the Jews remaining in Dmitrovka and the surrounding villages were rounded up and placed in one of the barns of a kolkhoz. This barn actually served as a temporary ghetto for the Jews. Jews deemed fit for work were used each day to perform road construction work. After a few days, the girls were raped by groups of soldiers, and all the Jews, at least 40 people, were shot.

DZHANKOI

Pre-1941: Dzhankoi, town and raion center, Crimean ASSR, RSFSR; 1941–1944: Dsbankoj, administered initially by the Rear Area, German 11th Army; post-1991: Dzhankoi, Autonomous Republic of Crimea, Ukraine

Dzhankoi is located about 90 kilometers (56 miles) northeast of Simferopol'. According to the census of January 1939, there were 1,397 Jews living in Dzhankoi and 2,610 in the entire Dzhankoi raion.

German troops occupied the town on October 31, 1941. Ortskommandantur II/939 administered the town. It was headed by Hauptmann Weigand, who was subordinated to Generalleutnant Döhla, the commanding officer of the Rear Area of the German 11th Army (Korück 553).

At the beginning of January 1942, a subunit of Sonderkommando 10b arrived in Dzhankoi from Kerch'. The unit, which remained in the town until August 1942, was commanded by SS-Obersturmführer Siegfried Schuchart.

In September 1942 a Security Police post was established in Dzhankoi. It was subordinated to the commanding officer of the Security Police and SD in Simferopol'. A Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer (Gendarmerieleutnant Fitzke) based in the town was in charge of four Gendarmerie posts.

Since the town was occupied four months after the start of the war, most Jews managed to evacuate. The Germans found only 44 Jews there on their arrival. The Ortskommandantur ordered the mayor to place them in a ghetto on November 7, 1941.¹ The first Jewish Aktion was carried out in early December 1941, when 15 Jewish men were shot in District 21 by the Gendarmerie during the course of some house searches.²

In mid-December 1941, a "concentration camp" was established in the town. Jews both from within the town and the surrounding district were held there. The Jews were used for various work tasks in the town and were guarded by the local militia.³ The camp was located in the attic of a dairy in the center of the town. G. Purevich, who managed to escape with the help of a Ukrainian acquaintance, recalled the conditions in the camp:

The crowding and congestion were intolerable. The children were tormented by hunger and thirst. Every morning we found that several had died. . . . [The Jews] were driven to hard labor—hauling rocks. The guard made sure that each person hauled one rock. Anyone who collapsed from the weight was shot on the spot. . . . When I found myself in the attic and saw what was going on there . . . I almost went mad. . . . In the congestion I met all the Jews who had not been evacuated from Dzhankoi—many Jewish collective farmers from the surrounding countryside and also non-Jews. The non-Jewish peasants were being held here for helping the unfortunate or for giving them food.⁴

According to Purevich, "[E]very day several dozen people were selected from among us and taken to the trench made into a grave." He mentions also that one Jew was appointed by the Germans as responsible for the camp as a form of Jewish elder. However, he soon became very unpopular with the other inmates after denouncing the ghetto's quartermaster, Radchenko, for secretly helping the Jews with extra rations as much as he could.⁵

The Germans decided to liquidate the camp because of the danger of epidemics spreading from it. A report by the 1c Department of the 11th Army staff dated January 1, 1942, for the period December 16–31, 1941, describes the liquidation as follows:

One particular incident, the creation of the "Jewish concentration camp" in Dzhankoi, led to repeated negotiations between the SD, the 1c/AO, the Field Gendarmerie, and ourselves. According to a report by the Ortskommandant of Dzhankoi, hunger is rampant in the camp and there is a danger of an epidemic, so that the “cleansing” had to be carried out immediately. The SD refused to carry out the Aktion because it did not have enough men, and it demanded that Field Gendarmes undertake it. Field Gendarmes should in principle not be involved in such Aktionen. Only after we stated that we were prepared to make available the Field Gendarmes to cordon off the camp did the SD chief issue orders to carry out the Aktion, which would presumably be done on January 2, 1942.⁶

An SD unit from the Gruppenstab in Simferopol’ carried out a “Jewish Aktion” on December 30, 1941: 443 Jews were shot in a hilly area near the road to Simferopol’.⁷ The passage quoted above suggests there may have been a second Aktion, shortly after that on December 30, but witnesses who refer to two Aktionen may also be referring either to smaller killings carried out beforehand or to others later.⁸ In early January 1942, Ortskommandantur II/939 sent back to Berlin a number of items of property confiscated from Jews who had been arrested and placed into the “Jewish camp” in Dzhankoi between December 5, 1941, and January 3, 1942, by the Field Gendarmerie.⁹

Subsequently the local military commandants from time to time arrested additional Jews who had gone into hiding and handed them over for execution by the SD. In late February 1942, the Ortskommandantur handed over to the SD “the Jew Alterman, who had escaped from the Jewish camp here.”¹⁰ Six Jews were handed over to the SD in Dzhankoi in April, and two more were handed over “for execution” in June 1942.¹¹

GORODNIA

Pre-1941: Gorodnia, town and raion center, Chernigov oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Chernibiv oblast’, Ukraine

Gorodnia is located 146 kilometers (91 miles) east-northeast of Kiev. According to the 1926 census, there were 1,359 Jews residing in Gorodnia and 1,427 Jews in the entire Gorodnia raion. According to the 1939 census, 731 Jews resided in the town (comprising 10.33 percent of the total population).¹ The decrease in the Jewish population between these two dates was most probably due to the migration of Jews to other regions and also the effects of the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933.

The German Army occupied the town on August 28, 1941, almost nine weeks after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. During this time the majority of Jews were either evacuated or fled to the east, while many of the men were conscripted into or volunteered to join the Red Army. Those remaining behind at the start of the German occupation represented only about 15 percent of the pre-war Jewish population (about 100 people).

During the entire period of German occupation (from August 28, 1941, to September 24, 1943), the town was administered by the German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur). The German military authorities established a local administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from local inhabitants.

Soon after the occupation of the town, the German military commandant ordered the registration of the Jews and compelled them to wear distinctive markings (an armband). The Jews were also forced to perform all kinds of heavy labor tasks.

According to an Einsatzgruppen report, in the second half of September 1941, the town was combed by units of Sonderkommando 7b, which shot a “leading Bolshevik, as well as 21 thieving Jewish terrorists.”² Probably in November 1941, all those Jews who remained in the town were relocated to a special “Jewish residential district” established for them (an “open ghetto”), consisting of one street. On December 20, 1941, this ghetto was liquidated when the German forces shot almost all the Jews (82 people). The life of 1 Jew was temporarily spared until October 24, 1942, when he was also shot.³ In total, 289 citizens were murdered in Gorodnia during the German occupation.⁴

KHAR'KOV

Pre-1941: Khar’kov, city and oblast’ capital, Ukrainian SSR (of which it was also the capital from 1919 to 1934); 1941–1943: Charkow, Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Khar’kiv, Ukraine

Khar’kov is located 478 kilometers (299 miles) east-northeast of Kiev. In January 1939, there were 130,250 Jews in Khar’kov, comprising 15.64 percent of the city’s population.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied Khar’kov on October 24, 1941. Anticipating that acts of sabotage and diversion would occur in the city, on October 17, 1941, the 6th Army ordered: “Jews and Bolsheviks should be taken first for collective reprisals. Saboteurs and persons offering armed resistance would be hanged in public.” To force the population to report mined buildings, hostages were to be held in them, again preferably Jews.¹ In compliance with this order, the 57th Infantry Division (commanded by Generalmajor Anton Dostler) had by the end of October shot three civilian political commissars and publicly hanged seven saboteurs, one of them a woman.² At a conference on November 4 at Field Command (Feldkommandantur) 787 (commanding officer Colonel Laudenschmidt), which was in charge of the city, it was stated: “The cleansing operation continues, but the work is difficult because unlike other cities no material and no lists have been found in Khar’kov. . . . Jews, who are often left behind as messengers, arouse the greatest suspicion. Since most of the Jews are still hiding, an Aktion against the Jews is anticipated only after some time. First of all, an order to the ‘chief rabbi’ of the Jews here to ‘secure’ Jewish property by turning in all cash and foreign currency.”³ A series of explosions in the city on November 14 resulted in further reprisals. Among those killed by the blasts were Generalleutnant Georg Braun, the commanding officer of the 68th Infantry Division, and his chief of staff. As a punitive Aktion, 200 “Communists” were immediately shot or hanged and 1,000 hostages arrested.⁴

The municipal administration, headed by Oleksii I. Kramarenko, was actively involved in both the terror and the anti-Jewish measures taken in the city at this time. In its first announcement (prior to November 3, 1941) the municipal administration ordered “the Jewish population of the city” to elect a committee by November 5. The committee was then to appear at the municipal administration for confirmation. Seventy-one-year-old Efim Gurevich, a doctor of medicine and a professor, was elected head of the Jewish community.⁵

Kramarenko responded to the events of November 14 by ordering the mayor of the fifth district, A.P. Orobchenko, to assemble in the district office “no less than 50 Communists and Jews (more is permitted).”⁶ The mayors of the other 18 districts probably received similar orders that same day. The “Communists and Jews” who were assembled with the assistance of German soldiers were held as hostages at the Hotel International. On November 22, the “presidium” of the municipal administration deliberated on “the Jewish question.” The resolution on this point read: “Jews have no right at all to work in state or public institutions. Except for the head of the community, Jews are not to be admitted to the administration offices. Jews must wear armbands on their sleeves. All Jews are to be resettled into one district. The attention of the German command should be drawn to the desire of the population to take measures against the Jews.”⁷ On December 5, the municipal administration passed a resolution to start registering the city’s population on December 6. Jews were to be registered on separate lists. The total number of registered Jews came to 10,271: 1,959 children under the age of 16 (960 boys and 999 girls) and 8,312 people over the age of 16 (2,907 men and 5,405 women).⁸

The main contingent of Sonderkommando 4a, commanded by Standartenführer Paul Blobel, arrived in Khar’kov in mid-November 1941. Blobel began the “final solution of the Jewish question” in the city by concentrating the Jews in one place. According to the report of Einsatzgruppe C:

An area was chosen, where the Jews could be housed in the barracks of a factory district. Then, on Mug shot of Paul Blobel, commanding officer of Sonderkommando 4a and later Sonderkommando 1005, taken during the Einsatzgruppen Trial, 1947.

December 14, 1941, the city commandant issued a summons in which the Jews of Khar'kov were told to move to the area by December 16, 1941. The evacuation of the Jews went off without a hitch except for some robberies during the march of the Jews in the direction of their new quarters. Almost without exception, only Ukrainians participated in these robberies. So far, no report is available on the number of Jews who were arrested during the evacuation. At the same time, preparation for the shooting of the Jews is under way. 305 Jews who spread rumors against the German Army were shot immediately.⁹

The text of the summons mentioned above was approximately as follows: "The entire Jewish population of the city of Khar'kov is to report to the machine-tool factory for work and residence. Precious objects and money are to be surrendered. Anyone found in the city after 4:00 P.M. on December 16 will be shot."¹⁰ Dr. L.P. Nikolayev observed the transfer of the Jews: "I saw how they went down Pushkin Street and gathered in groups in front of the 'Hotel Krasnaia.' It was a very sad sight. They were thin and pale, dressed in ragged clothes with suitcases, baskets, and packages. They wanted to make a deal with the cart-drivers, but the latter demanded outrageous prices from them."¹¹

The "barracks of a factory district" were the barracks of a machine-tool factory in the city's tenth district.¹² There were 26 barracks, and in early December 1941, 861 people were still living in them (each barracks had between 3 and 71 inhabitants). On December 12 and 13, all these people were resettled to make room for the Jewish population.¹³

The following table, compiled from the documents of the municipal administration, shows the number of Jews resettled to the tenth district on December 15–16, 1941.

In September 1943 a report prepared by the municipal commission for the investigation of Nazi crimes in Khar'kov described the conditions in the "Jewish district" or "ghetto" as follows:

The doors and windows in the barracks to which the Jewish population was herded were broken, and the plumbing and heating were ruined. Hundreds of people were settled in barracks intended for 60 to 70 people. In the ghetto they had established, the Germans starved people and prevented them from going out to get water and food. At night people were prevented from going outside even for the needs of nature. Anyone spotted violating the established regime was immediately shot. Many people became sick and died. The corpses of the dead remained in the barracks. Taking them outside was not permitted. . . . Every day the Germans made new demands to deliver warm clothing, watches, and other valuable objects. If these demands were not met because the objects were not available, "soldiers" [probably German police, ed.] took several dozen people away from the barracks and shot them.¹⁴

This description is largely corroborated by contemporary German documentation. A report from Police Battalion 314 indicates: "from December 17, 1941, to January 7, 1942, the companies took it in turn to guard the ghetto. During the guard duty of the First Company, Jews trying to leave the ghetto who did not stop when called were shot by the ghetto guards."¹⁵

The account of Maria M. Sokol, who managed to escape from the barracks just before the final liquidation, gives further details of conditions there. She slept on the floor in the freezing cold, and her hands and feet grew numb. She suffered from hunger but notes that some Germans would let people go to the market or fetch water if they were bribed. But the Germans also shot people at will, killing about 50 people per day prior to the order for the general execution of everyone.

After concentrating the Jews in one spot, Sonderkommando 4a set about exterminating them. But first, on December 24, 1941, about 200 Jewish patients from the psychiatric hospital were murdered, although the pretext given for their removal from the hospital was that they were being transferred to the Jewish community.¹⁶ On December 27, several hundred Jews who had been concentrated at the factory settlement were executed after being told that they were being sent to work in the Poltava oblast'. The total liquidation of the Jews began on January 2, 1942. It lasted several days because Soviet air raids repeatedly interrupted the shootings, which took place in a ravine outside the city (Drobitskii Iar). In all, more than 9,000 people were shot.¹⁷

SS-Obersturmführer Victor Woithon, an officer of Sonderkommando 4a who took part in the shootings, recalled at his trial in Darmstadt in 1967:

It was a horrific picture. Several layers of corpses lay at one end of a trench 60 to 80 meters [about 197 to 262 feet] long. There was movement in the trench. . . . I saw one man who shouted, "Finish me off," and although there was still shooting up ahead, I went down into the trench and finished him off with a pistol. . . . Then I ordered that a carbine be given to me because it has a great penetrating force and with a pistol I could not get to the people who were still alive in the lower layers. Walking on the mountain of corpses, which gave way under foot, was horrible. At this point Blobel ordered me to come out of the trench because there was still shooting. He accused me of being careless. . . . Eight men did the shooting. Others loaded the magazines or sorted the valuable objects.¹⁸

Several hundred sick or elderly Jews who could not get to the new place of residence because of their physical condition did not obey the order to resettle into the tenth district. They were assembled at the synagogue on Meshchanskaia Street where they soon died of cold and hunger.¹⁹ The murder of the Jews of Khar'kov, although clearly racially motivated, should also be seen in the context of the general hunger of the city's civilian population resulting from the requisition of food for the German army. In November 1941, a report by the Corps Intendant (supervisor) of the German LV Army Corps considered evacuating the Russian population due to the threat of widespread starvation.²⁰ More than 500 people died of hunger in January 1942, and by April, more than 2,000 city residents were starving each month.²¹

In addition to the sick and elderly, some Jews were still hiding in the city. To expose them the municipal administration issued Order no. 53, dated January 24, 1942, to all district mayors to establish (until the question of a Ukrainian police was resolved) a special unit consisting of three groups. The first group was charged with exposing "Communists, Bolsheviks, Jews, and others." This group was to check "all suspicious persons and to prepare lists of all Communists, Jews, and Bolsheviks in the district."²² Jews who had been exposed were handed over to the Security Police for execution. According to Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 187 of March 30, 1942, in addition to "193 agitators and seditious elements," 64 Jews were executed.²³

In total, about 12,000 Jews were exterminated in Khar'kov in 1941–1942. Sonderkommando 4a of Einsatzgruppe C was primarily responsible for the extermination of the Jews of Khar'kov. The American military tribunal at Nürnberg sentenced the unit's commanding officer, SS-Standartenführer Paul Blobel, to death in 1948. He was executed in 1951.

Generalmajor Dostler, who at the end of the war had the rank of Infantry General, was sentenced to death by an American military court in Rome on October 12, 1945. In 1947 the Soviet military tribunal in Berlin convicted 15 policemen from the Third Platoon of the Third Company of the Reserve Police Battalion 9. (They were all sentenced to 25 years of imprisonment.) This platoon, which was commanded by Zugwachtmeister Tecklenburg, was most active in killing Jews in Khar'kov. In 1948, former SS-Hauptsturmführer Heinz Hellenbroich, who had served in Sonderkommando 4a from October 1941 until February 1942 and was one of the organizers of the extermination of Khar'kov's Jews, was executed by a French military tribunal.

In 1967, a group of officers and noncommissioned officers from Sonderkommando 4a, some of whom had taken part in executing Jews in Khar'kov (i.e., Victor Woithon and others), was brought to trial in Darmstadt, West Germany.²⁴

The 314th Police Battalion, which arrived in Khar'kov in early December 1941, was also involved in exterminating Jews. A West German investigation of former members of this battalion led to the conviction of two former officers in Traunstein in 1982, but this was for executing Jews in Volhynia in July and August 1941 and in Dnepropetrovsk in October 1941 and not for killing Jews in Khar'kov. Oskar Christ, a former senior officer of this battalion, had faced trial in Wiesbaden in 1968, but for killing his mistress in March 1942 and not for taking part in killing Jews. The court ordered his case closed.²⁵

17. According to a document issued by the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) on September 5, 1943, more than 15,000 Jews were executed. They were buried in two trenches. One contained 8,000 to 10,000 corpses; the other, about 350 meters (1,148 feet) away from the first, contained 5,000 to 6,000. However, the second trench was hardly investigated. The number of corpses in it was estimated by eye. It is entirely possible that it contained the remains either of prisoners of war (military ammunition was found in the trench) or of non-Jewish civilians. In addition, the figure of 15,000 exceeds (by 5,000) the number of registered Jews. It is unlikely that so many Jews could have evaded registration. It should also be kept in mind that some of the registered Jews were killed before January 1942 and that for various reasons still other Jews were not resettled into the factory barracks. Dokumenty obviniaut, pp. 307–312. KOROP

Pre-1941: Korop, village and raion center, Chernigov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: initially controlled by Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Chernihiv oblast', Ukraine

Korop is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) northwest of Kono-top. According to the 1926 census, there were 787 Jews living in Korop itself and 826 in the entire Korop raion. In the 1939 census, 350 Jews were recorded as living in Korop (5.66 percent of the total population).¹ The decrease in the Jewish population by more than half during this period can be accounted for by the resettlement of Jews to other districts and also by the effects of the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933.

German forces occupied Korop on August 28, 1941, that is, some two months after the German invasion of the USSR. During this intervening period, about two thirds of the Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men of military age were conscripted or volunteered for the Red Army. Only about one third of the Jewish population remained behind under German occupation.

During the entire period of the occupation (from August 28, 1941, to September 4, 1943) the village was administered by a German military commandant (Ortskommandantur). The German authorities created a local administration and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force. A man named Shilo was appointed as commander of the Ukrainian police.

Soon after the occupation of the village, the local authorities organized the registration of the Jews in accordance with instructions issued by the German military commandant. The Jews were also marked (compelled to wear a distinguishing armband) and made to perform various kinds of hard labor. Probably in November 1941, all the remaining Jews in the village were resettled into a specially created "Jewish residential district" (open ghetto) consisting of one street. At the beginning of December 1941 the Ukrainian police from Korop under the command of Shilo murdered a number of Jews, probably about 20, in the nearby village of Ponornitsa.² Then on February 9, 1942, the Korop "ghetto" was liquidated when German forces shot the Jews (111 people). The life of 1 Jewish woman (a dentist) was temporarily spared, although she was later shot on November 4, 1942.³

After the shooting of the Jews of Korop in the second week of February 1942, the Ukrainian auxiliary police shot the Jews in the villages of Rayon Korop, especially in the villages of Budenovka, Gorodishche, Obolon'e, and Karyl'skoe; in these villages 10 Jews were killed.⁴ During the occupation a total of 198 local citizens were killed.⁵ Thus, the Jews represented 56.7 percent of all the victims in Rayon Korop.

KRAMATORSK

Pre-1941: Kramatorsk, city, Stalino oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Donetsk oblast', Ukraine

Kramatorsk is located 170 kilometers (106 miles) southeast of Khar'kov. According to the 1926 population census, 136 Jews lived in the city of Kramatorsk, and 141 Jews in the remainder of the Kramatorsk raion.¹ According to the 1939 population census, there were 1,849 Jews living in the city (1.96 percent of the total population).² The rapid increase in the Jewish population from 1926 to 1939 can be explained by the arrival of a number of Jews in the city as it developed into an important manufacturing center during the industrialization of the Soviet Union in the 1930s, becoming the site of two large power plants and several armaments factories.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the city in late October 1941, more than four months after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. As Kramatorsk was a major industrial center, the Soviet authorities evacuated a good part of the working population into the Soviet interior, including a majority of the Jews. Men of an eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Approximately 10 percent of the pre-war Jewish population came under German occupation in Kramatorsk.

During the course of the occupation from October 1941 to September 1943, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the affairs of the city. The German military commandant established a city administration and a Ukrainian auxiliary police force recruited from local inhabitants. The man appointed as mayor was an ethnic German named Schopen. Sonderkommando (Sk) 4b (a mobile detachment of the Security Police [Sipo] subordinated to Einsatzgruppe C) was stationed in the city under the command of SS-Sturmabführer Fritz Braune from November 1941 to March 1942.³

1772 EASTERN UKRAINE AND CRIMEA REGION

Shortly after the occupation of the city, the German military commandant ordered the registration and identification of the Jews, who were forced to perform various kinds of heavy physical labor. According to one source, the Germans established a ghetto in the Melovaia gora area, on the western outskirts of the city. The ghetto was surrounded by barbed wire, and many Jews died from starvation and the horrific sanitary conditions. From there, the Germans took groups of Jews to the nearby quarry and shot them.⁴ Other sources, however, indicate that non-Jewish civilians (suspected Communists) and Soviet prisoners of war may have been interned in the same camp and suffered the same fate as the Jews, either at the same time or subsequently.⁵

On January 25–26, 1942, Sk 4b, assisted by the local Ukrainian police, carried out a mass killing Aktion. All the remaining Jews were shot, along with a number of Communist activists, in a ravine in the Melovaia gora area.⁶ According to an Einsatzgruppen report, Sk 4b shot 139 Jews at that time, probably reflecting the number of Jews murdered in Kramatorsk. More than 700 non-Jews also were murdered by Sk 4b around this time.⁷

German soldier Kurt Rogel, who was based in Kramatorsk in early 1942, observed a camp consisting of six or seven wooden barracks, which was surrounded by a wire fence and contained about 400 civilian prisoners (men, women, and children). The camp was guarded by Gendarmes (probably Feldgendarmarie). One day the SD arrived, took out all the prisoners in groups of 20, and shot them in a nearby gravel pit. Rogel was surprised that the prisoners spoke “German” among themselves but could not say if all the victims were Jews.⁸ A few remaining Jews were still being tracked down and shot by the Feldgendarmarie in the vicinity of Kramatorsk in the spring of 1942.⁹

7. BA-BL, R 58/220, Ereignismeldung UdSSR no. 173, February 25, 1942, states that SK 4b “shot 861 persons from January 14 to February 12, 1942, according to the regulations of military law. Among those killed were 649 political functionaries, 52 saboteurs and partisans, and 139 Jews.” Since SK 4b was at that time located in Kramatorsk, one may surmise that the 139 Jews were shot there. According to the materials of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), more than 600 Jewish families, or 2,000 persons, were shot. See the document of January 26, 1944, in GARF, 7021-72-21, pp. 72, 74, 78, 81, 84. This figure, however, seems too high. A second source makes mention of 72 Jewish families; see I. PRILUKI

Pre-1941: Priluki, city and raion center, Chernigov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: controlled by Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd), from summer 1942, center of Gebiet Priluki, Generalkommissariat Tschernigow, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Chernihiv oblast', Ukraine

Priluki is located 128 kilometers (80 miles) east-northeast of Kiev. According to the 1939 census, 6,140 Jews resided in Priluki (16.5 percent of the total population).¹ After Germany attacked the USSR on June 22, 1941, especially in August and September 1941, a majority of the Jews in the city evacuated to the east, and many men were inducted into the Red Army. Probably no more than about one fifth of the Jewish population remained in the city at the start of the occupation.

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the city on September 18, 1941. Ortskommandantur I/317 soon assumed responsibility for administering the city and its surrounding area. It established a municipal government and a Ukrainian local police, which became the executive bodies of the Ortskommandantur.

In the fall of 1941, a section of the Secret Field Police (GFP-Gruppe 730) was stationed in Priluki, which relocated to Iagotin in late December 1941, leaving behind a squad in Priluki. In early February 1942, this unit was recalled and replaced by a unit from GFP-Gruppe 721. Due to the absence of any SD or other German police forces in Priluki at that time, the GFP basically oversaw all police duties in the city.

Soon after the city was occupied, the Ortskommandantur ordered all the Jews to register and wear a white armband with a yellow Star of David. Jews were forbidden to go to the market in the city center or to the cinema. They were deprived of their means of making a living and forbidden even to talk with their non-Jewish neighbors. Jewish men were compelled to perform forced labor: repairing highways, clearing up factory ruins, digging trenches for communication cables, and recovering unexploded bombs from the river.

On January 1, 1942, Ukrainian police began to drive the entire Jewish population into a ghetto on orders of the Ortskommandantur. The ghetto was created near the market, in two buildings that had housed Jewish and Ukrainian schools before the war; the buildings were surrounded by barbed wire. A Jewish Council (composed of “headmen”) was formed, and its members were responsible for maintaining order in the ghetto. The Germans posted the ghetto regulations on billboards in the schoolyards. In order to acquire food, the Jews secretly dug tunnels under the barrier and would slip unnoticed into the city. When the ghetto guard was strengthened, the ghetto residents began to send out their children, especially teenagers, who were able to traverse the barbed wire, get into the city, and bring food back into the ghetto, thereby saving the ghetto residents from starvation. When possible, some non-Jews also provided supplies to friends residing in the ghetto.²

According to the report of Feldkommandantur 197 in Nezhin on February 15, 1942, to which the Priluki Ortskommandantur was subordinate, there were 1,178 Jews in the city; the same account stated that the GFP had shot several Jews in Priluki.³ The report of the same Feldkommandantur on April 20, 1942, stated that there were 1,210 Jews in the jurisdiction of the Feldkommandantur, and most were in Priluki.⁴

On May 20, 1942, German forces organized the liquidation of the Priluki ghetto. The Jews were marched out of the city to the east in a large column four persons abreast, escorted by policemen and other armed guards. They were then shot in a ravine behind the prison.⁵ Altogether some 1,290 Jews were shot on this day.⁶ This number includes both the Jews that had resided in the ghetto and Jews from the surrounding towns and villages, driven to Priluki on that day. Thus, together with the Jews from Priluki, 15 Jews (one man, seven women, and seven children) from Ladan were shot.⁷ The shootings were carried out by the SD-Sonderkommando Plath (commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Karl Julius Plath) with the assistance of the Ukrainian police and the German Feldgendarmarie.

SOURCES Documents regarding the annihilation of the Jews of Priluki can be found in the following archives: BA-MA (RH 22/204); DACgO (3103-1-101); GARF (7021-78-37); NARA (T-501, reel 33); and TsDAVO (3676-4-317). SEMENOVKA

Pre-1941: Semenovka, town and raion center, Chernigov oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Semenowka, Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Semenivka, Chernihiv oblast', Ukraine

Semonovka is located 240 kilometers (149 miles) north-northeast of Kiev. According to the December 16, 1926, census, 852 Jews lived in the town of Semenovka, and a total of 1,049 Jews lived in what was then the Semenovka raion. According to the 1939 census, 402 Jews (5.39 percent of the total population) lived in Semenovka.¹ The decrease in the Jewish population was mainly the result of Jews moving to other districts, as well as the Holodomor famine of 1932–1933.

German forces of Army Group South occupied Semenovka on August 25, 1941, two months after Germany's attack on the USSR on June 22. During this period, a considerable number of Jews managed to evacuate to the east, and all men eligible for the draft were either drafted or had voluntarily joined the Soviet Armed Forces. Only about 14 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

During the entire German occupation (from August 25, 1941, to September 22, 1943), the town was ruled by the German military commandant located in Novgorod-Severskii. The German military authorities established a local Rayon administration and an auxiliary Ukrainian police force recruited from the local population.

Soon after the German occupation of the town, the German military commandant ordered the registration and public identification of the Jews (they were required to wear an armband on their sleeves), as well as their employment in a variety of onerous forced labor tasks. At the beginning of November 1941, all Jews who remained in town were moved into a specially created “Jewish residential district” (open ghetto) that occupied one designated street. On November 30, 1941, this open ghetto was liquidated. In the course of the liquidation Aktion, the Jews were first gathered in the school basement. The next day, German forces shot them in the birch woods nearby. A total of 55 people were shot.² The shooting was carried out by a section of the 10th Motorized Infantry Battalion of the 1st Waffen-SS Motorized Infantry Brigade. During the entire period of the occupation, the total number of civilians killed in Semenovka was 66.³ Therefore, the Jewish victims comprised over 83 percent of the town’s total losses.

SOURCES Documents on the persecution and extermination of the town’s Jewish population can be found in the following archives: DACgO and GARF (7021-78-37).

SHCHORS

Pre-1941: Shchors (Snovsk prior to 1935), town and raion center, Chernigov oblast’, Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Schtschors, initially controlled by Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd), then from summer 1942 center of Gebiet Schtschors, Generalkommissariat Tschernigow, Reichskommissariat Ukraine; post-1991: Shchors, Chernihiv oblast’, Ukraine

Shchors is located 107 kilometers (66 miles) west-northwest of Konotop. According to the census conducted on December 16, 1926, 2,416 Jews lived in Shchors. Altogether 2,447 Jews resided in the former raion surrounding the town.¹ However, at the time of the 1939 census, only 1,402 Jews still lived in Shchors, comprising 16.3 percent of the town’s total population.² The decrease in the number of Jews by more than 1,000 people between 1926 and 1939 occurred for several reasons: part of the Jewish population moved away to settle in other areas, and others were hit by the Holodomor famine that affected the country in the years 1932–1933.

German troops had occupied the town of Shchors by September 3, 1941, about two and a half months after their surprise attack on the Soviet Union. By the time the German army reached the town, more than half of the local Jewish population had managed to escape to the east. All the available men suitable for military service were drafted into the Red Army or joined it voluntarily. When German occupation forces entered Shchors, only about 40–45 percent of the pre-war Jewish population still resided there.

From the start of the German occupation in early September 1941, a German military commandant was in charge of the town. The military commandant established a local administration and a Ukrainian auxiliary police unit, which was recruited from the local inhabitants. From the summer of 1942, Shchors became part of the German civil administration for the Generalkommissariat Tschernigow as the center of its own district (Gebiet). Referent Buchmeier was nominated as the Gebietskommissar in Shchors.³ Before the German retreat in September 1943, authority was transferred back to the military authorities as the front line approached.

A short time after the arrival of German troops, the military commandant instructed the local administration to register the Jewish population. The military administration also ordered the Jews to wear a visible patch on their clothes. In addition, the Jews were compelled to perform hard physical labor. All the Jews still residing in the town were settled into a special “Jewish residential district,” or open ghetto. Proreznaiia Street was one of the main streets of the ghetto area.⁴

On November 9, 1941, German security forces conducted an Aktion against the Jews in Shchors. On the pretext of transporting the victims to another place of work, about 50 Jewish men were gathered, escorted into the forest close to town, and shot there.⁵ In January 1942, a second, larger Aktion was carried out in Shchors. This was the final liquidation of the ghetto. At the beginning of this Aktion, the victims were transferred to a large building that was the former dormitory of the technical school. After three days, the German forces shot approximately 80 elderly and young people in the forest just outside Shchors. Then, at night, the remaining women and children from the ghetto (probably 500 people altogether) were escorted in carts to Chernigov, where they were shot immediately upon arrival.⁶ On September 20, 1942, a few dozen Jews from the surrounding villages were brought to Shchors and shot there.⁷

STALINO (DONETSK)

Pre-1941: Stalino (Iuzovka before 1924), city and capital, Stalino oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Donets'k oblast' center, Ukraine

Stalino is located 594 kilometers (369 miles) southeast of Kiev. According to the 1939 census, the population of Stalino was 462,395 people, of which 24,991 (5.4 percent) were Jews.

Troops of German Army Group South occupied Stalino on October 20, 1941.¹ The city remained under German military administration until September 1943. At the beginning of December 1941, Feldkommandantur 240 reported: “So far the Jewish problem does not play a major role in Iuzovka. The number of remaining Jews is estimated at around 3,000. As in other places, the wealthy Jews have fled. Measures for the evacuation of the Jews by the SD have so far not been carried out because of the weather conditions.”²

In eastern Ukraine more than 80 percent of the Jewish population was able to escape before the occupation. At the same time, it can be assumed that nearly all the Jewish families that came under German occupation in Stalino were murdered. After the liberation of the Donbass, the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) found, in the Stalino oblast' alone, mass graves containing—according to its estimates—more than 323,000 corpses (about 174,000 civilians and 149,000 Soviet prisoners of war) who had been shot, hanged, or asphyxiated with gas by the Germans or had just died in camps from hunger, freezing, and disease.³ Although the accounts of the ChGK concerning the larger mass graves were often estimates based on volume calculations, and therefore sometimes probably too high, they clearly show the dimensions of the terror exercised by German rule in the region.

Einsatzkommando 6, headed by Robert Mohr from October 1941 until September 1942, and responsible for the murder of Jews, Communists, Gypsies, and other “enemies” in Stalino, was based in the city prior to the establishment of a fixed office of the Kommandeur of the Security Police and SD (KdS) there at the end of June 1942.⁴

At the end of February 1942, Einsatzkommando 6 ordered the city mayor of Stalino, Petushkov, and his deputy Eichmann to establish a Jewish ghetto. The intended location for the ghetto was a settlement named “Belyi Kar'er” (White Pit) at a former quarry on the outskirts of the city. During his interrogations before a Soviet military tribunal in 1946, Eichmann recalled: “At the end of February 1942 . . . Heidelberg [head of the executive department and deputy chief of Einsatzkommando 6] arrived from Berlin at the SD. Together with Graf [head of the intelligence section of Einsatzkommando 6], he came to the city administration to Petushkov and I. During a joint meeting with the police chiefs and the mayors of the city districts it was decided to create a Jewish ghetto at a special place, where the entire Jewish population, including children and old people, would be sent.” The existing inhabitants of Belyi Kar'er were evicted from their cottages within two days. The quarry was surrounded by a barbed-wire fence, and police guards were posted. In March 1942, the police chiefs and the mayors of the city districts were ordered to transfer the Jews into the ghetto. Families had to take their valuables, their best clothes, and food for five or six days. Apartment keys were handed over to the policemen who carried out the resettlement. During the resettlement action, children and the infirm were supported or carried on the arms of others. The policemen drove the Jews before them with whips and rifle butts, accompanied by groaning, screaming, and the weeping of children. Due to the limited number of cottages, part of the population remained under the open sky. All valuables and property were collected and handed over to the SD.⁵

The chiefs of the different police districts and their policemen played a major role in identifying and arresting the Jewish families. The chief of the first police district, Babenko, testified at his postwar trial: “In accordance with an order issued by the SD deputy chief Graf, I had to compose name lists for all of the Jews who lived in my police district. The other police districts received the same order. . . . Then, two days later Graf came to me and demanded the list. He took one copy and left two with me. He ordered that on the same day, after the curfew hour, all Jews had to be evicted from their apartments, informing them that they would be evacuated to the Zaporozh'e region, because of the approaching front line.”⁶ After these evictions, Graf and Eichmann usually inspected the apartments of the Jewish families and took away any remaining property.

Indirectly the establishment of the ghetto was reflected in the local press, which mentioned on March 15, 1942, the approaching resettlement of Stalino's Jews.⁷ There is very little information concerning living conditions in the ghetto in the few testimonies by survivors. According to these accounts, more than 300 families lived in the ghetto. Policemen guarded the ghetto, and the inmates were not allowed to leave.⁸ During daytime the ghetto inmates had to work hard. The survivor B.A. Geker recalled: “When I was in ‘Belyi Kar'er’ every morning policemen came to us, took 10, 20, or 100 people, men and women, with them and drove them to work somewhere. Some of them came back, others disappeared without a trace. When I was in ‘Belyi Kar'er,’ the entire Jewish population lived in destroyed houses without windows and doors or directly on the street. But it was winter and cold. Food was not distributed at all. I was starving, as were the other Soviet citizens. Children and old people died of hunger and nobody took any notice of that.”⁹

The separation and murder of the Jews was largely visible to the local population. The chiefs of the different police districts and their policemen played a major role, and a point was made of ensuring that local policemen were present when Jews were shot. It was the Germans' intention "to break the fascination which Jews had as bearers of political power in the eyes of many Ukrainians." By contrast, mass killings of Ukrainians and Russians were generally carried out by Einsatzkommando 6 in a much more secretive manner.¹⁰

The ghetto in Stalino existed for less than two months. As different witness testimonies confirm, it was liquidated during the night of April 30 to May 1, 1942. The city deputy mayor Eichmann recalled: "At that time the whole Jewish population—more than 3,000 people—were shot or taken away in special gas vans. The dead bodies were thrown into a coal shaft at the Kalinovka mine. Then the cottages were destroyed by the police."¹¹

The Jewish survivor B.A. Geker testified at Eichmann's postwar trial: "On April 30, 1942, around 2:00 A.M., policemen and Germans came to the quarry. They announced that we should all assemble and take with us bread for three days, valuables, and good clothes. They would take us to another place to work. One of the Soviet citizens said that they were going to shoot us now. I told my son that he should run away and tried to hide myself in the gorge. I was lying there for several hours. Then I fled to the Poltava region, pretending to be Polish. Regarding my 28 family members, who were also in the quarry—none of them ever came back. Their fate is unknown."¹²

It appears that Einsatzkommando 6 began the mass killings of Jewish families in Stalino at the beginning of April 1942. Friedrich Zapp, a member of Einsatzkommando 6, testified during his court inquiry in Germany in June 1962:

I witnessed the first executions in Stalino on Easter Monday [April 6]. . . . It was an Aktion using a gas van. Several hundred people were gassed. Men, women, and children were loaded into the van. On that Easter Monday by no means all of them were gassed. I think, that starting from around 7:00 A.M. until 10:30 A.M., when the Aktion was ended for that day, I had to load and unload four vans. . . . They were Jews, without doubt. In such a composition and number they could only be Jews. There were no plunderers and saboteurs in such numbers. And above all the presence of children confirms this conclusion. The Jews had to get into the van with all their clothes on. No selection took place. Men, women, and children had to get on board. I would estimate that each time around 60 people had to climb into the van. . . . It did not look like the Jews knew they would be gassed. After the door was closed, we drove either in front of or behind the gas van to a closed coal shaft. The gas van could not drive close to the shaft. So we had to haul the dead bodies out of the van, drag them to the coal shaft, which was about eight meters away, and throw them into it.¹³

At this closed coal shaft of the "4-4-bis Kalinovka" mine on the outskirts of Stalino, the German Einsatzkommandos frequently carried out mass shootings.¹⁴ After the city's liberation, the ChGK found in this coal shaft one of the largest mass graves of the entire region, holding—according to the ChGK's estimates—up to 75,000 corpses.¹⁵

In December 1967, a trial against Robert Mohr, the commander of Einsatzkommando 6, and other members took place in Wuppertal. Mohr was sentenced to eight years in prison.¹⁶ Other German trials against members of Sonderkommando 4b and members of the office of the KdS in Stalino took place in Düsseldorf and Dortmund in the late 1960s and early 1970s.¹⁷

In Stalino, a Soviet military tribunal convicted the former deputy and later city mayor Eichmann, together with 17 other members of the city administration and local police, in 1946. Eichmann and the head of the police, Babenko, were sentenced to death. The other defendants were sentenced to either 15 or 20 years of forced labor.¹⁸

VOIKOVSHTADT

Pre-1941: Voikovshadt, village, Lenino raion, Crimean ASSR, RSFSR; 1941–1944: Wojkowstadt, Rear Area, 11th Army; 1944: Crimean ASSR; post-1991: Kirove, Autonomous Republic of Crimea, Ukraine

Voikovshadt is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) west of Kerch' on the Kerch' peninsula. The village was founded 10 kilometers (6 miles) south of the regional center of Semu-Kolodezy at the beginning of the 1930s with financial support from the Agro-Joint (a subdivision of the AJDC). According to the 1939 census, about 349 Jews resided in the Lenino raion, most of them in Voikovshadt itself.

The village was occupied by units of the German 11th Army (46th Division of the XLII Army Corps) on November 2, 1941, just over four months after the start of the German invasion. Most of the Jews from this region were able to flee or were evacuated with the retreating Soviet forces. There was an organized evacuation for about 180 people,¹ while a few fled independently or were drafted into or voluntarily joined the Red Army. Fewer than 100 Jews remained in Voikovshadt at the start of the German occupation.

Immediately upon occupying the village, the German authorities registered the population. People had to wear a large, visible Star of David on their clothes, and all their livestock was taken. At the end of November 1941, the Jews were forcibly brought to a building, which was surrounded by barbed wire. It was located on the outskirts of the village and served as a small enclosed ghetto. Every night a roll call was held to ensure that no one was missing. Romanian soldiers guarded the ghetto.²

On December 26, 1941, Soviet forces landed on the Kerch' peninsula, and on December 29, the Red Army liberated the city of Feodosiia. This forced the German Armies to flee Kerch' and the neighboring raions of Lenino and Maiak-Salyn'.

In their hurry to evacuate the Kerch' peninsula, the German forces had no time to destroy the ghetto. The ghetto in Voikovshadt is one of the very few ghettos in the territories of the former Soviet Union in which the majority of inmates survived the German occupation.

When on May 8, 1942, German troops reoccupied the Kerch' peninsula in their counteroffensive, the Jewish villagers were hurriedly evacuated across the Kerch' straits to the Tamanski peninsula in the North Caucasus. The Red Army liberated Voikovshadt again in April 1944.

YALTA

Pre-1941: Yalta, city and raion center, Crimean ASSR, RSFSR; 1941–1944: Jalta, administered initially by the Rear Area, Eleventh Army; post-1991: Yalta, Autonomous Republic of Crimea, Ukraine

Yalta is located 444 kilometers (276 miles) south of Dnepropetrovsk. According to the census of December 1926, of the 28,811 inhabitants of Yalta, 2,392 were Jews, including 39 Crimean Jews (Krymchaky). In the Yalta district, including the towns of Alupka, Gurzuf, and Simeiz, there lived another 213 Jews, 14 of them Crimean Jews. In January 1939, of the 36,653 residents of Yalta, 2,109 were Jews. In addition, 911 more Jews were living in the surrounding Yalta raion.¹

Between the attack of Nazi Germany on the USSR on June 22, 1941, and the German occupation of the area at the beginning of November 1941, 1,120 Jews were evacuated from the city of Yalta in an organized fashion, 140 Jews from the Yalta area countryside, and 430 from the Yalta area towns (Alupka, Simeiz, Koreiz, Miskhor, Gaspra, Livadiia, Massandra, and Gurzuf), accounting for 1,690 Jews in total.² In addition, a number of Jews escaped from the city in late October and early November 1941 in the course of a spontaneous evacuation after German troops broke through the Soviet line of defense across the Perekop isthmus. Furthermore, at least 100 Jews were drafted or volunteered for the Red Army. At the same time, a number of Jewish refugees from Odessa and also other regions of the Crimea arrived in Yalta.

Yalta was occupied by the troops of the German 11th Army on November 8, 1941. The city and nearby districts were administered by Ortskommandantur II/662, with Hauptmann Kump in charge. Nineteen people, including four officers and several bureaucrats, worked in the Kommandantur.³ The Kommandantur reported to the commander of the Rear Area of the 11th Army. The Kommandantur established a local administration in the city (Stadtverwaltung) and a police force recruited from local residents; the city administration dealt mostly with running city services under the supervision of the Kommandantur.

On approximately November 9–10, 1941, part of Sonderkommando 11a, under the command of SS-Hauptsturmführer Eberhard Heinze, arrived in Yalta. The Sonderkommando, under overall command of SS-Sturmbannführer Paul Zapp, was part of Einsatzgruppe D of the German Security Police, at that time commanded by SS-Oberführer Otto Ohlendorf. One of the Sonderkommando's tasks, together with the identification and extermination of Soviet partisans, Communists, members of the underground, and saboteurs, was the extermination of the Jewish population.

Sometime in the middle of November 1941, Sonderkommando 11a created a Jewish Council (Judenrat) in the city that consisted of five or six members, and several days later, the German authorities issued an order for all Jews to wear a six-pointed star 10 centimeters (almost 4 inches) in diameter on the left side of their chests and on their backs and to turn in all their money and valuables to the Jewish Council.⁴

On November 21, 1941, the first anti-Jewish Aktion was conducted in the city: the Feldgendarmarie surrounded house no. 14 on Sredne-Slobodskaia Street, arrested all the Jewish tenants (17 people), presumably for alleged contacts with the partisans, and shot all of them that same day. On November 22, 2 Jews who were only wounded during the shooting returned from the grave site.⁵

A week later, on November 28, 1941, on the order of the Security Police and SD, the Jewish Council conducted a registration of the Jews. The next day, November 29, SS-Hauptsturmführer Heinze ordered the remaining Jews to move into the ghetto by December 5, 1941. The ghetto consisted of the former buildings for adult education courses of the Agricultural College on the outskirts of the city, near the suburb of Massandra, which were surrounded by high stone walls. The Jews were only allowed to enter the city between 8:00 A.M. and 2:00 P.M.; those who had a job were required to work. The Jewish Council was ordered to organize the move of the Jews into the ghetto. The German authorities issued instructions that due to the cramped space (2.5 square meters [27 square feet] per person) Jews were only permitted to take a few of their most valuable possessions with them. The Jewish Council was also required to organize a cooperative, workshops, a hospital, and a police force within the ghetto. The latter consisted of young people who wore white armbands with a blue six-pointed star on the left arm and who controlled the return of the Jews into the ghetto at the gate.⁶

On December 16, 1941, the ghetto was closed, and even the working Jews were not allowed into the city. On December 17, men were taken out of the ghetto to a ravine near the towns of Massandra and Magarach and made to dig two ditches; after completing the job, the German forces shot them. On December 18, the rest of the Jews were driven to the ditches and shot by members of Sonderkommando 11a. Altogether up to 1,500 people were killed during those two days.⁷ On the order of the Security Police and SD, members of the Jewish Council had to help organize the conveying of all the Jews to the killing site. With the aid of a detailed registration list, they put family after family onto the trucks that departed and then returned for more families; the members of the Council checked off on the list those who had been taken away. The last truck took away the members of the Jewish Council.⁸

In the first half of 1942, several more small groups of Jews who had escaped previously from the ghetto and had been hiding were discovered and also shot.

According to the first postwar census in 1959, 1,200 Jews lived in Yalta. On February 26, 1970, the regional court (Landgericht) in Munich sentenced former SS-Obersturmbannführer Paul Zapp, who commanded Sonderkommando 11a in 1941–1942, to life imprisonment. Together with him, former SS-Scharführer and interpreter for Sonderkommando 11a Baron Leo Karl Eugen von der Recke, who took an active part in the shooting of the Yalta Jews, was sentenced to 13 years in prison. The man immediately responsible for organizing the anti-Jewish Aktions of December 17–18, 1941, SS-Hauptsturmführer Heinze, was killed in Poznań on January 22, 1945.

YENAKIEVO

1938–1941: Yenakievo, town, Stalino oblast', Ukrainian SSR; 1941–1943: Jenakjewo, Rear Area, Army Group South (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Süd); post-1991: Yenakievo, Donetsk oblast', Ukraine

Yenakievo is located 240 kilometers (149 miles) east of Dnepropetrovsk. By 1939, there were 3,293 Jews living in the town (3.72 percent of the total population).

Units of the German 6th Army occupied the town on November 1, 1941, more than four months after the initial German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. Most Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Approximately 15 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained at the start of the German occupation.

From November 1, 1941, until the end of the occupation in September 1943, a military commandant's office administered Yenakievo. From the end of November 1941 to August 1942, the occupying authority was Ortskommandantur I/270, which was subordinated to Feldkommandantur 240 in Stalino.¹ The commandant established a local administration and a Ukrainian police force in the town. The Ukrainian policemen actively participated in the persecution and elimination of the Jews.

Shortly after the occupation of Yenakievo, the Ortskommandantur ordered the local administration to register and mark the Jews. The Jews were also forced to perform heavy labor.

In February 1942, the remaining 509 Jews (175 families) in Yenakievo were resettled into a ghetto by an official administrative order. The ghetto consisted of four large barracks in the Krasnyi Gorodok settlement area. The Jews remained confined within the ghetto for around three months. At the end of May or the beginning of June 1942, the Jews were driven out to Gorlovka and shot together in a mine, where their corpses were then covered over. There were 25 Communists who were also taken out to Gorlovka and shot along with the Jews.²

One Jewish woman, Maria Markovna Konvalova (née Ginzburg), escaped from the ghetto on the eve of its liquidation, after being tipped off by non-Jewish friends of the Kvasha family. The ghetto was closely guarded, but dressed only in her underwear she fled at night by swimming across a river. She was met on the other side by Andriy and Petro Kvasha, who gave her clothes, put a cross around her neck, and subsequently helped her to move from village to village to avoid recognition and betrayal.³

The extermination of Jews in Yenakievo was organized by Sonderkommando 4b with the assistance of the Ukrainian police. The headquarters staff of Sonderkommando 4b was located in Gorlovka from March 1942. At that time, it was headed by SS-Sturmabführer Walter Haensch.⁴

After the liquidation of the ghetto, some 30 Jews (10 families) composed of artisan specialists remained in the town. In September 1942, they were also taken out and shot in the mine area near Gorlovka.⁵

SOURCES Documentation concerning the German occupation of Yenakievo and the murder of the town's Jews can be found in the following archives: GARF; NARA; and YVA. A brief mention of the ghetto can also be found in a book by Yakov Suslensky, They Were True Heroes: Citizens of Ukraine, Righteous among the Nations (Kiev: Society "Ukraine," 1995), pp. 141–143.

OCCUPIED RUSSIAN TERRITORY

Pre-1941: RSFSR, Soviet Union; 1941–1944: partly under German occupation, initially Rear Area, Army Groups Center and North (rückwärtige Heeresgebiete Mitte und Nord), then 1942–1943, also Rear Area, Army Group B (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet B) on the southern front and in the northern Caucasus; post-1991: Russian Federation

Between July 1941 and December 1942, the Germans established around 50 ghettos in the occupied territory of the Russian Federation, which probably held some 22,000 Jews. In total, there were somewhere between 70,000 and 120,000 Jewish victims of the Holocaust in the territory of the present-day Russian Federation; therefore, probably around one quarter of the victims were confined within a ghetto prior to being killed.¹

Most of the ghettos established by the Germans in occupied Russian territory were located on the eastern fringe of the former Pale of Settlement (in the former Vitebsk and Chernigov gubernias), to which nearly all Jews in Tsarist Russia were confined up to 1917. The area to the east of the Belorussian cities of Mogilev and Vitebsk, comprising the western part of the Smolensk oblast', was soon occupied by the German Army in July 1941. In this region, the Germans established 20 ghettos, most of them within weeks of their arrival. Einsatzgruppe B, initially under the command of Arthur Nebe,² which was responsible for security operations in the area behind Army Group Center, reported on September 23, 1941, that in all towns visited by the Sonderkommandos and Einsatzkommandos Jewish ghettos had been established, and in larger places, Jewish Councils as well.³ For example, the ghetto in Tartarsk was established in September 1941 by a detachment of Vorkommando Moskau, which coordinated the necessary arrangements with the local mayor and the head of the Russian local police (Ordnungsdienst, OD).

Just to the south of the Smolensk oblast', in the western part of the present-day Bryansk oblast' (in 1939, part of the Orel' oblast'), which the Germans occupied during the course of August 1941, they established another 12 ghettos (including larger ghettos of around 1,000 people or more in Klinty, Starodub, Pochep, and Novozybkov), most in the fall of 1941. Sonderkommando 7b, commanded by SS-Sturmabführer Günther Rausch, based in Klinty from the end of September 1941, was the main unit responsible for establishing ghettos in this region.

German forces also established a number of smaller ghettos from the summer of 1941 in the region between Smolensk and Leningrad, behind Army Groups Center and North, on a more ad hoc basis: 4 in the former Leningrad oblast' and 10 in the former Kalinin oblast'. The Commander of Rear Area, Army Group North issued an order on September 3, 1941, noting that the Army High Command (OKH) had ordered that ghettos could be established in places with a large Jewish population, insofar as time and personnel were available, but that this was not to be seen as a priority.⁴ Nevertheless, some ghettos were established in the area for relatively small populations of Jews (between 30 and 150). The two largest ghettos in the region were in Nevel', holding 640 Jews (established by Einsatzgruppe B), and in Pskov with 232 Jews, under the direction of Sonderkommando 1a (Einsatzgruppe A).

As German forces advanced east again after the start of Operation Typhoon (the planned encirclement of Moscow) on September 30, they established two more ghettos immediately behind the advancing troops in Kaluga (in 1939, in the Tula oblast') and Dmitriev-L'govskii (Kursk oblast') in November 1941. It is interesting to note that only the Sonderkommandos of Einsatzgruppe B followed closely behind the advancing front, while the Einsatzkommandos remained in place, consolidating control over the territory already conquered, with a major focus on the destruction of the Jews.⁵

In some larger Russian cities, however, such as Bryansk, Orel, and Rostov on Don, as well as in many towns, no ghettos were established. Here the remaining Jews were killed in mass shooting Aktions; or in many places, such as Gzhatsk, Mozhaisk, and Iukhnov, the German Einsatzkommandos reported that almost all the Jews had been evacuated or had fled.⁶

In some locations the Jews were confined in an improvised manner for only a few days prior to being murdered. In the town of Mtsensk, Orel oblast', the Germans confined the Jews in an unheated school building for a week without food, before escorting them out of the town to shoot them in January 1942.⁷ In Pushkin, a town about 15 kilometers (9 miles) south of Leningrad, more than 100 Jews, composed mostly of women, children, and the elderly, were confined for about one week in the cellars of the Catherine Palace, before a detachment of Sonderkommando 1b shot them in groups on the palace grounds.⁸

Precise figures on the number of Jews able to evacuate from specific locations in the Germans' path are not available. From Rudnia and Liubavichi in the Smolensk oblast', where ghettos were subsequently established, it seems that roughly half of the Jews managed to flee. From Smolensk, it is estimated that over 13,000 of the city's 14,800 Jews managed to leave in time, probably assisted by the protracted fighting for the city. From some isolated towns and villages, without good communications, such as Zakharino, the proportion that fled was much lower (only 10 or 20 percent); and some places saw an influx of refugees prior to the Germans' arrival, as Jews fleeing from the west were trapped by the rapid German advance.

The ghettos served several functions, including isolating and controlling the Jews. They facilitated the seizure of remaining Jewish property or other resources, including labor. Ghettoization was also useful preparation for the massacres to come, as it demoralized and weakened the Jewish population, who received little or no food. However, the sequence of ghetto establishment, preceded or followed in some places by smaller Aktions against male Jews, allegedly for acts of resistance or infractions against German regulations, before the ghetto liquidation Aktions, indicates that German genocidal plans were pursued in stages. A number of ghettos existed into the spring or summer of 1942. In particular, the large ghetto in Smolensk, where about 1,500 Jews were exploited systematically for forced labor, was not liquidated until mid-July 1942.

In general, ghettos were not established behind the German advance on Stalingrad in the summer and fall of 1942, mainly because large numbers of Jews were not encountered. Exceptions were isolated towns on the German route of advance, mostly in the northern Caucasus, which had populations of Mountain Jews, local Ashkenazim, and refugees from the western regions of the USSR. Four places have been identified in this region where Jews were concentrated under ghetto-like conditions in the second half of 1942: in Kagal'nitskaia

(for about a month), in Elista (for only 10 days), and in Nal'chik and Essentuki (each for about 6 weeks). It appears that the Mountain Jews were "ghettoized" in Nal'chik but excluded from the killings on the recommendation of the head of Einsatzgruppe D, SS-Oberführer Bierkamp, as they were viewed rather as a local mountain tribe.⁹

The Wehrmacht was responsible for imposing a series of anti-Jewish measures following its arrival in the territory of the Russian Federation. These can be documented effectively from surviving German placards (Bekanntmachungen). In Demidov, on August 6, 1941, the Ortskommandant ordered all Jews over the age of 10 to wear yellow markers 10 centimeters (4 inches) in diameter. Jews of both sexes were required to perform forced labor. The ritual slaughtering of animals for kosher meat was also forbidden.¹⁰ Similar orders were issued in Kaluga on November 8, 1941, together with the appointment of a Jewish elder; Jews were prohibited from leaving the city or having relations with non-Jews, and the establishment of a ghetto was decreed.¹¹

One of the first ghettos established by the Germans on Russian territory was in the "Sadki" district of Smolensk, on August 5, 1941. It was under the control of the local Russian administration, which ordered the evacuation of the non-Jewish population from the ghetto area. The ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire and guarded by the OD.¹² From the beginning, Jews caught leaving the ghetto or not wearing the Star of David were to be arrested and shot.¹³

Other than for Smolensk, the process of ghettoization is documented for only a few locations, including Rudnia. Here the Ortskommandantur ordered all the Jews into a ghetto in August 1941, threatening to shoot those who did not comply. The OD used physical force to intimidate the Jews and confiscated Jewish property during the transfer, including all livestock. The ghetto, located on one street, consisted of 20 half-destroyed houses fenced off with barbed wire and guarded by German soldiers and the OD. Around 1,200 Jews, including some refugees, were assembled on the market square and herded into the ghetto. Initially, the Jews could still come and go freely, and some received food from non-Jewish neighbors.¹⁴

A variety of different structures were used as ghetto sites. The typical small wooden houses, or cottages, common in the region, were used in a number of towns, including Smolensk, Rudnia, and Starodub. In Karachev and Krasnyi, the ghetto consisted only of an open-air holding camp with no shelter, similar to many camps for Soviet POWs. In other ghettos, such as Nevel' and Starodub, due to insufficient housing, some Jews had to sleep in dugouts or barns. In OPOCHKA and POCHEP, former barracks were used; in Zlynka, a Machine Tractor Station (MTS) was used; and in Mglin, a prison was converted into a ghetto. Several smaller ghettos, including Dmitriev-L'govskii and Loknia, were established by forcing all the Jews into a single house. Jews were sometimes brought into the ghettos from surrounding villages; this is documented for Klimovo and Monastyrshchina. The population of most ghettos was composed primarily of women, children, and the elderly, with only a few males of working age.

Living conditions in the ghettos were horrific. The inmates of the Rudnia ghetto suffered from overcrowding and poor sanitation, receiving rations of only 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread per day. All Jews had to surrender any valuables at gunpoint, and the more prosperous members of the community were taken hostage and held for ransom.¹⁵ In the Velizh ghetto, about 500 people lived in pigsties, furnished with bunk beds, as the 27 houses were all full. In the Kaluga ghetto, established in a former nunnery, although ration cards were issued, no food was distributed to the Jews. Even children in the Kaluga ghetto were forced to work, removing bodies from the streets. Children also sneaked out of the ghetto to scavenge for food.¹⁶ In most ghettos that existed for more than a few weeks, there were deaths from starvation and disease. Reports from several ghettos, including those in Smolensk, Krasnyi, Petrovichi, and Khislavichi, mention the rape of Jewish women by members of the OD and also Germans.

The Soviet evacuation of most heavy industry during their retreat and the severe food shortages in the towns meant that there was no large-scale use of Jews as a professional labor force. Indeed, in Smolensk, Jewish craftsmen were ordered to surrender their tools for use by the non-Jewish population. Nevertheless, the Jews in most ghettos of the region were exploited for forced labor on immediate tasks such as road repairs, clearing rubble, loading railway cars, and also digging defensive trenches. Some assigned labor tasks, such as cleaning toilets, served more to humiliate those workers. In several ghettos, including those in Klinty and Rzhev, selected skilled craftsmen were saved for a time after most of the Jews had been shot. In Staraiia Russa, Jews living outside the ghetto in mixed marriages were arrested and shot one month after the ghetto's liquidation.

Little is known about the Jewish Councils in German-occupied Russian territory. Most comprised just a few members, and in some ghettos there was only a single Jewish elder. As elsewhere, their tasks included the implementation of German orders, especially the organization of forced labor, meeting German demands for "contributions," and providing social services, including rudimentary medical care. This latter reason may explain the strong representation of physicians, including some women, on the councils. Ilya Al'tman has identified the professions of 19 Jewish Council members from more than 10 ghettos; of these, 11 were doctors or dentists. Other professions represented included a bookkeeper as the Jewish community's representative in Kaluga and a teacher in Velizh.¹⁷

Examples of resistance are known for several ghettos. Some acts of resistance are cited by the Einsatzgruppen as the alleged pretext for extermination Aktions. Such references must be treated with caution, but the descriptions may in part be based on actual events. Einsatzgruppen report no. 124, on October 25, 1941, noted:

The staff unit (Gruppenstab) [of Einsatzgruppe B] and Vorkommando Moskau carried out an operation against the Jews in Tatarsk. The Jews had begun to leave the ghetto of their own volition, and return to their former residences. Russians had occupied their apartments in the meantime, and the Jews tried to drive them out. Therefore, the place was systematically searched and the Jews gathered in the market square. Some of them had fled, and had to be hunted out of the nearby forest. In punishment for not following the orders of the German Security Police, all the Jewish men in Tatarsk and three women were shot.¹⁸

In Rudnia, the Germans raided the home of a young Jew who had been studying to be a radio technician. They arrested and shot him for not surrendering his radio, together with another 15 to 20 young Jews. The Germans also discovered a pistol in the Rudnia ghetto and shot 100 Jews, ostensibly for concealing weapons.¹⁹ Shortly after this, Ida Brion fled the ghetto after hearing from escapees of the Vitebsk ghetto that all the Jews would be shot unless they escaped.²⁰ Jews escaped from several Russian ghettos just before or during their liquidation, with the aim of going into hiding or joining the Soviet partisans. Outside the ghetto, they had to contend with patrols of the Wehrmacht and the OD, hunting for escapees.

The advance of the Red Army in the winter of 1941–1942 successfully liberated three ghettos in the region from the Germans, saving most of their inmates from certain death. These were the ghettos of Il'ino, Kaluga, and Usviaty.²¹ Unfortunately, the liberation of these three ghettos was quite exceptional. In Velizh, the Germans and Russian police burned down the ghetto on January 30, 1942, just as Soviet forces were attacking the town, and only a few dozen of the ghetto's Jews managed to survive.

The Soviet counteroffensive may, however, have delayed the liquidation of some ghettos by a few weeks. Sonderkommando 7a, for example, was forced to retreat hastily by the Soviet advances in late December, its men suffering from cold and exhaustion as many vehicles broke down. It was then transferred to Klinty further to the rear to rest and recover, only arriving there in late February. Thus the Red Army's advance rendered it largely inactive for almost two months.²² In the ensuing weeks from March 1942, this unit murdered nearly all the remaining Jews in the area around Klinty in a series of Aktions coordinated by the unit's energetic new commander, Albert Rapp. These Aktions included the destruction of ghettos in Pochep, Unecha, Starodub, and Mglin.²³

The ghettos in Russian territory existed for only a few weeks or months. They were established just as the Einsatzgruppen, Order Police, and SS forces were escalating the genocide from the shooting of groups of male Jews and alleged Communists to the destruction of entire Jewish communities. Most ghetto liquidation Aktions were organized by the respective Einsatzkommandos, but they also required support from the OD and local Wehrmacht forces. The murder of the Jews of Gusino, for example, just west of Smolensk, can be reconstructed from the testimony of German soldiers given in post-war war crime investigations. The Jews were driven out of the ghetto to a pit through a narrow cordon formed by soldiers of a Landesschützen Company. The pit was only about 150 meters (492 feet) from the ghetto, close to the company's quarters in the local school. The Jews were then shot in the back of the neck in groups of 2 or 3 by two SS men on the edge of the pit. The German forces murdered more than 200 Jews in the Aktion, which lasted several hours. The Jews remained orderly. However, some soldiers recall a Jewish girl calling out: "Please don't shoot me, I will do any work!" The clothing of the Jewish victims was subsequently distributed among the local Russian population.²⁴

Little evidence has remained concerning the ghettos on occupied Russian soil. Just occasionally, however, these ghettos are mentioned in sources that reflect the perspective of so-called bystanders. Local resident Nikolai Karpov in Roslavl', who was subsequently deported to Germany for forced labor, recalls in his published memoir learning about the clearance of the ghetto. Neighbors reported with horror that all the inhabitants, including women, children, and the elderly, had been shot near the old Jewish cemetery. The graves had been hastily covered with earth, and Russian policemen had plundered the houses. Karpov observed one policeman attempting to drag away a cow that had belonged to a Jewish tailor, but the cow resisted, not wanting to go with someone it did not know.²⁵ In the two months following the Aktion, about 20 more Jews were brought into Roslavl' by Wehrmacht patrols in the surrounding countryside and placed in the SD prison. These Jews had been denounced by local inhabitants and handed over to the Wehrmacht. They were subsequently shot by the German Security Police.²⁶

Only a few hundred Jews managed to survive from the ghettos in German-occupied Russian territory, either hiding among the local population or serving with the Soviet partisans.²⁷ The experience of Solomon Bazhalkin, a 14-year-old boy who escaped from the Unecha ghetto, reflects the difficulties Jews faced in trying to survive. He knocked on people's doors in the surrounding villages, saying he was an orphan. Some local inhabitants offered him food and occasionally shelter for a short while; but usually he had to move on again, as people suspected that he was a Jew. On one occasion, he was denounced to the police, but he successfully convinced them he was an orphan and was released. Subsequently he linked up with the Soviet partisans, as did many of the surviving escapees from ghettos in Russia.

The last occupying German forces were driven from Russian territory in July 1944 with the capture by the Red Army of the town of Pskov.²⁸

BEZHANITSY

Pre-1941: Bezhanitsy, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Beshanizy, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Bezhanitsy, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Bezhanitsy is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) north-northwest of Velike Luki. According to the 1939 census, there were only 24 Jews living in Bezhanitsy.

German forces captured Bezhanitsy on July 18, 1941, almost one month after their invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. During this period, some Jews managed to evacuate to the east, and the eligible males were required to report for military service. Only some of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

During the occupation, which lasted until July 1944, a German military Kommandantur ran the town. The German Kommandantur formed a town administration and a police force (Ordnungsdienst), staffed by local residents.

Soon after the occupation of the town, the German Kommandantur ordered the town administration to organize the registration and marking of the Jews, as well as their use for various kinds of forced labor. In October 1941, all the remaining Jews in Bezhanitsy were rounded up and moved into a ghetto, consisting of an unheated house whose windows had been smashed, which was surrounded by a fence. The prisoners did not receive anything to eat for many days. The ghetto existed for several weeks, and then it was liquidated by shooting all the Jews. First 10 people were selected to dig two large graves. Then they were shot into the graves, which were filled in by the next group of 10. This was repeated until all the Jews had been shot. According to one source, 120 Jews were shot in total. This figure is considerably overstated. However, some Jewish refugees from other places likely were among the victims.¹

SOURCES Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Bezhanitsy can be found in the following archives: GAPO and GARF (7021-39-319 and 8114-1-963, pp. 111–112).

DEMIDOV

Pre-1941: Demidov (until 1918 known as Porech'e), town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943:

Demidow, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Demidov, Russian Federation

Demidov is located about 110 kilometers (68 miles) northwest of Smolensk on the Kasplia River. In 1939, the Jewish population was 206 (2.6 percent of the town's total population).

German forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on July 13, 1941, about four weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. During this intervening period, much of the Jewish population fled or was evacuated to the east, and men eligible for military service were drafted into the Red Army. It is not known how many Jews remained in the town, but it was most probably less than 50 percent of the preinvasion population.

At the end of July 1941, the German military administration in Demidov, Ortskommandantur (OK) I/593, appointed a local mayor.¹ A police force (Ordnungsdienst) was also recruited from local inhabitants. On August 6, 1941, the Ortskommandant ordered that all Jews living in the town over the age of 10 had to wear a yellow marker at least 10 centimeters (4 inches) in diameter on the right sleeve of their clothes and overcoats, which they were to make themselves. Jews of both sexes were not to be evacuated but were to remain in the town and to perform forced labor. The same order also forbade the ritual slaughtering of animals to prepare kosher meat.²

On August 29, 1941, two suspected Soviet partisans (non-Jews) were publicly hanged in Demidov, as a warning to the rest of the population. On September 4, OK I/593 issued an order denying the Jews freedom of movement and prohibiting them from trading with non-Jews.³ The detailed effects of this order are not known, but it may have resulted in the establishment of an open ghetto for those Jews that still remained in Demidov.

Shortly after this, during the second week of September 1941, units of the German 161st and 183rd Infantry Divisions, together with part of Sonderkommando (Sk) 7a and the Ortskommandant in Demidov, conducted an antipartisan sweep in the area south of the town, which resulted in the arrest of some 2,000 people "capable of bearing arms," of whom about 200 were shot or hanged.⁴ On September 28, OK I/593 in Demidov reported the execution of 398 individuals under the heading of "Partisans, Political Commissars, and Party Functionaries," as well as 3 commissars.⁵

One Jewish woman, who was seized and brought to Demidov together with her brother and another Jewish girl at some time in the fall of 1941, stated that the Germans raped the other Jewish girl. When she learned that she would be next, she managed to escape in time.⁶

From mid-August 1941, a Sonderkommando 7a detachment headed by SS-Untersturmführer Claus Hüser was located in Demidov for several weeks. According to German postwar investigative sources, the Russian Ordnungsdienst frequently handed over individuals they had arrested to the detachment while it was based in Demidov. Those prisoners that were Jews were shot without being interrogated. Allegedly up to 50 Jews were murdered by SK 7a in this manner while it was based in Demidov or shortly thereafter.⁷

More reliable information about the murder of the Jews of Demidov has not been uncovered. According to one partisan report, the remaining Jews in the town were allegedly shot at the start of 1942, by which time advancing Red Army forces had almost cut off the town. However, as this source considerably overestimates the number of victims, it may refer to the German antipartisan sweeps of September 1941 or other subsequent similar Aktions that were directed mainly against non-Jews.⁸

DMITRIEV-L’GOVSKII

Pre-1939: Dmitriev-L’govskii, town and raion center, Kursk oblast’, RSFSR; 1941–1943: Dmitriew, Army Group Center (Heeresgruppe Mitte); post-1991: Dmitriev-L’govskii, Russian Federation

Dmitriev-L’govskii is located 120 kilometers (75 miles) northwest of Kursk on the railway line from Briansk to L’gov. The census of 1939 revealed that the Jewish population stood at 111.

German forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on October 8, 1941, three and a half months after Germany’s invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During this intervening period, the overwhelming majority of the Jews managed to evacuate to the east, and eligible men were inducted into the Red Army. According to Soviet sources, only 16 Jews remained in the town at the start of German occupation. These included several key professionals, such as the dentists Kaplan and his wife, the head of the pharmacy, a tailor, a cobbler, and a barber.¹

During the entire occupation period, from October 8, 1941, to March 2, 1943, a German military Kommandantur ran the town. The German military administration formed a town council, and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) was recruited from among local residents.

Soon after the occupation, the town council organized the registration of the Jews, as well as their use in various kinds of heavy labor. The German occupiers spread antisemitic propaganda and imposed a special tax of 5,000 rubles per month on each Jew. They also proceeded to seize and rob remaining Jewish property.²

In November 1941, the Germans set up a “ghetto” in Dmitriev-L’govskii, forcing all the Jews to move into a single house, which bore the following inscription on the door: “Entry forbidden to non-Jews.” (Another source indicates that some Jews were shot in the town shortly after the arrival of the Germans, and the remainder were placed in the ghetto.) Jews were also required to wear a Jewish star on their clothes, on the chest and back, and were forbidden from having any contact with non-Jews.³ The Jews in the ghetto were forbidden from carrying out their former professions and were taken under guard to perform heavy, dangerous labor, including digging up bombs that had failed to explode. As they worked, they were whipped and beaten mercilessly with sticks.⁴

The fate of a 16-year-old Jewish boy named Boris is known from two witnesses. He was the barber’s apprentice and was forced to work for the Germans, carrying water and cleaning toilets. By accident he splashed water on a German dog, and the Germans started to beat him. When they discovered from other boys that he was Jewish, they beat him further for concealing that he was a Jew. The Germans threw him into the cold cellar of the Pedagogical School for three days, and on the fourth day a German came and shot him with a pistol. His body was left there among the trash until spring 1942, when it was thrown into the pit behind the cemetery.⁵

Following a Soviet counteroffensive, the Jews feared that they might be killed, and a few managed to run away. Shortly after this escape effort, probably in March 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto by shooting the remaining Jews.⁶

DUKHOVSHCHINA

Pre-1941: Dukhovshchina, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Duchowschtschina, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Dukhovshchina, Russian Federation

Dukhovshchina is located 57 kilometers (35 miles) north-east of Smolensk. According to the 1939 census, 102 Jews were living in Dukhovshchina (2.64 percent of the total population).

German units of Army Group Center occupied the town on July 15, 1941, 24 days after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. During that time, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army.

Shortly after the occupation of the town, in late July or early August 1941, the German Ortskommandantur appointed a mayor (Bürgermeister) of Dukhovshchina and ordered the local administration to organize the registration and marking of the Jews. The Jewish population was also exploited for various forms of forced labor. The town's remaining Jews were moved into a ghetto, to concentrate them in one location and isolate them from the rest of the population. The ghetto was liquidated in the summer of 1942 at which time the Jews of the town were shot. The number of Jewish victims is reported to be 300, but this figure may be exaggerated. The chief of the raion police force, Shershukov, took an active part in the shooting Aktion; there were several dozen victims. At least two Jewish families (the Gurevich and Blumin families) were saved with the help and support of local residents.¹

ELISTA (AKA STEPNOI)

Pre-1942: Elista, capital, Kalmyk ASSR, RSFSR; August–December 1942: Army Group A (Heeresgruppe A); post-1991: Kalmyk Republic (Kalmykia), Russian Federation

Elista is located about 250 kilometers (155 miles) south of Stalingrad. Between June 1941 and August 1942, a number of Jewish refugees arrived in Elista from Gomel', Dnepropetrovsk, Kiev, and other places occupied by the Germans. The lack of any rail communications made it difficult for Jews to flee from Elista in the face of the rapid German advance across the Kalmykian steppe in the summer of 1942.

Units of the German LII Corps occupied Elista on August 13, 1942. During the period of occupation, which lasted until December 31, 1942, German Ortskommandantur I/649 administered the town's affairs. The German military administration created a town authority and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) made up of local residents. For part of the occupation, units of the German 16th Motorized Infantry Division were stationed in the town.

Among the German punitive organs based in the town from the end of August to the end of December 1942 was the Security Police Sonderkommando Astrakhan, part of Einsatzgruppe D. The Sonderkommando, consisting of about 10 to 20 men, was headed by Hauptsturmführer Rolf Maurer, who died in February 1943.

Shortly after the occupation of the town, the German authorities ordered the registration and marking of all Jews, the confiscation of Jewish property, and the use of Jews for forced labor. All Jews had to wear distinguishing badges in the form of a white six-pointed star. After their registration and marking, the Jews were forced into a ghetto, for which one of the buildings on Rosa Luxemburg Street was designated. The Jews were not allowed to leave the ghetto, and they were deprived of food and water. They remained in the ghetto for 10 days.

On September 9, 1942 (or shortly thereafter), Sonderkommando Astrakhan under Maurer's command carried out the liquidation of the ghetto. According to testimony by members of the unit, about 80 to 100 Jews were taken out into the steppe outside the town to a place where a large ditch had already been prepared. Maurer and his men then shot all the Jews in small family groups (composed of men, women, children, and the elderly).¹ Soviet sources place the number of victims considerably higher, at 93 families, or more than 300 people altogether. The site of the mass shooting is reported to have been near the town's waste dump.²

Shortly after the mass shooting, the Germans began to encounter partisan resistance in the region and acts of sabotage in Elista, organized in part by the German-appointed mayor of the town and other local officials, who apparently were working for the NKVD. Sonderkommando Astrakhan responded by executing a number of non-Jews before its retreat at the end of December.

GUSINO

Pre-1941: Gusino, village, Krasnyi raion, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Russian Federation

Gusino is located 45 kilometers (28 miles) west-southwest of Smolensk on the Dnieper River and on the main highway from Minsk to Moscow. According to the 1926 census, 427 Jews resided in the town (with a total population of 706).

Units of the German 18th Panzer Division captured Gusino in mid-July 1941. Soon after their arrival, German forces established a ghetto for the Jewish population of approximately 250 people on July 28, 1941.¹ Members of the 1st Company, Landesschützen (LS) Battalion 507 (later renamed Security Bn. 545), which was stationed in Gusino during the winter of 1941–1942, note that on their arrival a ghetto had already been established in the town. The Jewish population was also forced to wear Jewish stars on their clothing and was made to perform forced labor, such as the clearing of snow and the unloading of railroad cars; a few of them also worked for the German soldiers based in the town. According to some accounts, a chicken-wire fence surrounded the ghetto, with barbed wire on top. The Jews lived in all the houses on one long street. In the town there was also a local Russian mayor and a local Russian police force designated only by armbands but armed with rifles. The Russian police was subordinated to the local German commandant.

The mass shooting of the Jews from the ghetto took place on February 6, 1942. On the evening before, a small unit of the SS and SD, comprising about 10 people, arrived in Gusino and informed Captain Schmitt, in charge of 1st Company, LS-Bn. 507, that all the Jews in the ghetto would be shot. It is not precisely clear which unit the SS men belonged to, but it was probably a Security Police (Sipo) and SD squad subordinated to Einsatzkommando 8 (commanded by Heinz Richter from January 1942), probably based in Orsha or Krugloe.

A mass grave had already been prepared in advance, close to the ghetto. Because of the hard ground, the Germans used explosives to prepare a pit some 10 meters long and 3 meters deep (33 feet by almost 10 feet). The Sipo/SD unit requested that members of the LS Company cordon off the ghetto during the Aktion to prevent any escapes. Some men of the company were deployed around the ghetto during the night. However, it appears that a few Jews got wind of the operation following the explosions and managed to flee, as other company members also searched the woods vainly in the morning just prior to the Aktion, trying to find escaped Jews.

The Aktion began at 9:00 A.M., when the Jews were driven out of the ghetto and forced through a narrow cordon, formed by members of the LS Company, to the pit. The pit was only about 100 or 200 meters (328 feet to 656 feet) from the ghetto, close to the company's quarters in the local school. Before arriving at the pit, the Jewish victims had to remove their upper clothing and their shoes. These items were subsequently distributed among the local Russian population. The Jews were then shot in the back of the neck in groups of 2 or 3 by two SS men on the edge of the pit. The German forces murdered more than 200 Jews, including men, women, and children of all ages in the Aktion, which lasted several hours. (A report by a Soviet military commission of investigation records that more than 250 people were shot altogether.)² The Jews remained calm during the shooting. However, some soldiers in the cordon recall a Jewish girl calling out: "Please don't shoot me, I will do any work!”³ During the Aktion at least one Russian boy tried to escape. However, he was fired on and wounded by men from the cordon, then brought back to the killing site.

The attitude of the Wehrmacht troops is hard to assess from the investigative sources, as they knew they might be prosecuted if they admitted that their participation was motivated by racial hatred. Nevertheless, the company consisted almost exclusively of middle-aged men who had no particular Nazi sympathies. Several men mentioned that one company member tried to save two young Jewish sisters who had worked for the company and received bread from their rations in return. When the SS men found out about these two Jewish girls a few days later, they also took them away to be shot. One soldier claimed that the events preoccupied him so much that he wrote to his wife about it, mentioning especially the shooting of the two sisters. Others said that they were so affected they could not eat.

About one week after the main shooting, the local Russian police carried out their own Aktion. They shot those Jews who had escaped from the first Aktion. Accounts by Wehrmacht soldiers stationed in the town mention Jews returning, but they were probably hunted down and brought in by the local police.⁴

IL'INO

Pre-1941: Il'ino, village and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Iljino, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Il'ino, Tver oblast', Russian Federation

Il'ino is located 82 kilometers (51 miles) east-southeast of Velikiye Luki. By 1939, the number of Jews stood at 221. Il'ino was remote from larger towns and 48 kilometers (30 miles) from the nearest railway station. It was not the site of any industry, and consequently the local authorities did not organize an evacuation as the German forces drew near. The inhabitants of Il'ino appealed to the raion authorities for help but received only a terse response: “Don't stir up panic; if it's necessary, we'll evacuate.” After loading their belongings into carts, many Jewish families tried to leave Il'ino on foot, seeking to get to the railway station at Staraia Toropa, but German troops stopped them, and they turned back.¹

German forces took Il'ino on July 22, 1941. Shortly afterwards, the occupiers ordered the Jews in the village to sew a yellow six-pointed star on the chest and back of their outer garments and to mark their homes with the stars.² A Jewish elder was named. One witness recalls that he was “an ordinary person, by no means a betrayer.” He was “caught between the devil and the deep blue sea.”³ The occupiers did not undertake the registration of the Jews since local non-Jewish citizens had given the Germans complete lists of the Jewish population in the village.⁴

The occupiers began to assign Jews to work servicing the German garrison. Germans treated the Jews scornfully and subjected them to taunts and beatings. On one occasion, eight German Air Force pilots gathered a number of Jewish men and took them to a neighboring village, made them dig pits, and staged a mock hanging. Subsequently, one of those Jews became deranged.⁵ According to one account, Finnish Army soldiers were especially brutal in dealing with the Jews. In one case, a woman's sister who was a witness indignantly told how a Finnish soldier took all the sugar from their house. Then, on horseback, he chased the woman for 3 kilometers (1.9 miles).⁶

Wehrmacht soldiers and those in Finnish, Estonian, and Hungarian units quartered in neighboring communities robbed the Jewish inhabitants. They took mostly foodstuffs. The chief of the Russian police obliged the Jewish elder, under threat of being shot, to procure various things for him. On one occasion, he asked for a black suit to be furnished by the Jews; on another, he demanded a supply of blank paper.⁷

In September 1941, the occupiers issued an order concerning the establishment of a ghetto. It designated a short street on the outskirts of the village from which all residents—mostly Russians and Latvians—were told to move out. Low, marshy ground flanked the street on one side, and a small stream intersected it. The Jewish cemetery lay at the end of the street. Several Jewish families moved into each house. The occupiers allowed them to bring with them only a few possessions and scarcely any provisions. Barbed wire partly surrounded the area of the ghetto, and German soldiers and Russian policemen guarded it. The occupying authorities did not allow the Jews to leave the ghetto and forbade local inhabitants to visit them.

The ghetto held as many as 200 people—residents of Il'ino and surrounding villages and refugees from Belorussia.⁸ The inmates were mostly women, children of various ages, and elderly men. Local authorities carried out a registration of the Jewish inmates once the ghetto had been established.⁹

The Jews in the ghetto suffered severely from hunger, even eating flaxseed meal. They avoided starving to death only because they had dug up potatoes from their kitchen gardens and brought them along when resettled to the ghetto. Every potato counted.¹⁰ Teenagers in the ghetto managed to obtain some bread and potatoes from former neighbors and acquaintances. A woman who had been confined in the ghetto recalled that parents feared the Germans might shoot the children.¹¹ Occasionally, Russian boys would steal into the ghetto at night to bring food to their friends.¹²

Ghetto inmates suffered from an insufficient water supply. During the winter, they had to melt snow for drinking water. There was no place where they could wash up; they were covered with scabs and tormented by lice.¹³ Not enough firewood was available for heating. Improvised medical aid was provided for sick Jews in the ghetto by a doctor who was a refugee from Vitebsk and who managed the local drugstore. Taking advantage of her “Aryan appearance,” on several occasions a female inmate left the ghetto to buy medication from him.¹⁴

Russian police arrived on the scene shortly after the ghetto was established; their aim was to seize the Jews’ belongings. They helped themselves to one thing after another—from linens to floor runners. The Komissarov family begged them, “Leave the strips of carpet!” The police chief replied, “What do you need your carpet for? You’ll soon have the ground under your feet.”¹⁵ That was a thinly veiled reference to the planned extermination of the Jews. German soldiers and the Russian police repeatedly carried out searches in the ghetto. They were looking for valuables, and they also seized warm clothing, even shabby garments, “for the German Army.”¹⁶

The lack of clothes to keep them warm heightened the suffering of the Jews in the ghetto during the severe winter of 1941–1942. Russian inhabitants of Il’ino recall that when the Germans ordered the Jews taken out of the ghetto in January 1942 (with the intention of shooting them), many of them were almost naked. Despite the ban on communicating with the inmates, one Russian woman brought warm clothing for a family in the ghetto with whom she had been friendly.¹⁷

According to orders passed through the Jewish elder, the guards escorted Jews outside the ghetto for compulsory labor. They assigned women and teenage children to do heavy and dirty work: to saw firewood; clean stables and toilets; wash motorcycles and cars; haul water for the field kitchen; and repair roads and, in winter, shovel them clear of snow.¹⁸

Former ghetto inmates recollect that many of them did not believe they could safely flee the ghetto, and they could not count on help from the local population. One ex-inmate said, “[N]obody could go anywhere. There was nowhere to go.” A former female inmate who was then still a child told how she often said to her mother, “Let me go out!” Her mother would reply, “Wherever you go, they’ll turn you in.”¹⁹ Nevertheless, some young people did leave the ghetto, a number of them to join the partisans.²⁰

A detachment of Russian police entered the ghetto on January 24, 1942. They brought all the Jews out of the ghetto under guard and assembled them near the German commandant’s office. The police kept the poorly clad Jews there for several hours in the freezing cold. Local inhabitants who witnessed the event and the Jews themselves later recalled that they were certain that this activity was in preparation for a mass shooting. A local midwife managed to snatch a little girl from the column of Jews and subsequently hid the child in her house.

Through an interpreter, the German commandant criticized the assembled Jews for alleged offenses: spreading rumors that disparaged the German Army, hailing Soviet aircraft, and so on. Then the Germans ordered the Jews to return to the ghetto and not to venture out of their houses. They nailed the doors shut and posted a guard of Russian policemen.²¹

Apparently the Germans did not have time to carry out the massacre, for their military command was by then busy warding off an attack by Soviet forces. On January 24, elements of the Soviet 4th Shock Army attacked Il’ino, but without immediate success. During the night, additional Soviet forces came up to the outskirts of the village, and at dawn the attack was launched again. Having overcome stubborn German resistance, by midday on January 25, elements of the Red Army liberated Il’ino.

This unexpected salvation was a shock to the ghetto inmates, who had thought they were going to die. They could not sleep all night. One woman, the mother of four children, lost all her hair. On the morning of January 25, when neighbors knocked on a woman’s door and reported that they had seen men wearing white coveralls and with red stars on their caps, the woman fainted from shock at this news.²²

Almost all the ghetto inmates who had survived to that point were saved. (Several elderly Jews had frozen to death on the eve of liberation.) But the very narrow escape of the inmates of the Il’ino ghetto was sadly quite exceptional in the history of the Holocaust in the territory of the Soviet Union.

Kagal'nitskaia is a Cossack village (stanitsa) located 58 kilometers (36 miles) southeast of Rostov on Don. In 1939, there were only seven Jews living in the village.¹

German armed forces occupied the village in late July 1942. Throughout the entire six months of the occupation, a German military commandant's office was in charge of the village. It established a local administration and an auxiliary police force, made up of local residents.

In August 1942, all the Jews in the village—38 families, primarily Jewish refugees—were assembled in a large barn, which became a temporary ghetto. Those Jews who were fit for work were required to perform forced labor. The Jews remained in this barn ghetto for one month. In September 1942, the German forces liquidated the ghetto by shooting all of the Jews, about 200 people in total.

KALUGA

Pre-1941: Kaluga, city and raion center, Tula oblast', RSFSR; October–December 1941: VIII Army Corps, Army Group Center (Heeresgruppe Mitte); post-1991: oblast' center, Russian Federation

Kaluga is located 188 kilometers (117 miles) southwest of Moscow on the Oka River and on the railway line from Moscow to Kiev. In 1939, the Jewish population was 833.

Warned of the German advance, the majority of the Jewish population managed to flee, leaving slightly in excess of 150 Jews behind. Part of the XIII Corps, of German Army Group Center, occupied Kaluga on October 12–13, 1941, only two weeks into Operation Typhoon (the German offensive towards Moscow). According to a child survivor (Yuri German), many people in the city initially greeted the German army with flowers. Some of his relatives had successfully evacuated from the city, but he remained behind with his mother.¹

Shortly after their arrival the German authorities forbade Jews from appearing in the market square or other public places and prohibited non-Jews from associating with them. Jews were denied access to the public baths, electricity, first aid, restaurants, and health services. The newly appointed local Russian mayor, Shcherbachev, also signed orders issued by the German commandant authorizing the seizure of Jewish property. Both before the establishment of the ghetto and thereafter, Jews were subjected to frequent raids by German and local police in search of property. Some Jews were murdered during these property raids. As Anna Veller recalls, a police officer entered her apartment just prior to the establishment of the ghetto and demanded all her valuables and money, threatening to kill her, as he had another Jewish woman. He took with him various objects, including silver spoons and 130 rubles in cash.²

On November 1, 1941, the mayor issued orders for all Jews to be registered and for them to wear a yellow star on the chest and shoulders of their outer garments, stigmatizing the Jews to the local population. On November 7, 1941, the German forces arrested 23 Jews and detained them for three weeks, starving them for several days. Of these, 8 of the younger people were shot, and the remainder were subsequently resettled in a "ghetto."³

Kaluga was the easternmost ghetto established in the area occupied during Operation Typhoon. On November 8, 1941, the city administration issued an order for the Jews to be confined together in one area on the outskirts of town. In addition, the Jews were ordered to establish a Jewish Council, which in turn would choose an elder, who would be the sole means of communication with the city administration. The same decree forbade the ritual slaughter of animals according to Jewish religious practice.⁴

In mid-November 1941, the German authorities ordered all 150 Jews to leave their houses and enter the ghetto within two hours. Many people moved into the ghetto, based in the former "Black Mountain" nunnery. They were only permitted to take with them what they could carry in their hands, forcing them to leave behind many precious belongings and food-stuffs, which were then snapped up by looters who soon followed in their wake.

The Germans issued orders for all Jews between the ages of 14 and 60 to perform hard physical labor, often accompanied by beatings. Forced labor began at the start of the German occupation, but once the ghetto was established, the main task for the next two weeks was constructing a fence around the ghetto. There were no construction materials, so the fence from around another building had to be dismantled. Three German Feldgendarmes and local Russian policemen oversaw the work.

On November 27, 1941, the German commandant threatened that if on the following day 100 workers did not appear for work, then every tenth person would be shot. At that time the Kaluga "Gestapo" had registered 154 Jews, of which only 17 were able-bodied men, 43 were men aged over 60 or disabled, 8 were mothers with babies or young children, 21 were women over 60 or disabled, and 47 were children aged under 14, the remaining 18 being women aged 14 to 60. Therefore, only 35 to 40 ghetto inmates were fit to work, but all the children and elderly also reported to avoid the collective punishment. Although a number of local craftsmen (tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, and others) were represented within the ghetto, they were no longer permitted to perform these trades.⁵ The assigned work included cleaning the streets and burying the corpses of German soldiers. The overseers often beat Jews as they performed forced labor. Even the children in the ghetto were forced to work, some being made to move bodies in the streets outside the ghetto.

Once it was enclosed, two Feldgendarmes and the local Russian police guarded the ghetto. Jews could only exit the ghetto during certain limited hours. If they were even a few minutes late, the guards would beat them. Although ration cards were issued for pickled cucumbers, pickled tomatoes, and salt, very little food was actually distributed to the Jews. Some children therefore sneaked out of the ghetto to scavenge for food. Inside the ghetto there were also deaths from starvation, among them a boy named Gurevich, who was only seven years old.⁶

In December 1941, the Red Army counterattacked, and the Germans began searching for valuables in the ghetto. According to Anna Veller, on December 18–19, 1941, ghetto inmates began to hear cannon fire and took refuge in the cellars. Then at 11:00 A.M. on December 22, German soldiers burst into the ghetto and began firing from automatic weapons. They doused part of the ghetto in gasoline and then set fire to it. Veller reported that apart from the 8 Jews shot in prison, 10 were shot in the ghetto settlement and 3 afterwards, while another 10 were lost (presumably in the burning ghetto)—the elderly Gershovich was burned alive in his bed. Other Jews were reportedly injured as they made their escape.⁷

Yuri German managed to escape under the cover of smoke and hide with a neighbor for a few days until the Red Army arrived. According to his account, prior to the German retreat, only Jewish invalids from the sanatorium had been systematically shot.⁸ According to the OKW daily report for December 30, 1941, Kaluga was evacuated "according to plan."⁹ It appears that the burning of the ghetto had been an attempt to destroy the Jewish population as the Germans retreated. Nevertheless, a large proportion of the ghetto inmates in Kaluga survived, indicating that the Red Army intervened before the German forces could organize the systematic liquidation of the ghetto.

SOURCES The main archival sources for the Kaluga ghetto are the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission reports, which are located in GARF (7021-47-1, 22, and 353) and some testimonies by surviving Jews (e.g., USHMM, RG-50.378*0016, oral history interview with Yuri Izrailovich German, August 5, 1995; and VHF, # 28740, 29422, 39439, and others). KARACHEV

Karachev is located 44 kilometers (27 miles) southeast of Briansk. Jews probably first arrived in Karachev in the late nineteenth century. In 1897, there were 326 Jews residing in the town, and by 1926 the number had increased to 522.¹ According to the results of the 1939 census, the number of Jewish residents had decreased to 443 people (or 2.48 percent of the total population).² Karachev was occupied by units of the German 2nd Panzer Army, Army Group Center, on October 5, 1941, almost three and a half months after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union. By this time, a large number of the local Jews had managed to escape to the east. Jewish men fit for military service were drafted into the Red Army. When German troops occupied Karachev, only about one quarter of the pre-war Jewish population was still in town, roughly 100 people.

During the entire period of the German occupation (from October 1941 until August 1943), a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) exercised authority in the town. The military commandant established a local administration and an auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst), recruited from local inhabitants. The chief district administrator (Rayonleiter) in Karachev was an ethnic German physician, Dr. Schepel.

A short time after the start of the occupation, the local Russian administration organized the registration of the Jews. They were forced to wear a distinctive symbol on their clothes marking them as Jews. Men and women were forced to conduct physically exhausting labor. Probably at the end of October 1941, the Germans established a ghetto in Karachev. It was more like a temporary holding camp, as it was in the open air and there were no buildings within the confines of the camp.³ On December 12, 1941, the ghetto was liquidated. All the Jews were shot. The number of victims is estimated to have been about 100 people.⁴ It is most probable that the liquidation of the ghetto was carried out by a sub-unit of Einsatzkommando 8, which was based in Briansk at this time.⁵

KHISLAVICHI

Pre-1941: Khislavichi, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Chislavitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Khislavichi, Russian Federation

Khislavichi is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) south of Smolensk on the Sozh River. In 1939, 1,427 Jews were living in Khislavichi.

Units of German Army Group Center entered Khislavichi on July 16, 1941. As early as the first few days of the German occupation, the Jewish population was subjected to robbery, assault, and other forms of human degradation.¹

At the end of August and in early September 1941, the headquarters unit of Vorkommando Moskau (a detachment of Einsatzgruppe B) ordered the registration and marking of all the Jews of Khislavichi. On the orders of the Vorkommando, the German military administration resettled the Jews in a ghetto and required them to perform forced labor. A few weeks later, members of the Vorkommando were responsible for shooting the members of the Judenrat and 20 other Jews.²

The Germans established the ghetto on the outskirts of town in older houses next to the Jewish cemetery and the synagogue. A barbed-wire fence surrounded the ghetto. Nobody could enter or leave the ghetto without permission. The ghetto inmates had to wear distinguishing markings: a yellow ring with a dark sign in the middle. Around 800 people were moved into the ghetto, where they lived in only 40 or 50 houses, with roughly 25 to 30 people in each.³ Among the prisoners of the ghetto were many children of various ages.

All property remained in the Jews' vacated homes when they were forcibly resettled into the ghetto. The property passed into the hands of the German military administration and local Russian policemen, who then occupied the best of the confiscated Jewish homes.

Sometime in the second half of September or early October 1941, the Germans rounded up Jewish men, telling them they were needed for work. Then they transported the men to a Machine Tractor Station (MTS) and shot them in a large ditch. According to Soviet sources, around 125 to 150 people were shot.⁴

The report of Einsatzgruppe B dated October 9, 1941, describes this event as follows: "In Khislavichi, according to reports from the Russian population, the Jews living in the ghetto have during the last few days tried to incite a mood of panic by spreading false rumors about an alleged offensive by the Bolsheviks. They also threatened to exact revenge once the Bolsheviks returned. Consequently, the Vorkommando sent out a detachment [Kommando], which liquidated 114 Jews."⁵

The German occupying authorities tried to cover up the shooting of the Jewish men by claiming that they had been sent to work in Belorussia. Jewish craftsmen were not shot at this time, as the Germans spared leather tanners, boot makers, and tailors from the ghetto. For making a suit, a tailor would receive half a packet of Russian tobacco. An irreplaceable Jewish mechanic named Dvorkin was ordered by the Germans to work at a mill. They gave his family an apartment and supplied them with basic foodstuffs. In the course of the final German evacuation of the town, however, the family was murdered.

The remaining ghetto inmates had to perform grueling physical labor. In January and February 1942, nearly all able-bodied Jews had to participate in laying concrete for various permanent defensive fortification sites for the German army.

German soldiers and Russian policemen often entered the ghetto to rob the Jews. They stole valuable items, clothing, and other property. In early January 1941, some German pilots who had just arrived in Khislavichi threatened the Jews and took all their warm clothing at gunpoint, including their winter coats with the yellow badges.

The ghetto inmates were constantly subjected to assault and other forms of humiliation. The Germans and Russian policemen raped Jewish girls and young women. For example, two 15-year-old twin sisters named Dimentman were raped in front of their parents. In January 1942, a group of young Jewish boys and girls were taken away from the ghetto and never seen again.⁶

In the view of the Einsatzgruppe, in the second half of September 1941 the Jews of Khislavichi could be characterized by their “passive resistance.”⁷ Young Jews looked for any opportunity to escape the ghetto. Sometimes they escaped when they were assigned to labor tasks outside the ghetto. In the words of one former ghetto inmate, “[T]hose who had all their closest relatives in the ghetto tried not only to escape, but also to organize armed resistance.” When the ghetto was first set up, one young Jewish man tried to mobilize his compatriots by crying out, “Don’t be afraid! Resist their power!” He was killed for speaking out. Another young girl who escaped from the ghetto came back a few times by sneaking past the guards. Among the ghetto inmates she spread Soviet leaflets dropped by planes.

Part of the population came to disbelieve the claims of German propaganda that “all misfortunes come from the Jews; and that this parasitic group is living off the people.” One witness observed that when the Germans talked with the local population, they “were not able to refute the fact that the Jews were the same kind of hardworking people as the rest of the population, for this was indisputable.”⁸

Evgenii Rzhetskii, a former teacher of German and director of the school branch of the raion administration in Khislavichi, became a translator for the Germans. He was able to save a number of Jews. One of the ghetto inmates, a schoolteacher, produced a certificate attesting to her falsified Russian nationality. Rzhetskii was apparently able to help some of the Jews by finding them work. Local residents of Khislavichi helped save the life of the tailor Iakov Bass, whose family perished in the ghetto.

At dawn on March 20, 1942, the Russian police broke into the Khislavichi ghetto. According to witness testimonies, a detachment of local Russian police, under the command of the German Security Police and SD, carried out the Aktion.⁹

Some of the policemen surrounded the ghetto while the others drove the Jews from their homes, not even allowing them to put on their clothes. Those who were too old or sick to move were shot in the ghetto. Local policemen on foot and on horseback escorted the Jews to the killing site. Some younger Jews and children tried to escape, but they were killed. On the way there, and during the shooting itself, the policemen seized the Jews’ remaining clothing and shoes.

The killing was carried out in a gully only about 150 meters (492 feet) northwest of the town. The Jews were shot with rifles and automatic pistols. Young children were forced to kneel with their heads to the ground. The policemen threw some of the children into the ditch alive. A 12-year-old girl who escaped was apprehended by the Rayon head, Shevandin. A 12-year-old boy with frozen hands and feet made it as far as the edge of town, but he too was caught and shot by the police. For about two weeks the grave site remained only partially covered, and dogs dragged away some of the bodies.

In the documents of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), two different figures are given for the number of victims of the mass shooting on March 20, 1942. Some documents report 800 victims, and others only 600.¹⁰ About 200 Jews had perished before the shootings, so the latter figure is probably more accurate. The commander of the partisan detachment operating in the Khislavichi raion reported to the western headquarters of the partisan movement that 550 Jews had been killed in Khislavichi in one day.¹¹

The police searched for those Jews who had escaped and caught many in the nearby villages. With each Jew who was found and shot, the police seized any valuables and other possessions, including tobacco. Sometimes the Jews were handed over by local inhabitants. Of all the inmates of the ghetto, only a few managed to save themselves. A 6-year-old boy sneaked away at night after emerging from the mass grave, and he succeeded in escaping from Khislavichi. A Russian father was able to hide a 12-year-old girl, although her Jewish mother and infant brother were both shot.

Jewish property—featherbeds, pillows, clothing, and ornaments—was divided as spoils among the Germans and Russian police. Some of it was resold in a local store in Khislavichi.

The ChGK investigation concluded that the mass killing of the “Soviet citizens” of Khislavichi was organized and carried out by the German commandant Dolerman, his deputy Mais, and their collaborators, including the Rayon head Shevandin and the chief of police, Bobkov.¹²

KLETNIA

Pre-1941: Kletnia, town and raion center, Orel oblast’, RSFSR; 1941–1943: Kletnja, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Kletnia, Briansk oblast’, Russian Federation

Kletnia is located about 90 kilometers (56 miles) west-northwest of Briansk. According to the 1939 census, there were 286 Jews residing in Kletnia (4.43 percent of the total population).

German forces occupied the town on August 10, 1941, almost two months after the start of the German invasion of the Soviet Union. By this time, most of the Jews of Kletnia had managed to escape to the east. Jewish men liable for military service had been drafted into the Red Army. When the German occupiers reached the town, probably less than half of the pre-war Jewish population was still there.

During the entire period of the German occupation (from August 10, 1941, until September 1943), a military headquarters (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. It also established a local Russian administration and an auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from the local population. In the fall of 1941, between 10 and 12 members of the Secret Field

Police (Geheime Feldpolizei, GFP) Unit 729 operated in the area. They were mainly engaged in combating Soviet partisan activity, but their special tasks also included punitive Aktionen against suspected partisans or those believed to be supporting them. There was also a German “Landeschützen” unit based in the town, which guarded the local sawmill factory that was supplying wood to the German forces at the front.¹

A short time after the arrival of German troops, the military administration instituted several measures against the Jewish population, such as personal registration, marking them as Jews with special signs on their clothes, and using them for forced labor under very harsh physical conditions. It appears that by the end of 1941, the Germans had established a small ghetto in Kletnia. It consisted of a few buildings that were set apart in the town. The ghetto guards were Russian policemen. During the existence of the ghetto a number of the inmates died of hunger or disease.

In late March 1942, Sonderkommando 7a, under the command of SS-Obersturmführer Albert Rapp based in Klitsy, organized the liquidation of the ghetto. He traveled to Kletnia accompanied by more than 20 men of the Sonderkommando (both Waffen-SS and Security Police/SD) and was joined in Mglin by about 20 or 30 local Russian policemen.

In Kletnia, men of the Waffen-SS surrounded the ghetto, and local Russian policemen drove the Jews out of their houses. Under close escort, at least 100 men, women, and children were then gathered in a barn on the edge of town. Those unable to walk were carried on stretchers. A few days later, under the personal supervision of Rapp, all the Jews were made to undress and then were shot by members of the Sonderkommando into a ditch in the woods about 100 meters (328 feet) from the barn. Due to the fear of partisans in the region, some of the force was used to guard the killing site externally as well as to prevent any escape.² In total, about 120 people were murdered.³

Rapp was tried after the war by the Landesgericht in Essen and sentenced on March 29, 1965, to life imprisonment.

Klimovo is located 170 kilometers (106 miles) southwest of Briansk. The 1939 census recorded that the Jewish population was 224, or 4 percent of the total.

German units of Army Group Center occupied Klimovo on August 25, 1941, two months after their invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During that time, approximately half of the Jews were able to evacuate eastward, and men liable for military service were inducted into the Red Army. Around 50 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

Throughout the occupation period (from August 1941 to September 1943), the town was governed by a German military commandant's office. The German military administration created a local town council and an auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local residents.

Shortly after the occupation of the town, the town council organized the registration and marking of the Jews and arranged for their use in various forms of forced labor. On August 29, 1941,¹ the Germans conducted the first Aktion in the town, during which a detachment of Sonderkommando 7b shot 27 “Jewish Bolshevik agents and terrorists.”² A ghetto probably was created in the town in October 1941, and Jews from the neighboring villages—Churovichi, Novii Ropsk, and others—also were forced to move into it.³ The ghetto was liquidated in early March 1942, when German-led security forces shot all the Jews, 280 people in total.⁴

KLINTSY

Pre-1941: Klintsy, town and raion center, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Klinzy, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Klintsy, Briansk oblast', Russian Federation

Klintsy is located approximately 150 kilometers (93 miles) southwest of Briansk on the railroad from Moscow to Kiev. In 1939, the Jewish population was 6,505 (16.07 percent of the population).

German units of the 10th Motorized Division, belonging to Panzer Group Guderian's XXIV Panzer Corps (Army Group Center), occupied Klintsy on August 20, 1941, almost two months after the start of the German invasion of the USSR. It was one of the few towns that fell to the Germans intact, and it became an important administrative base. Prior to the Germans' arrival, some Jews had managed to evacuate to the east, while men of military age were drafted into the Red Army. Approximately half of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town under German occupation.

Throughout the occupation, the town was ruled by a German military administration. In October 1941, a military field commandant was established in the town (Feldkommandantur 528), which also supervised the activities of the local commandant's office (Ortskommandantur). At the beginning of March 1942, a new local commandant's office (Ortskommandantur I/888) arrived in Klintsy from France, assuming control of the town and also the surrounding area. In the fall of 1941, Unit 729 of the Secret Field Police (Geheime Feldpolizei, GFP) arrived in Klintsy; it was mainly engaged in fighting against Soviet partisans. In the last days of September or the beginning of October 1941, a subunit of the Security Police's Einsatzgruppe B, Sonderkommando 7b (commanded by SS-Sturmbannführer Günther Rausch), arrived in Klintsy, where it was stationed until the end of February, being replaced up to the end of April 1942 by Sonderkommando 7a (commanded by SS-Obersturmbannführer Albert Rapp). Sonderkommando 7b established a local town administration in Klintsy, headed by the ethnic German (Volksdeutsche) Gretsikii, and also a Russian local police unit (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local citizens, which played an active role in the anti-Jewish Aktions.¹

Immediately after the occupation of the town, the military administration ordered the registration of all local Jews and their recruitment for hard labor. An order published in the German-controlled Klintsy newspaper (issue no. 1, September 26, 1941) announced that by the end of September all Jews, male and female, aged over 10 years were obligated to wear a yellow Star of David 10 centimeters (4 inches) in diameter.²

At the end of September 1941, Sonderkommando 7b organized the first anti-Jewish Aktion in Klintsy. According to an Einsatzgruppen report, during this Aktion “83 Jewish terrorists and 3 Communist Party leaders were killed (liquidated),” and during subsequent Aktions “3 Communist officials, 1 politician, and 82 Jewish terrorists” were murdered, making a total of at least 165 Jews and 7 Communist victims.³

At the beginning of October 1941, Sonderkommando 7b ordered that the Jews in town were to be relocated into a ghetto on the edge of town, which was guarded by the Russian local police.⁴ In the ghetto, the Germans established workshops for shoemakers. Jewish doctors, barbers, and typists were conscripted to serve the German and local authorities.⁵ One Jewish female baby was rescued from the ghetto and eventually adopted by her family’s non-Jewish housekeeper.⁶

The ghetto in Klinty existed for more than two months. On December 6–7, 1941, Einsatzkommando 8, which was located in Gomel’ (commanded by SS-Obersturmführer Wilhelm Schulz), assisted by men of the Russian Ordnungsdienst, murdered the inhabitants of the ghetto.⁷ In the course of these two days they shot about 2,500 people. Afterwards a number of Jewish specialist workers remained in the town with their families. These Jews were arrested successively and held in prison before being murdered in March 1942. The order for this mass shooting of at least 100 Jews was given by Rapp of Sonderkommando 7a. In addition to the Jews, the Security Police shot 30 Gypsies (Roma), who had also been collected in the prison.⁸

KRASNYI

Pre-1941: Krasnyi, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast’; RSFSR; 1941–1943: Krasnij, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Krasnyi, Russian Federation

Krasnyi is located about 50 kilometers (31 miles) southwest of Smolensk. In 1939, there were about 100 Jews living in Krasnyi.

Units of German Army Group Center occupied Krasnyi on July 13, 1941. The office of a German military commandant (Ortskommandantur) administered the town. The commandant appointed a Russian mayor and a local Russian police force (Ordnungsdienst), which was designated by armbands and armed with rifles.

On July 26, 1941, the commandant called the residents of the town to a meeting and announced that anyone who wanted to could move into a house belonging to a Jew and that all Jews had to obey the orders issued by the German Army. Soon after this German forces entered Jewish apartments, beating the inhabitants and taking their boots.

On August 8, 1941, soldiers of a German Death’s Head Unit (Totenkopfverband) arrested Boris Semenovitch Glushkin and humiliated him. The next day they announced that he would be publicly executed. First they stripped him naked, then dragged him behind a horse until he was half-dead, before killing him. The Germans also raped his wife.¹

On August 27, 1941, a German special unit arrived in the town and collected the Jews together. They issued instructions for the Jews to surrender their possessions and move into the ghetto. The Germans fenced off a piece of ground with barbed wire and put up a sign that read: “Ghetto. No entrance.” All Jews, including children, had to wear six-pointed stars on their clothing cut from bright yellow material. Anyone was permitted to insult or beat a Jew with impunity.

According to the account of Sophia Glushkin, subsequent “checks” were carried out regularly in the ghetto at night. “People were herded into the cemetery, girls were raped, and people were beaten unconscious.”²

Some younger Jews escaped from the ghetto to the forest and joined the Soviet partisans. However, it was not possible for the older people or women with children to escape in this way. On April 8, 1942, Glushkin learned that a German punitive unit had arrived in the town, and with some others she decided to flee.

The German forces and their local police collaborators surrounded the town and hunted down the Jews. They gathered the Jews in a yard and made them remove their clothes before shooting them so that they would fall into a pit. After the mass shooting, the Germans returned to the ghetto to look for any items of value and also discovered and murdered a baby who had been left behind in a crib.³

In liquidating the ghetto on April 8, 1942, the German forces (probably a detachment of Einsatzgruppe B) shot about 30 Jews. In total at least 63 Jews lost their lives in the Krasnyi ghetto.⁴

Sophia Glushkin with her eight-year-old son managed to make it to the nearby prisoner-of-war camp, where she had some contacts. From there she escaped to the partisans, where she served for two years as a courier and endured many hardships until the Red Army liberated the area.⁵

LIUBAVICHI

Pre-1941: Liubavichi (Yiddish: Liubavich), village, Rudnia raion, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Ljubawitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Liubavichi, Russian Federation

Liubavichi is located 75 kilometers (47 miles) west of Smolensk. By 1926, the number of Jews there stood at 967, or 50 percent of the population.

German forces of Army Group Center occupied Liubavichi on July 21–22, 1941. Approximately one month later, the German military commandant issued an order requiring Jews, under penalty of death, to wear badges in the form of circular patches of yellow fabric on their chests and backs and, subsequently, an armband. They were forbidden to have any contacts with German soldiers and the local population. Soon after this, a number of Jewish men were sent to Rudnia to work, but they never returned.¹

The Jewish population was subjected to various humiliations. People were lined up in formation and made to run. The Nazis knew that Liubavichi was a Jewish religious center and called it a “holy city of Jehovah, rabbis, and ritual murders.” Therefore, the treatment of observant elderly men was particularly cruel. Public floggings were held daily. The men’s beards were pulled out with pliers, and they were forced to dance on the parchment of the Torah scrolls. Then they were shot.²

On September 27, 1941, a detachment of the Security Police and SD from Einsatzkommando 8 arrived in Liubavichi from Rudnia (one witness stated that the detachment was based in Mogilev), accompanied by members of the Rudnia local police force. Assisted by the local police of Liubavichi, they started moving the Jewish population into a ghetto. The Jews were allowed to take with them only what they could carry. The property left behind was confiscated, in part by local policemen and some items were sent to Rudnia. The oppressors assembled all the Jews in the central square of the village, where they took away their warm clothing, kitchen utensils, and other items. Under the pretext of assigning them to work, they selected and escorted away 17 Jewish men, who apparently were shot.³

Allocated to the ghetto were 19 small houses on one of the village streets in which 500 to 600 people were forced to reside: alongside the residents of Liubavichi were also refugees from Orsha, Vitebsk, Smolensk, and Rudnia. The majority of the Jews in the ghetto were craftsmen before the occupation, working in the village’s artels. Going outside the ghetto’s boundaries was forbidden. On the road leading into the ghetto, a police post was set up, and unauthorized persons were denied access to the ghetto.

Inside the ghetto, the Jews lived in extremely congested conditions, with 20 to 30 individuals crowded into a single room. The prisoners in the ghetto were not supplied with food. They built and repaired roads and bridges and did other types of heavy labor. Because of poor sanitation and physical exhaustion, various diseases spread among the Jews. Apparently, several dozen people died in the ghetto before its liquidation. The mortality rate among children was especially high. As one of the witnesses, a Liubavichi resident, noted, the Jewish population was placed in circumstances that doomed it to extinction.⁴

In early November 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 and the Rudnia local police arrived in Liubavichi again. Several times they tried to gather the Jews together within the confines of the ghetto, in a pasture where livestock were usually put to graze, but the Jews kept running off in different directions. As one woman, a Liubavichi resident, recalls, the Jews were treated worse than cattle. Those who tried to escape were shot on the spot.⁵

On the night of November 4, 1941, Russian policemen from Rudnia and Liubavichi, under the leadership of Security Police and SD officials, encircled the ghetto. The next morning, under the pretext of sending the Jews to perform agricultural work, they led them out of the ghetto into the center of the village. The aged and the ill, along with the bodies of those shot at the previous assembly site, were taken in carts. In the main square of the village, the ghetto inmates were divided into two groups of about 250 people each. One group was herded into the basement of the Church of the Dormition (Tserkov' Uspe-niia Bogoroditsy), the other into a large barn. Around noon, beating the first group of Jews with whips, the German and Russian policemen drove them towards the southern edge of the village and herded them into a slaughterhouse building. From there they led the Jews in groups of 20 to 30 to a small ditch. They made the victims lie facedown on the ground, then shot them with submachine guns. The shooting was carried out by officials of the Security Police and SD. The Germans made parents lie down on the corpses with their small children. After the shooting of the first group of Jews, the second group was murdered in the same way. The shooting lasted about one and a half to two hours. Then the Russian policemen made a group of male village residents cover the grave. The Russian policemen also finished off those Jews who were trying to find their way out from under the mountain of corpses, and they buried some who were still alive. The corpses were lightly covered with earth.⁶

In 1943, after the Red Army liberated Liubavichi, the grave was opened, and 483 corpses were found there. In the file of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) on the opening of the grave of the murdered Jews, it was stated that "the corpses of the children in most cases were found in the embrace of adult corpses." It was also noted that "the presence of corpses with no signs of damage leads one to assume that these victims of the German fascist invaders were buried alive, which should apply in particular to individuals who were young children."⁷

A few small children succeeded in escaping from the execution site. They all returned to Liubavichi, to their own homes, where members of the local police seized them. They gathered the children together in a single house, then shot them. Their bodies were tossed into the grave of the murdered Jews.⁸

The report of Einsatzgruppe B for December 19, 1941, contains information about the shooting in Liubavichi of 492 Jews of both genders. It was reported that they had been shot "for hostile attitudes towards the Germans and for sympathizing with the partisans."⁹ According to ChGK data, more than 500 Jews were shot in Liubavichi.¹⁰

Along with the Security Police and SD, the German army and, in particular, the local Ortskommandantur (OK (II) 930) also bear responsibility for the extermination of the Jewish population of Liubavichi. The German military authorities represented the murders of the Jews as a measure taken in response to partisan attacks. A man named Korotchenkov headed the detachment of the Rudnia local police that participated in setting up the ghetto in Liubavichi in September 1941. Subsequently the Germans shot him for concealing property stolen from the Jews.¹¹ Divakov, the deputy chairman of the Rudnia raion authority, headed the detachment of Russian police that came from Rudnia and participated in the extermination of the inmates of the Liubavichi ghetto on November 4.¹² The local police, under the command of a man named Astrakhanskii, took part in all the cleansing Aktions against the Jews in Liubavichi. He and two other former policemen from Liubavichi were tried by the Soviet authorities in Rudnia. The court sentenced them to be hanged for participation in the shooting of the families of Communists and partisans and in the murder of the Jewish population.¹³

LOKNIA

Pre-1941: Loknia, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Loknija, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Loknia, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Loknia is located 60 kilometers (37 miles) north-northwest of Velike Luki on the railway line running from Vitebsk to Leningrad. According to the 1939 census, there were 193 Jews living in Loknia, accounting for 8.8 percent of the total population.

German armed forces occupied the village on July 20, 1941, four weeks after their invasion of the USSR on June 22. During that time, a large portion of the Jews managed to evacuate eastward, and men liable for military service were inducted into the Red Army. At the start of the occupation, 52 Jews remained in the village.¹

Throughout the entire occupation period—from July 1941 to February 1944—a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) governed the village. The German military administration created a raion authority and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local inhabitants.

Soon after the occupation of the village, the German military commandant's office ordered the raion authority to organize the registration and marking of the Jews, as well as their deployment for various types of forced labor. In September 1941, all the Jews remaining in Loknia were forced to move into a ghetto, for which the house at 11 Sotsialisticheskaya Street was allocated; a Jewish family, the Filonovskii, had lived in the house previously.² The ghetto was in existence for more than four months. It was liquidated on February 1, 1942, by shooting all the Jews, 38 in total.³ The shooting took place outside the village, near the Machine Tractor Station (MTS); the Jews were taken there in a truck and a bus. At first they were crowded into the MTS building, but then they were led out 2 at a time to a pit near the building, made to kneel beside the pit, and killed with a shot to the back of the head.⁴ The shooting was carried out by an SD detachment (commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Hermann Hubig) that was part of Einsatzgruppe A, with the participation of Russian policemen. (Actually, 37 Jews were shot. A bullet struck Aleksandr Filonovskii's hat; he fell into the pit, and after the shooting was finished, he climbed out and hid in various villages until the liberation of Loknia in February 1944.)

In the spring of 1942, two more Jewish families were shot: one in the Loknia sel'sovet and one in the Olokhov sel'sovet; in late 1942, the four members of the Sandalovskii family were shot.⁵

MGLIN

Pre-1941: Mglin, town and raion center, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Briansk oblast', Russian Federation

Mglin is located 100 kilometers (62 miles) west-southwest of Briansk. In 1939, 726 Jews (10 percent of the local population) were living in Mglin.

German forces occupied Mglin on August 18, 1941. By this time, a number of local Jews had managed to escape to the east. Jewish men liable for military service were drafted into the Red Army. At the start of the German occupation, just over two thirds of the pre-war Jewish population was still in the town. From October 1941, Mglin was subordinated to the military field headquarters (Feldkommandantur) FK (V) 528 based in Klinty. In Mglin the German military authorities established a local administration and a Russian auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local inhabitants.

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the town administration organized the registration and marking of the Jews with distinctive symbols. Furthermore, the Jews were forced to perform physically demanding labor of all kinds. On January 21, 1942, all the Jews of Mglin were resettled into a ghetto. The building of the local prison was chosen to serve as the ghetto. The Russian guards who supervised the Jewish prisoners took away their coats and boots. There were no windows in the cells of the prison. The heating system did not function, which meant that during the very cold winter many inmates developed frostbite.¹ About 60 people died of starvation and disease inside the ghetto.²

On March 2, 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. On this day a subunit of Sonderkommando 7a, which had arrived from Klinty under the leadership of SS-Obersturmführer Franz Tormann, shot about 500 Jews with the assistance of the Russian auxiliary police. The majority of the victims were women and children. The Russian police took the outer clothes and any valuables from the half-starved victims and escorted them to the grave site at the edge of a forest about 500 meters (1,640 feet) from the prison ghetto. Some 10 to 20 SS men conducted the shooting. In the course of the Aktion, one member of the SS unit, SS-Oberscharführer Hermann Glockmann, was killed accidentally when a bullet ricocheted off the frozen ground and struck him directly in the heart.³ During the Aktion, some Jews succeeded in hiding, but on the following day, 7 of these individuals were captured and shot.⁴

In June 1942, Feldkommandantur 528 sent to the Reich War Booty Office (Reichshauptkasse Beutestelle) in Berlin some gold coins that had been confiscated from the deputy head of the local Russian police in Mglin. He was shot, apparently for the illegal possession of property.⁵

Tormann was sentenced on February 10, 1966, to three years' imprisonment.⁶

MIKULINO

1938–1941: Mikulino, village, Rudnia raion, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Russian Federation

Mikulino is located on the shores of a small lake close to the border with Belarus, 69 kilometers (43 miles) west-northwest of Smolensk. According to the 1939 census in the former raion of Rudnia (not counting Rudnia), there were 556 Jews.

Mechanized units of Army Group Center occupied the village in July 1941, approximately four weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. In these four weeks, a portion of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and eligible men volunteered for or were conscripted into the Red Army.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ordered the village administration to organize the registration of the Jews. The Jews were also required to wear distinctive yellow patches and had to perform heavy labor of various kinds, including work on the nearby kolkhoz. German soldiers made their quarters in the local school.¹

In August 1941, the Germans established a ghetto in the village. The transfer into the ghetto took place late in the evening, when local Russian police summoned all the Jews to leave their houses and forcibly moved them to Barkovskaia Street.² The local authorities designated five houses that had been vacated by their Russian residents as the ghetto. The ghetto was not enclosed by a fence but was guarded by the Russian police, and the Jews were not allowed to leave that street. Including refugees from Smolensk and Rudnia, around 250 Jews resided in the ghetto, with about 50 people sharing each house; many people had to sleep on boards or on the floor.³ There was a terrible shortage of food, and some of the young people occasionally left the ghetto to beg for food from the peasants. As there was little opportunity to wash, disease soon spread, and many children and elderly ghetto inhabitants died. Survivors do not recall any Jewish leadership within the ghetto. Harassment was common, including beatings, thefts, and some rape attempts by the Russian police. In the winter of 1941–1942, most of the Jews did not try to escape, as they had received news of the Soviet counteroffensive and expected to be liberated by the Red Army soon.⁴

On February 22, 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. They took the remaining 200 or so Jews to Rudnia and shot them there two days later.⁵ German Security Police from Einsatzkommando 9 and local Russian police carried out the mass shooting. The synagogues and Jewish books in Mikulino were destroyed during the German occupation.⁶

MONASTYRSHCHINA

Pre-1941: Monastyrshchina, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Monastyrshchina, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Monastyrshchina, Russian Federation

Monastyrshchina is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) south-southwest of Smolensk, on the Vikhra River. There were 856 Jews living there in 1939.

On July 18, 1941, units of German Army Group Center entered Monastyrshchina. In July and August, the occupying authorities hanged a number of Soviet activists and Jews in the town square. Among those executed were the head of the Jewish kolkhoz and a Jewish doctor, who was accused of trying to poison the Germans.

German soldiers and members of the local Russian auxiliary police (Ordnungsdienst) also robbed the Jewish population. They took any valuable items, cattle, and other property.

Sometime in September 1941, a detachment of the "Vorkommando Moskau" section of Einsatzgruppe B arrived in Monastyrshchina and ordered the marking and registration of the Jewish population. This visit was reportedly in response to the "daring and defiant" behavior of the Jews. The Jews had to wear a yellow Star of David on their clothing. All Jews were resettled into a ghetto and were allowed to bring in only their most essential items.¹

The Germans established the ghetto on one of the streets on the outskirts of town. Approximately 30 houses near the Zhelezniak River were designated for this purpose. Around 800 Jews were moved into the ghetto. In addition, the OD was ordered by the occupying authorities to round up all Jews in the villages of the Rayon Monastyrshchina and move them into the ghetto. The ghetto was surrounded by a fence, and the inmates were guarded by Russian policemen.²

The majority of the prisoners in the ghetto had large families with many children. The average age of the men was 45 years old. Those brought into the ghetto included traders, kolkhoz workers, and many who were in service professions. The women were mostly homemakers.³

All able-bodied persons were sent out of the ghetto to perform various kinds of forced labor. The prisoners of the ghetto did not receive sufficient rations and suffered from hunger. During the harsh winter of 1941–1942, furniture was burned for heating purposes, along with anything else the inmates could find. People in the ghetto suffered from infectious diseases, including typhus. Ivan Blinov, the head of the OD in Rayon Monastyrshchina, became known for "treating the Jews with cruelty and callous disregard for their lives."⁴

Before the ghetto was liquidated, a site for mass shootings had already been selected to deal with those Jews caught outside the ghetto or trying to escape its confines. In December 1941, V. Grachev, the head of the second department of the OD, shot a Jewish woman and her two children, who were 3 and 6 years old. At the start of January 1942, six women and a 12-year-old girl were shot. In the same month, another six Jews were shot at the Jewish cemetery. The killings were carried out by three Germans and a number of Russian policemen.

In February 1942, 10 SS officers from Einsatzkommando 8 (members of the Security Police and SD) arrived in Monastyrshchina.⁵ Also taking part in the mass shootings were Russian policemen (OD) under the command of the mayor of Monastyrshchina, Trofim Savel'ev, and a detachment of "Ukrainian Cossacks," composed of Ukrainians and former Soviet prisoners of war.

The prisoners were driven out of the ghetto with blows from rifle butts and lashes and were placed in four houses guarded by the Ukrainians. Next, 100 of them were transported to a cheese-processing factory and herded into the basement. From there, the Jews were taken out in smaller groups to the large ravine called "Chertov Iar," located on the outskirts of Monastyrshchina.⁶

Near the ravine, all were ordered to strip naked, despite the brutal cold. Anyone who refused was beaten cruelly. The Jews were then ordered to lie down at the bottom of the ditch, where they were shot with automatic rifles. The Aktion continued in this manner, as subsequent groups of Jews had to lie down on top of the corpses before they were shot in turn. Bodies of new rows of victims piled up on top of some who were only wounded.⁷ The perpetrators also buried young children who were still alive. When a policeman named Dudin was apprehended subsequently by the Soviet authorities and asked if he threw young children into the ditch alive, he responded, "I did not throw them, I was putting them down."⁸

As the ghetto prisoners were taken to the killing site, a three-year-old boy attempted to escape and hid among the residents of Monastyrshchina who were some distance away. However, Russian policemen captured the boy and killed him by smashing his head on the ground. Moreover, the OD found and shot a number of Jews who were hiding in Monastyrshchina. A month after the liquidation of the ghetto, on the orders of the German military commandant, Captain Rechke, and the mayor of the town, Trofim Savel'ev, 49 Jews who were incarcerated and had remained alive after the first Aktion were also shot.⁹

In February and March 1942, more than 800 Jews in total were shot in Monastyrshchina.¹⁰ During the same period, Jews from the ghetto in Tatarsk were also shot. According to the findings of the Smolensk provincial committee for the investigation of the crimes committed by the Nazis in the years 1941–1942, 1,700 Jews were executed in the Monastyrshchina raion of the Smolensk oblast'.¹¹

As a rule, the Nazis also murdered the children of mixed (Jewish/non-Jewish) marriages. In Monastyrshchina, two Russian residents had to bring their wives and children to the killing site and watch as they were shot. The Germans spared one 11-year-old child whose Russian father was at the front and whose Jewish mother and brother were murdered.¹²

Isaak Rozenberg, a resident of Monastyrshchina was hidden by his Russian wife for more than two years, concealed in an underground bunker behind the stove. She only went down to visit him at night. His two young children did not even know that their mother was hiding their father underground. In September 1943, in the course of a battle between the Red Army and retreating German soldiers in Monastyrshchina, Rozenberg's home was burned down, and he died of smoke inhalation.¹³

Prime responsibility for organizing the murder of the Jews of the ghetto lies with Paul Rechke, who was in command of Ortskommandantur (OK) (I)/292¹⁴ in Monastyrshchina at that time, and members of the detachment of Einsatzkommando 8. After the liberation of the town, Soviet authorities arrested several members of the collaborating local police (OD).¹⁵ In October 1942, the former head of the Monastyrshchina police, V. Borozdin, and the former head of the second detachment of the Monastyrshchina police, V. Grachev, were sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment.

NAL'CHIK

Pre-1942: Nal'chik, capital, Kabardino-Balkar ASSR, RSFSR; October 1942–January 1943: Naltschik, Army Group A (Heeresgruppe A); post-1991: Nal'chik, Kabardino-Balkar Republic (Kabardino-Balkaria), Russian Federation

Nal'chik is located about 600 kilometers (373 miles) south-east of Rostov on Don. According to the 1939 population census, 3,007 Jews were living in Nal'chik (6.27 percent of the total population). After the German invasion of the USSR in June 1941, a number of Jewish men were recruited into the Red Army, and some others managed to flee or were evacuated before the German advance into the region in the fall of 1942. There were likely about 1,000 to 1,200 Mountain Jews who remained in and around Nal'chik at the start of the German occupation, as well as a few score of Ashkenazi Jews, including some refugees from towns and cities further to the west.

German forces of Heeresgruppe A captured the city at the end of October 1942. During the occupation, which lasted until early January 1943, the German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur I/794) administered the city. Ortskommandantur I/794 was subordinated to the field commandant's office (Feldkommandantur 248) in Piatigorsk. The German military administration established a local city council and recruited an auxiliary police force from among local residents. Sonderkommando 10b, commanded by SS-Sturmbannführer Alois Persterer and belonging to Einsatzgruppe D, was stationed in the city in November and December 1942.

Shortly after the occupation of the city, the occupying authorities issued orders calling for the registration of the Jews, the confiscation of their possessions, and the introduction of forced labor for Jews. The Jews also were ordered to wear distinctive markers in the image of a six-pointed star. Consequently, they tried not to venture out into the streets.

According to Soviet sources, German security forces (probably of Sonderkommando 10b) murdered most of the Ashkenazi Jews at some time during the first weeks of the occupation. About 10 Mountain Jews were also shot at this time, probably as alleged Soviet activists.¹

In November 1942, a camp or form of "open ghetto" was established in the city. It was an isolated district into which the Mountain Jews were resettled from different areas of the city.² Some sources describe it rather as a camp, noting that the Mountain Jews did not receive any provisions, although most of them probably survived here until the Red Army returned.³

The regulation for the marking of the Jews was changed after December 6, 1942, on the orders of Feldmarschall Ewald von Kleist, the commanding officer of the 1st Panzer Army, after negotiations by the city's Jewish community with the occupying authorities. Some witnesses recalled that the Jews were required to wear yellow armbands before setting out for labor. Around the same time, a Judenrat consisting of five individuals was formed in Nał'chik.⁴ In December 1942, the head of Einsatzgruppe D, SS-Oberführer Bierkamp, visited the Mountain Jews in the "environs of Nał'chik," where he "received a welcome reception and declared that other than their common religion, they [the Mountain Jews (Bergjuden)] had nothing to do with the Jews." Along with this, Bierkamp issued an order to the occupying organs not to harm the Mountain Jews and in general did not speak of them as Jews but as "Taten" (as the local Jews called themselves).⁵ It is likely that for this reason most of the city's Mountain Jews remained alive.

On January 1, 1943, a few dozen Jewish men, women, and children (probably refugees from the western regions of the Soviet Union) were shot in Nał'chik. SS-Sturmabführer Eduard Jedamzik organized the mass shooting on the day after he took over command of Sonderkommando 10b on New Year's Eve. The Jews were shot in an antitank ditch just outside the city and buried on top of the victims of a previous mass shooting. The fur coats of the victims were distributed among the men of the Sonderkommando, who then drank schnaps before evacuating the city to the north.

NEVEL'

Pre-1941: Nevel', town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Newel, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Nevel' Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Nevel' is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) southwest of Velike Luki. According to the Soviet census, in 1939 there were 3,178 Jews living in Nevel', comprising 20.4 percent of the total population.

After bombarding the town, German forces of Army Group Center captured Nevel' on July 16, 1941. Because of the town's good rail communications, many Jews were able to evacuate to the east in the four weeks following the start of the German invasion, while men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Some Jews, however, soon returned to their homes due to misleading information in the Soviet media. Less than one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Nevel' at the start of the occupation.

During the period of occupation, from July 1941 until October 1943, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town. The German military established a local administration and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local residents.

Soon after the occupation of the town, Sonderkommando (Sk) 7a established a Jewish Council (Judenrat). The Judenrat was responsible for registering the entire Jewish population. It also had to ensure that the Jews wore distinguishing marks in the form of a yellow star. Able-bodied Jews were formed into work details for various kinds of manual labor, especially cleaning up the town following the bombardment. Jews were also looted and robbed from the first days of the occupation. In the first half of August 1941, a detachment of Sonderkommando 7a, which was headed by SS-Obersturmführer Friedrich Meyer, shot 74 Jews, allegedly in retribution for an arson attack by Jews in the town.¹ A Jewish survivor recalls that after the fire all the Jews were gathered together, at which point 25 of the strongest young men were shot in front of everyone.²

On August 7, 1941, all the Jews of the town were resettled into a ghetto, which was located approximately 3 kilometers (1.9 miles) outside the town, in the "Golubaia Dacha" (Blue Dacha) Park.³ The ghetto consisted of an area fenced off by barbed wire, which included several very overcrowded houses and wooden shacks, as well as dugouts prepared in the ground that were also used by the Jews for shelter. The precise number of ghetto inmates is unknown, but it was probably around 700. Some Jews may have been brought into the Nevel' ghetto from the surrounding area.⁴

The ghetto existed for only about one month. In September 1941, Dr. Alfred Filbert, in charge of Einsatzkommando 9 based in Vitebsk, sent a detachment headed by SS-Untersturmführer Heinrich Tunnat to Nevel' in response to reports of Soviet partisans being active in the area. Tunnat soon reported on the ghetto in Nevel' to Dr. Filbert, who ordered Tunnat to shoot the Jews as soon as possible. According to the report of Einsatzgruppe B, a German doctor had detected an outbreak of disease in the ghetto, which was then liquidated to prevent the contagion from spreading.

At some time in the first week of September 1941, a squad of Waffen-SS commanded by SS-Untersturmbannführer Waldemar Clauss drove the Jews out of the ghetto and escorted them to a site nearby, where Soviet prisoners of war had recently prepared a large pit. At the killing site, the Jews were ordered to remove their outer clothing, which was neatly piled up by the head of the Judenrat. The Jews were then shot into the pit by a squad of five or six men armed with machine pistols. Members of the Russian police also participated in the shooting. According to the Einsatzgruppen report, the forces of Einsatzkommando 9 shot 640 Jews during the Aktion. Afterwards the remaining buildings of the ghetto were burned to the ground.⁵ Only a handful of Jews managed to escape from the ghetto and avoid the roundups, living in hiding, on the “Aryan” side, or serving with the Soviet partisans until the Red Army liberated the area in October 1943.⁶

NOVOZYBKOV

Pre-1941: Novozybkov, town and raion center, Orel oblast’, RSFSR; 1941–1943: Nowosybkow, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Novozybkov, Briansk oblast’, Russian Federation

Novozybkov is located 60 kilometers (37 miles) northeast of Gomel’ on the railway line from Gomel’ to Briansk. In 1939, there were 3,129 Jews (12.78 percent of the total); an additional 213 Jews lived in the villages of the Novozybkov raion.

Following an aerial bombardment, which killed a number of civilians, German forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on August 16, 1941. In the two months following the start of the German invasion in June, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and the Soviet authorities inducted many men into the Red Army. The rapid progress of the German advance forced back to Novozybkov some of those who sought to flee following the bombing.¹ Around one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the occupation.

Until the Germans’ retreat on September 25, 1943, the town was run by a German military commandant’s office (Ortskommandantur), which was subordinated to the Feldkommandantur in Gomel’. The German military authorities established a town administration and organized a local police force (Ordnungsdienst) from among the residents of Novozybkov. Shortly after the occupation began, the town administration organized the registration of the Jews and subjected them to various forms of forced labor; for example, some Jewish women had to clean the toilets in the prison. Jewish homes were marked with yellow stars, and the Jews had to wear yellow stars on their chests. German soldiers were quartered in some Jewish homes, confining the Jewish families to just one room. The Germans shot an unknown number of Jews and suspected Communists, mostly adult men, during the first weeks of the occupation.²

In October or November of 1941, the Ortskommandantur ordered the establishment of a ghetto in Novozybkov. The ghetto comprised approximately five streets. Reports differ on whether or not the ghetto was enclosed with barbed wire.³ However, Russian police were present during the day to prevent Jews from leaving the area without permission. The sole Jewish survivor interviewed in the 1990s does not recall there being a “Jewish Soviet” [Jewish Council] in the ghetto nor encountering there any Jewish refugees from outside Novozybkov.⁴

By early 1942, news had arrived in Novozybkov of the fate of the Jews in Klinty, where German forces from Gomel’ had liquidated the ghetto in early December 1941.⁵ After this, the Jews had few illusions about their own chances of survival, especially as some non-Jewish acquaintances now advised them to run away or hide. Bella Nepomniashchaia was able to escape with her mother on the eve of the liquidation, and she convinced a Russian policeman that she was not Jewish, assisted by her appearance. She received aid in the form of food from some local non-Jews but also had to sleep outside in freezing weather before she was able to link up with the Soviet partisans.⁶

The available sources give somewhat contradictory information on the liquidation of the Novozybkov ghetto. German Security Police forces from Einsatzgruppe B, either part of Sonderkommando 7a based in Klinttsy, or from Trupp Schulz subordinated to Einsatzkommando 8 in Gomel', arrived in Novozybkov in early 1942 (snow was still on the ground) to organize the murder of the "Jews and Communists" in the town with the assistance of the local Russian police.⁷ It appears that several pits were prepared in advance, according to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), in the Karkhovsk Forest near the railroad station.⁸ On the day before the Aktion, the Jews (more than 800 souls) were all confined within the meeting room of the match factory.⁹ According to one version in the ChGK materials, the Germans and their collaborators shot the remaining 950 Jews (men, women, and children); sources date the Aktion as occurring on either January 18 or February 18, 1942.¹⁰ A German witness, who was a member of a Landeschützen Battalion stationed in Novozybkov at the time, mentions that 1,000 to 1,200 people were killed, although some sources indicate that non-Jews may have been among the victims on that day.¹¹ After the Aktion, the local police plundered the empty houses in the ghetto as they searched for Jews in hiding.

OPOCHKA

Pre-1941: Opochka, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Opotschka, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Opochka, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Opochka is located about 125 kilometers (78 miles) west-northwest of Velike Luki on the Velikaia River. According to the 1939 population census in Opochka, which at that time was part of the Kalinin oblast', 289 Jews lived in the city (2.59 percent of the total population). The town was occupied on July 9, 1941, a little over two weeks after the initial German invasion of the USSR on June 22. At that time a number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Men of an eligible age were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 200 Jews remained in the town under German occupation.

During the period of the occupation from July 1941 until July 1944, a German military commandant's office ran the affairs of the town. The German military commandant established a local administration and recruited a local police force (Ordnungsdienst) for security purposes from among the local residents.

Shortly after the occupation of the town, German security forces murdered a number of Jews at the Jewish cemetery. The German military commandant issued an order calling for the registration and marking of the Jews. They were also forced to perform heavy labor. In August 1941, all the remaining 100 to 200 Jews were resettled into a ghetto located in a half-burned barracks building.¹ The ghetto existed for more than six months. From November 1941 onward, groups of Jews were taken out and murdered near the villages of Maslovo and Pukhili. On March 9, 1942, the ghetto was liquidated, and German forces shot the last remaining 100 or so Jews.²

In the fall of 1943 the Germans dug up the bodies of their victims and burned them in an attempt to cover up the evidence.

PETROVICH

Pre-1941: Petrovichi, village, Shumiachi raion, Smolensk oblast’, RSFSR; 1941–1943: Petrowitschi, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Petrovichi, Russian Federation

Petrovichi is located 90 kilometers (56 miles) south-southeast of Smolensk. On the eve of war in 1939, the several hundred Jews living in Petrovichi accounted for about half of the village’s population. Some famous Jews were natives of Petrovichi: Isaac Asimov, who became a central figure in American science fiction, and Semen Lavochkin, who later became a designer of Soviet fighter aircraft.

German troops captured Petrovichi on August 2, 1941. Before the occupation, many Jewish families attempted to leave the village in horse-drawn carts. Almost all of them, however, were forced to turn back. Some Jews did not believe the Soviet propaganda and were in no hurry to evacuate. Only a few succeeded in escaping. One who did manage to leave with his family was Leib Ryskin, chairman of the Imeni Tret’ego Internatsionala (Third International) kolkhoz. His actions were influenced by a German leaflet that he happened to pick up along the road: “Pick up a stick, and drive the Yids back to Palestine!”¹

ple who had fled from other places or who had come to visit relatives during the summer vacation.² About 40 percent were women over the age of 16, and approximately one third of the ghetto’s prisoners were children under 16, based on the lists of Jews who were shot.³

The ghetto consisted of a single street, and as many as five or six families lodged in each house. Overcrowding was intense—everyone slept on the floor in a single row. German soldiers, followed by the local police, looted most of the possessions the Jews had been forced to leave behind in their former homes. All Jews were required to wear a badge with the word “Jude” sewn on their outer garments. A small plaque with the same inscription was affixed to every house in the ghetto. A Jewish elder (starosta) was chosen and required to report to the Kommandantur for the assignment of work details to the Jews.

German soldiers and Russian police constantly made the rounds of the Jews’ houses in the ghetto and robbed them of their meager belongings. Any attempt at resistance resulted in cruel beatings of the ghetto dwellers.

The oppressors subjected the Jews in the ghetto to refined taunts and seized any opportunity to kill them. Soon after the ghetto’s establishment, some of the men were taken forcibly and transported to an unknown destination; they never returned. Observant elderly men were subjected to savage treatment. Some of them were shot, and others were tied to wagons by their beards and dragged through the village.⁴

If no other work could be found for them, the Jews were made to carry manure from one place to another. The women had to hold the stable dung in their skirts, while the men were forced to use their hands. An eyewitness of the events described the German atrocities in detail:

Our stables all were about half a kilometer apart. And the Jews were ordered to pick up the manure with their hands and run, carrying it from one stable to another. Old men and young ones had to run and run without stopping. There was rain and slush. The children were crying. Even the mothers, grandmothers, and grandfathers were running, urged on by lashes, with manure in their hands. The people couldn’t keep it up, of course. I remember how Khana-Rokhl Ber-man, a neighbor, came running up to a stable and pushed her children inside, and later she went in behind them.

The Germans forced the Jews to lie on boxes used to hold potatoes, then lashed them and beat them with sticks. The others had to stand there and watch. The beatings continued until the person’s skin was stripped off, and pieces of scarlet flesh showed through. Sometimes they forced the Jews’ own comrades to flay them.⁵

of bread. With the help of the local residents, the Russian policemen caught him, put him in a cage, and humiliated him, beating him mercilessly. He showed the Germans his letters from relatives in America, counting on favorable treatment, but his efforts only brought him additional blows.

At night the Russian policemen used to drag young girls out of Jewish houses and rape them—frequently, they also killed them. Instances of Germans raping Jewish girls also took place. For example, the two Novikov sisters, who had fled to Petrovichi from Smolensk, were brutally raped. Afterwards the ghetto residents found one of the sisters hanged and the other murdered.

Part of the non-Jewish population of Petrovichi and the neighboring villages treated the Jews sympathetically. Some brought bread, milk, and other foodstuffs to their Jewish friends and acquaintances in the ghetto. Occasionally, local residents helped Jews who had escaped from the ghetto and hid them or their children. In most cases, however, the local collaborationist Russian police (Ordnungsdienst, or OD) hunted down the escaped Jews and killed them.⁶

According to German data, on May 31, 1942, 107 Jews were transferred from Petrovichi to Roslavl'. One of them was killed during an attempt to escape.⁷ The documents of the Smolensk Oblast' Commission contain a list of the names of 84 Jews sent from Petrovichi to the Roslavl' Gestapo.⁸ In Roslavl', the Jews from Petrovichi were most probably shot by forces subordinated to Sonderkommando 7c within a short time.

In early June 1942, the approximately 230 Jews remaining in the Petrovichi ghetto were shot.⁹ One week before the Aktion, they were rounded up and placed in five or six houses near the Jewish cemetery. Each house held about 40 people.

Thirty members of the local police (OD) who had come from Khislavichi, under the command of three Germans and the chief of the local police in Petrovichi, carried out the Aktion. Several dozen local inhabitants dug the pit. After the shooting, the same locals buried the victims' corpses. The shooting went on for three hours. The residents of Petrovichi were ordered to cover their windows and were forbidden to watch the Jews being led to their deaths. Later, those Jewish specialist workers who were kept alive at the time of the ghetto liquidation were also shot; they included several tailors, cobblers, and a saddler.

As the column of Jews moved towards the killing site, the student Sara Iasman, who had blue eyes and light, wavy hair, was repeatedly urged to leave, but she refused. Before she was shot, she cried out, "Fascists, you'll get what you deserve!"

Many Jews tried to run away once the mass shooting started, but they were mown down by submachine-gun fire. Sometime later, the Russian police found and shot young children who had escaped and were hidden before the ghetto prisoners were taken away to be shot. Those who had fled to other villages were caught and shot on the spot. Only one girl, who chanced upon a partisan detachment, and a 12-year-old boy managed to escape.

The inhabitants of the village of Stakhovshchina hid a woman doctor, Konikova, with her three sons. The chief of police in Shumiachi, Gavrilok (the Germans shot him along with his family), had given her a document certifying that her husband was a Russian. One year later, however, she was shot, and one month before the arrival of the Soviet forces, her children, whom the villagers had hidden, also were killed.

The day before the destruction of the ghetto, some 30 Jewish teens had left it. In the forest, they encountered a group of armed Soviet soldiers that happened to be in the area, and they formed a partisan detachment. Khaim Gurevich, an 18-year-old, became a platoon leader in the detachment, and his 15-year-old brother Lev was a scout. The detachment sabotaged railroads and highways, and it also engaged in heavy fighting against German units and detachments of the OD, which was receiving support from a portion of the local population. A betrayal resulted in the overwhelming defeat of the partisan detachment. Seriously wounded, Lev Gurevich was hidden by the family of Prokofii Ivanov, a teacher from the village of Kosachevki, and he spent eight months living in a hole dug beneath the cellar. Ivanov's wife was hanged.¹⁰

Pre-1941: Pochep, town and raion center, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Potschep, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Pochep, Briansk oblast', Russian Federation

Pochep is located about 80 kilometers (50 miles) to the southwest of Briansk on the Sudost' River and on the railway line from Moscow to Kiev. By 1939, the number of Jewish residents in the city stood at 2,314 people (14.87 percent of the total population). An additional 266 Jews were counted in the villages of the Pochep raion.

Units of the German XLVIIth Panzer Corps occupied Pochep on August 21, 1941, two months after the initial German invasion of the Soviet Union. During these two months, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army. Up to 75 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

During the period of occupation, which lasted until September 21, 1943, the Germans set up a military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) and a local administration in the city. They also recruited a Russian auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst, or OD) from among the local residents.

In March 1942, at the time of the mass killing, a 10-man detachment of the Secret Field Police (Geheime Feldpolizei, GFP) Unit 729 and a small detachment (2 or 3 men) of Sonderkommando 7a (part of Einsatzgruppe B) were based in the town.

Shortly after the start of the German occupation, the town administration organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were also forced to perform various forms of heavy labor.

Sometime at the start of 1942, the commandant's office in Pochep ordered the establishment of a ghetto. The ghetto consisted of a series of barracks on the grounds of a cabbage-pickling factory on the edge of the town, guarded by the OD.¹ It is possible that some Jews were also resettled into the ghetto from the outlying villages in the Pochep raion with the aid of the OD.

In March 1942, Sonderkommando 7a, under the command of Obersturmbannführer Albert Rapp based in Klintsy, organized the liquidation of the ghetto, shooting all the Jewish inmates. According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission, the number of victims was 1,854, including men, women, and children.² The shooting, which lasted several hours, was carried out by six men of Sonderkommando 7a, with the help of the OD who escorted the victims and members of the GFP 729 and Feldgendarmerie that cordoned off the area. The killing site was a large ditch, possibly prepared by the Russians as an antitank ditch, located less than 100 meters (328 feet) from the site of the ghetto.³

Pre-1941: Pochinok, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Potschinok, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Pochinok, Russian Federation

Pochinok is located 62 kilometers (39 miles) southeast of Smolensk on the rail line from Orel to Riga. According to the 1939 census, 283 Jews were living in Pochinok (8.89 percent of the total population).

German units of Army Group Center occupied the town on July 17, 1941, approximately four weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. During these four weeks, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army.

Shortly after the occupation of the town, in August 1941, the German Ortskommandantur appointed Dr. Nikolai Nikitin mayor (Bürgermeister) of Pochinok¹ and ordered the local administration to organize the registration and marking of the Jews. The Jewish population was also exploited for various forms of forced labor.

Sometime in August 1941, the German administration established a ghetto on the site of the Machine Tractor Station (MTS). German security forces, probably belonging to Einsatzkommando 9 or Trupp Smolensk, liquidated the ghetto on April 21, 1942,² when they shot up to 200 people.³

Basya Pikman, a Jewish woman who was fleeing from the Germans, was arrested by the Germans in Pochinok after the liquidation of most of the ghettos in the region. She was whipped and had her teeth knocked out as she was interrogated about her possible Jewish roots, but she remained silent. In Pochinok, she witnessed the Germans hang Russians. Fortunately she was released and managed to make her way further to the east and survive the occupation.

SOURCES Documents dealing with the persecution and murder of the Jews of Pochinok can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-44-629); GASmO; and USHMM (RG-22.002M, reel 10).

PSKOV

Pre-1941: Pskov, city and raion center, Leningrad oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Pleskau, initially Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord), then Gebiet Petschur, Generalkommissariat Estland; post-1991: Pskov, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Pskov is located 256 kilometers (159 miles) southwest of Leningrad on the Velikaia River. According to the 1939 census, 1,068 Jews lived in Pskov (1.77 percent of the total population).

On July 9, 1941, two and a half weeks after the initial German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, units of the 4th Panzer Division occupied the city. A significant portion of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Eligible men were mustered into the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 25 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the city at the start of the occupation.

In the summer and fall of 1941, a German military commandant's office ran the city. A local administration was set up, and an auxiliary police unit (Ordnungsdienst) was recruited from among the local population.

At the start of 1942, authority was transferred to the German civilian administration. Pskov became part of Gebiet Petschur. SA-Standartenführer Bombe became the Gebietskommissar. Major Warnholz of the Schutzpolizei became the SS- und Polizei-Standortführer (senior police leader) in the town. Leutnant Hermann Hidde of the Schutzpolizei became the Gendarmerie-Gebietsführer. In turn, Gebiet Petschur was incorporated into Generalkommissariat Estland. Initially the residence of the Gebietskommissar was located in Petschur but it was moved to Pskov in 1942 and remained there until 1944.¹

From July 10, 1941, the German Security Police detachment Sonderkommando 1a was located in Pskov. It was later reorganized into an outpost of the Security Police (Sipo-Hauptaussonstelle), which was subordinated to SS-Sturmbannführer Martin Sandberger, the Commander of the Security Police and SD (KdS) in Tallinn. The head of the Sipo-Hauptaussonstelle in 1941–1942 was SS-Obersturmführer Otto Bleymehl.

Shortly after the occupation of the city, the German military commandant's office ordered the registration of the Jews and the institution of forced manual labor. Jews were also required to wear a distinctive yellow patch on their clothing.

In August 1941, a ghetto was created in the city.² During the forced resettlement into the ghetto, 13 Jews were murdered.³ The ghetto existed until some time between December and February 1942, when German forces liquidated the ghetto by shooting all the Jews in the nearby village of Vasilevo.⁴ In June 1942, a number of Jewish doctors were murdered. They had been working in a hospital for those wounded in the war.⁵ Under these various circumstances, according to German sources, the Security Police (Sicherheitspolizei) shot 232 Jews in total.⁶

In November 1941, the commander of Sonderkommando 1a, SS-Sturmbannführer Martin Sandberger, forcibly resettled more than 100 Jews from Estonia together with other prisoners into a labor camp near Pskov. From February to April 1942, Höhere SS- und Polizeiführer (HSSPF) Russland-Nord under the command of SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln was stationed in Pskov. Jeckeln's command ordered that these Jews from Estonia should be eliminated quickly.⁷ The shootings were carried out by members of the Sipo-Hauptaussonstelle in Pskov with the assistance of the local police.

In September 1943, the Germans started to burn the bodies of the victims at the grave sites near Pskov in an effort to remove all traces of their crimes. The Red Army liberated the city in August 1944.

After the war, Otto Bleymehl was under investigation for some time, but the investigation was eventually discontinued.⁸

PUSTOSHKA

Pre-1941: Pustoshka, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Pustoshka, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Pustoshka, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Pustoshka is located 190 kilometers (118 miles) south-southeast of Pskov. According to the 1939 census for Pustoshka, the Jewish population stood at 308, comprising 11.9 percent of the total.

German units of Army Group North captured the town on July 15, 1941. During the intervening three weeks since the start of Germany's invasion of the USSR, many of the Jews had managed to evacuate to the east, and eligible males were ordered to report for military service in the Red Army. Around 20 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

During the entire period of occupation, from July 1941 to February 1944, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town. The German military administration created a local authority and police force (Ordnungsdienst), recruited from local residents.

Soon after the occupation of the town, the German Ortskommandantur ordered the registration and marking of the Jews with badges. The Jewish population also was forced to perform various types of heavy labor. In early February 1942, all the remaining Jews in the town were moved into a ghetto, consisting of a single building, which was either fenced in or guarded.¹ The ghetto existed for several weeks, until late February 1942, by which time all the Jews had been shot. According to one source, the total number of Jewish victims was 58.²

ROSLAVL'

Pre-1941: Roslavl', town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Roslavl, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Roslavl', Russian Federation

Roslavl' is located 107 kilometers (66 miles) southeast of Smolensk. According to the 1939 population census, 2,935 Jews lived in Roslavl'.

Following heavy aerial bombardments of the town in June and July 1941, German mobile forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on August 3. Due to its location on a main east-west railroad, a large portion of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east before the Germans' arrival. It is estimated that between 300 and 600 Jews remained in Roslavl' at the start of the German occupation. The German military administration established a local Russian auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst), which not only maintained order but also carried out repressive measures against the local population.

Shortly after the start of the occupation, the Germans hanged 4 people in the center of Roslavl' who had been denounced as Communists.¹ According to Soviet sources, on August 5–6, 1941, German security forces murdered a group of Jews, possibly as suspected Communist activists.² German sources indicate that probably in the first half of September 1941, the 2nd Platoon of the 2nd Company, Reserve Police Battalion 9, which was attached to Einsatzgruppe B, came to Roslavl', where it arrested and then shot about 50 men (mostly Jews). The same unit subsequently conducted a second Aktion in Roslavl' in which about 25 Jews (including some women) were arrested by members of the SD and shot by members of the battalion on a command from their platoon leader.

In October (or possibly the first part of November) 1941, the German military administration established a ghetto or "Jewish residential area" (Judenviertel) on Red Fleet Streets # 1 and # 2. All the Jews were moved into several empty houses and were prohibited from having any contact with the other residents of the town. The area was enclosed and guarded day and night to ensure that nobody escaped.³

In the fall of 1941, Roslavl' came under the control of Feldkommandantur (V) 199, which was subordinated to Security Division 286. Other units based in the town included a unit of Feldgendarmarie commanded by Leutnant Vogt, an OT unit, a bakery company, and a Luftwaffe repair unit. A detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 commanded by Kriminalkommissar Wilhelm Döring arrived in Roslavl' in mid-November 1941. It remained there until the end of December

1941, when it was replaced by a detachment of Sonderkommando 7c. German investigative records indicate that shortly after his arrival Döring received an unwritten order from Einsatzkommando 8 to shoot the Jews who had already been concentrated (ghettoized) in Roslavl'.⁴

According to Soviet sources, the German Security Police liquidated the ghetto in mid- or late November 1941.⁵ Einsatzgruppen report no. 148, dated December 19, 1941, stated that a total of 510 Jews of both sexes were shot in Shumiachi and Roslavl', on grounds of "public security and order." Testimonies by members of the Feldgendarmarie unit subordinated to Feldkommandantur (V) 199, based in Roslavl', give the figure of at least 200 Jews being shot there in the winter of 1941–1942.⁶

These testimonies and information from the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) permit a fairly detailed reconstruction of the ghetto liquidation Aktion in Roslavl'. A few days prior to the Aktion, a group of able-bodied Jews was selected from the ghetto and ordered to prepare a large pit under the supervision of the Russian Ordnungsdienst on the grounds of the Jewish cemetery. On the assigned day, men of the Feldgendarmarie were ordered to get up early in order to conduct a roundup in the Jewish quarter. These men claim that they thought initially the Jews were being assembled for transfer to a forced labor assignment. They searched the Judenviertel and collected together at one point about 200 Jews, including a number of women and children, who were then handed over to the men of the SD. The Jews were then escorted to a ditch about 6 meters by 5 meters and 2 meters deep (19.7 by 16.4 by 6.6 feet), which had been prepared at the cemetery, apparently located close to the POW camp on the southwestern edge of town. Here the Jews had to remove their outer clothing and were searched by the SD for any valuables. About seven or eight SD men then shot the Jews with machine pistols in groups of 2 to 5 people at the ditch. Children were thrown into the ditch and buried alive. The Feldgendarmarie served as an external cordon to guard the site against escape attempts and prevent onlookers from approaching. The Jews remained calm throughout the Aktion, more or less resigned to their fate. Among the victims was Dr. Magidson of the children's hospital. Afterwards, Döring reported the date and the number of people shot back to the headquarters of Einsatzkommando 8.⁷

Local resident Nikolai Karpov recalled that after a few days it became known that the houses of the ghetto were empty again, and people who lived nearby reported with horror that all the inhabitants, including women, children, and the elderly, had been shot near the old Jewish cemetery and that the graves had been hastily covered with earth. Russian policemen then plundered the houses of the ghetto. He observed how one policeman attempted to remove the cow that had formerly belonged to the large family of a Jewish tailor, but the cow did not want to go with someone it did not know.⁸

In the two months following the Aktion, about 20 more Jews were brought into Roslavl' by Wehrmacht patrols in the surrounding countryside and placed in the SD prison. These Jews of all ages and both sexes had been denounced by local inhabitants and handed over to the Wehrmacht. They were subsequently shot together with other prisoners by the SD in the course of mass shootings conducted at irregular intervals to "make room" in the prison cells.⁹

The Red Army drove the Germans from Roslavl' on September 23, 1943. Only a handful of Jews from Roslavl' managed to survive on German-occupied territory, either hiding among the local population or serving with the Soviet partisans.¹⁰

RUDNIA

Pre-1941: Rudnia, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Rudnja, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Rudnia, Russian Federation

Rudnia is located 68 kilometers (42 miles) west-northwest of Smolensk on the railroad from Smolensk to Vitebsk. By 1939 there were 1,640 Jews living there.

Because of the rapid advance of the German army, only a small number of Jews were able to evacuate or escape from Rudnia in an organized fashion. Some Jewish families tried to leave the town to the east on foot or in carts, but they were ordered to turn back. German airplanes dispersed leaflets with the message: "Take up the stick, and drive the Jew to Palestine." Local collaborators took the Jews' livestock, vehicles, and other belongings. Those Jews who refused to comply were killed.

German forces captured Rudnia on July 14, 1941. Shortly after the occupation began, the occupying authorities registered Jews. Jews were ordered to sew yellow rings onto the backs of their clothing. In the first days of the occupation, German propaganda organs actively promoted antisemitic agitation among the local population. Many residents of Rudnia took advantage of this lawlessness to rob the Jews.

In August 1941, the German Ortskommandantur issued an order for all the Jews in Rudnia to be resettled into a ghetto. Those who refused to comply were to be shot on the spot. Jews who owned farm animals, such as cattle or poultry, were not permitted to bring their animals with them. The local police (Ordnungsdienst) used physical force to intimidate the Jews and confiscate their clothing, watches, domestic items, gold, silver, and other jewelry. One woman who survived the ghetto observed that "nothing was off limits to any of them."¹

The ghetto was established on one street in the town, and it consisted of 20 or so half-destroyed homes. It was fenced off with barbed wire and guarded by German soldiers and local police. Around 1,200 Jews, residents of Rudnia as well as Jewish refugees from the Baltic states and Belorussia, were assembled on the small market square and then crammed in the ghetto.² Initially, people could come and go freely, and some Jews received food brought by neighbors from outside the ghetto.³ Judging from the list of those Jews who were subsequently shot, many families with multiple children resided in the ghetto. About half of the children were under the age of 16. There were also some elderly men living in the ghetto and many artisans of various professions, including 32 carpenters.⁴

In August, the Germans raided a home where the 17-year-old student Abram Dol'nik lived. At school, Dol'nik had been studying to be a radio technician, and he refused to hand over his equipment to the Germans. For this, they shot him and another 15 to 20 young Jews. In September, the Germans discovered in the courtyard of one of the homes in the ghetto a pistol obtained during the retreat of the Red Army. As a result, 100 Jews were shot, ostensibly for concealing military weapons.⁵

The inmates of the ghetto lived under conditions of great overcrowding and poor sanitation. They were subjected regularly to assault and degradation. Only 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread were allotted each day to the prisoners. All Jews had to hand over any valuable items or face being shot. Those who were considered prosperous were taken hostage and held for ransom. The Jews were also taken out for forced labor. Young Jews had to do the heaviest physical work, including road and gas pipeline repairs. One of the few medically trained people in the ghetto, Ida Brion, fled eastward in the fall of 1941 after hearing from escapees of the Vitebsk ghetto that all the Jews would be shot unless they escaped.

On October 21, 1941, a detachment of Einsatzkommando 9 arrived in Rudnia from Vitebsk. With the help of the local police, the detachment shot a large number of ghetto inmates. The Jews were told that they were being transported to Vitebsk and that they should take enough food and belongings for two days. Drunken local policemen randomly assaulted the Jews. Before sending the Jews to the place of execution, the Germans shot young children, the infirm, and others hiding in the ghetto who had refused to leave. The column of ghetto prisoners included women, children, elderly persons, and young infants. The mass shooting took place in an antitank ditch on the outskirts of the town. Those persons wearing good clothing were ordered to strip down to their underwear. The Germans forced several people into the ditch and then shot them. The corpses were flung into the water. They threw children alive into the ditch and tossed infants up in the air and shot them. The killing went on for several hours. According to the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), more than 1,000 Jews were shot.⁶ After the shooting, there were heartrending moans from down in the ditch. The Germans and their collaborators then threw down heavy stones and covered the grave with three layers of dirt.

The report of Einsatzgruppe B indicates that it had conducted a "large-scale Aktion" against the Jews in Rudnia because the Jews had "provided significant help to the partisans, spread subversive propaganda, occasionally refused to work, and would not wear distinguishing markings for Jews." The report states that 835 Jews were shot in total.⁷

Subsequently the Germans shot the chief of the local police in Rudnia, a man named Korotchenkov, on the same spot where the Jews were killed. The Germans tortured him in front of his underlings as a punishment for having concealed goods stolen from the Jews. The policemen threw his body on top of the corpses of the Jews who had been shot previously. The Germans then confiscated Korotchenkov's belongings from his apartment.⁸

A group of young Jews from the ghetto was taken out to work and they were not shot on October 21, the day of the mass shooting.⁹ Instead, they were grouped together with a number of specialists: doctors, shoemakers, carpenters, painters, bakers, and others. These Jews remained in the Rudnia ghetto.

In the fall of 1941, the residents of the Jewish kolkhoz "The Path to Socialism" (Put' k sotsializmu) were also shot. Having captured Rudnia, the Germans took over the kolkhoz and forced the Jews to work there for them. One day in the fall, the Jews were taken out into the field to gather in the harvest, and after they were finished, they were shot. Only two children managed to survive.¹⁰

On February 24, 1942, the last prisoners of the ghetto in Rudnia were shot at the request of the local Ortskommandantur, Feldkommandantur 815, and also General Max von

Schenckendorff, the commanding officer of Rear Area, Army Group Center. The victims included refugees from various raions of the Smolensk oblast' and from Belorussia. The remaining Jews in Rudnia were killed along with 200 Jews from the nearby ghetto of Mikulino and also Jews who had been brought in from other towns and villages of the Rudnia raion. When the Jews from Mikulino arrived, the Jews in the Rudnia ghetto understood that they were about to be shot, and many tried to escape. About 20 persons were killed inside the ghetto.¹¹ Those remaining were gathered into a column, taken out to the antitank ditch, and then shot.¹² According to the activity report of Einsatzgruppe B for the second half of February 1942, first 311 Jews were shot in Rudnia, then another 55 Jews and Communists.¹³

In 1941–1942, the Germans and their collaborators shot between 1,500 and 2,000 Jews in total in Rudnia.

Some members of the local population disapproved of the actions of the German occupying authorities. One witness recalled “an exchange with German soldiers from the Ortskommandantur on the question, ‘Why in the world are they shooting innocent Jewish families?’” The Germans answered that “the Jews had betrayed Germany in the past, and that because they had kept the Germans down whenever they could, they were no longer allowed to live. They would only take vengeance on the German nation.”¹⁴ However, many of the residents of Rudnia supported the destruction of the Jews. After the liberation of Rudnia, one young housewife bluntly said to a soldier who stayed overnight in her home, “It was tough to live with the Germans. But they did something good by shooting the Jews. The Jews deceived us by supporting the Soviet powers.”¹⁵ She did not know, apparently, that the soldier was Jewish.

Not many Jews successfully escaped from the ghetto. On the night before the large-scale Aktion, two girls got away. One of them, Chaia Sheftlina, saw the mass shooting of October 21, 1941. She later gave her testimony to the ChGK. During the occupation, she hid in the home of a Russian friend in Rudnia.¹⁶ A few Jewish children were also able to climb out from under the pile of corpses after the mass shooting and escape. One nine-year-old boy hid for a time with residents of Rudnia, then managed to escape from the town.¹⁷

Of the Jews who survived the ghetto, the majority ended up in partisan detachments. I.L. Finkel'shtein escaped from the ghetto together with his wife after the October shooting. Apparently, he was among the group of artisans who were spared on October 21. Because he was not called up for the war, he elected to join one of the partisan detachments that were active in the Smolensk oblast'. After he left the ghetto, the Germans hanged his wife and children. In the winter of 1941–1942, Finkel'shtein's detachment blew up several bridges and killed up to 100 German soldiers. One Jewish girl was a partisan agent in Rudnia. For two months she was inside the ghetto, but she escaped and again joined the partisans. Many young Jews successfully escaped from the ghetto at the time of the mass shooting on February 24, 1942, and were accepted into various partisan detachments.¹⁸

The ChGK documents indicate that a German punitive detachment of the Security Police and SD arrived from Vitebsk for the mass shooting of the Jews on October 21, 1941. It was headed by the chief of the Gestapo in Rudnia, a man named Walter Bruk (or Buk).¹⁹ Tit Nikonov, the deputy head of the local police under Korotchenkov, was arrested and executed by the Soviet authorities in Smolensk after the liberation of Rudnia by the Red Army on October 29, 1943.²⁰

RZHEV

Pre-1941: Rzhev, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast'; 1941–1943: Rschew, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Rzhev, Tver oblast', Russian Federation

Rzhev is located 120 kilometers (75 miles) southwest of Kalinin on the Volga River. In 1939, the census recorded 457 Jews in the town, a scant 0.85 percent of the total population.

German forces occupied Rzhev on October 14, 1941, more than three and a half months after the German attack on the Soviet Union (June 22, 1941). During that time, a significant number of Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and the Soviets began to draft eligible men for military service. The Jewish population in Rzhev at the start of the German occupation was about one tenth of the pre-war figure.

A German military administration (Ortskommandantur I/532) governed the town during the entire period of occupation (October 1941 to March 1943). The Germans created a town council and an auxiliary police unit (Ordnungsdienst), both staffed by local inhabitants. Among German punitive organs in Rzhev from October to December 1941, and again from the end of April 1942, was a detachment of Sonderkommando 7a, subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B. By the end of October 1941, the German military commandant had ordered the registration of the Jews in Rzhev, and Sonderkommando 7a established a Jewish Council (Judenrat).¹ On November 13, 1941, the German military commandant required Jews to wear a distinguishing armband.

In the spring of 1942, the occupiers ordered all the Jews to resettle into a ghetto, which was located in a building that had formerly housed a nursery school. Some Jewish families were moved into the ghetto. In July 1942, the Germans liquidated the ghetto. In a gully near the airfield, they shot all the Jews (38 persons) except a watchmaker, a tailor, and their families. Members of Sonderkommando 7a carried out the shooting, with the participation of the Russian police. The Germans subsequently shot the watchmaker and his wife, in February 1943.²

SEBEZH

Pre-1941: Sebez, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Sebesch, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Sebez, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Sebez is located 130 kilometers (81 miles) west-southwest of Velike Luki on the main railroad from Moscow to Riga. According to the 1939 population census, there were 845 Jews (14 percent of the total population) living in Sebez.

On July 7, 1941, the town was captured by units of the SS-Motorized Division “Totenkopf,” just over two weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During this period, a large portion of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Only about 15 to 18 percent of the pre-war Jewish population, composed now mainly of women, children, and the elderly, remained in the town at the onset of the German occupation.

During the entire occupation, from July 1941 to July 1944, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ran the town. Initially, the commandant was an Austrian, and the Jews bribed him in an effort to ameliorate conditions. The German military administration created a raion council and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) from among local residents. Shortly after the occupation of the town, the German military commandant ordered the council to organize the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were also made to perform heavy physical labor, such as digging trenches and repairing railroad tracks.¹

As early as the summer of 1941, the first 2 Jews were shot in the town as agitators.² In September 1941, a ghetto was created in Sebez, and 100 to 150 Jews were forcibly relocated into it.³ The ghetto existed until early March 1942, when the Germans ordered its liquidation.⁴ During the liquidation Aktion more than 100 Jews were shot into pits.⁵ The shooting of the Jews was carried out by Russian policemen, headed by the chief of police, a man named Buss. Afterwards local Russians filled in the pits and reported that many of those shot had not been killed outright and had moaned for some time, as the earth thrown over the corpses continued to move. One 12-year-old boy managed to escape from the mass shooting by hiding in a chimney and then made it to the village of Presni. However, despite his pleading, the head of the village handed him over to the Germans to be killed.⁶

SHUMIACHI

Pre-1941: Shumiachi, village and raion center, Smolensk oblast’, RSFSR; 1941–1943: Schumjatschj, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Shumiachi, Russian Federation

Shumiachi is located 120 kilometers (75 miles) south-southeast of Smolensk. According to the 1939 population census, 744 Jews lived in Shumiachi, comprising 21.5 percent of the population.

At the end of July or the beginning of August 1941, about five weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941, German forces of Army Group Center occupied the village. Shumiachi was bombed several times after the start of the invasion, and a number of buildings were also damaged in the fighting as the Germans entered the town. In the interim period, part of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were called up to the Red Army or enlisted voluntarily. Around 350 Jews remained in Shumiachi at the start of the German occupation, including some refugees from Poland who had become trapped there.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, the German military ordered the registration and marking of all Jews. The Jews were also required to perform forced labor, including clearing rubble and collecting trash. In October 1941, the German military administration established a ghetto, or “separate Jewish residential area,” in the village.¹ Jewish families suffered from hunger in the ghetto.²

German forces of Einsatzkommando 8 liquidated the ghetto on November 18, 1941.³ On that day, after arriving from Roslavl’, they drove the Jews out of their houses in the ghetto and loaded them onto several trucks. From here they were taken to a prepared pit on the edge of the village, where the men of Einsatzkommando 8 shot 320 Jews.⁴

According to the report of Einsatzgruppe B, dated December 19, 1941, 510 Jews of both sexes were shot in Shumiachi and Roslavl’ altogether, on grounds of “public security and order.” The same report noted that in Shumiachi 16 mentally ill Jewish and Russian children were also shot around this time. The children were from the children’s home, which had been abandoned by the Soviet authorities. They were found living in filthy conditions with severe eczema on their bodies. The senior German doctor, Dr. Raefler, at the medical field hospital in Shumiachi (Feldlazarett 6/562), approved of the shooting, as the children’s home and its inhabitants were viewed to be a dangerous source of disease.⁵ The children, who were all under 10 years of age, were shot in the clay pit of a brick factory on the edge of Shumiachi by men of Einsatztrupp 5 (part of Einsatzkommando 8), which was based in Roslavl’ under the command of Kriminalkommissar Wilhelm Döring.⁶

SMOLENSK

1938–1941: Smolensk, capital city, Smolensk oblast’, RSFSR; 1941–1943: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Russian Federation

Smolensk is located 419 kilometers (260 miles) west-southwest of Moscow on the Dnieper River and on the main railroad from Moscow to Minsk. According to the 1939 census, 14,812

Wehrmacht and SS defendants sit in the dock during their trial in Smolensk for perpetrating war crimes against the Soviet people, 1945. USHMM WS #79149, COURTESY OF RGAKFD

Jews were residing in the city (out of a total population of 156,900). The Smolensk ghetto was the largest in all the occupied territories of the Russian Federation and also the one that lasted for the longest time, one year. This reflected the need of the German army for labor in the city, as Smolensk was a strategically important railway junction directly on the main line of advance towards Moscow.

On July 16, 1941, the Germans occupied the greater part of the city, which lay on the left bank of the Dnieper River. The battle for the right bank of the river lasted until July 29. The majority of the Jewish population (about 12,000 people) was evacuated or managed to escape.

The German authorities issued the order to resettle the Smolensk Jews into a ghetto at the end of July, three days after the establishment of the field commandant's office (Feldkommandantur, or FK, (V) 813).¹

In August, the "advance squad Moscow" (Vorauskommando Moskau) of Einsatzgruppe B searched certain quarters of Smolensk for "officials, agents, criminals, members of the Jewish intelligentsia, and others." During this operation the Security Police arrested and shot 74 people.² Shortly afterwards, Einsatzgruppe B reported the shooting of "38 Jewish intellectuals, who had tried to create unrest and discontent in the newly established Smolensk ghetto."³

The ghetto was established in the northwestern area of the city known as the "Sadki" district, located on the right bank of the Dnieper River, not far from the Jewish cemetery and the railway. The ghetto was surrounded with barbed wire, and a local Russian police unit (Ordnungsdienst), under the overall command of a Russian named Umnov, guarded the perimeter.⁴

The ghetto was under control of the local Russian administration, which had been established by the German military administration. The notes of the mayor of Smolensk, B. Menshagin, regarding the establishment of the ghetto have survived:

[1-3 not included here.]

4. Excluding the Jewish district, the entire city shall be free of Jews by 4:00 P.M. on August 5, 1941.
5. All Jews who remain in the city after that designated hour shall be arrested and shot.
6. In the settlement area, Jews do not have the right to exit without special permission. This permission can be granted only by the official commandant of the city, or by the police.
7. The area for Jewish settlement shall be surrounded by barbed wire and by a certain date it has to be enclosed by walls.
8. Residences liberated from the Jewish population shall be administered by the head of the city in the interests of the local population.

11. All Jews in Smolensk shall be prohibited from having any direct contact with the city's administrator and his headquarters, or with any Russian citizens. Contacts must be mediated through the Jewish Council [Judenrat].
12. All Jews over the age of 10 are obliged to wear a yellow Star of David, measuring 10 centimeters [4 inches] in diameter. The symbol shall be worn on the front and back of their clothing. Jews caught not wearing the yellow star after 4:00 P.M. on August 5, 1941, shall be arrested, locked up [in the building of the former NKVD], and shot.⁵

According to the city administration of Smolensk, there were some 1,200 people collected in the ghetto as of November 1, 1941.⁶ That number subsequently increased a little. The Jews in the ghetto included those from Smolensk and the surrounding areas, as well as some refugees from Belorussia.

On the basis of a list containing the names of 1,364 Jews who were shot from the Smolensk ghetto, which Soviet authorities compiled after the liberation of the city, the breakdown of the ghetto inhabitants was roughly as follows: 350 men, 614 women, and 350 children less than 15 years old. Of the men, some 50 percent were over age 50. About 40 percent of the women were aged 19 to 39.

The commandant appointed Dr. Painson, a well-known dentist, as the elder in charge of the ghetto's affairs. In the words of one witness, he "complained many times about this onerous duty, which he had to carry out in the interests of the Jewish population but without any prospect of a good outcome."⁷ He organized the Jews for forced labor in accordance with the commandant's orders and enforced security inside the ghetto. According to one German source, the Judenrat in Smolensk consisted of four or five people who spoke good German, including one woman, and was responsible for ensuring that the restrictions imposed on the Jews were strictly observed.⁸

About 70 small houses were located in the ghetto.⁹ Each house contained several families. There was neither electricity nor sufficient space for people to sleep at night. Many people slept in a sitting position, still wearing their clothes.

The Jews were able to leave the ghetto at times in order to barter possessions for food, although the Russian-speaking population was not supposed to associate with them. Approximately two months before the destruction of the ghetto, a much stricter regime was enforced, in which anyone entering and exiting the ghetto was closely monitored. That put an end to the vital trade between Jews and non-Jews.

During the first months after the ghetto was established, Jewish craftsmen received their work instructions from the labor office (Arbeitsamt). The commandant's office issued a few work permits for tailors and shoemakers to continue their trades. In October 1941, the mayor B. Menshagin received a directive ("Regarding the Jews") from the Feldkommandantur. It included the following instructions:

Based on order no. 50023/41 issued by the Economic Inspectorate on October 22, 1941, it is determined that Jews shall be excluded from the list of workers available for employment. . . . Jews must be dismissed immediately by the Wehrmacht. After the exclusion of the Jews from the list, their equipment must be confiscated and handed into protective custody at the mayor's administrative headquarters. The mayor is obliged to consult with the labor registration office and distribute the confiscated equipment to Aryan craftsmen. . . . Any usable items found in the possession of Jews should be confiscated and stored. All Jews shall be confined in a ghetto.

The directive further emphasized that Jews should be gathered in groups for forced labor and assigned to the most demanding physical work.¹⁰

All able-bodied Jews went out daily to perform forced labor. Initially they cleared debris from the streets and repaired damaged buildings. Then, on the order of the Feldkommandantur, they began to work on the railway. They were escorted to work in columns of 50, 100, or more people, guarded by the Ordnungsdienst and Germans with dogs. At the railway station, Jews cleaned, unloaded, and loaded railway wagons. They hauled railway ties and cleaned toilets, even though they never received adequate tools for these tasks. In the winter they cleared snow from the tracks, the roads, and the air base. Weak and infirm Jewish workers were shot, and their coworkers were forced to bury them on the spot.

Jews in the ghetto did not receive any food rations. When Dr. Painson asked the commandant, "How are we to feed our families?" he answered that such trifles were not his problem.¹¹ According to the newspaper of the Smolensk City Committee, called Rabochii put' (The Worker's Way), people in the ghetto ate nettles to ward off starvation.¹² The prisoners exchanged personal items such as clothes, footwear, and valuables with local peasants for food or got it from friends and acquaintances. Workers received a ration of 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread that consisted of bran dust mixed with turnips and beetroots. For those who could not leave the ghetto, the only hope was the children who sneaked out of the ghetto and foraged or begged.

In the ghetto there was no running water, although it was bounded by the Dnieper River. Russian policemen and Germans frequently took water away from Jews or poured it on the ground, so the exhausted prisoners had to go and get more. Because of the lack of water and food, many diseases broke out and spread quickly. These included dysentery, typhus, and tuberculosis. In the winter of 1941–1942, because of famine, cold, and disease, more than 200 people perished, particularly young children and old men. It was forbidden to bury the dead in the cemetery, even though it was located nearby. Graves were dug randomly in the ghetto. The dead were buried naked, since those still surviving needed their clothes.

German Feldgendarmes repeatedly robbed the Jews in the ghetto. They stole watches, gold and silver items, and utensils. Starting in September 1941, they started to demand any warm clothing from the Jews. They took fur coats and fur caps and even peeled the fleece cuffs from some articles of clothing. Night searches were accompanied by beatings and shooting. On several occasions, the ghetto prisoners were ordered to pay taxes. They were required to hand over specific amounts of gold items, furs, clothing, and so forth.

Shortly before the liquidation of the ghetto, a very large fine was imposed on the Jews for not delivering a "contribution" to the German city administration. On July 5, 1942, Mayor Menshagin reported to SS-Obersturmführer Kurt Matschke of the Trupp Smolensk unit of Einsatzgruppe B: "On the order of the commandant's office, 60 complete sets of bedding and 3 sewing machines were requested from the ghetto. The Jewish Council was fined 5,000 rubles for the failure to deliver the requested bedding material on time."¹³ One witness recalled that in June 1942 the mayor of the city ordered the Jews to bring 7,000 rubles in gold to the city administration.

Jewish girls and young women were subject to mockery and sexual violence from the Germans and Russian policemen. On one cold night the Germans rounded up Jewish girls, forced them to undress, lined them up, and then started to beat them. Several witnesses recalled that "the Germans regularly came into the ghetto and raped women at will."¹⁴ Sometimes at night, old men and women stood guard to warn people of intruders. But Russian policemen conducted random inspections in the ghetto during the evenings and took away beautiful girls who did not always return.

Killings of Jews in Smolensk continued throughout the entire period of the ghetto's existence. The German Police Regiment "Mitte" shot 1 Jew in the first half of January 1942 during an attempted escape. In the first half of February 1942, 1 Jew was shot as a Communist and for not wearing the Star of David. In the second half of February 1942, 5 Jews were murdered for disseminating provocative rumors and for refusal to work. Around the same time, 3 Jews were killed for not wearing the Star of David and for being outside the ghetto without permission. In March 1942, "Trupp Smolensk" of Einsatzgruppe B shot 18 Jews.¹⁵ Hostages were repeatedly taken from the ghetto on the pretext of having broken the regulations with the aim of extorting money or valuables. Most did not return.¹⁶ A Soviet partisan source reported that "drunken German officers with the sanction of the commandant of Smolensk were able to shoot Jews without any fear of being brought to account.”¹⁷

In the reports of witnesses, including those of ghetto survivors, there is only fragmentary information about Jewish resistance. One interesting source comes from a reconnaissance report by Soviet partisans. The following is noted:

In the suburbs of Smolensk there are three or four prison camps for the Jews. No food is given to them. Many have no trousers or outer clothing, and are covered only with blankets. They have bartered their clothes for food. Owing to these conditions among the Jews, there were revolts during which they killed the guards and tried to escape. But they were caught and shot.¹⁸

Two Jewish women did manage to escape from the ghetto and hide in the city with Russian friends. Eventually they received new identity documents. Several children from mixed Russian-Jewish families were also rescued with the help of their Russian relatives and friends. There are also several other cases of Jews in Smolensk who were rescued with the help of the local population.

On the night of July 14–15, 1942, members of the Security Police and SD, German Feldgendarmarie, and Russian police arrived in the ghetto. The Russian policemen acted on the orders of G. Gandziuk, the first deputy to the mayor of Smolensk, and possibly also a man named Alferchik, who was the head of the 2nd (Political) Section of the Russian police.¹⁹ They drove the Jews out of their homes and loaded them onto covered trucks. Throughout the day until the evening of July 15, 1942, the Jews were transported in groups to a prepared ditch in a wood near the village of Magalenshchina. According to the statements of local residents taken by officials of the military counterintelligence section (SMERSh), after the liberation of the city on September 25, 1943, some of the Jews were poisoned in three gas vans that transported them on four successive trips, and some were shot at the ditch.²⁰ The shooting was carried out by members of Trupp Smolensk.²¹ An estimated 1,200 to 2,000 people were shot.²² A few skilled worker-specialists were selected out and allowed to remain alive for a while longer. A small number of Jews managed to escape on the night of July 14, 1942, just as the loading of the trucks commenced.

Russian witnesses testify that the remaining property of the Jews in the ghetto was plundered by the Russian police. One German source indicates that the clothes and other items from the ghetto were distributed as follows: 25 percent for hospitals and the Russian police and 50 percent for the civilian employees of the Wehrmacht. Jewish woman Asia Shneiderman, who was living in Smolensk in 1942, testified that “items from the ghetto were brought to the Gestapo and used to dress the prostitutes in Smolensk.”²³

According to the report of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK), the following persons were identified and accused of the murder of the Jews: Erich Naumann, the

SOL'TSY

Pre-1941: Sol'tsy, town and raion center, Leningrad oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1944: Solzy, Rear Area, Sixteenth Army, Army Group North (Heeresgruppe Nord); post-1991: Sol'tsy, Novgorod oblast', Russian Federation

Sol'tsy is located 78 kilometers (48.5 miles) southwest of Novgorod on the Shelon' River. According to the 1939 census, there were 156 Jews living in Sol'tsy, accounting for 1.74 percent of the total population.

German armed forces of the LVI Motorized Corps occupied the town on July 13, 1941. On July 16, 1941, the Germans withdrew from Sol'tsy as a result of a Soviet counteroffensive, but they retook it on July 22, 1941. By the time the town was occupied, some of the Jews had succeeded in evacuating to the eastern regions of the USSR, and men liable for military service had been conscripted into the Red Army. No more than 100 Jews remained in the town.

Throughout the occupation period (from July 1941 to January 1944), a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) was in charge of the town. The German military administration set up a town authority and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) composed of local residents.

Soon after the occupation of the town, the German commandant's office ordered the town authority to organize the registration and marking of the Jews. They were obliged to wear a white armband with a yellow six-pointed star. The Jews also were used for various types of forced labor, and all their valuables were confiscated. In the fall of 1941, all the Jews who remained in the town were concentrated and isolated in one place, to which Jews from surrounding towns and villages also were resettled. In 1941, all the Jews were shot in a nearby forest.¹

In 2007, a monument was erected at the site where the Jews were shot. Funds for the memorial were collected by the Jewish community of Novgorod.

SOURCES Documentation regarding the extermination of the Jews of Sol'tsy can be found in the following archives: AFSBNO; GANO; and GARF (7021-34-360).

NOTE

1. According to ChGK documents (GARF, 7021-34-360), several dozen Jews were shot. According to data from the Novgorod Jewish Culture Society (<http://novgorod.allnw.ru/soletsky/news/43769>), about 150 Jews were shot in December 1941 and 104 on January 17, 1942; about 500 Jews are said to have been living in Sol'tsy before the war. In the author's opinion, these figures are too high.

STARAIA RUSSA

Pre-1941: Staraiia Russa, town and raion center, Leningrad oblast', RSFSR; 1941-1944: Staraja Russa, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Staraiia Russa, Novgorod oblast', Russian Federation

Staraiia Russa is located about 100 kilometers (62 miles) south of Novgorod on the Polist' River, to the south of Lake Il'men'. According to the 1939 census, there were 828 Jews living in Staraiia Russa, accounting for 2.2 percent of the population.

Units of the German 16th Army occupied the town on August 9, 1941, seven weeks after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. In that time, some Jews had managed to evacuate eastward, and men liable for military service were inducted into the Red Army. Approximately 15 to 20 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town.

Throughout the occupation (August 1941 to February 1944), a German military commandant was in charge of the town. For much of the occupation, Feldkommandantur 820, under Oberstleutnant Colonel Mossbach, was based in Staraiia Russa. The German military administration established a town authority and a police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local residents. An ethnic Estonian was named as chief of police: Alexander Kiutt (in 1948 a Soviet tribunal sentenced him to 25 years in prison). The police force was made up of men of various nationalities, including Pavel Goldt (employed in the investigative division), who had one Jewish parent and posed as an ethnic German. Especially active in persecuting Jews was the town's deputy mayor, Vasilii Bykov (arrested and sentenced in 1944), whose responsibilities included oversight of "Jewish affairs."¹

Among the German security units operating in the town were the Feldgendarmarie, which was subordinated to Feldkommandantur 820, and a detachment of Einsatzkommando 1b of Einsatzgruppe A. This detachment was sent to the town immediately after its occupation² and was active there until November or December 1941; it probably organized most of the shootings of Jews.

In the first few days of September, the German military commandant's office in Staraiia Russa ordered the registration and marking of all the Jews, requiring them to wear a white armband with a yellow six-pointed star. Jews were also used for various kinds of forced labor, and all their property was confiscated. A few days after the registration, the Germans arrested all the Jews and placed some in the prison and the rest into a monastery, which served as a temporary ghetto for them.³ The liquidation of the ghetto, accomplished by shooting all the Jews gathered in the monastery, apparently was carried out on October 15, 1941; around 80 people were shot.⁴ One month later, Jews who were married to non-Jews were arrested. These Jews, some 30 in total, were shot between December 6 and 10, 1941.⁵ A former employee of the town police, Tamara Finagina, questioned after the war in connection with these events, stated:

I also know that under Kiutt's leadership, the police arrested up to 30 Jews in December 1941; initially, after the Germans came, these people had been left alone because they had Russian husbands or wives. In August and September 1941, the Germans exterminated Jewish families in which there were no Russians. All these Jews were herded by the police and Gendarmes into the monastery and shot inside the ruined walls by the police and Gendarmes. That was told to me by policemen, whose names I don't recall.⁶

Besides the above-mentioned shootings, it is likely there were other shootings of Jews in the town. In total, about 150 to 200 Jews were shot in Staraiia Russa in the period from August to December 1941.

A number of townspeople, at great danger to themselves, hid Jews in their homes. Some of them paid for it with their lives. On September 21, 1941, the sisters Anna and Taisia Degtarev were sentenced to death for hiding Jews. Two days later, several others were publicly executed for concealing Jews: Ivan Nikolaevich Burmagin, 69, a carpenter; Ol'ga Sergeevna Burmagin, 68, a housewife; Nina Ivanovna Burmagin, 40, a teacher; Anna Egorovna Voskoboinikov (age not specified), a member of the church choir; and Sidor Timofeevich Voskoboinikov, 64, a church elder.⁷

STARODUB

Pre-1941: Starodub, town and raion center, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941-1943: Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Briansk oblast', Russian Federation

Starodub is located about 140 kilometers (87 miles) southeast of Briansk. In 1939, there were 1,629 Jews in Starodub (12.96 percent of the total population).

The German army occupied the town on August 18, 1941, almost two months after the start of the German invasion of the USSR. In this period men of military age were drafted into the Red Army, and some Jews decided to evacuate to the east, but others hesitated. The Soviet authorities tried to calm civilians with radio broadcasts calling on them not to panic, claiming that the Red Army's counterattack would start very soon. This information served to confuse the inhabitants of Starodub, as the growing flood of refugees fleeing from the western borderlands brought quite different rumors—of the rapid German advance. The last group of evacuees left town on August 17, consisting mainly of members of the Jewish collective farm "Red Star." By this time, however, it was too late. Germans forces blocked their path, and the Jews were captured and brought back to Starodub. About two thirds of the pre-war Jewish population came under German occupation.¹

During the occupation, a German military commandant (Ortskommandant) administered the town. The military commandant also established a local town administration and a Russian police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local inhabitants.

Shortly after the occupation of Starodub, the local authorities organized the registration of the town's Jews and assigned them to perform hard labor. The German military authorities issued numerous orders and decrees that circumscribed Jewish daily life, such as the wearing of distinguishing marks on clothes and by creating an atmosphere of hopelessness and humiliation. The Jews' last remaining valuables were invariably looted by either the Germans or their collaborators.

At the end of September 1941, the Jews of the town were forced to relocate to a ghetto within 24 hours. The ghetto consisted only of a few cottages and sheds designed for farm animals and surrounded by barbed wire in the suburb of Belovshchina, on the edge of town, from which the Germans had expelled the farmers.² The ghetto was probably established on the orders of Sonderkommando 7b (commanded by SS-Sturmabführer Günther Rausch). According to a German report, at the time of the resettlement, Sonderkommando 7b shot 272 people on September 25, 1941, allegedly on the grounds of resistance to ghettoization by Jews. Accounts by local witnesses indicate that the Germans lined up all the Jewish males over 14 years of age, some 400 people in all, gave them shovels, and then marched them under close armed guard in the direction of the villages of Brezgunovka and Sokolovka to "work." The men were ordered to dig "antitank ditches" in the Galye swamps that were actually mass graves. Then they were stripped naked and shot with submachine guns.³

The Jews left after this Aktion, consisting of a few men and many women and children of all ages, were confined inside the ghetto for more than five months. Overcrowding in the ghetto was appalling, as the Jews were packed together with 65 or 70 people to each small cottage, while those who could not be accommodated in the cottages had to live in stables and pigsties. Russian policemen of the Ordnungsdienst guarded the ghetto.

The daily ration for the ghetto inmates was only about 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of bread. As leaving the ghetto to go to the marketplace was forbidden, the inmates were starving. Some occasionally ventured out, at the risk of their lives, to the surrounding fields for some vegetables. Several mothers were killed as they sneaked out to the vegetable plots next to the Babinetz River, looking for something edible to bring back to their children. Some sympathetic local policemen looked the other way, enabling the Jews to smuggle a little food into the ghetto. Due to starvation, exposure, and beatings, the mortality rate from hunger and disease was very high; 153 people died in the ghetto prior to its liquidation.

On February 22, 1942, the inhabitants of the ghetto were awakened by the sound of explosions nearby. The policemen tried to calm the panic among the inmates, assuring them it was only part of German fortification efforts. In reality the Germans were preparing huge mass graves only 500 meters (1,640 feet) from the ghetto, using explosives to break the frozen ground.⁴

A subunit of Sonderkommando 7a under the command of SS-Obersturmführer Kurt Matschke shot the remaining several hundred Jews on March 1, 1942.⁵ The local Russian police under the command of Nikolai I. Molodzhhevsky played an active role in guarding the Jews during the mass shooting.⁶

Several Jews managed to escape the massacre, but most were captured by policemen the next day on the edge of the forest. The Germans ordered the captives to dig a grave, then to undress, after which they shot them. Two survivors from this group of escapees were the Israeliev sisters who reached the village of Shniaki where they convinced a local policeman to help them. They hid in the cellar of an elderly couple of Baptists. The family's son was a brutal member of the local police living in the same house, who remained ignorant of their presence. Once the policeman had left for work, the Jewish girls were able to come out of the cellar for warmth each day. They managed to survive until the Red Army liberated Starodub on September 22, 1943.⁷

STODOLISHCHE

Pre-1941: Stodolishche, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Stodolishchtsche, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Stodolishche, Russian Federation

Stodolishche is located 76 kilometers (47 miles) southeast of Smolensk on the railroad from Smolensk to Briansk. According to the 1939 census, there were 232 Jews in Stodolishche, accounting for 10.37 percent of the total population.

German units of Army Group Center occupied the village on July 19, 1941, 28 days after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. During that time, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army.

Shortly after the occupation of the village, in late July and early August 1941, the German Ortskommandantur appointed a community leader (starosta) of Stodolishche and ordered the local administration to organize the registration and marking of the Jews. The Jewish population was also exploited for various forms of forced labor. According to one source, German security forces shot a few Jews in Stodolishche during the second half of July 1941. The remaining Jews were forced to move into a ghetto to concentrate them in one place and isolate them from the rest of the population. In April 1942, the Ortskommandantur in Stodolishche was OK (I) 364. The ghetto was liquidated in May 1942, when German security forces shot all the remaining Jews.¹

SURAZH

Pre-1941: Surazh, town and raion center, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Surash, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Surazh, Briansk oblast', Russian Federation

Surazh is located about 42 kilometers (26 miles) north-northeast of Klinty on the railway line from Unecha to Orsha. The 1939 census showed 2,052 Jews in the town, comprising 22.8 percent of the total population.

German forces occupied Surazh on August 17, 1941, almost two months after the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union (on June 22, 1941). During this intervening period, a number of the town's Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and all men obligated to serve in the military were called up to the Red Army. When the Germans occupied the town, only around 30 percent of the Jewish population was still there.

The town remained under the jurisdiction of the Wehrmacht throughout the occupation and was run by a German military commandant, who set up a town administration and a police force (Ordnungsdienst), recruited from local inhabitants. Soon after the occupation of Surazh, the town administration organized the registration, marking, and exploitation of Jews for various kinds of hard labor.

In the late autumn of 1941, a ghetto was established. Several dozen Jews died there from hunger, cold, and sickness. On March 27, 1942, the ghetto was liquidated. On that day, 560 people were shot in the village of Kislovka.¹ The shooting was carried out by Sonderkommando 7a, which was headed at the time by SS-Obersturmbannführer Albert Rapp.²

After the war the bodies were dug up and reburied in a common grave at the Jewish cemetery.

SOURCES The ghetto is mentioned in Shmuel Spector and Geoffrey Wigoder, eds., The Encyclopedia of Jewish Life before and during the Holocaust (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem; New York: New York University Press, 2001), p. 1265.

Rapp denied any knowledge of the shooting in Surazh, but an Aktion (probably in Surazh) in March or April 1942 is mentioned by other witnesses; see idem, 20:775–778.

SVIATSK

Pre-1941: Sviatsk, village, Novozybkov raion, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Swjatsk, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Sviatsk, Briansk oblast', Russian Federation

Sviatsk is located 202 kilometers (126 miles) southwest of Briansk directly on the border with the Republic of Belarus'. According to the 1926 census, there were 588 Jews living in Sviatsk.¹ The results of the 1939 census reveal that the Jewish population had been roughly halved from the 1926 figure. This decline was due primarily to the resettlement of Jews to other regions.

Units of German Army Group Center occupied the village on August 16, 1941, about two months after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During that time, approximately half of the Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men who were eligible for military service were inducted into the Red Army. Only about 150 Jews remained in the town at the start of the German occupation.

Throughout the period of occupation (from August 1941 until September 1943), a German military administration (Ortskommandantur) governed the village. The German military administration appointed a village elder (starosta) and policemen who were local residents.

Soon after the occupation of the village, the local authorities organized the registration and marking of the Jews and arranged for their use in various kinds of forced labor. German security forces conducted a first Aktion about 4 kilometers (2.5 miles) outside the village of Sviatsk on October 12, 1941, when they shot 27 people (23 Jews, 2 Communists, and 2 prisoners of war). The remaining Jews were moved into a ghetto, which remained in existence until January 25, 1942. On that day, the Jews were gathered in the courtyard of the village administration building where they were forced to wait stark naked in the freezing cold for several hours before being taken out to be shot on the grounds of an old brick factory.² German security forces (probably a detachment subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B), assisted by the Russian local police, shot 116 people on this day, and 9 more Jews on the following day.³

SYCHEVKA

Pre-1941: Sychevka, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Sytschewka, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Sychevka, Russian Federation

Sychevka is located 70 kilometers (43 miles) north of Viaz'ma on the Vazuza River. According to the 1939 census, Sychevka had a Jewish population of 138, or 1.64 percent of the total.¹

German units of Army Group Center occupied the town on October 10, 1941, approximately 16 weeks after the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941. During that time, some Jews were able to evacuate to the east, and men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army.

Shortly after the occupation of the town, in October 1941, the German Ortskommandantur appointed a mayor (Bürgermeister) of Sychevka and ordered the local administration to organize the registration and marking of the Jews. The Jewish population was also exploited for various forms of forced labor. To concentrate the town's remaining Jews in a single place and isolate them from the rest of the population, the Germans ordered them to be moved into a ghetto.² The Jews may have been separated out from among 4,500 civilians, which the Secret Field Police Group 580 (GFP-Gruppe 580) had temporarily placed in a prisoner-of-war (POW) camp in Sychevka by the end of October 1941.³

The ghetto was liquidated on January 1, 1942, when the town commandant, Oberleutnant Kiesler, ordered all the Jews—probably around 100 mainly women, children, and the elderly—to be shot in the village of Piskovo, outside of Sychevka.⁴ It is most likely that a detachment of Sonderkommando 7a, which had been based in the town in October and November 1941 and again from late April 1942, carried out the Aktion. Sonderkommando 7a, which at that time was under the command of Kurt Matschke, retreated hastily from Kalinin via Staritsa, Rzhev, Sychevka, and Gzhatsk to Viaz'ma between mid-December 1941 and January 7, 1942, in response to the Soviet winter offensive. This would have placed the unit in Sychevka on around January 1, 1942, corroborating the date given in the Soviet military investigation report.⁵ Russian policemen also took an active part in the shooting.

TATARSK

Tatarsk is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) south-southwest of Smolensk. According to the 1939 census, there were 819 Jews living in what then comprised the raion of Monastyrshchina (excluding the village of Monastyrshchina itself). The majority of these Jews (around 600 people) were inhabitants of the village of Tatarsk.¹

German forces occupied Tatarsk in July 1941, approximately four weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. During these four weeks, some of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army. Approximately 400 Jews remained in Tatarsk at the start of the German occupation.

Just after the occupation of the village, the German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) ordered the registration and marking of the Jews and also the exploitation of Jews for various kinds of forced labor. The commandant's office also established a local auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) and appointed a local Russian mayor.

In September 1941, a detachment of the Vorkommando Moskau (a small squad subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B), commanded by SS-Hauptsturmführer Woldemar Klingelhöfer and assisted by SS-Hauptsturmführer Egon Noack, arrived in Tatarsk from Smolensk. On arrival, they met with the local mayor and the head of the Ordnungsdienst, to set up a ghetto in Tatarsk. The local authorities defined two streets containing about 10 houses, to which all the Jews had to move. The ghetto was surrounded by a wooden fence and guarded by the Ordnungsdienst, but initially Jews were able to leave fairly easily, as the Russian guards were not strict. During this first visit (probably in mid-September 1941), Noack and Klingelhöfer collected all fur items of clothing from the Jews and organized the shooting of about 50 male Jews in a ditch. It was probably at this time that a Judenrat consisting of not more than 3 people was established.²

Living conditions in the ghetto were deplorable. The Jews received only the bare minimum necessities for subsistence. Between 7 and 10 families, or between 35 and 50 people, had to share living quarters in each house.³ The conditions were so bad that soon the Jews tried to leave the ghetto and return to their old homes. The German Security Police viewed this as an act of subversion against the established order, and in early October 1941, on orders from the head of Einsatzgruppe

B, SS-Gruppenführer Arthur Nebe, Klingelhöfer and Noack returned to carry out a second anti-Jewish Aktion.⁴

In Security Police Report (Ereignismeldung UdSSR) no. 124, issued on October 25, 1941, these events are described as follows:

The staff unit (Gruppenstab) [of Einsatzgruppe B] and Vorkommando Moskau carried out an operation against the Jews in Tatarsk. The Jews had begun to leave the ghetto of their own volition, and return to their former residences. Russians had occupied their apartments in the meantime, and the Jews tried to drive them out. Therefore, the place was systematically searched and the Jews gathered in the market square. Some of them had fled, and had to be hunted out of the nearby forest. In punishment for not following the orders of the German Security Police, all the Jewish men in Tatarsk and three women were shot.⁵

According to postwar accounts given by Klingelhöfer, some 200 Jews were rounded up on this second occasion, and the remaining 30 or so male Jews were among those shot.⁶ According to one source, the Germans and their collaborators continued to hunt down those Jews in hiding and shot another 10 or 15 Jews uncovered over the following weeks. In total, at least 300 Jews are estimated to have been murdered in Tatarsk.⁷

A non-Jewish local inhabitant, Petro Rashkeev, witnessed the murder of Jewish children. It was a cold, rainy day, and the children were grabbed out of their houses naked and driven to the grave site with whips. Here, the Germans hit some babies on the head with iron rods and threw them into a pit without checking to see whether or not they were still alive. The children died, buried in the damp, blood-saturated earth.⁸

Local witnesses recall efforts by several individuals to rescue Jews in Tatarsk, but only a few Jews succeeded in evading capture. Lev Sorin hid in the pharmacy during the second Aktion and received help from a Communist. He noted that the Russian police played an active part in the killing. Subsequently, he obtained papers that helped him to pass as a Russian.⁹ A man named Klimov hid a Jewish woman but was denounced to the Germans. The Germans tortured him to death, but he refused to reveal where the Jewish woman was hiding. A 70-year-old man tried unsuccessfully to protect four Jewish boys by saying they were his grandsons. The Germans suspected they were Jewish and killed them and then almost beat the man to death.¹⁰

TOROPETS

Pre-1941: Toropets, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1942: Toropez, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Toropets, Tver oblast', Russian Federation

Toropets is located 69 kilometers (43 miles) east-northeast of Velike Luki. According to the 1939 census, there were 500 Jews living in the town, at that time a raion center in the Kalinin oblast'. The Jewish population then accounted for 3.87 percent of the town's total population.

German forces of Rear Area, Army Group Center occupied Toropets on August 29, 1941, two months after the German attack on the Soviet Union (June 22, 1941). During that interval, a large number of Jews from Toropets had succeeded in evacuating to the east. Meanwhile, the Soviets began drafting eligible men into the Red Army. At the start of the German occupation, probably less than 100 Jews remained in the town.

A German military administration governed Toropets throughout the occupation (from August 29, 1941, until January 21, 1942). The German commandant appointed local citizens to a newly created Rayon authority and established a local police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from non-Jewish local residents.

On September 20, 1941, the chief of the local police, invoking the authority of the German military commandant, ordered that lists be prepared for him of all the Jews in the town, specifying their ages; that they all be resettled into a designated section of the town (a ghetto); and that they be checked to verify whether they were all wearing identifying armbands.¹ To house the Jews, the authorities selected a building belonging to a local flax mill on the edge of town. They chose a dentist as the ghetto elder. The ghetto elder was responsible for organizing forced labor details for the German authorities.²

A weekly report by the responsible commandant's office Ortskommandantur (OK) I/532 in Toropets, probably from the end of September 1941, noted that a "Jewish quarter" (Judenviertel) had been established and that the Jews had been marked and registered (21 male and 25 female Jews, out of a total population of 5,724).³

On October 23, 1941, OK I/851, under the command of Major Hirschberg, took over the administration of Toropets from OK I/532.⁴ Shortly afterwards, on October 28, 1941, servicemen of the SS-2nd Cavalry Regiment raided the ghetto, "confiscating" items of women's clothing and money.⁵ Also stationed in the town at this time were elements of Police Reserve Battalion 131.

The ghetto, which contained about 75 people, remained in existence for about three months.⁶ Postwar testimony by German servicemen reveals a number of additional details about the ghetto and its liquidation, some of which is corroborated by several of the witnesses. According to Hauptmann Pohl, the intelligence officer (Ic) with OK I/851, the Jews consisted mainly of women and children, including a number of young women, and the flax mill was surrounded with barbed wire. The Jews all wore white armbands bearing numbers.⁷

In early November 1941, a detachment of Geheime Feldpolizei (GFP)-Gruppe 710 consisting of 15 to 20 men arrived in Toropets under the command of Feldpolizeisekretär Blohm. In early or mid-December, Blohm received a written order to shoot all the Jews in the ghetto, including the women and children. Several German witnesses maintain that in order to avoid having to shoot the roughly 20 Jewish children in the ghetto, the local commanders planned for a German doctor to kill them using poison or a lethal injection, according to one account, in the context of a "Christmas celebration." The doctor, however, refused to comply, reporting himself sick.⁸

The Germans liquidated the ghetto in the second half of December 1941.⁹ The Jews were escorted on foot from the flax mill to a gravel pit only a few hundred meters away, where there was a trench about 10 meters long and 3 meters wide (33 by 10 feet). Here the Jews were ordered to undress and place their clothes in a pile. They also had to surrender any valuables, and some Jews were found to have been hiding money in their shoes. The Jews then had to kneel in the ditch in groups and were shot in the back of the neck. The mass shooting was carried out by men of GFP-Gruppe 710. Some of the clothing was distributed to local Russian women who worked for the Germans.¹⁰

A mixed family with a Jewish wife who lived outside the ghetto was initially spared from the massacre. The Germans shot the entire family a short time later, stealing their property.¹¹ Within a few weeks of the ghetto's liquidation, the Soviet winter counteroffensive had driven German forces out of Toropets by January 21, 1942, seizing this important supply base in the rear of the German 9th Army.

UNECHA

Pre-1941: Unecha, town and raion center, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Unetscha, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwartiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Unecha, Bryansk oblast', Russian Federation

Unecha is located on the Unecha River approximately 120 kilometers (75 miles) southwest of Bryansk. According to the 1939 census, 1,708 Jews lived in Unecha (comprising 12.24 percent of the total population).

German forces of Army Group Center occupied the town on August 17, 1941, almost two months after the initial German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. The advent of war led to panic in the marketplace, making it difficult to buy provisions. Based on information from Polish refugees, as well as heavy German bombing, some Jews decided to evacuate. Since Unecha was an important railway junction, a large portion of the Jewish population was able to escape to the east. However, the local government only organized the evacuation of specific groups of workers, and Soviet regulations made it difficult for others to flee.¹ Men of eligible age were called up to enlist in the Red Army. It is estimated that around 20 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Unecha under German occupation.

Shortly after the arrival of German forces, the Germans established a military commandant's headquarters (Ortskommandantur), which was responsible for the administration of the town. They also recruited a Russian auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) composed of local residents. In the summer of 1941, the authorities compelled the Jews to wear six-pointed stars made out of white cloth, and they were forbidden to leave the town limits.² Police tasks in the area were also carried out by German forces of the Field Gendarmerie (Feldgendarmerie) and by a detachment of the Secret Field Police (Geheime Feldpolizei, GFP); beginning in the fall of 1941, GFP-Gruppe 729 was based in Unecha.

In October 1941, all Jews remaining in the town were resettled into a ghetto close to the railway line. The ghetto area was based around an old poultry factory and surrounded by a wooden fence.³ Any Jews caught outside the ghetto were shot. The ghetto was unsanitary, particularly because dead bodies were not removed from the area. All Jews over the age of 15 had to perform difficult and dirty forced labor from morning until night. The ghetto inmates were composed mainly of women, children, and the elderly. Some additional women and children were brought into the ghetto after the male members of their families had been arrested and shot. The local Russian police frequently robbed the Jews. It was difficult to obtain water in the ghetto, and there was hardly any food, only a few old potatoes, so some Jews risked leaving the ghetto to barter things with local peasants in exchange for food.⁴

In mid-March 1942, German security forces liquidated the ghetto.⁵ Just prior to the ghetto's liquidation, about 70 Jews from the village of Zhudilovo (in the direction of Pochep) were brought into the ghetto, as were a number of Gypsies (Roma) transported on sleds.⁶ On the afternoon of March 15, the German-led forces assembled the Jews into a column and escorted them to the edge of town where a 10-meter-long (33-foot-long) ditch had been prepared. Men of the Feldgendarmerie and from GFP-Gruppe 729 cordoned off the killing site. Four or five SD men, probably a detachment of Sonderkommando 7a that was based in Klintzy (in March 1942 under the command of SS-Obersturmbannführer Albert Rapp) then shot the Jews in the back of the neck with pistols.⁷ All the Jews (including some who had converted to Christianity) and Roma were shot. In total, probably around 342 persons were murdered on that day not far from the Unecha railroad station.⁸

Solomon Bazhalkin, then 14 years old, escaped from the ghetto just prior to its liquidation. He knocked on people's doors in the surrounding villages, saying he was an orphan. Some local inhabitants offered him food and occasionally shelter for a short while; but usually he had to move on again soon, as people suspected that he was a Jew. On one occasion he was denounced to the police, but he successfully convinced them he was an orphan and was released. Subsequently he linked up with the Soviet partisans. The Red Army liberated the region during its offensive in September 1943.⁹

USVIATY

Pre-1941: Usviaty, village and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Usvjati, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Usviaty, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Usviaty is located about 70 kilometers (44 miles) south-southeast of Velike Luki. According to the 1939 census, 136 Jews were living in Usviaty (5.46 percent of the total population). In the villages of the Usviaty raion, there were another 10 Jews.¹

German armed forces occupied the settlement in July 1941, approximately three weeks after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. In those three weeks, some of the Jewish population was able to evacuate to the east. Men of an eligible age were called up for service in the Red Army.

During the course of the occupation, from July 1941 until January 1942, a German military commandant's office (Ortskommandantur) controlled the village. The Ortskommandantur appointed a village head and recruited a police force (Ordnungsdienst) from local residents.

Shortly after the occupation began, the local administration organized the registration and marking of the Jewish population. Jews were also exploited for various kinds of heavy labor.

At the end of September 1941, a ghetto was created in the village. A few homes that had been emptied of their Russian residents were designated for this purpose, and the "Jewish quarter" was surrounded with barbed wire. Jews in the ghetto did not receive provisions. Food rations were issued only to Jews who performed labor, and they received only 200 grams (7 ounces) of bread per day.² Most sources estimate that around 160 Jews were living in the ghetto, but the actual number was probably less than this.³ The ghetto existed for about four months. The German security forces did not have time to liquidate the ghetto. On January 28, 1942, the Red Army liberated the remaining Jews in the ghetto in the course of their winter counteroffensive. Unfortunately about 30 Jews perished in the ghetto from cold and starvation just before the arrival of the Red Army.⁴

SOURCES Documentation regarding the ghetto in Usviaty can be found in the following archives: GARF (7021-20-25); GASmO (R-1630-1-369); and YVA (M-62/55 and O-33/3275).

There were only 136 Jewish residents before the war, and some of these people were able to evacuate the area. Therefore, one can surmise that there were probably around 100 people in the ghetto.

VELIKE LUKI

Pre-1941: Velike Luki, town and raion center, Kalinin oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1942: Velikije-Luki, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Velike Luki, Pskov oblast', Russian Federation

Velike Luki is located on the Lovat' River, about 220 kilometers (137 miles) south-southeast of Pskov. According to the 1939 census, 1,519 Jews were living in Velike Luki, at that time a raion center in the Kalinin oblast'. The Jewish population then accounted for 4.34 percent of the town's total population.

German forces of Army Group Center first captured the town on July 19, 1941, but they were then temporarily driven out by a Soviet counterattack. The Germans recaptured the town on August 24, 1941, but this temporary reprieve in the meantime had enabled a large number of Velike Luki's Jews to evacuate to the east.¹

A German military administration (Ortskommandantur) asserted authority in the town, assisted by a Russian auxiliary police force (Ordnungsdienst) recruited from local inhabitants. From September 4 to around September 17, 1941, Ortskommandantur (OK) 1/302 and Feldkommandantur (V)/181 were based in the town, subordinated to Korück 582 of the German 9th Army. From the start of September until mid-October 1941, a detachment of Sonderkommando (Sk) 7a, comprising 20 or 30 men, and a subordinated group of Waffen-SS men were based in Velike Luki. Also present in the area to guard the railway lines was part of Police Reserve Battalion 131, which assisted Sonderkommando 7a in the arrest and shooting of suspected Communists and Jews.²

Soon after occupying the town, the German military administration established a ghetto in Velike Luki, which was located on a single street.³ Information on the ghetto and its inhabitants is sparse. According to documents in the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission files, the German commandant (Ortskommandant) soon appointed a Jewish headman, the 65-year-old dentist Labas, who was made responsible for the Jews. He had to report in writing every day that all the Jews were present and correct. If any Jews were missing, Labas would be beaten. German records indicate that in September 1941, there were 59 Jews registered in Velike Luki.⁴

From the accounts of German servicemen based in the town in September 1941, it appears that the Jews of the ghetto (at least 50 men, women, and children) were shot in one or more small Aktions conducted during the month of September, as were a number of Jews uncovered in neighboring villages at this time. The members of the Sonderkommando were assisted in these Aktions by members of 2nd Company Police Reserve Battalion 131, the Ordnungsdienst, the Feldgendarmarie, and possibly also a detachment of Latvian auxiliaries. The total number of Jews shot in the region by members of Sk 7a may have been 175 to 200 people.⁵ Il'ja Al'tmann indicates that the Germans had completely liquidated the ghetto by October 1941.⁶

Velike Luki was also the location of a German camp for Soviet prisoners of war, as around 30,000 men had been captured in the region at the time of the German offensive in late August 1941.⁷ According to a report to Korück 582, on October 4, 1941, German Wachbataillon 720, which was in charge of a Soviet POW camp in Velike Luki, handed over to the Security Police "three Soviet prisoners of Jewish nationality," who they then shot following an interrogation. According to German sources, there was reportedly a strong Soviet partisan resistance in the area at this time, which led Sonderkommando 7a to shoot a number of people as suspected partisans or partisan helpers at around the same time as the shooting Aktions against the Jews.⁸

SOURCES The contents of some of the German court-related testimonies on the ghetto and the murder of the Jews in Velike Luki are briefly summarized in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. 25 (Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2001), Lfd. Nr. 643a, pp. 301–311.

VELIZH

Pre-1941: Velizh, town and raion center, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Welish, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Velizh, Russian Federation

Velizh lies on the banks of the Western Dvina River, 125 kilometers (78 miles) north-northwest of Smolensk and 80 kilometers (50 miles) northeast of Vitebsk. The Jewish population stood at 1,788 in 1939.

On July 13, 1941, units of German Army Group Center captured Velizh. At the end of July and the start of August 1941, the occupying authorities established a Judenrat and ordered the Jews to register and to wear a yellow patch for identification.¹

Jews were not permitted to socialize with Russians or to appear at the market. Some of the Russian population began to treat the Jews with unconcealed hostility. One witness reported that the Russians viewed the Jews mainly as an opportunity to extract booty.²

Each day, Jewish men ages 15 to 60 had to appear before the Kommandantur, where they were given shovels for different forced labor projects. Generally they worked repairing the Velizh-Demidov-Smolensk highway. At work, they were beaten and humiliated. Occasionally, the guards ordered their victims to squat down and get up 100 times while holding an axe or shovel.

Jewish women also had to perform heavy labor, hauling bricks, logs, or beams, or cleaning toilets. Others had to do pointless tasks, such as gathering stones and putting them into a pile, then the next day dispersing them again. Sometimes they had to do more grueling work, such as collecting water from the river, carrying it up a hill, pouring it on the earth, and then climbing down the hill to get more. The guards often whipped the women.

In August 1941, Sonderkommando 7a (subordinated to Einsatzgruppe B) shot a Jewish woman and eight former Komso-mol members from Velizh for sabotage at the Voroshilov kol-khoz 17 kilometers (11 miles) from Velizh. They were accused of having “attempted to intimidate the population by spreading false rumors.”³ From September 4 to the start of October 1941, Sonderkommando 7a was based in Velizh, where it apparently played a key role in the persecution of the Jews. In September 1941, on the pretext of a work assignment, the Germans gathered approximately 150 Jewish men ages 18 to 35, took them out of the city, and shot them. Shortly afterwards, 50 young women were brutally beaten with rifle butts for trying to run away through the streets.

At the end of September 1941, the Kommandantur issued an order for the Jewish population to be resettled into a ghetto. They were allowed to bring with them only essential items, namely, basic foodstuffs and warm clothing. The Jews’ remaining property was to be turned over to the Russian policemen and redistributed. The ghetto was set up on the edge of the city, next to a large pig farm. A fence surrounded the ghetto, reinforced with barbed wire. Men of the Russian police (Ordnungsdienst) guarded the perimeter.⁴

There were 1,400 to 1,500 Jews in the ghetto. About 1,000 people lived in just 27 houses. The living conditions were atrocious, and many people were unable to wash themselves. About 500 people lived in the pigsty, in which rows of bunk beds, two or three tiers high, stood around one oven, with hardly any room to sleep. Food had to be prepared over bonfires.

Jews were forbidden from leaving the ghetto on pain of death. Non-Jews were also not allowed to enter it. Russian policemen, upon spotting someone trying to escape, would run after them, shouting: “Catch the Jew [zbid!]” Those whom they caught were brutally beaten. They chased the ghetto inmates out of their dwellings and made them watch the executions. The one exit from the ghetto was usually locked; only trucks carrying corpses to the Jewish cemetery were permitted to pass through.⁵

Sources are scarce on the Judenrat’s activities in the Velizh ghetto. The foreman (starosta) in charge was the teacher Mendel’ Itkin. One witness recalled that “the leaders of the Judenrat did not have any detailed or reliable information. . . . [T]hey were unfortunate people themselves.”⁶ The main task of the Judenrat was to pass on German orders to the ghetto population. The foreman assigned people to labor tasks according to the demands of the occupying authorities.

Initially, the Jews lived on whatever they had brought from their homes into the ghetto. But most of the goods spoiled, and famine set in. Many of the inmates were refugees from Belorussia and other places, and without any supplies, these people suffered badly. People grew swollen from hunger, and many young Jews died in the streets. The more fortunate with regard to rations were those in mixed families, as they generally received help from their Russian kin. Neighbors and friends gave some assistance to the ghetto, providing the inmates with potatoes and bread. Sometimes ghetto inhabitants, having removed their yellow markers, managed to get out of the ghetto and obtain foodstuffs from people they knew. They bartered gold and silver items for food.

Winter came, and in the pigsty it was unbearably cold. The Jews were unable to obtain firewood for heating; instead, they broke up the bunk beds. Living conditions deteriorated further. The prisoners used kerosene lamps until the fuel ran out. Several people died each day of hunger, cold, and typhus. Some elderly people fell out of their high bunk beds and died. There was no medicine. The Russian doctor Vasilii Zhukov lived in the ghetto with his Jewish wife and their three children. He was responsible for treating everyone.

Many ghetto inmates owned gold and silver items. Some of the Russian policemen who guarded the ghetto accepted such things in exchange for a little food. But the Germans found out about the barter and shot those policemen. Then the guards started to rob the Jews more systematically.

Witness testimonies provide little information about forced labor by ghetto inmates. They indicate that the Jews were taken out in convoys to work from morning to evening. As a rule, they performed heavy physical and menial jobs. Some Jewish tailors had to mend clothing for the Germans.

On several occasions in December 1941 and January 1942, the Russian police took young Jewish girls and teenagers for work in the city and shot them after they had finished. In a Smolensk court in March 1960, Piotr Sychev, who worked with the German Secret Field Police (GFP), recounted how he had participated in these shootings on three separate occasions.⁷

The Jews did not see any prospect of being rescued from their hopeless situation. A former ghetto inmate recalled that in the ghetto “they gathered in groups and sat silently in the darkness. They didn’t want to speak with each other.”⁸ Jews who came back to the ghetto observed the silence and tried to support the inmates who remained behind each day.⁹

There were some incidents of resistance during the course of an Aktion carried out against the young men. According to testimonies gathered by the Soviet 4th Shock Army, “an unidentified Jew tried to organize a resistance movement armed with axes, but the Germans shot him and his associates before they could realize their plans.”¹⁰ A group of young Jewish girls also escaped from the ghetto and joined Soviet partisan detachments.

With the advance of the Red Army close to the city in late January 1942, some Jews escaped from the ghetto. They hid with acquaintances in the town or went across the front line. Two days before the destruction of the ghetto, the Russian doctor Vasilii Zhukov managed to get his family out and save them.

On the morning of January 30, 1942, the 4th Shock Army attacked Velizh from three sides. Fighting was heavy until February 2, 1942, when Soviet forces successfully liberated the northwestern part of the city up to the Western Dvina River. Then their advance was halted.¹¹

On January 30, the Germans and Russian police sealed all the exits from the pigsty, poured gas on it, and set it on fire.

Then they burned down the houses in the ghetto where other Jews were still living. The police opened fire on any Jews who tried to escape from the flames.¹² Maria Savinskaia, one of the ghetto inmates, recalled at a trial in Smolensk in March 1960: "I saw my mother's black hair catch fire. We got her out through a small window. Then shots were fired. I was wounded, but my friends did not make it. We could only save ourselves. For a long time . . . there was the stench of charred corpses and burnt hair. I've never been able to forget that smell."¹³

Approximately 100 people managed to escape from the pigsty, and of that number, most were wounded or later killed. Dozens of Jews who escaped from the ghetto and hid in the basements of town buildings were discovered and shot by members of the Ordnungsdienst. About 600 people were killed during the liquidation of the ghetto.¹⁴ Some of those who initially escaped from the burning ghetto were killed subsequently during the fighting in the town. Only a few dozen Jews survived, including the teenagers and young women who fled and joined the Soviet partisans.¹⁵ The report of the Velizh District Commission in August 1944 indicates that not 1 Jew remained in the town.¹⁶

The Soviet Extraordinary State Commission (ChGK) assigned responsibility for the crimes against Soviet citizens to the local German military administration in Velizh (Ortskommandantur 849); the Wehrmacht officers Kohlman, Age-ment, Lugash, and Rosenfeld; Bidiukov, the mayor of Velizh; and Murashkin, the chief of the Russian police.¹⁷ The Soviet authorities tried a number of Russian policemen who took part in the murder of the Jews. In March 1960, a Smolensk court sentenced two former policemen to death, and a third received 15 years in prison.¹⁸

VYRITSA

Pre-1941: Vyritsa, town, Gatchina raion, Leningrad oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Vyritsa, Rear Area, Army Group North (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Nord); post-1991: Vyritsa, Russian Federation

Vyritsa is located 56 kilometers (35 miles) south-southeast of Leningrad. In 1926, there were 49 Jews living in Vyritsa, and in 1939, the census recorded 138 Jews, representing 1.2 percent of the total population of the town.¹

German forces of Army Group North captured the settlement on August 31, 1941, more than two months after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22. During that time, some Jews were able to evacuate to the East, and the eligible males were required to report for military service in the Red Army. About one third of the pre-war Jewish population remained in Vyritsa at the start of the German occupation.

During the entire period of occupation, a German military Kommandantur ran the town. The German military administration formed a local council and a police force (Ordnungsdienst), staffed by local residents.

Soon after the occupation of the town, the German Kommandantur ordered the council to organize the registration and marking of the Jews, as well as their use for various types of heavy labor. In October or November 1941, all the remaining Jews in the settlement were rounded up and moved into a ghetto, for which a barn was allocated. This ghetto contained around 50 people. German security forces soon liquidated the ghetto, probably in November 1941, when all the Jews were shot in the forest outside the town.²

YESSENTUKI

Pre-1942: Yessentuki, town, Ordzhonikidze krai, RSFSR; August 1942–January 1943: Yessentuki, Army Group A (Heeresgruppe A); post-1991: Yessentuki, Stavropol' Krai, Russian Federation

Yessentuki is located about 150 kilometers (93 miles) southeast of Stavropol'. According to the 1939 population census, there were 581 Jews living in the town.¹ After the German invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22, 1941, the Jewish population initially decreased, as men of eligible age were conscripted into the Red Army. However, about 1,500 Jews—out of several thousand Jews who were evacuated at the start of the war from the western regions of the USSR to the northern Caucasus—arrived in the town, and most were unable to flee in the summer of 1942 due to the rapidity of the German advance.

On August 11, 1942, German armed forces occupied Yessentuki. Throughout the town's occupation, which lasted until January 11, 1943, a German military administration ran the town. In August 1942, the Ortskommandant in Yessentuki was Oberstleutnant von Beck. The German military created a town administration and an auxiliary police force, recruited from among local residents.

The murder of the Jews of the town was organized by the Security Police of Einsatzkommando 12 (Einsatzgruppe D). This detachment was stationed in Piatigorsk, and it was headed by SS-Hauptsturmführer Heinrich Wiens, who went missing from the military at the end of the war.

Shortly after the occupation of the town, Ortskommandant von Beck ordered the establishment of a Jewish Council, or Judenrat, which consisted of five members. The Judenrat was responsible for carrying out the registration of all the Jews in the town. The results indicated 507 able-bodied Jews and around 1,500 deemed unfit to work, including children and elderly people.² Other regulations excluded Jews from receiving bread rations, and able-bodied Jews were exploited for various kinds of heavy physical labor, including the cleaning of military hospitals. On September 7, 1942, all Jews except those in mixed marriages were ordered to appear on September 9 at a school on the outskirts of the town, on the pretext of being resettled to sparsely populated areas. Most of those who obeyed the instruction were taken out in the early morning of September 10, 1942, and murdered in an antitank ditch near the glass factory at Mineral'nye Vody.³

It appears from the sparse information available that the several hundred able-bodied Jews in Yessentuki were temporarily spared and returned to the school building, which may have served as a form of remnant ghetto or labor camp for six more weeks. According to one source, this camp was liquidated on October 29, 1942, when 483 Jews were shot in a nearby forest. About 15 Jews from mixed marriages were excluded from the antisemitic measures and survived in Yessentuki, although these people also went into hiding during the last days of German occupation, fearing that the Germans might kill them too before they retreated.⁴

ZAKHARINO

Pre-1941: Zakharino, village in the Khislavichi raion, Smolensk oblast', RSFSR; 1941–1943: Zacharino, Chislavitschi Rayon, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Novoe Zhakarino, Russian Federation

Zakharino is located a few kilometers to the southeast of Khislavichi. In 1925, there were 550 Jews living in Zakharino, representing 92 percent of the village's population. In the 1930s, Zakharino was Jewish national sel'sovet within the Khislavichi raion.¹ By 1941, the number of Jews had dropped to only about 275,² primarily as a result of the resettlement of Jews to other regions.

German forces captured the village on August 1, 1941, more than one month after the German invasion of the USSR on June 22. During that time, a few Jews managed to evacuate to the east, and eligible men were required to report for military service in the Red Army. More than 90 percent of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the village at the start of the German occupation.

During the entire period of occupation, a German military administration was responsible for the Chislavitschi Rayon, including the village of Zakharino. The German administration ordered the registration and marking of the Jews, as well as their use for various forced labor tasks such as clearing snow in winter. During the first weeks of occupation, Germans stole poultry and would humiliate Jews by forcing them to fetch water from the well, then pouring it away. Later Germans came from Khislavichi and shot into Jewish homes, killing several Jews. In another incident, two fat Germans forced a Jew to pull them on a cart through the village, as if he were a horse, before they hanged him on an old broom tree.³

The Germans established a Judenrat in Zakharino, which was responsible for passing on German orders and regulations to the Jewish population. In October 1941, all the remaining Jews in the village were rounded up and moved into a ghetto, for which several streets were designated.⁴

A number of Jews arrived in Zakharino who had fled from towns in Belorussia, including Minsk, Vitebsk, and Mstislavl'. According to one fugitive, the Jewish children in Mstislavl' had been buried alive. After hearing such stories, the Jews of Zakharino lived in fear. German Gendarmes and local collaborators periodically entered the Jews' houses to conduct searches. During these searches, they robbed items, raped girls, beat people, and dragged away Jewish men for purposes unknown. In February 1942, a large punitive squad arrived and ordered the Jews to pile up their clothing, cooking utensils, and bed linen in several designated huts. The Germans then transported away these vitally needed possessions in the depth of winter.⁵

The ghetto existed until May 9, 1942, when German security forces liquidated it by shooting all the Jews. According to the records of the Soviet Extraordinary State Commission, there were more than 260 victims, of which the names are known for about 215 people.⁶ After the Aktion, local policemen continued to search for Jews hiding in nearby villages and in the forests, as they received the victims' clothes and several packets of tobacco as a reward from the commandant for every Jew they brought in. These Jews would be escorted to the ravine and shot. Very few Jews from the village survived. The Germans took away the remaining horses and cows and set fire to the village just before their retreat. The Red Army liberated Zakharino on September 27, 1943.⁷

Pre-1941: Zlynka, town and raion center, Orel oblast', RSFSR; 1941-1943: Slynka, Rear Area, Army Group Center (rückwärtiges Heeresgebiet Mitte); post-1991: Zlynka, Briansk oblast', Russian Federation

Zlynka is located 50 kilometers (31 miles) east of Gomel' on the highway to Briansk, which lies 200 kilometers (124 miles) to the east-northeast. The town lies close to the point where the borders of Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus now meet. The 1939 census indicated a decline in the town's Jewish population to 432 (5 percent of the total). This reduction was primarily due to the resettlement of Jews to other regions.

German troops of Army Group Center occupied Zlynka on August 25, 1941, two months after Germany's invasion of the USSR on June 22. The morning that the war started, a loudspeaker announced the news, leading to a general panic. Frightened residents quickly bought as many groceries as they could afford, causing long lines to form. People also exchanged items of clothing to obtain food. At the same time, young people volunteered or were mobilized for the front. During the intervening period before the Germans arrived, approximately half of the Jews were able to evacuate to the east. Slightly more than half of the pre-war Jewish population remained in the town at the start of the German occupation, approximately 230 in total.¹

During the entire period of the occupation until September 26, 1943, a German military Kommandantur ran the town. The German military administration formed a town council and a police force (Ordnungsdienst), recruited from local inhabitants. Soon after the occupation, the town council organized the registration and marking of the Jews with stars on their chests, as well as the recruitment of Jews for various forms of heavy labor.

In early September 1941, in the first Aktion against the Jews of Zlynka, Sonderkommando 7b arrested 27 Jewish men as alleged "terrorists." The men were taken about 10 or 15 kilometers (6 or 9 miles) outside the town and shot.² Shortly after this, by October 1941, the Germans established a ghetto about 3 kilometers (almost 2 miles) outside the town on the premises of the Machine Tractor Station (MTS).³ The Zlynka ghetto existed for around four months. A few Jews who had fled from other towns, including Novozybkov and Gomel', were also settled within the Zlynka ghetto.⁴ The ghetto was composed of two barracks, a few nearby houses, and a bathhouse. The rabbi lived in one of the houses. There was a Jewish elder in charge of the ghetto who organized the collection of valuables and other items demanded by the Germans. The ghetto was not enclosed by a fence, but the Jews were forbidden to leave. Due to severe hunger in the ghetto, sometimes Jews would remove their stars and sneak into nearby villages where local inhabitants gave them food. Some young people in the ghetto celebrated the New Year in 1942 with a tree, music, and singing.⁵

On February 15, 1942,⁶ German-led security forces liquidated the ghetto. When the German and Russian police first arrived and surrounded the ghetto, many Jews gathered in an apartment to pray.⁷ All the remaining Jews were shot and buried in a pit; the total number of victims was 190. The alleged pretext for the ghetto's destruction was that the Jews had established contact with the partisans, after 12 Jews from Zlynka had joined Soviet partisans operating in the region.⁸ However, the German Einsatzgruppen had instructions to murder all Jews in the region. A detachment of Einsatzkommando 8 (Trupp Schulz) probably organized the liquidation of the ghetto, but local witnesses mention that local Russian police also participated in the shooting. During the Aktion, one boy vehemently maintained that his parents were Russian, but nobody paid attention to his pleading, and he was shot together with the others.⁹

SECTION VIII

GERMAN-OCCUPIED GREECE

Following Germany's invasion of Greece from the north in April 1941, in support of its ailing Italian Axis partner, German forces secured control of the Greek mainland by early May 1941. Germany, Italy, and Bulgaria then partitioned Greece into three occupation zones. The Italians became responsible for the bulk of mainland Greece until the surrender of Italian forces in September 1943. The Bulgarians were awarded a strip of territory in the northeast, comprising part of Macedonia and much of Thrace. To the east of this Bulgarian sector there was a small strip along the border with Turkey, which remained under German control. The main block of German-occupied land lay in the center of northern Greece, around the city of Thessalonikē. The Germans were also responsible for Athens and a small area around it, for several islands in the Aegean Sea, and also for most of Crete.

Until September 1943, the German administration in occupied Greece consisted initially of the theater command Military Commander Southeast (Wehrmachtsbe-fehlshaber Südosten), which was exercised by Army High Command 12 (Armeeoberkommando 12). At the start of 1943, Army Group E (Heeresgruppe E) took over this responsibility. Directly in charge of the area around Thessalonikē was the commander for the Thessalonikē-Aegean region (Befehlshaber Saloniki-Ägäis). Under his authority, the German officer primarily responsible for occupation policy in Thessalonikē was Kriegsverwaltungsrat Colonel Dr. Max Merten.

German SD officers subordinated to Adolf Eichmann ordered the establishment of a ghetto consisting of three sections in Thessalonikē in March 1943. No other ghettos were created in German-occupied Greece. Following ghettoization, almost all the Jews of this ancient city were deported to the Auschwitz II-Birkenau concentration camp within six months. Northern Greece was liberated by Allied forces at the end of 1944, although on some of the islands, German forces held out until May 1945.

THESSALONIKĒ (AKA SELÂNĪK OR SALONIKI)

*Pre-1940: Thessalonikē, city, Macedonia periferias, Greece; 1941–1944: Salonika, capital, Besatzungszone Saloniki-Ägäis; post-1945: Thessaloniki, capital, Thessaloniki prefecture and Thessalonikē is located about 300 kilometers (186 miles) north-northwest of Athens. The Jewish population of the city in 1940 was about 50,000.

The German army entered Thessalonikē on April 9, 1941. In the first 10 days the German authorities closed down Jewish community offices, shut down the Jewish press, and imprisoned the Jewish communal council and other community leaders. Immediately thereafter, they confiscated their communal archives, which contained community and member financial data. In a separate operation, the Einsatzstab Reichsleiter Rosenberg scoured Thessalonikē's Jewish libraries and archives, seizing property and sending it back to the Reich. Thessalonikē's chief rabbi, Tzevi Koretz, was arrested in Athens and transported to the Gestapo prison, Hotel Metropole, in Vienna. He returned to Thessalonikē in February 1942.¹

Until July 1942, the German authorities did not implement racist legislation against Thessalonikē's Jews. However, in April 1941, some Thessalonians initiated the placement of signs forbidding entry to Jews, stating that their presence was unwelcome in all restaurants and coffee shops in the city. From the outset, the Germans permitted only antisemitic newspapers. The new newspaper Nea Evropi (New Europe) joined the already established, pro-German Apoyevmatini in publishing scurrilous, defamatory, and historically inaccurate articles against Thessalonikē's Jews. Local rumors spread of a secret referendum, according to which the Thessalonians implored the German authorities to apply racial legislation. The German officer who became responsible for the city of Thessalonikē in August of 1942, Kriegsverwaltungsrat (KVR) for the Saloniki-Aegean Theater, Colonel Dr. Max Merten, referred to this rumor to blackmail the Jews.

In July 1942, General Kurt von Krenzski ordered all Jewish males, aged 18 to 45, except for Italian or Spanish passport holders, to appear at Freedom Square (Plateia Eleftherias) at 8:00 A.M. on Saturday, July 11, threatening dire penalties for nonconformity. The Jews soon found out they were to be used in forced labor for military work and road construction. Dozens of Greek municipal employees under German supervision registered some 6,000 to 9,000 Jews.² During this assembly the German authorities mistreated and humiliated the Jews, with beatings, penal exercises, and assaults by guard dogs. In the days that followed, the men received cursory medical examinations by Greek physicians. By September 1942, some 2,000 to 3,000 Jewish laborers were engaged in building military roads, under the supervision of the German Müller construction firm. From the outset, living conditions were so bad that medical assistance was needed immediately. The forced laborers worked for more than 10 hours a day, primarily in quarries. Physical abuse was routine. Summer heat, malaria, and the lack of basic hygiene contributed to the spread of epidemics. The first dead engendered uproar in Thessalonikē's Jewish community and prompted immediate intervention.

From August 20, 1942, the task of relieving the hard-pressed forced laborers fell, with the agreement of Merten and Müller, on the Jewish community's Central Coordinating Committee for Welfare Works. Exempted from forced labor were men who fell into the categories of sole breadwinners and high school or university students, while exemptions could be purchased for a minimum of 1 million drachmas. It is estimated that in its first 20 days of operation the liaison office drafted 3,000 new laborers, established buyout fees for 500 draftees, and exempted 6,000 students plus 1,000 others. The buyouts raised approximately 7.5 billion drachmas, held in trust by the Jewish community.

Meanwhile, Organisation Todt (OT), the Nazi construction organization, dispatched Jewish laborers to various sites in Chalkidiki. The OT work supervisors' savagery resulted in escapes, arrests, and on-the-spot executions. Due to the high number of deaths, the Central Coordinating Committee sent Yomtov Yakoel to visit the works in Gida, Methoni, Aghios Dimitrios, and elsewhere with Müller and Greek General Lavranos. So shaken was Yakoel that he wrote a report, contrasting the peasants' compassion with the OT's cruelty. After witnessing the forced laborers' miserable condition, Müller proposed the replacement of Jewish workers by non-Jewish road builders. He estimated that if an amount of 2 billion drachmas could be collected from the Jewish workers' buyout fees, it would suffice to pay the non-Jewish workers' wages. Merten endorsed the idea of replacing the Jewish workers but raised the ransom to 3.5 billion drachmas. Meanwhile, Koretz, recently released from a second stint in German custody, and the committee members replied that they could not collect this huge sum in such a limited time. Merten thereupon recommended that the Jewish community pay 2 billion drachmas in cash; the balance was to be taken in the form of the Jewish community relinquishing its claims to the Jewish cemetery, which was to be used for military purposes. In responding to Merten's blackmail the committee members wrote that an amount of 2 billion drachmas could be collected and that it was up to Merten to decide whether military considerations necessitated the Jewish cemetery's destruction.

Acting on a request by Macedonian General Governor Vassilis Simonidis, the Thessalonikē-Aegean military command sent a letter to the Jewish community to collaborate with the municipality in the Jewish cemetery's transfer, which like the Greek Orthodox cemetery was located in the city's center. But the 10 days allotted to relocate the remains were insufficient to perform such a huge operation, as the old cemetery measured 350,000 square meters (86.5 acres) and contained nearly 300,000 graves. On December 6, 1942, the municipality dispatched thousands of workers who destroyed the cemetery, in the process ignoring German instructions to set aside certain tombs of high archaeological and historical value. The municipality used the tombstones to repair sidewalks and the Church of St. Demetrius and to build a swimming pool for German officers. The cemetery's demolition was a political, not a military, act, since Merten thought it would bring the non-Jewish population over to his side. Destroying the Jewish cemetery, subsequently the site of the Aristotelian University of Thessalonikē, completed the city's Hellenization.

In December 1942, Chief Rabbi Dr. Tzevi Koretz replaced Sabi Saltiel as head of the Jewish community. In the early months of 1943, Koretz served as de facto Jewish elder over the communal council and from February had to meet twice weekly with representatives from the Security Police (Sicherheitspolizei, Sipo). Appointed chief rabbi of Thessalonikē in 1932, his behavior as Jewish community president during the Holocaust prompted accusations of collaboration, but subsequent historical accounts have begun to reassess his role. Indeed, Koretz's name headed a list of Jewish collaborators drawn up after the war and submitted to the Special Court of Thessalonikē.³ In a memoir secretly written during the deportations, Yakoei blamed Koretz for moral blindness: "At the head of this multifarious and multifaceted organization [the communal council] stood the Chief Rabbi, Dr. Koretz, occupying himself personally, from morning till late at night, with the smallest and least important details, neglecting the examination of the greater problem: the fate that awaited the Jewry of Salonika."⁴ A Polish Jew, Koretz held a doctorate from the University of Vienna and spoke German, Greek, and Spanish. As historian Minna Rozen has recently argued, he was a useful scapegoat for the Sephardic community: not only was he viewed as an Ashkenazi outsider, but his uncovering of financial irregularities that implicated the community's leaders in the mid-1930s created lasting enemies. As historian Steven Bowman has argued, it is difficult to imagine how another community leader could have done any more than Koretz, given the impossible situation the Germans created.

In January 1943, SS-Sturmabführer Rolf Günther of the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, RSHA) IV B 4 (Jewish Affairs) arrived to prepare for the destruction of Thessalonikē's Jews. At Adolf Eichmann's behest, he demanded the compilation of a historical, demographic, and economic report on the Jewish community and its members.⁵ Following Günther's mission, on February 6, 1943, Eichmann's specialists, SS-Hauptsturmführer Dieter Wisliceny and SS-Hauptsturmführer Alois Brunner, came to Thessalonikē. Requisitioning a Jewish house at 42 Velissariou Street, near the Jewish community offices, they established the headquarters for the Special Detachment for Jewish Matters of the Security Police Saloniki-Aegean (Sonderkommando für Judenangelegenheiten der Sicherheitspolizei, Saloniki-Ägäis). Early accounts of the Holocaust in Thessalonikē erroneously referred to their mission as the "Rosenberg Kommando." At the International Military Tribunal, Wisliceny self-servingly testified that Brunner handled the "technical" (i.e., railway) aspects of the "Final Solution" and therefore did not answer to him.⁶

The destruction process in Thessalonikē took only five weeks from the badging order to ghetto formation and the first deportation. In carrying out the Final Solution, as historian Hans Safrian points out, Eichmann's team got vital assistance from the Wehrmacht, in particular Merten, whose signature appeared on many orders. On February 6, Wisliceny and Brunner ordered that Jews not carrying a foreign passport had to wear the yellow star from age five and for all Jewish property to be marked with Greek and German labels. Additionally, the order required the Jews to move to certain defined areas (ghettos) by March 6, 1943, while all other areas were barred to them.⁷ These laws restricted the Jews' movement and simultaneously forbade their entry into cafés and travel by tram or motor vehicle and mandated their return to the ghetto before sundown. Failure to obey these orders resulted in on-the-spot shooting.

The short notice given to implement the measures prompted community leaders to ask Merten for more time, but to no avail. The Jews had to register all belongings and to submit household goods to the occupation authorities. The communal council worked indefatigably to move 7,500 families, who formerly lived throughout the city's neighborhoods, to the confines of three ghettos.

Three predominantly Jewish areas served as ghettos in Thessalonikē. From north to south, the first "ghetto," known as Baron Hirsch, comprised the Aghia Paraskevi quarter, the Regie Vardar and surrounding streets, and the Baron Hirsch quarter. Some accounts do not classify Baron Hirsch as a ghetto at all but as a concentration or transit camp. In 1939, the Baron Hirsch quarter comprised an area of 30,000 square meters (7.4 acres) and 593 rooms. In 1940, new housing facilities were built in the Aghia Paraskevi quarter for homeless Jews. Although the three areas were in close proximity, they were not adjacent but are still considered a single ghetto. A label in German, Greek, and Judeo-Spanish identified the Baron Hirsch ghetto's three exits, two leading to two different streets and one to the adjacent freight railway station from where the deportation trains left. E.D. Gebin, a young Nazi, headed the transit camp, and Vitali Hasson served as his interpreter.

Further south, the second ghetto, Syngrou, was in the center and northwest side of the city and was named after the Monasteriote Synagogue on Syngrou Street. It formed a parallelogram with Egnatia Avenue in the west, the Chalkeon Square in the south, the Kyverneion Street in the east, up to the "Viozah" factory and the Langada Street in the north. The third ghetto was situated in the center and southeast of the city in the Campagnas district (Greek: Exoches) and extended in the west from Vassilissis Sofias Avenue to Vassileos Georgiou Avenue, Evzonon Street in the north, and 25 Martiou Street to the south, including the Kalamaria working-class district in the east to Papaphi Street.

Non-Jews continued to reside in the Syngrou and Campagnas ghettos, while Jewish domiciles were marked with black Stars of David. Jewish houses situated along the ghettos' peripheries were likewise marked with black Stars of David. Many Jews who did not find rooms to rent had to move in with family members who lived in the areas prior to their ghettoization. Non-Jewish policemen and Jewish volunteers wearing yellow armbands inscribed "Jüdischer Ordnerdienst" (Jewish Order Police; Greek: politofylakes) guarded ghetto entrances.⁸ The Jewish militia chief was Salis, a former Greek army officer from Chalkis. Vitali Hasson's right-hand man, Iossef (Jacques) Albala, like Hasson notorious for brutalizing fellow Jews, was assigned the post of Jewish Police chief by Eichmann's Sonderkommando. He organized the 250 members of the Jewish Police and reported daily to the Gestapo.

The German authorities' numerous restrictions, effectively turning the Jews into prisoners, drove some to disguise themselves, leave the ghettos, and flee to the Italian occupation zone and Athens by train. Most Jews, however, followed Koretz's instructions for strict obedience to German orders.

As of March 1, 1943, the Jews were required to register their personal property for statistical purposes. From March 6 they were strictly forbidden to leave the ghetto, and all exits were guarded by German police (Schutzpolizei, Schupo) and Greek police. During the first weekend after enclosure, they went hungry until the communal council was able to distribute some food. Relief came from soup kitchens organized at the beginning of the occupation by certain community leaders and from members of Matanoth Laevionim (Gifts to the Needy, an association founded in 1901 by a group of Jewish leaders and doctors that established several soup kitchens). These organizations were subsequently able to distribute up to 5,000 portions daily, thanks to help from the International and Hellenic Red Cross.

The Baron Hirsch ghetto's proximity to the railway station meant that its 2,315 inhabitants were among the first deported to the Auschwitz II-Birkenau concentration camp. The first transport also included 85 Jews from the village of Langadas and from the Campagnas ghetto. Among the Campagnas ghetto families were the Kounios, who, as fluent German speakers, became interpreters. On March 17, the Aghia Paraskevi's inhabitants were deported, after which came Regie Vardar's turn. After March 19, when the Aghia Paraskevi-Regie Vardar-Baron Hirsch areas were emptied, the Baron Hirsch quarter became a transit camp (Durchgangslager) for the remaining Jews in Thessalonikē. The camp was fenced in by high wooden boards reinforced by barbed wire and guarded by machine guns.

Every couple of days the Germans marched approximately 3,000 Jews to the Baron Hirsch camp from either of the two remaining ghettos, from which they were quickly deported. Most convoys consisted of 40 goods wagons designed to hold no more than 40 men each. Yet the Germans managed to cram up to 70 to 80 people in each, with at least 2,800 per convoy. Deaths occurring in the Baron Hirsch camp and during the deportation went unrecorded. Of the 19 convoys that left from Thessalonikē between March 15 and August 10, 1943, 5 left from March 15 to 27, 9 from April 3 to 28, and 2 in May. According to statistics provided by Hellenic Railways, 42,830 people were deported by May 9.

Koretz unsuccessfully tried to persuade the Greek authorities, including the collaborationist prime minister Ioannis Rallis, to intervene. This attempt led to his third imprisonment, this time in the Baron Hirsch camp.⁹ Some 150 Thessalonikē jurists protested against the deportations and submitted a petition to request that the convoys would be diverted to other parts of Greek territory. The intelligentsia of Athens, including Archbishop Damaskinos, also tried to intercede in favor of the Jews.

In the last two major convoys of May 1943, 2,034 Jews from the smaller communities of Florina, Veria, Didymoticho, Soufli, and Nea Orestia were included since these towns were part of the Thessalonikē-Aegean occupation zone. Another 820 “privileged” Jews—communal council members and collaborators—departed on June 1 not for Terezín (Theresienstadt), as was rumored, but for Auschwitz II-Birkenau.

Some 74 Greek Jewish communal leaders, including Koretz and his family, and another 367 Jews of Spanish citizenship were deported to the Bergen-Belsen camp on August 2.¹⁰ (Koretz died of typhus in June 1945.) Finally, on August 10 the last convoy with 1,800 Jewish slave laborers, dispatched in March 1943 to repair the railway’s north-south Boetia line, was also deported to Auschwitz.

With the exception of some escapees who joined the Greek resistance or hid in cities of the Italian Zone with the help of non-Jewish friends, a few Turkish Jewish citizens, and others who escaped to Palestine, the only ones to escape the German “Final Solution” were several hundred Spanish and Italian Jews who had the right of repatriation. But the Spanish Jews had to hand over their valuables before being deported to Bergen-Belsen, while the Italian Jews were sent to Athens.¹¹

Nineteen convoys consisting of 45,891 people left the city within five months. Of those, 37,387 were gassed on arrival in Auschwitz II-Birkenau; most of the others died in forced labor at Auschwitz. At the end of August 1943, Thessalonikē, the Jerusalem of the Balkans, with more than 2,000 years of active Jewish life, had become judenrein (cleansed of Jews). Only 4 percent of the Jews living in Thessalonikē in 1940 returned after the war.

Documentation from various diplomatic consulates and from the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) underscored the German authorities’ difficulty in keeping word of the Thessalonikē Jews’ fate from the outside world. Not only did the U.S. State Department gather testimony about the deportations from Turkish Jewish returnees in Istanbul, but consuls representing Axis and neutral governments, including Lucillo Merci of Italy, were able to gather detailed information on the Eichmann Sonderkommando’s decrees within days of their issuance.¹² Especially well informed was Fridolin Jenny, the former Swiss consul in Thessalonikē, who repeatedly dispatched reports to Geneva, pleading for relief for Thessalonikē’s Jews.¹³

To date, Alois Brunner has escaped justice for his role in the Holocaust, but the Czechoslovakian government executed Dieter Wisliceny in 1948. In 1957, chief Greek prosecutor Andreas Toussis had Max Merten arrested during the latter’s visit to Athens. Charged with 15 counts of extortion and murder, Merten was found guilty of most charges and condemned to 25 years’ imprisonment, but he only served a minimum of his sentence in Greece: the government of Konstantine Karamanlis released him as soon as it was politically convenient to do so, in the name of preserving good trade relations with West Germany. In 1945, the Thessalonikē Special Court, formed to try collaborators, convened two trials against the journalists of Apoyevmatini and Nea Europi, which led to many convictions. The most important Jewish collaborator to be tried in Thessalonikē was Vitali Hasson, who was executed in 1946.

SOURCES To date there is not a monograph-length study of the Thessalonikē ghettos. Published primary sources on Thessalonikē begin with the collection of German documents, with French translations, found in Molho and Nehama, In Memoriam. Wisliceny’s self-serving testimony on Thessalonikē at Nuremberg may be found in International Military Tribunal, ed., Trial of the Major War Criminals (Nuremberg, 1967), vol. 4, pp. 363–367. Additional sources may be found in Irith Dublon-Knebel, ed., German Foreign Office Documents on the Holocaust in Greece (1937–1944) (Tel Aviv: Goldstein-Goren Diaspora Research Center, 2007); and Alexandros Kitroeff, “The Jews in Greece, 1941–1944: Eyewitness Accounts,” Journal of the Hellenic Diaspora 12:3 (1985): 5–32. The latter consists of U.S. diplomatic and intelligence documents, some of which pertain to Thessalonikē. A useful published diary is Joseph Rochlitz, ed., “Excerpts from the Salonika Diary of Lucillo Merci (February–August 1943),” introduction by Menachem Shelach, Yad Vashem Studies 18 (1987): 293–323. An important collection of published testimonies by Yomtov Yakoel, Isaac Aaron Matarasso, and Salomon Mair Uziel is Steven Bowman, ed., The Holocaust in Salonika: Eyewitness Accounts, trans. Isaac Benmayor (New York: Bloch Publishing Company, 2002). Another significant testimony is Jacques Stroumsa, Violinist in Auschwitz: From Salonika to Jerusalem, 1913–1967, trans. James Stuart Brice, ed. Erhard Roy Wiehn (Konstanz: Hartung-Gorre, 1996). Also see Renee Levine Melammed, “The Memoirs of a Partisan from Salonika,” Nashim: A Journal of Jewish Women’s Studies & Gender Issues 7 (Spring 2004): 151–173. A compelling open letter by an anonymous witness to the unfolding deportations in Thessalonikē, unfortunately of unknown provenance, may be found in Walter Zwi Bacharach, ed., Dies sind meine letzten Worte . . . Briefe aus der Shoah, trans. Marice Tzorf, foreword by Yehuda Bauer (Göttingen: Wallstein Verlag; Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2006), pp. 106–108.

Major archival holdings on Thessalonikē may be found in A-ICRC, CAHJP, JCTh, and YVA. At USHMM, major collections on Thessalonikē include RG-11.001M.21 (ERR, microfilmed from RGVA); RG-11.001M.51 (Records of the Jewish Community of Saloniki, Greece, microfilmed from RGVA); RG-19.045M (ICRC, Commission of Prisoners, Internees, and Civilians; Jews=Israélites, 1939–1961); RG-45.001 (Hellenic Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Jewish Collection, 1885–1957); and the digitized ITS holdings, especially 01 (CNI) and 1.1.47.1 (Various Concentration Camps [VCC]). The USHMMPA has an extensive collection of photographs relating to the public humiliation of Jews at Freedom Square.

ABOUT THE EDITOR

Martin Dean, Applied Research Scholar with the Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies, received his B.A. and Ph.D. in history from Queens' College, Cambridge, in 1984 and 1989, respectively. From 1992 to 1997, he was the Senior Historian for the Metropolitan Police War Crimes Unit in London. He has worked on the preparation of Nazi-related war crimes cases for trials in Australia, Great Britain, and Germany. In 1997–1998, he received the Pearl Resnick Fellowship at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. He is the author of Collaboration in the Holocaust: Crimes of the Local Police in Belorussia and Ukraine, 1941–44 (2000) and Robbing the Jews: The Confiscation of Jewish Property in the Holocaust, 1933–1945 (2008), which won a National Jewish Book Award for Writing Based on Archival Material in 2009. He has authored numerous articles and book chapters on collaboration, war crimes, ghettos, and the confiscation of Jewish property during the Holocaust.

NAMES INDEX

This index lists all names alphabetically by family name. Names and spellings of names sometimes vary, because of marriage, use of a pseudonym, or alternate spellings in the source documents. Although efforts have been expended to make the listings as consistent as possible, a person may appear more than once in the index. Where known, we have used cross-references to link these names together.

PLACES INDEX

This index lists place names; organizations are included in the Organizations and Enterprises Index. The page numbers corresponding to each ghetto essay are in bold type, for example: Balin, 1316, 1325–1326, 1470–1471. Those locations (villages, towns, cities, and/or ghettos) that are also referred to as camp sites in the text are designated as camps in parenthesis (following the Place name). Also note that page numbers for districts are only included as separate entries when the referenced page numbers are unique. Lastly, no entries have been included for the countries Germany and Poland because of their appearance throughout the text.

ORGANIZATIONS AND ENTERPRISES INDEX

This index lists organizations and entities, such as industrial firms, governmental agencies, political parties, educational institutions, private associations, and small businesses mentioned in the text. Some German titles refer to both the person and the office; therefore they are included here. Note that extremely prevalent organizations such as Jewish Councils and the Jewish police have not been indexed.
